against Morgan?" I asked, incredulity in my voice. The banker made haste to assure me that Landon had nothing against Morgan. "It was," he said, "just a piece of demagoguery. Landon felt he had to stick in something like that for public consumption." Then, he went on to tell how he had labored to get the Governor to erase the passage, and how other Kansans had joined in these labors but to no avail. He narrated these labors in detail because he was rather proud of Landon's resistance and, after all, he had referred to Landon's stubbornness as one of the Governor's chief virtues. But he could not bear to leave the story there and hide how, through his own agility, Landon finally was overcome. He said that when it became certain that no local influence could persuade Landon to omit the attack on Morgan, he, the banker, had called up a certain Eastern gentleman, who thereupon had telephoned Landon "in his usual diplomatic way" with the result that the Governor immediately struck the name of Morgan from his speech. The banker had referred by name to this successful Eastern intermediary, and I asked who the gentleman was. "Oh," he said, "I thought you knew. Why, he's the Washington 'front' for —," and he named the president of one of the Morgan banks at New York.

So far the campaign has added nothing to the store of Roosevelt anecdotes unless the story of the circumstances surrounding his acceptance speech at Philadelphia can be placed in that category. You doubtless read at the time many highfalutin stories attaching profound significance to the manner in which the President delivered that acceptance speech. Some found in its slow and measured pace tired and discouraged notes, which they immediately interpreted as symptoms of defeatism. Others interpreted its pace in terms of deep religious and even messianic significance. And there were others who—but there's no need to lengthen the list; the important thing is that all the interpreters were punditical and no two agreed. And the truth of the matter is that the manner affected by President Roosevelt in delivering his acceptance speech had no political significance whatever. In the great stadium where he spoke; the amplifiers down at the far end threw back his phrases at him seconds after they were uttered, and he had to affect a slow deliberateness in order to keep from seeming to himself at least to be making two speeches at one and the same time. The moments before the speech was delivered were no less unhappy for the President than the acoustics which accompanied the address. As he sat on the platform trying to compose himself for the most important address of his career, Philadelphia's Mayor Wilson insisted on pouring into his ear the minutest details of the city's preparations to guard against the President's being assassinated, details about the thousands of cops stationed about the stadium, the thousands of firefighters reinforcing them, and the machine-guns on the roofs. Then, to make matters worse, Senator Robinson, who was to speak four minutes in introducing Roosevelt, lost his manuscript and spoke only one minute, thereby catching the President unawares. A few minutes earlier Roosevelt nearly had lost his own speech, for as he came up the ramp to the platform one of his braces came unfastened and his son, kneeling to fasten it, put down the manuscript he was carrying for his father and a gust of wind scattered its pages among the feet of the trampling throng of ward-healers and Roosevelt worshippers.

It might as well be told here, too—since years hence in some debunking biography it surely will be told—how the President of the United States first met the President-pretender, Landon. They bumped into each other at Des Moines last month as Landon was coming through a doorway marked "Men." Roosevelt said, "Hello." Landon said, "Hello." And that was that. As a matter of fact, it was not the first time they had met. Landon had been a White House visitor in 1934, and the Republican boast that he gave Roosevelt his drought-relief ideas is based upon that visit. But there exists in the office of one of the most violently anti-New Deal newspapers incontrovertible proof that Landon made so little impression upon Roosevelt at the time that he later could not recall ever having seen the Kansan, and his memory failed him on this score under circumstances in which there was no political advantage for him in feigning forgetfulness.

Journalists trouping with Landon come back to Washington bringing word that—no matter how thoroughly publicized by Hearst and others the Kansan may have been—a great many Americans do not know his name and many of them that think they do call him "Langdon." The rest, they say, refer to him as "that other fellow." Those who repeat this observation with chagrin take delight in telling that near Rapid City, Iowa, the correspondents following Roosevelt on his recent drought tour found a woman who did not know Coolidge was no longer President." As the Roosevelt train pulled into a little Iowa town, this woman detached herself from a group beside the track, ran up to the President's son, Franklin, Jr., and, they insist, cried: "Oh, Mr. Coolidge! Won't you please get your father to come out and speak to us?"

As a contretemps this was minor, of course, compared with what happened at the recent American Legion convention that Landon addressed in Kansas. Mr. Landon was all set to deliver, and did deliver, a speech on "tolerance" which was in line with his "teachers' oath" speech at Chautauqua. But one of his ardent supporters, Verne Marshall, a Cedar Rapids editor, preceding him on the platform, roused the audience to fever heat with a flag-waving, red-baiting speech, and Mr. Landon's speech, following the Marshall effusion, was received like that memorable herring that glittered in the moon and stank. Mr. Marshall, incidentally, is the editor who received a Pulitzer prize for a graft crusade a day before the Iowa Supreme Court dismissed all the indictments his campaign had produced.

Mr. Landon's agitation as he heard Marshall heating up that audience must have been something like the agitation felt by Jimmie Williams, the editor Mr. Hearst has sent chasing around at Landon's elbow, when he received his advance copy of the Republican nominee's Chautauqua speech and saw the teachers'-oath passage in it. Williams, the Hearst editor who figured in the Black committee's exposure of Hearst's telegram damning the late Representative McSwain as a Communist, had quitted the Landon entourage at West Middlesex, but having been apparently tipped off that the Chautauqua speech would contain something distasteful to his master, had scrambled back aboard the campaign train at New Castle. Once aboard the lugger, he began pounding on doors and angrily insisting to the Landon retainers that the teachers'-oath passage be deleted. It is pleasant to recall that Mr. Williams's exhortations achieved nothing but the elevation of his own blood pressure.

Can Europe Afford War?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

TO THE man in the street, preparedness for war has only two aspects—the military and the financial. After considering the military factors he is almost certain to ask: "But how can nations afford a war so soon after the depression? Are they not already on the verge of bankruptcy?"

The fallacy is a deep-seated one. Prior to 1914 there were experts who insisted that large-scale war was impossible in the twentieth century because no country could stand the financial strain. At most, they asserted, hostilities could only be carried on for a few weeks before the belligerents were forced into bankruptcy. But we ought to know better today. The World War lasted more than four years and cost at least two hundred billion dollars, yet financial stringency played little or no part in the outcome. The same would inevitably be true of any war. Given basic economic strength, finances can be manipulated—by taxation, borrowing, inflation, or confiscation. Without a strong industry and essential raw materials, a healthy budget is of little significance except as it may affect the possibility of obtaining supplies from abroad.

It is generally agreed that man-power will be relatively unimportant in the war of tomorrow. In a short struggle airplanes, tanks, and mechanized infantry are expected to play a crucial role. In a long-drawn-out conflict the advantage will lie with the country having the greatest resources.

A highly developed, diversified industry would be of the utmost significance in either case; and where the two sides were about evenly matched, the availability of foodstuffs and raw materials would almost certainly prove decisive. The next war, even more than that of 1914, will be fought and won in the laboratory, machine-shop, and mine. As Mr. Hanighen pointed out in The Nation of September 5, it is not the airplanes and tanks which a country has at the beginning of a war that count; it is the ones that are built during the conflict. No country can have an effective war industry without these fundamentals: (1) an established iron and steel industry; (2) an established machine industry; (3) an established chemical industry; (4) assured supplies of coal; (5) adequate supplies of iron ore; (6) adequate supplies of oil.

Of all the European countries Germany undoubtedly possesses the most advanced and most diversified industry. The magnificent resistance which it put up during the World War when it was virtually cut off from foreign supplies is a significant indication of its essential strength. Despite the losses resulting from the war, the Reich leads the whole of Europe in steel output and rolling-mill production, and is a close second to the Soviet Union in pig iron. With the exception of the United States it is the world's greatest producer of chemicals. It stands next to Great Britain and the United States in the fabrication of textiles, and is first in Europe in the production of electric power. It also ranks immediately after the two Anglo-Saxon powers in the output of motor vehicles—an extremely important factor in modern warfare.

Although its industry is undiminished in strength, Germany is materially weaker in natural resources than in 1914. Of the four most essential raw materials—coal, iron, petroleum, and cotton—post-war Germany is adequately supplied only with coal. Good coking coal is the most important material asset a country can possess. It is essential in the making of steel and is basic in the chemical industry. Explosives, medicines, disinfectants, and solvents are but a few of the indispensables of war which are indirectly derived from this basic commodity. Before the World War the Reich possessed 40 per cent of the coal and about one-third of the iron ore of all Europe. The Treaty of Versailles robbed it of 10 per cent of its population and 12 per cent of its area, but took 26 per cent of its coal and 75 per cent of its iron ore. Part of the coal has been restored with the Saar, but nearly seven-tenths of the Reich's former iron ore passed to France with the cession of Lorraine. At present most of the Lorraine output is being purchased by Germany to supply its blast furnaces, and a smaller amount of high-grade ore is being imported from Sweden. The latter supply, however, would be far from sufficient for Germany's needs in the event of a general conflict which would cut off the French source. Apart from coal and potash Germany is deficient in practically all the minerals. It has no petroleum. Most of its once abundant zinc supply was located in the territory lost in the World War. It produces small but far from adequate quantities of copper, lead, sulphur, nickel, rubber, chromium, manganese, tungsten, bauxite, tin, mercury, and mica—all important as sinews of war. As a substitute for gasoline Germany has made rapid progress in the production of benzine but finds it a relatively expensive luxury. Despite a highly developed agriculture Germany also lacks essential foodstuffs, the deficiency in proteins and vegetable oils being particularly serious.

In a war in which Great Britain was not involved, Germany might obtain the bulk of its needed supplies abroad. But with a blockade by the British navy the situation would gradually become critical. Neither the Scandinavian states, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, nor Poland is in a position to remedy all of these major German deficiencies. And it must be remembered that Germany has practically no gold reserve and no credit; and its exports would suffer severely in the event of war. Owing to the lack of foreign exchange, the Third Reich has been drawing heavily on its raw-material reserves during the past year, leaving no backlog for the exceptional demands of war. Barring devaluation of the mark and rehabilitation of the export industries, it is difficult to see how this shortage can be remedied.

Italy's deficiencies are far more serious in character. Because of lack of coal, iron, and other mineral resources, it has never developed its industry to an extent comparable to the other great powers. In pig-iron production in 1934 Italy stood twelfth among the nations of the world; in steel output it ranked tenth, just below Luxemburg. Its machine and chemical industries are weak. It has an ample supply of silk, hemp, sulphur, mercury, and zinc. It produces some lead and antimony but is wholly dependent on foreign countries for other minerals. In time of war the deficiency of oil, coal, and copper would be most serious. It is generally believed that an oil embargo at the outset of the Ethiopian campaign would have brought Italy to its knees within three or four months. Like Germany, Italy has widely advertised its experimentation with substitutes, but with few exceptions they are unsatisfactory and relatively expensive. And despite desperate efforts to attain self-sufficiency in food, Italy is dependent on foreign countries for meat and fish, and in bad years for wheat. With practically no gold reserves and a normally adverse balance of trade, it would find it difficult to repair these deficiencies even if it were not blockaded by the enemy.

For the initial stages of a conflict French industry is probably not so well equipped as German. Despite its possession of the rich Lorraine iron-ore deposits, France produces less than half as much iron and steel as the Reich. Its coal output is utterly inadequate to the needs of a great industrial nation. It has a surplus of bauxite, but otherwise is deficient in all the strategic minerals. Unlike Germany or Italy, however, France is practically self-contained as far as foodstuffs are concerned. Providing the seaways are open, it can obtain chromium, nickel, graphite, and vegetable oils from its colonies. And it has, next to the United States, the world's greatest gold reserve. With a neutral or friendly England to assure physical access to supplies, France would be able to maintain its strength for a comparatively long period. It was this capacity, as much as anything else, which eventually turned the tide in the World War.

As compared with the Western powers, the economic strength of the Soviet Union is practically untested. Its enormous population, its vast area, and its tremendous store of raw materials make it potentially the most formidable power in Europe. In the past few years its industrial growth has been unprecedented. From the fifth country in Europe in the production of steel in 1926, it has become second only to Germany. It has the good fortune to be the one country in the world which possesses within its boundaries an adequate supply of all three of the essentials of steel making—iron ore, good coking coal, and manganese. It is also alone among the great powers in possessing an adequate supply of chromium, which is likewise of considerable importance in steel. Certain other of Russia's recently developed industries are of strategic importance. The chemical industry has received especial attention in the second Five-Year Plan, and is believed to be nearly adequate. The U. S. S. R. leads the world in the production of tractors—a fact of great significance in considering the relative effectiveness of a mechanized army. Automobile production has grown many fold in the past five years. No figures are available on the construction of aircraft, but the Russian output is known to be one of the largest in Europe.

Next to the United States, the Soviet Union undoubtedly has the greatest range and supply of raw materials of any country in the world. In addition to being self-sufficient, or practically so, in coal, iron, petroleum, and cotton—the four great essentials—it has abundant supplies of phosphates, potash, mercury, asbestos, platinum, flax, vegetable oils, and timber. Its most serious deficiency appears to be in copper. Although copper production is more than double the pre-war output, it is still well under the country's expanded needs. The same applies to zinc and lead, though these metals are of less strategic importance. Aluminum production is still in the experimental stage but is being rapidly expanded. Until recently the U. S. S. R. was thought to be without substantial deposits of bauxite, the ore from which aluminum is extracted, but several fairly rich deposits have been discovered in the Urals. It is almost completely lacking in tin, nickel, tungsten, vanadium, antimony, jute, hemp, and sisal. It grows no rubber, but has developed tau-sagiz and the Crimean dandelion to the point where a fair amount of its rubber requirements could be met from these sources in an emergency. Like France, the U. S. S. R. is wholly self-sufficient in foodstuffs. And it is second in gold production, thus making possible substantial foreign purchase if the trade routes can be kept open. Russia's great weakness lies in its transportation system. Although the railways have made tremendous strides under Kaganovich's direction, it is exceedingly doubtful whether they could bear the added strain of war.

If forced to depend on its own resources, Great Britain would be a negligible factor in a general European war. While equipped with an excellent industrial plant and possessing an adequate supply of highly skilled labor, England is almost entirely dependent on the empire and outside world for raw materials. If blockaded by enemy submarines or aircraft, it would be able neither to feed its population nor to obtain the resources to keep its great industrial plant in action. Of all the key resources, coal alone is abundant in Britain. The United Kingdom produces approximately 20 per cent of the world's coal, being second only to the United States. It has a fair supply of iron ore, and a trace of tin, tungsten, and lead.

It is usually assumed, however, that the British navy and air fleet would be able to keep the shipping lanes open. If able to draw on empire sources, Britain need have no fear of an extended war. Taken as a whole, the empire is perhaps the most nearly self-contained of the world's political units. It has rubber in Malaya and Ceylon, tin in Malaya and Nigeria, manganese on the Gold Coast, bauxite in British Guiana, vanadium in northern Rhodesia, and phosphates in Nauru and the Christmas Islands. There are deficiencies in petroleum, cotton, potash, antimony, mercury, and molybdenum. Of these the most serious are in petroleum and cotton. Although both Egypt and India are important cotton producers, England would suffer very seriously if American cotton were cut off by blockade or embargo. The empire petroleum deficiency could be very nearly made up by the British-owned fields in Iran, Iraq, and Mexico.

The obvious conclusion of such a survey of the economic resources of the great powers would be that Germany and Italy, as the two chief disaffected powers, would have very little chance if they became involved in a protracted war with France, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain. There are, however, many factors which might modify this conclusion. In the first place, it is evident that the fascist powers would be greatly strengthened if they obtained the active or passive support of the Balkan countries, particularly of Rumania. The recent change in the Rumanian Cabinet which forced out the anti-Nazi Foreign Minister, Nicholas Titulescu, might easily swing the balance in the next war. The rich Rumanian oil fields would be of utmost value to either Germany or Italy. In addition, there are substantial bauxite, chromium, and copper deposits in Yugoslavia and some iron in Czecho-Slovakia. If by reason of deficiency of foreign exchange or sanctions these supplies were withheld, it is highly probable that they would be seized. Germany may be expected to make a sudden, powerful thrust for the Lorraine ore fields on the outbreak of war. It might also be possible for Germany to seize quantities of raw materials in occupied cities as it did in 1914.

Still, it cannot be denied that this rather somber analysis yields a ray of hope. If it is true, as many people believe, that the next war will be fought only when Mussolini and Hitler are ready, the chances would seem overwhelmingly against a conflict within the next few months. Both Italy and Germany have an abnormally small supply of fundamental resources at the present time. Although Mussolini would be the last to admit it, the evidence gathered by the League authorities indicates that Italy has been seriously weakened by economic sanctions. With practically no gold and very little foreign exchange its supply of strategic commodities can hardly be brought to the 1935 level until many months have elapsed. Similarly, Germany has suffered far more than it is willing to admit in the battle for foreign exchange. Commodity reserves, never very large, are virtually non-existent. While statesmen, particularly in fascist countries, are not noted for their foresight, the military leaders of these countries must be aware of the situation. They may feel that their strength in the air and their mechanized forces—their undoubted superiority in a quick thrust—are sufficient to offset their lack of fundamental resources. But it is difficult to believe that they will take the offensive at the present moment when they might be much less handicapped a year hence.

England Betrays the Jews

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, August 23

FOR eighteen weeks Palestine has been the scene of destruction and murder. At least 1,000 persons have been killed. The witches' holiday reached its peak in two atrocities. On the evening of August 13 Arabs entered a Jewish house in Safed and shot to death three sleeping infants, killed the mother who attempted to protect them, and blew the father to pieces with a bomb. Four evenings later two Jewish nurses were shot as they were entering the government hospital at Jaffa.

For these happenings the British government alone is responsible. The disturbances could have been stopped in any week of the past eighteen. Even before the British army was moved here, and when the police force was less than half its present strength, Spicer, the chief of the Palestine police, offered to end the disturbance in forty-eight hours. Military officers assure me even now that if given a free hand the soldiers could restore order in two or three days. Britain has crushed greater colonial revolts in the past.

However, it is not alone a reluctance to drown the revolt in blood which has stayed the hand of the government. The Arabs made it perfectly clear at the very beginning that they would not cease violence until they were given what they wanted. They told the government that they would continue the strike and the disorders for a year if necessary, and they meant it. Their demands were clearly stated: stoppage of Jewish immigration, prohibition of the sale of land to Jews, and a representative national government instead of the present colonial administration. If the government did not wish to put down the revolt by force, as it could have done, the logical thing would have been to yield to Arab demands immediately and not to wait until hundreds were killed. The Zionists would of course have cried to high heaven, but the mandatory power is not bound to take orders from them. Besides there is not the slightest doubt that ultimately the disturbances will be ended by the government promising to stop immigration.

For eighteen weeks Britain has taken no decisive action. That is its crime. It has not adopted the stern measures necessary to end the disorders nor has it yielded to the Arabs. So many inexplicable things are done here that if one did not assume an imperialistic method behind the madness, one would be forced to doubt Britain's sanity. Extreme anxiety to suppress the disturbances is evinced; at the same time fuel is added to the fire by subtle and not so subtle hints to the Arabs to continue their work, and by carefully chosen pro-Jewish measures calculated to provoke the Arabs still more. Finally, the Jews have been annoyed in a way which can mean nothing but a desire to incite them to reprisal.

When the riots broke out in Jaffa on Sunday, April 19, the government had 4,000 men under arms. On Friday and Saturday I had been in Tel Aviv and Jaffa and watched the political temperature rising steadily. When I returned to Jerusalem on Saturday evening, excited young Arabs told me that dozens of their brethren had been massacred in Tel Aviv. They spoke of revenge. Yet the government used neither the press nor the radio to dispel the baseless rumors. When the explosion actually took place, the soldiers were many miles away and even the ordinary police force seemed smaller than usual. The soldiers had strict orders not to shoot, which the Arabs interpreted as official approval of their acts. No suspects were arrested; no rein was put on the Arab press, which carried on a persistent and vigorous campaign of agitation. No attempt was made to check the movements of the leaders, who set out on cross-country journeys to draw the hinterland into the struggle. Crops were put to the torch, trees were uprooted, and before half of May was gone, the number of Jewish dead was above thirty.

The government simply marked time. Not a single one of the incendiaries was apprehended, not a single murderer. Even the triple murder at the Edison Cinema in Jerusalem, when an armed terrorist fired point-blank into the theater crowd, killing three persons, could not move it from its Olympian calm. When Hassan Sidky Jejani, a Jerusalem ambulance lawyer masquerading as a nationalist leader, published a "flagrantly subversive" leaflet calling for mass terror, a fine of $125 was all the government cared to impose on him, although many a suspected Communist has received a long sentence at hard labor for a great deal less. All the government did during those terrible weeks was to pour in more troops and to issue daily communiqués in which "No arrests; police are investigating" appeared at the end of nearly every item of destruction, incendiarism, and murder.

Government officials explained the inactivity as a tactical move to avoid making martyrs of the nationalist leaders and to deal a death blow to Arab morale by allowing the strike with its attendant disorders to collapse of its own weight. But as the Hebrew press pointed out, far from collapsing, it gained momentum. For the first time since the British occupation began, the villagers were given a chance to enter the struggle. Gangs of terrorists sprang up. Cautiously at first, as if to test the government, but more boldly later on when they became convinced that they could carry on their operations with immunity, they attacked travelers on the road. Soon they even began attacking military patrols. On June 2, six weeks after the strike began, an Emergency Ordinance empowering the district commissioners to order the reopening of shops was finally enacted. But the ordinance has remained a dead letter. Another emergency law, passed on June 13, providing the death penalty or life imprisonment for persons firing on the military forces or interfering with public utilities and the water supply, has never been applied. Hundreds of terrorists have been found to be possessed of bombs and loaded revolvers. But so far only two Arabs have been convicted of manslaughter, and they have been sentenced to twelve and fifteen years, respectively. The lesson is not lost on the Arab population.

Symbolic of the government's lack of desire to end the bloodshed is the statement of the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, that suspension of Jewish immigration is "subject to a decision . . . in due course on the merits of the case." Both the Arab and Hebrew press interpreted this to mean that if violence is continued long enough, immigration will be suspended. To confirm further the view that if the disturbances go on long enough the government will yield, negotiations with the leaders directly responsible for the terror continue. Official communiqués have even informed the country on two occasions that His Excellency the Commissioner found it necessary to visit the leaders incarcerated in a concentration camp and to discuss with them the political situation.

On the other hand, the Jews have been indirectly incited to retaliation. How else, for example, can one explain the removal of the army from Safed just before the attack? Young men who volunteered to watch fields and citrus groves were given hunting guns for defending themselves against Arab rifles. In order to maintain "administrative balance," Hebrew newspapers which certainly have not advocated violence have been suppressed because Arab papers have been forbidden, and there is now talk of imposing a collective fine on a Jewish village because an Arab was killed in the neighborhood, although there is not the slightest evidence that a Jew committed the crime. When Jews are shot at, it is always the work, as far as the official communiqué is concerned, of "unknowns," but when one wounded Arab claimed that a Jew fired at him, the identity of the assailant was twice announced over the radio. The Colonial Secretary told Parliament that 120 Arabs had been arrested and 32 Jews, but he did not specify that the Arabs were arrested for murder, incendiarism, and incitement to violence, and nearly all of the Jews for no greater crime than breaking curfew. The administration, in short, goes to any length to give the impression that a civil war is going on.

What does the government want? What imperialist scheming explains this queer situation? The government's tactics are too simply explained by attributing them to the weakness of the High Commissioner, as some do, or to the anti-Jewish bias of certain officials. The explanation lies far deeper. And it is clear that the policy is followed too consistently not to have been laid down by London. The revolt came just in time to provide Britain with a needed excuse for converting Palestine into a military base. When the Mediterranean was threatened last summer, thousands of British soldiers were poured into Egypt. But Egypt was in far too restless a state to endure this or other manifestations of imperialism, and an Egyptian treaty was the result. One of its stipulations is that British troops are to leave Cairo and Alexandria. Another place had to be found, and Palestine is the ideal spot. But although Palestine is being fortified surreptitiously, the mandate prevents its being converted into a second Singapore. Now under the guise of settling internal trouble, the juridical difficulty has been removed. Permanent military barracks are being built at the expense of the Palestine government. Military airports need not be built secretly any longer. One has just been completed near Janin, another is being built near Gaza, many others have been completed, all at the expense of the Palestine government. Tel Aviv is being developed as a commercial port; Jaffa, whose waterfront has been completely cleared since the riots started there, would be useful as a naval port.

In the second place, London probably felt that a little knocking about would teach the Zionists their place in the imperialist scheme of the future. Large-scale immigration and prosperity during the past two years had led the Zionists to believe that their National Home was just around the corner. But London is no more interested in a strong Jewish Palestine than in an Arab Palestine which is a member of a strong Arab federation. It is to British interest to keep the country divided as long as possible. This will insure Britain a permanent job. A strong Jewish state would attract the interest of other states. Already Czecho-Slovakia and Switzerland have begun commercial pourparlers with the Jewish Agency.

There are further and more serious considerations. The Mandates Commission of the League of Nations has been demanding an explanation of the curious situation here. Also there is the Royal Commission to consider. Though the Zionists will probably not expose the administration, both commissions might ask embarrassing questions: Why has the government failed to protect the lives and property of one section of the population against the onslaughts of the other? Hence the administration eagerness to prove that civil war is going on. But the Jews have been too clever for them. They have borne their dead sensibly and not retaliated. As week follows week, the administration is driven into more and more extreme measures to provoke the Jews to reprisal. Police officers have even promised not to interfere. So far there has been no result. Britain must think up another device by which it may keep Palestine under its control and properly subdued.

Private Versus Public Power

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

THE president of one of the largest holding companies in the country was sitting in the lobby of the Mayflower Hotel reading a "paper" contributed by the Russian delegation to the Third World Power Conference. This "paper" was a bound volume of 496 pages printed in Moscow and presented to the conference by G. P. Brailo, chairman of the Russian delegation.

The holding-company man had gone no farther than page eleven when he read a speech of Lenin's beginning:

A report on the electrification of Russia has been included in the agenda of the Congress of Soviets, so that the single economic plan for the restoration of national economy that we have been discussing may be outlined from the technical standpoint. Unless Russia is placed on a different technical level, higher than before, restoration of the national economy and communism are out of the question. Communism is the Soviet power plus the electrification of the whole country, for without electrification progress in industry is impossible.

At this point the jowls of the utility executive turned a deeper purple. The Edison Electric Institute and the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association had come through with $100,000 for the expenses of this conference, and now the papers were likely to use front-page space to emphasize the advantages of public over private ownership of the nation's electrical utilities.

The program for the third meeting of the power men of the world (the first was held in England in 1924, the second in Berlin in 1932) might have been written by H. G. Wells in collaboration with Lewis Mumford and Norman Thomas. As a matter of fact, the proceedings were outlined by two American engineers, Morris Llewellyn Cooke and O. C. Merrill. Mr. Cooke, head of the Rural Electrification Administration and a valiant fighter on the people's side in every matter involving public resources, and Mr. Merrill, who more than any other one person is responsible for the water-power policy of the country, have been working on the content of this conference for more than a year. They succeeded in obtaining for it an appropriation from Congress of $25,000.

Hearing of this, the private power gang, through their sounding-boards, the Edison Electric Institute and the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association, fished up $100,000 for the expenses of the delegates. As a result the conference was attended by a bizarre collection of private-ownership press agents, genuine engineers, government yard-stickers, and out-and-out public-ownership advocates.

At the outset what Amos Pinchot calls the "kilowatt klan" took over the social side of the conference. To impress the 700 foreign delegates with the orthodoxy of the affair, orders were sent out that evening clothes must be worn by those listening to the speech of Secretary Hull at the opening session. Hired engineers in hired dress suits applauded the Secretary of State; the president of the conference, Dr. Julius Dorpmüller, an impressive figure covered with medals grouped around the Iron Cross; and his press agent, Carl Krecke, who went on about the status of power under Hitler.

The next morning, however, the collectivists had their innings. Judge Robert E. Healy of the Securities and Exchange Commission presented a doughty paper in which he urged the utilities to free themselves from "the jugglers of finance." His entire paper was a blistering attack upon the holding-company regime, and when it was summarized by the official reporter of the conference, several utility men walked out in high dudgeon. Immediately afterward, in order to offset the unhappy impression made by Judge Healy's paper, Max Frederick Horn, of Belgium, gave a paper which stated that the holding companies were the potential saviors of civilization.

Maurice P. Davidson, former Water and Gas Commissioner, and Langdon W. Post, Tenement House Commissioner of New York, made subversive remarks about the possibilities of rate regulation, intimating that it was impossible to regulate the utilities under the status quo. Whereupon three appointed spokesmen for the companies who were to discuss the New Yorkers' papers solemnly withdrew their names, which had been written on slips and put into a hat. And so the convention went, with the recurrent theme of private against public ownership underlying every paper.

One group interested in the production and distribution of cheap and abundant electrical power not represented at this gathering was the consumers. No one seemed much exercised by the discussion of rates except a woman from Yonkers, New York, who wondered audibly why she had to pay so much for juice in Yonkers. She was promptly relegated to the background. Yet if the more than 300 papers presented to this conference could be condensed in popularized form, they would form a "true cyclopedia" of power, as Morris Cooke said, and might be read with benefit by consumers everywhere.

A traveling show of the really dramatic exhibits set up here by the Federal Power Commission, the Department of Labor, and the Department of the Interior would also have enormous educational value. At long last the government is taking a leaf from the book of the private-power propagandists and is turning out material in the best advertising technique. Pictures of the TVA and the fight against soil erosion displayed in the lobby of the Hotel Mayflower here are profoundly eloquent of the possibilities of public ownership.

The swarm of press agents for the private companies which was buzzing around every meeting place of the dellegates may be counted on to modify, so far as the newspaper reading public is concerned, the genuine educational value of the conference. It was a bad day for the rate-payer when the conference management consented to accept the donations of the Edison Electric Institute and the appliance makers. So great was the stress on the showmanship angle that the dinner to the delegates was held in the waiting-room of the Union Station. It could, of course, have been held in a large Washington hotel, but then the grandeur of the "social lobby" of the utilities would have been dimmed. On the whole, the conference, with every chance to make a genuine contribution to the world's knowledge of falling water and heat, saw its aims sadly distorted by the American utility executives, who assume that power in every form is their natural monopoly.

Landon Slide

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

TIME: Seven weeks before November 3.
PLACE: A hotel room overlooking Michigan Avenue, Chicago. Colonel Knox is sitting on a couch surrounded by piles of straw votes which he is plaiting into a pattern. He wears a disgruntled look as of a man with an inferiority complex or a Republican vice-presidential candidate in 1936. Charles D. Hilles remains unaffected. John Hamilton paces the floor, stopping occasionally to look at a large picture over the fireplace. It is an old-fashioned tinted photograph of Alfred M. Landon. It depicts him standing simply—upright with his feet on the ground. In one hand he clutches a large sunflower; with the other he is pulling out petals. Some of these lie on the floor and are labeled with the names of states.

MR. HAMILTON: Well, Colonel Knox, anything new about our candidate?

COLONEL KNOX (bristling): Our candidate?

MR. H.: Oh, don't get huffy. Is there any news?

THE COLONEL: According to the Digest poll, your candidate (he pauses and glares) will carry Elizabeth, New Jersey, and New Rochelle, New York.

MR. H. (stopping in his tracks): My God, don't tell me. (He hastily pulls out of his pocket a long sheet, obviously a list, and scribbles two lines upon it.) There. That fixes that. We'll just have him make a couple of rear-end speeches in those towns. Anything else?

THE COLONEL: The redcaps of Grand Central have come out for Landon and have collected a contribution.

MR. HAMILTON: Redcaps? Redcaps? It's a plot. So they're trying to hang the red label on us are they? That's easy. We'll have our candidate (he glares and pauses) make another speech for the open shop. That'll make the labor vote solid. How about New York City?

THE COLONEL: The best of news. Walter Lippmann has come out for Landon. We can depend on him to mop up what few votes there were left in that sector.

MR. HAMILTON: Marvelous. Go on.

indicate that Landon will make a record-breaking run in that state. He will come nearer to losing Connecticut than any Republican candidate since 1912.

MR. HAMILTON (rubbing his hands): Fine. Fine. I suppose that's the best we can do. We can't expect even Mr. Landon to lose Connecticut. How about California?

THE COLONEL: Now California, there's a state! The only Landon territory is San Simeon and even there sentiment for Roosevelt has been detected in the sixth swimming pool in the servants' quarters. I tell you, Mr. Hamilton, in this country we do things right.

MR. HAMILTON: And you'll admit, Colonel Knox, that the Republicans have it all over the Democrats when it comes to engineering a landslide.

COLONEL KNOX: You said it, Mr. Hamilton. That stroke of getting Hearst behind Landon right from the beginning was nothing less than genius. (They go on congratulating each other. Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Hilles draw up their chairs and help Colonel Knox with his weaving. Presently there is no sound but the roar of Chicago traffic and the gentle rustle of straw votes. A knock at the door breaks the spell. Mr. Hamilton answers, and a bellhop hands him a telegram. He tears it open.)

MR. HAMILTON (his face falling): Curses!

MR. HILLES and the COLONEL: What is it? What is it?

MR. HAMILTON: It's a telegram from the Republican state chairman for Maine. (He reads.) "In spite of your magnificent strategy in sending Landon just before primary, we failed to lose Maine. However, without doubt rear-end speeches from Kansas to Portland have cut down Republican vote in other states."

(Mr. Hamilton stuffs the telegram in his pocket, picks up his hat, and is about to leave the room dejectedly when the telephone rings. He answers—and then turns with shining eyes to his colleagues.)

MR. HAMILTON: Gentlemen, that was Herbert Hoover. He's just heard about Maine and he's all cut up. But he's got a way out. He says he's ready to begin speaking in favor of Landon in the middle of October and he guarantees that if he leaves any Republican majorities standing he'll start wearing low collars.

COLONEL KNOX: Mr. Hamilton, I think the populace should be informed of these significant developments.

(Mr. Hamilton takes an air of confidence off the mantel and carefully adjusts it. He throws open the door to the balcony and steps out. There is, miraculously, complete silence on Michigan Avenue as he begins to speak.)

My countrymen. I wish to announce that a vast groundswell is moving across the nation in the direction of the Landon-Knox ticket. The reports by the committeemen substantiate this. (Colonel Knox and Mr. Hilles smile at each other.) Reports from California are exceedingly gratifying. I should like to challenge Mr. Farley . . .

(At this point the lights change, the traffic starts up again, and the voice of Hamilton is drowned in the roar. Meanwhile Mr. Hilles and Colonel Knox are putting the finishing touches on their design. They lay it on the floor and look down at it with admiring eyes. Through the large straw mat, which is a beautiful Hearst yellow, is woven the slogan: WE DON'T WANT LANDON.)

The Used-Car Racket

BY ELLIOTT ARNOLD

THE old-time confidence men who unloaded worthless oil stock on unsuspecting widows or sold gold mines which existed only on highly lithographed paper were as innocent as babes in the woods compared with the cutthroat fraternity which today makes its living selling used cars that are fit only for a junk pile.

There is virtually no car which cannot be temporarily doctored to look and sound and run like a second-hand car in excellent condition. This doctoring process will keep the car running long enough for the sucker to put his name on the dotted line and congratulate himself on getting a good used car at a bargain. The guileless customer drives off and for a day or so everything is all right. Then things begin to happen.

By this time, of course, the "gyp" used-car dealer has transferred the account to a finance company, if the customer is paying for the car on the instalment plan—which, incidentally, in many cases is a racket in itself. The dealer then blandly informs the complaining customer that the car is out of his hands and in the hands of the finance company. At this point the customer figures that he has made so much of a down payment that he might as well go along a little farther, and tries to repair the car properly. Finding it virtually impossible, he may drop the whole thing, whereupon the car is sold again to some other victim. If he has paid cash he is licked completely.

Some racketeering dealers give lofty-sounding written guaranties with the crates they sell. Like the cars, they are practically worthless because in most cases they promise only to replace "defective" parts. It is up to the customer to prove that the part was "defective" when he bought the car and is not the result of his own work, and that is not the easiest job in the world, even if the dealer is honest.

When, in rare cases, the dealer agrees to replace the "defective" part, the customer will find that the guaranty merely called for the "replacement" of the part. It says nothing about payment for the labor involved. The customer will find he has to pay for this labor. He also will find that the "labor" alone will cost more than the whole job—labor, parts, and all—would have cost in a reputable repair shop.

It should be clearly understood at this point that the writer is not making a blanket accusation against the entire used-car industry. Many used-car dealers are reputable merchants who are as careful to guard their good name as any other neighborhood merchant. But there are also racketeers in the business, ruthless men who lost their consciences with their baby teeth and have been going along on instinct ever since. These dealers specialize in wrecked and useless cars that a reputable dealer would not touch. The turnover of used cars in New York City alone is approximately 100,000 vehicles a year. This includes the used cars handled by honest and dishonest dealers. The figure means that about $2,000,000 changes hands annually for used cars—and the gyp dealer gets a large piece of the total.

The first thing the gyp dealer does with the crate dumped at his door is to turn down the speedometer. That's just a matter of a few minutes with a screwdriver. The mileage is cut about in half; not too much or it might look suspicious—they know when to stop. The car is then painted. A shiny car half sells itself. But even in this simple job the future customer is being duped. The cars the gyp dealer gets are usually covered with rust patches. He won't go to the trouble of "curing" the patches. He won't have them sandpapered down and burned clean. He will simply spray a fresh coat of paint over the car, rust spots and all. The result? What appears to be a shiny, new-looking car is in reality a diseased car, rusting under its bright coat of paint. Before long holes will appear where the rust spots are; the fenders, when they are eaten through, will begin to flap like the wings of an unhappy crow. The customer will blink his eyes—if the car has lasted that long—and wonder what has happened. He knows that he has kept his car polished and clean and sheltered; he never saw it rust. If the car were left unpainted, the customer could at least see the rust patches and clear them up. On a newly sprayed car he not only can't see them but has no reason to suspect them.

The dealer knows all too well that the potential customer, after he has been enchanted by the shine of the car, will next examine the tires. In most cases the tires on the dilapidated crates which are dragged to the gyp shop are practically gone; the tread is worn smooth. But that is a simple matter to remedy. If enough rubber is left it is engraved with beautiful grooves which give it the semblance of a fairly new tire. On the floor of the groove, of course, there may be only an eighth of an inch of rubber covering the tube; a sharp pebble will go through it. But it looks fine. Sometimes the tire is worn down too much to be "retreaded." But there is another trick. Take long strips, or shells, of rubber, smooth on the concave inside and treaded on the outside. Spread glue over the interior of the shell and place the strip around the worn tire. It looks swell. After a little bit of riding, to be sure, the friction and the heat and the pressure will loosen the shell, and the ancient tire will be exposed in all its unhappy nakedness. But that is the customer's hard luck.

The customer, when he tries a used car, will always test the brakes. They seem to grip splendidly. In reality they are probably useless. The simplest device for producing the effect of good brakes is to "take up" on the brakes as far as possible. Even though the linings are gone the mechanic can take up enough to make them grip. Of course, without the lining it is simply a question of steel gripping against steel. In the end this means that not only new brake linings but new drums will be necessary. Brakes can also be tightened by the insertion of shims, or thin wedges, between the brake linings and the brake shoes. This will give the impression of brand-new brakes—while they last. Hydraulic brakes are even easier to adjust with shims than are mechanical brakes.

As for the battery, if it is too good the dealer removes it, because he can make a few dollars selling it. If it's not worth much he has it charged to its fullest and keeps it charged until the customer wants to try out the car. Even though one of the cells is dead, he can usually charge it high enough to make it work decently—temporarily. He also boosts the generator so that the motor charges the battery higher than normal and keeps it working for a while.

Suppose a battered, wrecked car is hauled into the shop. The frame is broken; the body is dented. But it is a very easy thing to straighten out body dents. The hard job—and the important job—is straightening out and repairing the frame. The proper straightening of a bent frame is a long and costly job. The body of the car must be lifted off and the frame recast in its original mold. Even if the straightening job is done by a competent welder the frame must be gone over—after the body has been taken off—with a ruler, inch by inch. That takes time and costs money. The dealer doesn't bother with all that. If the frame is broken too badly he may have it welded. He doesn't bother to have it properly straightened. He merely realigns the wheels to compensate for the off-true frame, often shifting the front axle as much as an inch.

What happens? First, there is a constant unnatural pull on the body which eventually will cause it to rip open somewhere. But what is really important is that the drive shaft is forced out of line and is liable at any time to snap from the strain. Also it is tugging on the universal—the part where the drive shaft connects with the transmission—and will eventually ruin that important mechanical part.

Another part of the car which has a tendency to go bad as the machine ages is the clutch. A slipping clutch can be detected even by a novice driver; so it has to be "fixed." It is very simple. Phony dealers have discovered that fuller's earth—yes, fuller's earth, the soft powder mothers use for their babies—inserted through an oil hole in the transmission of certain cars will temporarily restrain a slipping clutch. This method can be applied only to what is mechanically known as a "dry clutch." Most of the smaller cars, the bulk of the used-car trade, have dry clutches.

Bushings and king-pins wear out rather easily, and then the front wheels shimmy. What to do? The car is jacked up and ordinary sand is thrown into the bushing. It fills up the spaces caused by the wearing out of parts and temporarily makes the bushing hold. The wheels stop shimmying, for a while. The sand runs out very quickly, however, and the steering wheel begins to jump in the driver's hands. What is more, while the sand is in the parts, it is further wearing down the bushings, and possibly getting into other parts. Another trick, when the king-pins and bushings are too worn for the sand cure, is to remove the pin, a round piece of metal, and hammer it until it is egg-shaped. Then it is replaced and the sand is tossed in. Egg-shaping the pin makes it broader, causing it to fill more space in one direction and giving it a greater grip—for a while. Or the unscrupulous dealer can burr the pin with a chisel—raise a series of nicks along it.

Suppose the springs are shot. Instead of being curved, they lie flat—dead metal without resiliency. Just tighten the shackles, pull them into a curve again, give the lifeless metal brief new life. Eventually the weight of the car and passengers, the bumps on the road, burst the inordinately strained shackles. The car descends with a bump. The axle snaps. Perhaps something else breaks. Who cares?

Is the transmission gone? That can be detected when the car is put into second speed. There is an unmistakable chatter which means that the bushings are worn. It is very simple to force into the transmission oiled, pulverized cork or sawdust. The thick molasses-like substance closes around the worn bushing, fills it. The chatter disappears. But the trouble is still there; and not only will the noise reappear when the filler wears thin but, worse, the transmission is not getting the proper lubrication, and the repairs which are soon necessary will cost almost the price of the used car itself. Fiber grease, instead of oil, is used to dam up the filler. A faulty rear end can be doped in the same fashion.

The same heavy mixture can also be inserted into the crankcase—mixed half-and-half with regular oil. There it will accomplish seeming miracles. Bearing knocks are eliminated, motor noises are silenced, loose connecting rods are reinforced. Of course, your car is not being lubricated. Metal is rubbing on metal; friction is ruining moving parts. The damage usually finishes the motor. If this heavy mixture is put in the crank case, it will act favorably, for the moment, on the action of a worn oil pump. The density of the mixture will hold up the diaphragm of the pump, making the meter on the dashboard read normal when the pump may not be working at all, or very little. The customer will see a high reading, if he bothers to look; in reality there is no pressure at all.

Even so serious a damage as a cracked motor can be fixed. The block can be skilfully welded. Grease spread over the welding will then cover the signs of it. But eventually the welded line will reopen. It cannot be welded again because metal will not take a second welding in the same place. A new motor is needed.

The dealer is full of simpler tricks. A quantity of ether in gasoline will work wonders. It will eliminate a carbon knock—while the gasoline being exploded contains the ether. It will improve motor performance and power to an unbelievable degree. However, it also so heightens the explosive heat of the gasoline that it may blow off the cylinder head. The old trick of backing a car uphill is a favorite device for proving the strength of a motor. Not many persons know that a car has greater power going backward than in any other speed.

Dealers develop trick remedies for unusual individual cases; they are limited only by their ingenuity. In one case, where a piston was broken, the dealer put an ordinary screwdriver blade in its place; it worked long enough to sell the car.

How Dead Is Liberalism?

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

II

IN ITS broadest sense the term "liberalism" includes both a political method and a conception of the good life. As I indicated last week, Marxians in general and Communists in particular have tended during the last three or four years to center their attacks more and more upon the method alone and to emphasize a conception of the good life — it is supposed ultimately to emerge which is not significantly different from that of the nominal liberal whom they have so much despised. Only the fascists maintain consistently that contempt for liberal ideals per se which, at an earlier period, the Communists seemed often to exhibit, and to the liberal it seems that Moscow and Berlin adopt, for the present, methods which are strikingly similar while intended ultimately to produce governments and societies diametrically opposed. Whether or not either is destined to be successful is another question, but one is sometimes inclined to feel that liberalism could protect itself from its enemies on the right if only someone would manage to protect it from its friends on the left.

Among those with whom I talked André Malraux gave the clearest, the most complete, and the most assured account of the convictions of the intellectual Communist whose ultimate aims are purely liberal. Like so many Frenchmen of his political complexion, he by no means subscribes to all the tenets of the new Russian orthodox church, and in France, he insists, the structure of the present economic order is such that the revolution must be bourgeois-proletarian rather than merely proletarian. Far more important from the standpoint of the present discussion is the strength of his emphasis upon the identity of the life which communism is determined to achieve with the life which liberalism professes to desire.

To him the phrase "Liberalism is dead" is true in two senses. The liberal society is dead because it was never alive; liberalism as a political method is dead because experience has shown that it does not work. The way lies through dictatorship because only through a dictatorship is it possible to make those fundamental realignments of power which are necessary before a truly liberal society can begin to function, and thus the purpose of an anti-liberal revolution is not to kill liberalism itself but to make it work.

In all this, moreover, the intellectual and the artist have a very important role to play because it is primarily through art that the continuity of the liberal conception of the good life is maintained and that—this strikes me as almost too neat and ingenious a solution—the arbitrariness of political acts is prevented from having any significance larger than themselves. They establish no precedents and no presumption that dictatorial methods are generally justified, because both art and the artist are preserving intact the ideals which remain inviolate while, for reasons of pure temporary expediency, they are being violated.

For this reason, also, both the artist and the intellectual have a relation to party policy and to party discipline quite different from that sometimes assumed. So far as the latter is concerned, it is of a particular sort and strictly limited to the field of specific political acts. The party leaders are assured by the artist or intellectual that he will not obstruct political measures, that he will do what he is told to do and refrain from any attempt to interfere in any way with political acts. But in return for this loyalty he will demand absolute freedom of thought and of creation because those are as clearly his fields as the field of political action is clearly theirs.

To ask of him any more or to grant to him any less means inevitable stultification, and most so-called revolutionary art has been bad because it has been an effort to promote political revolution instead of an effort to define, encourage, and celebrate that dignity of the human spirit for which political revolution is attempting to establish the necessary material conditions. Many writers, of whom Louis Aragon in France is a typical example, have all but destroyed themselves out of a mistaken conception of what service in their cause required. To them bad art has come to seem a positive duty, and Aragon, especially, has reviled and trampled upon his natural inclinations. He has taught himself to despise his special talents and peculiar sensibilities because he felt it wrong to be distinguished from the mass, and has developed a masochistic impulse to destroy himself as well as everything he loves out of a conviction that only in that way could he serve the people.

Actually the artist best serves the revolution by serving in his own way the ultimate end toward which he and revolution are both working—namely, the ennoblement of the human spirit. It is true that once when he had been listening to music Lenin was asked if it was not his duty to protect "all this," and that, looking out of the window at a crowd of people in the street, he replied that it was they who had made the revolution and therefore they who came first. It is true, in other words, that the problem of art in a revolutionary society sometimes comes to be a question of quantity versus quality, that the common man has a right to art which the common man can appreciate. But that need lead to no assumption that what he can appreciate is actually the best. The duty of the intellectual and the artist is to see that the best is not lost and that the tradition of the best is not broken. Indeed, it is less true to say that the purpose of art is to promote revolution than it would be to say that the purpose of revolution is to promote art—provided, of course, that one does not define art in too narrow a way. It is through art that the human spirit has achieved that dignity which it is the business of revolution to make available to all mankind.

In certain other respects M. Malraux's philosophy of art is even farther removed from the orthodox Marxian doctrine that literature "reflects social conditions." To him the history of art is essentially self-contained, a history of forms and styles rather than a history of social conditions. It does not react to or against "life" but against other works of art, and "revolutionary art" is not art which deals with revolutionary social conditions but art which finds new forms and expresses new feelings whether the subject matter be traditional or not. Thus M. Malraux, though a Communist, is in these respects nearer to a pure aestheticism than the nominal liberal usually is, and to many of his fellow-Marxians must seem positively counter-revolutionary.

We are, however, here concerned with literary opinions only in so far as they demonstrate the increasing tendency of the Communist to differ from the liberal chiefly in his willingness to adopt anti-liberal methods; in his conviction that it is, indeed, only through them that true liberalism may be reached. And the first thing that must be said of his obviously paradoxical position is that, like the more grotesque position of the "infantile leftist," or for that matter of the Nazi, it lends itself to very neat formulation on the purely conceptual level. Even the aesthetic doctrine of Eisenstein which I summarized briefly in the first article is marked by a logic and an internal consistency which make it seem superior to far more adult conceptions so long as one is content to accept the implied premises and to argue them out without reference to an actual aesthetic experience. In the same way M. Malraux's political theory—one might almost call it political metaphysics—has obviously the same sort of superiority over the apparently fumbling doctrines of the democrat, who may exhibit a more realistic sense of the difference between the formulation of a logical chain of conceptions and the control of a political process but who is prevented by that very fact from evolving so complete or so complacent a doctrine.

Even one as suspicious as I myself am of political theorists who are sure that they have solved the problems of the world because their own equations balance, and because there is no break in the chain of logic from their premises to their conclusions, recognizes what may be called the theological superiority of any one of the three or four mutually contradictory Communist "ideologies" over that of the liberal democrat who is more concerned with what is happening to the liberties of mankind than with philosophical disquisitions designed to demonstrate that dictatorship is an inevitable prelude to liberty. But it may very well be that this superiority is purely theological and that the liberal temper—with its direct and positive reaction against specific injustices and specific cruelties—serves humanity at least as well as the theological temper which accepts any particular injustice or cruelty that it can defend as the means toward some still remote end. After all, many of the bloodiest wars have been fought by those who claimed to love peace, and the rulers of the Inquisition were cruel, so they said, only in order to be kind.

Stephen Spender was not in England at the time of my visit, but it was kind enough to write an answer to my questions in terms not very different from those of M. Malraux. From such representative liberals as Rebecca West and Bertrand Russell I got, on the other hand, no such positive assurances as M. Malraux and, to a lesser extent, Mr. Spender were ready to give. Indeed, to both it seemed that the imminence of war rendered almost fantastic any plan for the future of mankind, which can hardly be drawn up until we know how much of the present world and how many of its inhabitants have survived the catastrophe which is almost certain to arrive before present tendencies, good or bad, have had time to develop much farther. And when I turned from them to T. S. Eliot in the hope of finding a conservative philosophy ready with absolutes to oppose the absolutes of the Communist doctrine, I discovered both a tendency to moderation and a tendency to submit concepts to the criticism of current actualities which reminded me less, let us say, of St. Augustine or Trotsky than of any liberal democrat.

One might suppose, for example, that Mr. Eliot would agree with Stalin, Mussolini, and the Pope upon the necessity of controlling expressions of opinion when such opinions run counter to official pronouncements. So indeed Mr. Eliot does—as far at least as pure theory is concerned. When one knows the truth, or rather if one knows the truth, it is one's duty, he says, to suppress error, and that conviction is anti-liberal to the extent that it denies the liberal faith (vide Mill) in the utility of error itself as a challenge to truth. But Mr. Eliot adds hastily that the difficulty is, of course, the difficulty of finding an authority competent to decide what is true; and when I ask him if he knows any pretenders to such competence which he would today be willing to trust, he answers, not as I half expected with "Lambeth Palace," but with a simple "No"—thus ranging himself, on purely practical grounds, not with the orthodox Communist who would reply "the Kremlin" nor with the oppositionist who might propose the council of his own party, but with the liberal democrat who has not that much faith in the infallibility of even other democrats like himself.

Thus we are led to another conclusion which complicates the conclusion arrived at in the discussion of last week. It is true that the Communist and the liberal tend to agree more and more closely concerning the character of the good life as it may ultimately emerge. But they differ widely in the degree to which systematized "ideologies" inspire them with confidence. Even the churchman, if one may generalize from Mr. Eliot, has lost a good deal of his faith in the sufficiency of merely logical or theological solutions to the problems of society, while it remains for the Communist to compose elaborate treatises which challenge those of the schoolmen in self-consistency and finality.

[Mr. Krutch's third article will appear next week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SECRETARY HULL'S admirable peace speech to the International Power Conference in Washington is a fitting corollary to that of President Roosevelt at Chautauqua. Nothing could have been stronger than the Secretary's denunciation of war as "death to youth, death to hope, death to civilization," and his solemn appeal to the men of science and the engineers before him to use their influence to keep the nations from drifting into a final war because of the armament race and "the dangerous ambitions and conflicting political philosophies" which vex the world. Mr. Landon, too, spoke well for peace on Labor Day to the Kansas American Legion. He urged tolerance and demanded that the Legion uphold complete freedom of speech, but he especially stressed the preservation of peace and the "utter futility," the "waste," the "meaningless cruelty" of war. It is to his credit that he did not accompany this utterance with the usual politician's banality that there is "something worse than war," or refer to our national honor.

Surely we could not have better anti-war speeches than these; yet the fact remains that we are preparing for war as never before in the ridiculous belief that preparedness means safety from war. Mr. Roosevelt knocked the bottom out of that nonsense when he declared at Chautauqua that in the last analysis it made no difference what laws were written to keep us out of war if the President and Secretary of State did not stand fast against our going to war when the emergency came. That only intensifies our anxiety to know how we can keep a President and his Secretary of State from putting us into war. It is certainly alarming to have Ernest K. Lindley assure us that a recent poll of Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet showed that a majority believed that the United States would fight if Japan attacked Canada—which seems quite at variance with the earnestness of Mr. Roosevelt's appeal to the peace elements to keep him out of war at all times.

All of this, and especially Mr. Hull's speech, emphasizes anew the truth that it is the governments and not the peoples—despite the conflicting political philosophies—which are the danger points. This is the case not merely with the dictators like Hitler and Mussolini, but with practically all governments, many of which are warring upon all individuals who declare that they will not take up arms on any terms. It is interesting to note that while Mr. Roosevelt declares that peace must be finally safeguarded by the anti-war elements, his Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Woodring, recently went out of his way to assail as shockingly unpatriotic the 14,000 clergymen who declared that they would in no manner help the government in the next war. Mr. Roosevelt did not rebuke him; nor has he rebuked the numerous admirals and generals who are daily attacking all who work for peace and charging every peace lover with being a craven "red" in the pay of Moscow. Mr. Roosevelt not only tolerates this but more than any other President has strengthened the hands of these intolerant, un-American militarists. Even the governments which sincerely protest that they want peace above all else refuse to allow their people to vote upon war, to dissent from armament policies, or to decline to fight. Yet some of those very governments have shown themselves incompetent to prevent war. They are heading for war again, according to the testimony of President Roosevelt, Stanley Baldwin, Mr. Hull, and many other statesmen, and still they will not assent to any limitation of their complete control of peace and war.

There lies the vicious circle. The people don't want war, the statesmen admit, and don't make war. But they must not have any voice in the decision because diplomatic secrets cannot be shared with millions, and because modern war can be made overnight and, as in the case of Ethiopia, can be begun and ended without a declaration of war. So the people cannot have the right to say whether their sons shall go to almost certain death, whether they themselves shall have death rained upon them from the sky. Is it any wonder that the feeling that governments are the chief enemies of mankind in this matter of war and peace grows steadily? Has not the time come, therefore, for the peace movement to concentrate not merely upon establishing collective security and inculcating the spirit of peace among men, but upon depriving governments of their supreme war-making powers? "But what nonsense that is," multitudes will say, "when in many countries there are dictators in power who can make war without asking anyone's consent, and who have the ability to lay a neighboring capital in ashes overnight." The continuance of the present system certainly does not make those dictators less dangerous, or safeguard any country from their attack. Armaments are bleeding the world white, yet guarantee no peace; on the contrary, they bring war nearer. We could not be any worse off if we sought a way out by some other means. At least part of the world must set the example of giving the people the war-making power and of disarming, even at the risk of injustice and the loss of territory, such as China has suffered. China's plight is dreadful; yet if the alternative is the destruction of civilization by a wholesale war, that situation, bad as it is, is the better. The way to disarm is to disarm. The way to end war is to have the peoples decide and not any small group of men swayed by political considerations. If this sounds wholly unrealistic, then we must face, as Mr. Hull said, financial ruin and "death to youth, death to hope, death to civilization."

BROUN'S PAGE

WHEN first I read in Mr. Hearst's New York American that the Herald Tribune was "willing to aid and abet communism" I was as you might say a little incredulous. I just had not noticed it. However, I decided to investigate and so I went to Blake's restaurant and into the bar. This is just ten feet removed from the entrance to the Herald Tribune building, and I have always found it the place where one can get the most candid evaluation of Ogden Mills Reid as a journalist. I was fortunate enough to run into a minor executive who is very articulate about his paper but perhaps, also, a little reckless. I have made no attempt to confirm the extraordinary story which he told me. He says that within the month America was saved from communism by nothing more than a typographical error in the Tribune composing room. Whether the story is accurate in every detail cannot concern me now. I want to scoop Hearst.

"The first thing that made us suspicious in the editorial room," said my informant, "was the fact that we noticed that Ogden Reid was always whistling the 'Internationale' under his breath. And whenever he got to 'arise ye prisoners of starvation' he would get up and go down to Blake's. I wasn't able to follow him, but it is possible that he contacted Yipsels in the back room."

"I've always found the place very neat and clean myself," I objected.

"Don't be a fool," said the Tribune man who was telling the story. "I didn't say contracted. I said contacted, and a Yipsel is a member of the Young People's Socialist League. Ogden would have preferred to join the Young Pioneers but that is harder to get into than the Yipsels. It is about like the Union Club as compared to the Racquet, and anyhow Mr. Reid already belongs to the Union. But somehow or other he couldn't seem to make the YPSL. Of course he didn't quite get the idea. He thought that if he hung around long enough somebody would tap him on the shoulder and say, 'Go to your room.' That's the way he made Skull and Bones at Yale, but nobody tapped him for the YPSL."

"Perhaps they thought that Mr. Reid was too old to join a Young People's Socialist League," I suggested.

"Not at all," explained my friend, "there are Yipsels with long white beards. It wasn't Mr. Reid's maturity which kept him out but his class position. That hurt his feelings very much because he had a great ambition to be an agit prop in the A. N. P. A."

"It would make it a little easier," I complained, "if you would drop the radical jargon."

"I will forgive your ignorance," he continued, "but the A. N. P. A. is not a radical organization. It is the trade union of the newspaper owners and its full name is the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. Up to a short time ago Howard Davis, the publisher of the Herald Tribune, was the president of the A. N. P. A. It is a closed shop and it maintains an active lobby against the child-labor amendment and other legislation which might diminish newspaper profits. At any rate Ogden Reid got the idea that he might bore from within. Unfortunately he is not a good inside worker. When he sets out to do anything he does it frankly and openly. He began to activize the Herald Tribune, and to all reporters who had been on the paper more than twenty-five years he passed out Browder buttons.

"The next person on whom Ogden Reid's radical propaganda had a distinct effect was Geoffrey Parsons. Mr. Parsons used to be an amiable person who would come down to Blake's in off hours and play the match game. But of late it has been impossible to get him to take his nose out of 'Das Kapital.'"

"Just how far Ogden Reid got outside the office there's no telling. I hear that he approached both Butch Howard of the Scripps-Howard papers and Arthur ('Bugs') Sulzberger of the Times, but that they both threw him down. At the very least they said that the time was not yet ripe. Of course, Ogden Reid felt that he would have to make his move before Walter Lippmann got back from Wading River. In fact they do say that he planned to have the 'I' key on Mr. Lippmann's typewriter wired to an infernal machine. Thus when Walter returned from his vacation and started to prepare his message the bomb would go off, killing the commentator and vastly amusing all the bystanders.

"There were others in on the plot but the cell, or nucleus, was very small—just Ogden Reid and his friends. Lippmann was to be back on a Tuesday, so the revolution was scheduled for Monday morning. The signal was a piece of copy sent out in Mr. Reid's own hand. It ran, 'Red Revolution at 10 a.m. punctually. This means you.' At the bottom the publisher penciled, 'O. M. R.—must.' Then, just to be on the safe side, he added, 'B. O. M.,' which means Business Office Must. Yet in spite of these precautions a proofreader spoiled the whole thing. He saw the item 'Red Revolution' and thought to himself, 'Isn't that silly! That ought to be Reid Revolution.' And he changed it accordingly.

"The make-up man asked, 'What the hell does this Reid Revolution mean?' 'I guess it means there's going to be a new towel in the washroom,' said the foreman of the composing room, and they both laughed and threw it on the floor.

"The next day Walter Lippmann returned and came out for Landon. They didn't even get around to putting the bomb in Mr. Lippmann's machine. Still Ogden took a mean revenge. He sneaked into Walter's office when he was out and penciled a mustache on his autographed picture of Governor Landon."

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Life of a Critic

THREE WORLDS. By Carl Van Doren. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IT IS Mr. Van Doren's peculiarity that, in the gusty office of literary critic, he has always kept his head. If this seems to be a commonplace achievement, then try to think of another who has done the same. All the rest, once they get above writing the review for the book, sprout the horns of evangelists and begin to gore heretics. But not Van Doren. He has had some hand in all the literary controversies that have souged over New York since he first came to town, and in more than one of them his weight has counted, but I can't recall a time when he ever failed to be both just and polite to an opponent, or forgot the issue in the heat of the fight.

But to say so much is certainly not to accuse him of what he himself denounces, in this frank and amusing review of his first fifty years, as "the lazy, timid trick of thinking there is something to be said on both sides." His position has always been quite clear, and whenever there has been any direct challenge to the values he cherishes he has been an active partisan. But he has yet managed to remember that there is a ponderable difference between mortal error and mortal sin, and if that capacity has made him singular, then it is a singularity that has had its plentiful uses.

His basic doctrine is simple, and, as I think, completely sound. He is in favor, in the battle of ideas, of the utmost enduring degree of liberty, and he is in favor of any honest attempt to ascertain and state the truth. No rigid a priori theorizing. No harsh, hampering dogmas about the social, or political, or theological function of literature. Its one and only aim, as Joseph Conrad said, "is, by the power of the written word, to make you hear, to make you feel—it is, above all, to make you see. That—and no more, and it is everything."

The end is thus always the same, but the routes to that end are almost as numerous as the pilgrims who tread them. Herman Melville tramping the sands of his forlorn shores. Elinor Wylie tripping along her street of transcendental gift shoppes. Dreiser stalking through the mud puddles down behind the railroad tracks. Dos Passos riding the parallels of latitude. Van Doren saw what was honest and significant and true in all of them, and, seeing it, he tried to make others see it too. It seems to me that his judgments, taking one with another, have been equitable far beyond the common, and that no other critic of his generation has been less upset by loud noises, loud colors, and loud smells.

His book deals with his literary adventures only in part. His writing is at its best, and the story he has to tell is most interesting, in his earlier chapters, which have to do with his nonage in a small Illinois village. It is a pleasure, in these days of autobiographical tear-squeezing, to discover an author who had a grand time as a boy, and plenty to eat, and no Freudian hallucinations, and a father who made a good living and was his own boss.

This, his first world, was the most spacious and charming. His second, the world of pedagogy, was narrow and stuffy, and he began to bulge out of it the moment he got into it. His third, in which he still moves and has his being, is wider but still not wide enough for a man of his enterprise and energy. More than once, tiring of writing about other men's books, he has ventured to concoct books of his own. So far, they have got much less notice than his critical works—mainly, I suspect, because he tried to put something of his critical precision into them. But in the present volume there are touches of a more Dionysian spirit. His self-imposed rein is looser. He exults and lets himself go; there are moments when he even whoops.

What a novel he could write about the literary quacks of New York!

Our Paramount National Problem

RICH LAND, POOR LAND. By Stuart Chase. Whittlesey House. The McGraw-Hill Company. $2.50.

IF THE average substantial citizen is asked to name the most important problem that confronts the American nation, his reply will be, balancing the budget. By that he means the budget of income and outgo of the federal government. If we were to continue with deficits on the present scale for one generation, the burden of debt would be unbearable, and we should have to resort either to repudiation or to inflation. A grave problem, but there is another budgetary problem that is far graver. That is our budget with our natural resources. Deficits have been running against us since the landing in Jamestown. We have met them out of our national capital, and are still meeting them by this imprudent method. By overcutting our forests, overgrazing our pasture lands, overcultivating and carelessly cultivating our farm lands we are making heavy drains on that natural capital. It would be safe to say that our whole farm production is subsidized to at least 10 per cent of its value by drains upon our diminishing natural capital. We are reaching the limit, and if we go on with this kind of deficit production we shall in one generation encounter, not a paper redistribution of wealth among our citizens, such as repudiation or inflation involves, but actual hunger, bread riots, widespread social disorders.

To this paramount national problem Stuart Chase addresses his book, "Rich Land, Poor Land." It is a marvel of a book, text clear as crystal, illustrated by skilfully drawn charts and brilliant photographs by Charles Krutch. A fascinating book, in spite of the deeply discouraging story it tells, of a hundred million acres, which might have maintained a million families, utterly destroyed by water erosion; of nine million acres destroyed by wind and hundreds of millions of acres more yielding rapidly to wind and water erosion; of forests slashed to the quick and the ground burned over; of grazing lands turned into desert; of the tragic upsetting of the hydrologic cycle which has turned into disastrous run-off the water that should have been held in the soil, to support vegetation and to percolate to the lower levels and feed wells and springs. Our exploitative handling of forest, grazing, and tilled lands exaggerates floods and reduces the dry-season flow of our rivers to almost nothing. In the drought of the early nineties it required the skill of an Indian to swim across the Missouri at Sioux City. Last summer a man waded across.

Whether this acceleration of the flow of water to the sea affects the actual rainfall is not known. What is known is that the effects of a drought are far more disastrous when the water table sinks below the reach of tree roots and below the level of wells. It is known too that floods must become more severe as the run-off becomes more precipitate. Add to the fact of a greater occasional river flow the raising of river bottoms through silting, and one can see why a river in its lower reaches becomes a more and more treacherous neighbor. We are now engaged in a desperate race between the levee builders and the Mississippi. Every year the river bottom rises; the levees must be built higher, with broader bases, at staggering expense. As Stuart Chase puts it, we are setting the river up on stilts, where it may look far out over the surrounding plain. Sooner or later it will stumble, and we shall have our really record-breaking Mississippi flood. That is, if we continue our ruinous practice of exploitation.

There are, however, signs that we shall not continue it. Scientists and nature lovers had dinned the approaching national disaster in our deaf ears for a generation. The effect would have been negligible except for the luck of the American people in drawing from the Roosevelt family two powerful Presidents with economic-geographic minds. The first Roosevelt impressed upon us the meaning of forest conservation. If we are still cutting five times as much lumber as we are growing, nevertheless our area of national forests, scientifically managed, has been greatly extended through the impetus given by Theodore Roosevelt. Since his time we have built up a magnificent corps of forest administrators, fit to serve as a nucleus for the broader service of natural-resources administration we so desperately need. Franklin Roosevelt is no less alive to the need of forest conservation, but his imagination ranges forward to the whole problem—erosion control, the regulation of river flow, flood control, silt control, hydro-electric power. Future ages will count it a fortunate dispensation that a grave depression coincided with the administration of a statesman with a keen appreciation of natural resources. The unemployment crisis brought adequate support for the Tennessee Valley Authority and the systematic reconditioning of a river basin almost as large as England. Pity that a jangle over power competition should obscure in the minds of many good people the fact that we have in the Tennessee Valley project the most intelligent and majestic public enterprise in American history.

The depression gave us the C. C. C. and the opportunity to send out some hundreds of thousands of young men to learn the art of soil conservation and to serve as missionaries for this most important of causes. Two other pieces of American good luck will be noted by the future historian: the Supreme Court decision invalidating the old Triple-A and shifting crop control to the field of soil conservation, and the great drought, which has made even the most exclusive clubs realize that the protection of the natural base of our national life cannot properly be called boondoggling.

Stuart Chase has a geographer's sense of contours, an engineer's sense of quantities, a poet's sense of woods and ranges, wild nature, once lovely rivers now enslaved, defiled, rebellious. When he approaches finance his compass behaves erratically. To put our national estate in proper shape would cost, he estimates, five billion a year for twenty years, and the continuous labor of five million men. We know where the men are to come from. Our advancing technology assures a liberal supply of the unemployed. But the money? Stuart Chase darkly hints at what the government could do if it were its own banker. One surmises that some non-Euclidean fiat-money scheme is lurking in his mind.

What we must do to preserve our natural resources we shall have to pay for out of taxation revenues, although in time of depression we should use our credit boldly. If five billion a year is needed to protect our normal seventy-billion national income against irretrievable disaster, we can find it. But this earthy problem is not advanced toward solution by astronomical figures. It is not necessary for Washington to hold all the top soil of the United States in its official hands. The farmers of France and Germany have done this at their own expense from the time of the Caesars. The farmers of the United States will do a great part of the work of conservation, once we have developed a sound system of permanent agriculture. The help of government is needed to repair ancient mistakes. But the man who mixes his labor with the soil has always been the chief agent of conservation. Presently we shall find out how to let him live in comfort on his own unencumbered land and to develop that love of the soil without which no government, however wise, can maintain intact the basis of the food supply and the national life.

Whose Jefferson?

JEFFERSON IN POWER: THE DEATH STRUGGLE OF THE FEDERALISTS. By Claude G. Bowers. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.75.

TODAY, as a sideshow to their war for votes, both of our great political parties are conducting what can only be called an ideological battle. Both turn to history and invoke the name of the vigorous ghost, the "patron saint" of democracy, Jefferson, to justify their ways to voters, rich and poor, black and white, Jew and Gentile. Whose Jefferson, we ask? The G.O.P.'s, or the New Deal's?

With this fairly burning question in our eye we come to Mr. Bowers's timely work on the Virginia philosopher-President for light on the real nature of the doctrines and interests that clashed in those other days of the republic. But "Jefferson in Power" yields only a few random hints in all its lengthy chronicle. Mr. Bowers's historical method is simpliste in the extreme, and allows of no sociological interpretation. As in his other books, all the world (of politics) is a stage. The scenery is noted; the "actors," quickly described at the beginning, are easily and simply ranged as heroes and villains. Then, dipping his heavy brush in all the colors of partisanship—for Mr. Bowers avows himself a "Jeffersonian"—the author rushes away upon a long, theatrical, and quite breathless word-painting of Jefferson's epoch, day by day, season by season.

An eventful and even tumultuous period in our history, these eight years; but also a highly intellectual age. Jefferson was a son of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, carrying forward a profoundly important and novel experiment in popular government. His letters and public papers and policies are the manual of democratic rule which he has left us. And though Mr. Bowers heartily champions Jefferson, he touches chiefly the surface of the man's thought. A magnificent subject, we must distinguish for ourselves its grand lines in the highly charged, rather heavyweight prose of Mr. Bowers's narration.

Jefferson's victory in 1800 was a "peaceful revolution" at the polls, as he said. A popular party, supported by landowners, chiefly in the South and West, overthrew the junta of Federalists under the direction of Hamilton, who habitually "mistrusted" the people. Jefferson aroused the country, in the tones of 1776, against the Federalist "money changers" and "royalists." In his first inaugural address he projected a "wise and frugal government" whose economies would lessen the burdens upon the masses of people and prevent privileged groups from exploiting them unduly. Diminished military and naval forces would remove further the menace of a possible autocratic rule. At his "court" in Washington the new President introduced the most austere democratic etiquette. All this ran counter to the policies of Hamilton, which had served the financial and manufacturing class so well, and appealed instead to the planters and farmers who composed more than 70 per cent of the population. The other phase of Jefferson's democratic action which is significant to us today is the contest he opened with the judiciary, which had been "packed" with Federalists under the Adams Administration. Here was a citadel of the government, the federal courts, greatly expanded, in which the adversaries had intrenched themselves for life; Jefferson proposed to reduce the provisions for its support, limiting thus its growing power over the rights of the states, not to speak of the federal legislature and the executive. On this front Jefferson came at once into collision with the formidable John Marshall, who "nullified," as we know, part of the legislative action of the majority party and established precedents and issues which run like a thread through our history.

So far, the action is all characteristically "Jeffersonian." But thereafter comes a tale of compromise and conciliation. As the Napoleonic wars engulfed Europe there were dangers and opportunities which could not be ignored. No "strict construction" of the Constitution, such as Jefferson argued for, could ever show any authorization for such a tremendous territorial acquisition as the "extravagant" Louisiana Purchase; and the embargo against trading with the belligerents of Europe, an emergency measure taken in the self-denying quest for peace and neutrality, certainly trampled on states' rights as no decree of King George had ever done. In many a public expression Jefferson used the ideology of the Enlightenment, with its dogmas of popular sovereignty, egalitarianism, and the ultimate triumph of the common man. But between theory and practice there was a large hiatus. Jefferson favored, but did not effectively advance, universal suffrage.

If Jefferson and his lieutenants had any consistent policy at heart, it was, as Henry Adams said bitterly in his "History," one of furthering in the national government "ideas and interests peculiar to the region south of the Potomac, and only to be understood from a Southern standpoint." Jefferson instinctively feared and hated the money-lending and capitalist class, while holding the tillers of the soil to be so far as he was concerned "the Chosen People." At the same time, he showed a vehement dislike and misunderstanding of the urban proletariat, the "mobs" of mechanics and artificers "piled upon each other" in the cities.

In truth, Jefferson presided as chief magistrate over a small, simple, agricultural and mercantile society which flourished wonderfully and which he trusted could be kept flourishing so long as it retained its overwhelmingly agrarian character. It was a very charming idyl—but neither of the great political parties of today, whose spokesmen profess to admire Jefferson, seriously consider returning to that bucolic idyl. Neither party proposes to abolish our General Motors companies, our monopolies with their billions of horse-power—phenomena which Mr. Jefferson could not foresee.

What would Jefferson with his eighteenth-century philosophy make of our Pittsburghs and Chicagos? Would he take his stand with Mr. Landon and the party which now stumps for government economy, reduction of the federal bureaucracy, and even, in some measure, the strengthening of states' rights? Or would he join with Mr. Roosevelt in his sallies against the Supreme Court's legislative vetoes? Would he applaud the Roosevelt solicitude for impoverished mechanics and farmers, and the Roosevelt philippics against finance capitalists—or the Liberty League's defense of "individualism" and the freedom of large business enterprises from government control? The former stockbroker, James Truslow Adams ("The Living Jefferson"), apparently contends that the philosopher-President would have cried anathema on the New Deal and all its public works; while the Democratic office-holder, Claude Bowers, suggests he would have given aid and comfort to Roosevelt.

The truth is that Jefferson, inconsistently enough, altered his doctrines in accordance with economic and partisan realities. Mr. Bowers does not seem to be aware that on the question of judiciary power Jefferson formerly stood in agreement with Hamilton, Adams, and Marshall in counting upon the Supreme Court to check the majority power of Congress. When he became President and found the court in the hands of his opponents, he underwent a change of heart. Who, then, is "Jeffersonian" now, and what is Jeffersonism?

If there is any useful parallel between Jefferson's age and our own, it is that once more a fundamental class struggle, broader, more complex than in the early republic, is discernible in the formal contest between the great professional parties. The old Roman of Monticello might well be appalled by our era of war, mass life, boom, and depression. But surely he would be too intelligent to be "Jeffersonian" in 1936.

Too Much Love

LETTERS TO AN ARTIST: FROM VINCENT VAN GOGH TO ANTON VAN RAPPARD (1881-1885).

The Viking Press. $3.50. (Limited edition, $10.)

SINCE Van Gogh has become America's favorite painter (as this is written, the traveling exhibition of his work has already been seen by more than 700,000 people, and by the time it goes back to Holland probably over a million will have seen it), the publication in this country of the artist's recently discovered early letters, translated from the Dutch by Rela van Messel with an introduction by Walter Pach, is both timely and appropriate.

Ours are today an unsentimental land and age—except where Van Gogh is concerned. So this shall be a sentimental review. Futility is pathetic; realization of futility is tragic. Fortunately for us all, Van Gogh was not tragic. He never became convinced that the world did not want him. So we have again the old story: human beings breaking an artist's heart and then taking it back on their bended knees after he is dead.

Van Gogh, inept and heavy handed in personal relations (words were not his idiom, though he spoke and wrote well at times), was over tender and longing in spirit. Attempts at companionship with the aristocratic academician to whom these letters were written, attempts at making group artists out of peasants, attempts at rendering an ailing, abandoned mother, and two children, happy—these are all of a piece with his later attempts in France to found in good-will a painters' commune, to be a comrade to the bullying Gauguin, to befriend prostitutes. All his career was consistent, including his final insanity and suicide. He was a man who loved too much.

Even in these early letters "To love what we love" is his battle cry, and he asks how people can give their best efforts elsewhere, "treating that which they love as a stepchild, instead of surrendering themselves frankly to the irresistible impulse of their hearts." "The more we love the more we act," he wrote. Until one finds this clue to its strangeness, his life will seem like a string of beads without the string.

It all becomes clear in the first of the letters now before us.

THIS LIGHT Can Save 5000 Lives a Year

AND it can save the suffering caused by more than 80,000 unnecessary accidents; it can prevent an annual economic loss of more than $180,000,000—death, injury, waste that are the result of preventable night accidents. This fearful toll can be stopped by the adequate lighting of the primary highways of the nation.

Already the golden-orange, danger-dissipating light of sodium lamps is lifting the terror that lurks on dark roads. As these lamps illuminate more and more miles of highway, they will save thousands of Americans otherwise doomed to meet injury or death in night accidents. Sodium lamps are among the latest of the many aids to safety to which the General Electric Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, has made important contributions.

But research in light is only one of the many fields in which G-E scientists are helping you. The new manufacturing methods which they have developed have reduced the price you pay for necessities. The new products they have provided have stimulated industry, have created new employment, have raised the living standard of the nation.

Van Gogh's touching eagerness for visits with Rappard, his desire to praise Rappard's work reveal this life-longing for affection. Yet he could not endure the condensed milk of art, and had to shout that the academicians are "not worth a dime."

The next year, however, found Van Gogh still writing letters. He explains anew why he took in the sick woman, "one foot in her grave, mentally as well as physically," her only chance of recovery "in a normal, regular home life." He is undaunted. "Notwithstanding some nasty, yes, very nasty experiences since I took this woman and her two children into my home, the encounter has brought me a certain serenity. . . ."

He is working furiously, has a vision of "art . . . not made only by hands, but of a deeper source." He preaches to Rappard; the friendship totters. Another year. Van Gogh reproaches Rappard for not writing, humbles himself under past criticisms. He beseeches Rappard to come and visit him. He longs for "a chance to find understanding." But he cannot forbear stabbing back again: "The worst of all evils is self-righteousness." He still loves too much.

The last year. Van Gogh—a child hurt in the dark—"I have just received your letter. . . . I hereby return it. . . ." In it Rappard had called his work "superficial," "unreal," "exceedingly weak!!" "Such work cannot be taken seriously," writes the superior academician. "Art is too great a thing to be treated so carelessly!" Van Gogh replies that Rappard is "insulting." Again affection intervenes. "Do you want to break with me?" he sadly asks. "I put too much heart in my work to be insincere . . . your letter was not just . . ." he cries. Then, "Do not quarrel with me." But Van Gogh cannot endure it. "Time will show whether your criticism of my work and of myself were justified or not," he challenges. Finally more pleadings: "We must stop bickering. . . . I am at the end of my wits . . . do not fight with me. . . ." But he cannot help calling Rappard "more tedious and drier than ever!"

Van Gogh had once more loved, and told the truth, too often. He did not want to lose a friend; but nothing infuriates people like receiving justice—and he lost one. The rest is hopeless. Difficult? Of course Van Gogh was difficult. To his dying day he never learned that the love of an uncomprehending soul implies no honor.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT

Mr. Eliot Glances Up

ESSAYS ANCIENT AND MODERN. By T. S. Eliot. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THIS is a new edition of "For Lancelot Andrewes," the slender volume of essays which Mr. Eliot published eight years ago with a preface announcing his position as royalist in politics, classicist in literature, and Anglo-Catholic in religion. He omits the preface now because it has "more than served its turn" and because it has misled too many readers into supposing that in his mind "all these three were inextricable and of equal importance." The italics are Mr. Eliot's, and refer to an ascending importance which time has established among the famous three. Nothing is said any more, indeed, about royalism at all. And classicism informs but a single discourse. The emphasis is all upon religion; by which Mr. Eliot means the Christian religion and more particularly Anglo-Catholicism; and in the high light of which he examines the contemporary world. Two of the essays which he has struck out of the present edition, those on Middleton and Crashaw, were perhaps too merely literary to please him. The essay on Machiavelli would have continued to serve his purpose had he kept it here where it so brilliantly belongs.

For some reason he has not kept it; but for certain very plain reasons he has added three uncollected pieces on the eternal aspects of literature, politics, and education, and he has been content to represent himself as a critic of writing with two further pieces on Pascal and Tennyson.

The position he maintains here—maintaining it with that unique talent of his for being at the same time delicately ironic and fanatically firm—was anticipated in the essay on Irving Babbitt's humanism which he has held over from the earlier book. Mr. Eliot's objection to Mr. Babbitt's morals was that they were after all personal to Mr. Babbitt; lacking the religious reference as they did, they were simply one more attempt by modern man to save himself. Mr. Eliot has grown more and more sure during these eight years that man cannot save himself, and his review of the current chaos is a series of nods in the direction of schemes which will not work because their authors have taken the short view and ignored "the primacy of the supernatural over the natural life." Contemporary literature is by and large "degrading" because it knows no other life than this one; contemporary affairs are mismanaged because we have lost respect for that "other-worldly wisdom" without which worldly wisdom can never be complete; and contemporary education is meaningless because most teachers have forgotten that their problem is at bottom religious. The universal sin is secularism, under whose blind guidance we follow low ideals to the inevitable moment of disillusion—it is only the Catholic, with his absolute ideals and his moderate expectations, who cannot be disillusioned—and then stumble off, still hopeful, in another wild direction. Fascism and socialism, not to speak of the elective system in education, are heresies because their glance is ahead, not up; and because they subscribe to the tragic faith that man is sufficient unto himself. Confidence in the League of Nations is for Mr. Eliot an illustration of "that exaggerated faith in human reason to which people of undisciplined emotions are prone"; and the notion of letting students educate themselves is a sign of our having forgotten that "no one can become really educated without having pursued some study in which he took no interest—for it is a part of education to learn to interest ourselves in subjects for which we have no aptitude."

All of this is interesting, and it would be folly in the present state of affairs to assume without question that it is untrue. There is more truth in Mr. Eliot than there is in many a contemporary prophet to whom he will sound archaic and fantastic. The strange thing is that he speaks in the end with so little force and gives so little assurance that it is the world which he desires to save. The suspicion that it is himself—that he is only one step beyond Mr. Babbitt in the personal race for cover from the hailstones of our unbalmy time—arises if nowhere else from the circumstance that his essay on Pascal's "Pensées" is so much the most powerful essay here; and from the intimation of an affinity which he has felt for one who possessed in such high degree "the sensibility to feel the disorder, the futility, the meaninglessness, the mystery of life and suffering," as well as the need to "find peace through a satisfaction of the whole being." But the suspicion may be entertained by any serious reader on any page of this after all too tentative book. Mr. Eliot has suggested rather than substantiated a human world order, and his humility in doing so is perhaps more exquisite than it should be. What are we to make, considering the sternness with which he has announced the necessity of our learning to interest ourselves in subjects for which we have no aptitude, of his protestations again and again that he knows almost nothing about politics, economics, and science? How then are we to know

MANY MARRIED COUPLES LACK... the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed. $2.

The HYGIENE OF MARRIAGE

By DR. MILLARD S. EVERETT

Dr. Everett holds that there is more variation in sex practices than the average man or woman conceives possible. In this volume, more frank, more informative, more detailed than any yet published in America for the general public, the distinguished author instructs the intelligent reader in the variety that can exist within the marital relationship—and leaves no major aspect of sex untouched. The WHAT, the HOW, the WHY of sex in a simply, intimately written volume that digests the whole of sex knowledge as it applies to the marital relationship and, specifically, to the sex act. $2.50

The first book frankly facing relationships not even supposed to exist. Answers from the modern, enlightened point of view such questions as: What percentage of men and women have sex experience before marriage? On purely physiological grounds, is there any reason why temperate sex relationships should be denied to the unmarried? What are the dangers to a young couple in arousing, but not fulfilling, physical desire? Is a marriage in which there has been pre-marital sexual relationship more likely, or less likely, to go to smash? Etc., etc. 320 pages containing the practical, enlightening viewpoints and advice of 12 nationally respected authorities. $2.50

The SEX LIFE OF THE UNMARRIED ADULT

Edited by IRA S. WILE, M.D.

Many women hesitate to ask even their physicians about those problems peculiar to their sex of which this astounding book treats. Exposes the numerous "scientific" rackets in the field of woman's hygiene, analyzes by name the important products offered for "feminine hygiene," and gives constructive, reassuring, helpful advice. A remarkable medical guide against misleading claims and dangerous products. "Courageous and honest and highly informative."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2

A BORZOI BOOK

Shake Hands with the Devil

A novel of the Irish "lower depths"—the story of the hopeless and degraded ones in a seaport slum. The scene: a tenement house where live an old woman caretaker, three prostitutes, several non-descript drunkards who are capable of a curious wild comedy, and two brothers, one a bully, the other goaded to madness by poverty and sexual repression. Their story makes one of the most powerful of contemporary proletarian novels.

which "ways of reorganizing the mechanisms of this world" are good in the degree to which such things in his opinion can be good? For he cannot tell us. He can merely reiterate, sometimes with an inflection like that of any curate, his faith in the enduring primacy of God's kingdom. And nothing that he says puts down the suspicion that he is as innocent of theology as he is of economics. If this is so, then he cannot be serious. He remains a literary critic of great charm and acumen; one furthermore who is skilful in the art of announcing distinctions—between mediation and compromise, say, or between unity and uniformity—which there never is time to exhaust; but one who, straying into immense subjects with only his "sensibility" to guide him, may add at best a few grace notes to the already roaring confusion. MARK VAN DOREN

The New Deal Reviewed

HALF WAY WITH ROOSEVELT. By Ernest Lindley. The Viking Press. $2.50.

A PROGRAM FOR MODERN AMERICA. By Harry W. Laidler. Thomas Y. Crowell. $2.50.

MR. LINDLEY'S new study of the Roosevelt regime places him in the front rank of commentators on the American political scene. He observed the future President day by day when Mr. Roosevelt was Governor, and from the time Mr. Roosevelt was nominated until Mr. Lindley was sent to report Governor Landon's doings he chronicled Mr. Roosevelt's career every single day for the Herald Tribune, with a detachment creditable alike to that newspaper and to himself. But Mr. Lindley has not been content to be a mere recorder of the President's doings; he has made himself a most careful student of men and events in Washington, where he has himself grown in his powers of analysis and interpretation, his sureness of touch, his ability to portray the political scene as it is.

For all Mr. Lindley's liking for the President, he discusses him with an obvious effort to be critical. He writes so well that the story grows steadily more absorbing, and compels admiration for its clarity of style and its remarkable handling of the mass of material with which the author was confronted. It is interspersed with subtle humor, with complete understanding of the genius politician and of the stupidities of the "economic royalists" who have so long been the masters of America, and with extremely clever use of quotations from Theodore Roosevelt, from Hoover and other reactionaries, and from the recent decisions of the minority of the Supreme Court. Despite its bias in favor of the New Deal it is hardly too much to say that no one who has not read this book can discuss the Roosevelt regime with complete knowledge and understanding. Those who disagree with Mr. Lindley's attitude will have to admit that they have learned a lot and that Mr. Lindley is frank and candid throughout except in his title, deliberately chosen, I suppose, to puzzle us as to its exact meaning. The book ought to be on every editor's desk for its facts, figures, and interpretations, and on every business man's, too.

As for his criticisms, Mr. Lindley feels that the NRA was a total failure from which the President was luckily rescued, and that the President made a bad beginning in the field of foreign policy. He thinks Mr. Roosevelt ought to have done something in 1933 about the Supreme Court, but he is free to confess he does not know what. The President was too optimistic about the forces of natural or semi-natural recovery, and, mirabile dictu, Mr. Lindley accuses him of not having adopted an aggressive spending policy! That one of his worst failures was in not making a comprehensive attack upon the housing problem Mr. Lindley records, and also his slowness and inadequacy in resorting to taxation to encourage spending, and his failure to see that he was sure to lose generally the support of big business, industrialists, and financiers, and therefore must waste no time seeking to compromise with them. He also frankly admits that the President is a poor disciplinarian and slow to rid himself of incompetent aides.

As for the credit side, Mr. Lindley lists sixteen achievements, such as the TVA, the social-security legislation, such as it is, the humane relief policy, the President's efforts to protect collective bargaining, his taking a long step toward establishing the principle that everybody is entitled to a job. He sums it all up thus:

In the aggregate Mr. Roosevelt's accomplishments in three years have been prodigious. Most fundamental of all, he revived faith in the democratic system of government by proving that it was not helpless in the face of a great crisis. He has given the nation a chance to make fundamental adjustments and created at least a moderate amount of hope that it can continue to make them in an orderly manner. He has set or encouraged several trends which point toward a reasonable degree of economic democracy, without which we might as well ring down the curtain now and look around for a totalitarian dictator.

Finally, it must be added that there has been no more thoughtful or searching study of the President himself, his character, the effect upon him of his antecedents, his inherited wealth, and the other influences which have made him what he is. Mr. Lindley insists that the President has had a social philosophy all the way through. About Mr. Farley, too, he takes the unconventional viewpoint: "Eight years of observation of Mr. Farley have convinced me that he is one of the most energetic and efficient men in public life. In my opinion he is better as an administrator than as a politician." This may be true, but Mr. Farley has profoundly affronted the moral sense of the country and therefore served the President and the nation extremely badly.

Were there space I should like to question Mr. Lindley's attitude toward the Hull tariff policy, the big-navy policy, and other phases of the New Deal. But I am compelled to admiration by Mr. Lindley's achievement as a whole, and especially its complete demolition of the absurdities of those who charge the President with trying to "scrap the Constitution," ruin our institutions, "destroy the American system," and make us all bolsheviks. Unfortunately the book suffers from slovenly proofreading and especially from the absence of an index.

Mr. Laidler's volume is an even greater storehouse of facts and figures concerning the New Deal and cognate happenings in other countries, and in addition makes an effort to supply a socialistic program. It is by no means as entertaining as Mr. Lindley's book. It is more a study of the general situation of the United States than a specific inquiry into the New Deal as such. The book would be improved by printing the program in a couple of pages instead of compelling the reader to fish it out of every chapter. But it is, like all of Mr. Laidler's work, an honest, sincere, and painstaking bringing together of valuable facts necessary to an understanding of the existing situation in the world. The reader must be prepared, however, to find that Mr. Laidler believes in nothing short of abolishing the profit system and "a complete reorganization of our social order." There is an excellent appendix on the cooperative movement. These two books together will supply the inquiring mind with all the information needed for an understanding of where we are and what is before us.

THE WAY OUT

To those seeking a permanent efficient and inexpensive solution of the Social Security problem

BEFORE we approve of the present Social Security Act, built on the basis of state socialism or accept the plan of the Republican Party, built even more on the basis of state socialism with a huge addition to the tax burden, would it not be wise to try a democratic plan, which is self-supporting and needs no constitutional amendment?

Such a plan, sponsored by Senators George and Borah, and scheduled for debate in the next Congress is described in the challenging and constructive book:

Rubber: A Realistic History

RUBBER. A STORY OF GLORY AND GREED. By Howard and Ralph Wolf. Covici-Friede. $4.25.

"ROMANCES" of great commodities are numerous. Some of them are interesting, a few even charming. Most of them, however, are distortions of reality, opiates that dull the critical senses. This book on rubber is refreshingly free from romancing. What is more, it is consciously and severely realistic, honest to the core.

The story of rubber is told against a grandiose panorama stretching from the jungles of the Amazon, the Congo, and Malaya to the centers of modern rubber-using industries and again to the remotest corners of the earth to which automobiles and electric cables reach. As background there is a magnificent chiaroscuro of glory and greed, of the unselfish devotion of such inventors as Goodyear and Nieuwland, and of bestialities that would be truly incredible if they were not documented by government reports and court records.

Rubber is a newcomer among the great commodities. Its drama unfolds in less than a century. To be sure the Indians of Central and South America for hundreds, perhaps thousands, of years had been making numerous tools and utensils from various gums: but as a commodity in the modern sense rubber did not come into its own until steam opened up the vast transportation system of the Amazon and its tributaries, and until Goodyear through vulcanization unlocked the myriad-fold utilities of rubber. From then on the drama unfolded with a swiftness which left man dumbfounded, groping in the dark, realizing the true significance of rubber developments long after the event—usually too late.

The volume is divided into five books. The first is merely a prologue, covering the pre-commercial stage. Book Two is the story of wild rubber, its orgies in both South America and Africa. Its high marks are the condensed accounts of the Putumayo and Congo atrocities. Book Three is the story of plantation rubber. It covers not only the agricultural and technological aspects but also the financial, managerial, and other economic and social phases of this great venture of the white man in the tropics. Surprising to many readers will be the suggestion that the small-patch native rubber grower, especially of the Dutch East Indies, may well come out ahead in his struggle with the highly rationalized corporation-controlled plantation. Book Four contains the record of the great inventions and technological achievements on which the modern rubber-manufacturing industry rests, while Book Five tells the story of this industry itself with its ups and downs, its labor troubles, its titanic struggles between industrialists and financiers.

Throughout this volume we meet with real people of flesh and blood, villains as black as those of the cheapest melodrama, heroes whose unselfish devotion to great ideals arouses not only our admiration but our affection. Among the villains there stands out a certain "Coburg," better known to most readers as Leopold II, King of the Belgians. Among the heroes may be mentioned Edmund Dene Morel, and Benjamin Saldaña Rocca, who deserve much of the credit for having exposed conditions in the Congo and Putumayo and who through this courageous publicity contributed much to their alleviation. It would be easy to point to at least a score of biographical sketches and characterizations which are veritable gems. Throughout this study we run into any number of interesting people in the most unexpected places. We encounter Joseph Conrad as Captain Korzeniowski on the Congo River; we meet André Gide in Equatorial Africa. We find Thomas Fortune Ryan of Tammany Hall and New York traction fame in the company of King

Leopold. We learn that Thomas A. Edison dabbled in Mexican rubber stock, being associated with the Obispo Rubber Plantation Company.

Of equal excellence are the technological and economic discussions. The difficult and often highly intricate material is handled with unusual skill, so that even the general reader can not only gain a clear insight but fully appreciate the significance of underlying forces and hidden trends. The story of the technological progress is indeed astounding. The best that the wild-rubber industry had ever been able to do was to furnish a maximum of forty thousand tons of rubber at a minimum normal price of seventy cents a pound. Today the plantations and native growers actually furnish close to a million tons and could readily supply very much more than that amount at a cost which probably ranges as low as three and not much over eight cents a pound.

Viewed as a whole the book is an excellent illustration of the destructive power of the early get-rich-quick form of commercial capitalism. At the same time it holds out the hope that a broader and wiser view is gaining ground. The short-run commodity viewpoint of the trader appears to be yielding in many instances to the longer resource viewpoint of those responsible for the billions invested in giant plantations and huge factory agglomerations. The story of wild rubber is perhaps the most impressive object lesson in killing the goose that lays the golden egg, showing that exploitation of man and nature does not pay. If this book had no other merit than that of driving home this point—and it has many more besides—it would deserve a place of honor in the library of the generally cultured reading public.

ERICH W. ZIMMERMANN

A Modern Robin Hood

PRETTY BOY. By William Cunningham. Vanguard Press. $2.

MUCH as William Cunningham is to be commended for his ingenious attempt to extend the area of social fiction into the underworld, the value of his proletarian gangster as a social symbol is highly questionable. Based on the life and legend of "Pretty Boy" Floyd, one of the recent claimants to the title of Public Enemy No. 1, "Pretty Boy" is the story of a romantic and humane desperado. Reckless, brooding, sentimental, Pretty Boy speeds through a succession of bank hold-ups until his nerves break and he is trapped and shot down by a company of G-men. His funeral is attended by thousands of neighboring farmers, who mourn him as the "friend of the poor." A Robin Hood in modern dress—robbing the rich and helping the poor—Pretty Boy is presented as a small-time gangster who hit the headlines but was really being exploited by the more powerful racketeers who make more money with fewer risks. Cunningham plausibly suggests that Pretty Boy was launched on his anarchic career by the poverty and injustice he suffered in early life. But in his social philosophy of sympathy for the poor working people and hatred for the bankers and their gangster hirelings, Pretty Boy is evidently unique in his profession. Hence Cunningham's portrait of him as a social rebel has more meaning as biography than as fiction, for the significance of the gangster today is that of a "fit" rather than a misfit. In general, "Pretty Boy" hovers between biography and fiction. Other characters emerge only in fragments, and the action lunges, for the most part, through a single dimension. In many places the story reads like one of the telescoped biographies in the novels of Dos Passos.

STUART CHASE'S

most exciting book!

RICH LAND POOR LAND

Never before has Stuart Chase had a theme for a book that comprised so many of the things that seem most important to him. Rich Land, Poor Land presents first a bird's-eye view of America before the coming of the white man—a vast continent, luxurious with forests, rich in animal life, a country of enormous natural wealth.

The scene shifts then to 1936, to a land laid waste by the profligate spirit of the pioneer. One sees the tragedy of the continental forests, erosion, water pollution and floods, mineral and power exploitation.

The need for national conservation becomes self-evident and we review this movement. Marquis W. Childs, N. Y. Herald Tribune: "With his consummate skill, Mr. Chase makes appallingly plain the problem . . . so overwhelming, so vital . . . A dramatic narrative."

BEETHOVEN'S thirty-two sonatas for piano record a spiritual and artistic development that has led certain commentators to regard him not only as the greatest composer but as the greatest artist the world has known. In the two movements of the last sonata, Opus 111, we have the culmination of the long spiritual experience: in the first movement a last grim statement of the inner conflict; in the second—the most wonderful of all movements—the super-earthly exaltation and illumination that Beethoven attained at the end. In this movement there is the fullest, richest elaboration of what has been heard in the conclusion of Opus 110, and before that in the conclusion of Opus 109, and of what has indeed manifested itself in the same way—the efflorescence into trills in the extraordinary concluding variation of Opus 109. The work, in short, stands in relation to the sonatas as the Ninth—which embodies the same experience in its first and third movements—stands in relation to the symphonies; and a recording of it (Columbia: three records, $5) is therefore one of the outstanding events of the year—the more since the only other recording, that of Artur Schnabel, was issued by subscription and is now unobtainable.

Egon Petri's performance is that of an excellent musician; the first movement is without Schnabel's technical imperfections; the second movement is recorded with greater clarity; and its concluding section is not broken. That, however, is because the second movement is played on four records instead of Schnabel's five; and this is achieved by a somewhat faster tempo than Schnabel's and at the cost of the repose, the spaciousness of his performance, which are essential to a full realization of the movement's emotional implications. But those who are not under my disadvantage of having Schnabel's performance in mind will be impressed by Petri's, and rightly.

Columbia's September list is further enriched by Beethoven's Quartet Opus 59 No. 1 in the performance of the Roth String Quartet (five records, $7.50). The Roth group is not heard at its best pumping up vigor for Beethoven; but this is Beethoven in a less vigorous, more reflective mood, and played with beautiful sensitiveness and warmth. And notable, also, in its beauty of tone, distinction of phrasing, and technical ease is Emanuel Feuermann's playing in Haydn's Concerto for 'Cello (four records, $6). The accompaniment by an unnamed orchestra under Malcolm Sargent is not, however, equally distinguished.

In two-record sets (each $3) Columbia offers an excellent performance of Wagner's "Faust" Overture by the London Philharmonic under Beecham, with the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin" on the fourth side; and Fauré's Ballade for Piano and Orchestra Opus 19, to which the suave superficiality of Marguerite Long's playing is better suited than it was to Mozart. The orchestra is not named; the conductor is Gaubert. And on two single discs ($2) is some charming music by Grétry—a ballet suite, "La Rosière Républicaine," which ends with the "Carmagnole" but which in other parts shows as much relation to the French Revolution as Shostakovich's music—the music, not the words or the accompanying ideology—showed to the Russian Revolution even before the change in official party line on the subject. It is well played by the Grand Orchestre Philharmonique under Selmar Meyrowitz.

Letters to the Editors

The Masses in Russia and in France

Dear Sirs: Léon Trotsky is right when he writes in your issue of August 8 of "the distrust or the half-trust of the workers" in the People's Front government and its willingness and ability to satisfy the workers' demands. But as everyone knows, France is primarily a country of about 5,500,000 small landowners, of approximately 1,000,000 small independent shopkeepers and innkeepers, and of over 1,500,000 state employees. Allowing two dependents to each representative of the three preceding classes, we find a total of some 25,000,000 out of 42,000,000 souls in France in what may be called the nucleus of the petty bourgeoisie. Rightly or wrongly, most of them feel that their interest lies in the so-called liberal capitalistic status quo. As for "the 200 families" and their hundreds of thousands of upper-class followers all over France, they know that their interest lies in the status quo. The working class, industrial and agricultural, lies somewhere within the remaining 17,000,000. On the basis of numbers alone Trotsky's predictions of a new French Revolution of the proletariat seem far-fetched. . . .

Like the United States, France has had too long a democratic tradition to allow itself to engage in such a proletarian revolution as Trotsky imagines. Trotsky cannot get over the amazing ease with which a handful of scattered, exiled revolutionaries and a few thousand strikers led 160,000,000 peasants without land. They led them autocratically and they have held them thus ever since. (The new Russian constitution is as yet only a very bright light in the future.) Anyone even superficially acquainted with Russian political and economic history can easily understand the traditional obedience of the Russian masses to their despotic masters. These masses were illiterate, down-trodden, unorganized, used to vague communal land tenure based on supposedly recurrent redistributions. In France there is no majority class with all these traits.

Briefly, in Russia the masses meant unorganized peasants without possessions; in France they comprise three main groups—small landowners, small business people, and small bureaucrats. The Russian masses were badly exploited before 1917 and craved a change; the French have been less and less exploited since 1789 and are inclined to maintain things pretty much as they are. With such an attitude predominant in France, I really believe that when the crisis comes, the fascist counter-revolution of which Trotsky writes will have the best chance of survival, at least for some time to come.

ALFRED J. BINGHAM

New York, August 9

"America Under the Trees"

Dear Sirs: We have read with great interest the article America Under the Trees, in your August 29 issue, in which reference is made to certain conditions in Kansas City, and specifically to the newspaper situation.

The Journal-Post is listed and is conducted as an independent newspaper and is not violently Republican as the article stated. Ever since the two major-party conventions we have attempted to analyze as closely as possible what we held to be the weaknesses in both platforms and campaigns to date, rather than to take sides specifically "for" one candidate.

Toward the end of the article the statement is made that in Kansas the Democratic vote in the primary "showed a surprising total of over 200,000, at least 53,000 more votes than were ever polled by Democrats in any Kansas election." Our Topeka, Kansas, correspondent, W. G. Clugston, a man who pays close attention to political and state matters, advises me that the official count shows that in the recent primary the Democratic candidates for governor received 153,704 votes, and that the all-time high record of Democratic votes in any Kansas primary was set in 1934, when the total vote for governor was 155,355.

Mr. Ward Apologizes

Dear Sirs: I have taken The Nation for quite a number of years because I admire its breadth of view and independence of thought. I have come to rely in most cases on the accuracy of statements in the articles appearing in your publication, but in your issue of August 8, in the article by Paul Ward, his inaccuracy in regard to Minnesota is so glaring that it makes me distrust his whole article. He says: "To this list were added five states, Indiana, Iowa, Idaho, Minnesota, and Oregon. All have Democratic governors."

Governor Olson of Minnesota was elected by the Farmer-Labor Party, is not a Democrat, and has never professed any allegiance to that party.

Later on, in referring to Landon's chances in Minnesota, Mr. Ward says: "Minnesota has one Democrat and no Republicans in Congress." As a matter of fact, Minnesota is represented in Congress by five Republicans, one Democrat, and three Farmer-Labor Congressmen.

THOMAS F. WALLACE

Minneapolis, August 10

Dear Sirs: Mr. Wallace has me on the hip. I must plead guilty to both of the errors charged. In extenuation I hope he will let me plead that the errors are as inexplicable to me as apparently they are to Mr. Wallace. The chart I had worked out as the basis for the article had the distribution of Congressmen in Minnesota properly noted and on that basis I can say at least that the misstatement in this respect in no wise affected the conclusions of the piece. As for the error in giving Minnesota a Democratic governor, I think it immaterial in the context in which it was used, and even if that were not enough, there follows soon after the error a sentence correctly stating that Minnesota's governor was a Farmer-Laborite. I regret that these two slips have made Mr. Wallace distrustful of the whole piece. So may I add that since receiving his letter I have carefully checked and rechecked all the statements of fact in the article, comparing them with official records and finding no other flaws. PAUL W. WARD

Maybe a Little Better

Dear Sir: Your editorial in the issue of August 15, grieves me much—awful much. How could you? It is probably O. K. to call Moe a gunman and a racketeer. But Nation, dear Nation, there is a limit. Why was it necessary as a parting shot to say he is no better than the Chicago Tribune? JOHN WILLARD

The Shape of Things

ALTHOUGH GOVERNOR LANDON HAS NOW climbed on the crop-insurance band-wagon, there appears to be a vast difference between the scheme he has in mind and the plans being drawn by the Administration. Mr. Landon is intentionally vague, but seems to be thinking of insurance in actuarial terms, possibly to be carried out by the private insurance companies. Secretary Wallace, on the other hand, is more realistic in insisting that it is far too big an undertaking to be handled by private organizations. We have learned from the Social Security Act that a complicated, expensive form of insurance involving the accumulation of huge reserves may be worse than none at all. If crop insurance is to be cheap enough to attract the average farmer, it is probable that the insurer will have to take losses. Unlike the private companies the government can afford to do this, if only as a means of reducing relief costs. Mr. Roosevelt has gone beyond Landon, moreover, in recognizing that neither crop insurance nor land conservation will solve the fundamental problem of the ever-increasing number of landless tenants and sharecroppers. Whether cheap government credit will prove an adequate solution depends entirely on how cheap it can be made. Long-term mortgages at 3½ or 4 per cent would merely place the average tenant in permanent servitude to the government. An abundance of government money at 1 or 2 per cent, on the other hand, might usher in an agricultural revolution by returning the land to the men who work it.

THE REVOLT IN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS over the seating of the Ethiopian delegates indicates that the League has not been wholly taken over by the big powers. On September 18 Italy announced that it would consent to resume its seat at the council table if the Ethiopian delegates were refused credentials. The Credentials Committee contains nine members, usually drawn from the smaller nations, who carry on the perfunctory business of deciding on the right of delegates to sit. This time, however, the business was not perfunctory, and England and France were reluctantly obliged to provide two members of the committee before any others would consent to serve. As finally constituted, the committee was made up of representatives of England, France, the Soviet Union, the Netherlands, Greece, Czecho-Slovakia, Turkey, and Peru; and much to the chagrin of the first two, only Peru unequivocally cally supported them in opposition to Ethiopia. French pressure on Professor Gaston Jeze forced that fiery champion of the Negus out of the council room altogether. As a substitute, A. E. Colson, former American financial adviser at Addis Ababa, consented to serve. It is probable that the Credentials Committee refused to agree less out of a passion for simple justice than out of fear that the ouster might serve as a boomerang for other League members at a later day. It is proposed to refer the matter to the World Court, suspending the Ethiopian delegation pending an opinion. But to ask the court for an opinion requires a unanimous vote, and the Ethiopian delegation promises to vote no. A very embarrassing situation all around, particularly for Great Britain, which does not want to take the responsibility of forcing the Ethiopians out and wants still less to offend Mussolini by permitting them to remain. The Duce himself is reported to be exceedingly annoyed. For a Cæsar it is always annoying when right shows a tendency to prevail over might.

NEWS FROM THE SPANISH FRONT IS CLEARLY unfavorable to the government forces. Aided by superior equipment, the Moors and Foreign Legion under General Franco are reported to have captured the strategic city of Maqueda, while the troops of General Mola have made appreciable progress toward Bilbao and Santander. The government offensive against Huesca and Oviedo seems to be at a standstill. Although the government's desperate attempts to seize Toledo's Alcazar are strategically of minor importance, popular interest has centered chiefly on this battle. In making the terrible decision to dynamite the ancient fortress, the government appears to have been moved by a desire to strengthen the morale of the government forces by a decisive victory, and anxiety to release the well-equipped army of 5,000 men which has been held in Toledo to prevent the fascist force from emerging from the fortress and attacking the government's lines of communication. Many of the Alcazar's defenders have been killed in the dynamiting, but the remainder, if not carefully guarded, could cause damage to railroads, bridges, and telephone lines in the loyalists' rear. With thousands of fresh government troops being thrown into the battle along the Maqueda front and the loyalist air force once more on the offensive, it is probable that the decisive battles of the war will be fought this week.

TENSION BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN HAS been increased by the killing of a Japanese consular policeman at Hankow on September 19 and a near clash between Chinese and Japanese troops at Fengtai, near Peiping. The policeman was the fourth Japanese to be killed in China in less than a month, but the first instance in recent years of a Japanese official assassinated by a Chinese. Although four Japanese would seem few as compared with the thousands of Chinese slaughtered since the fateful incident of September 18, 1931, the Tokyo government is reported to have dispatched a naval expeditionary force to back up its demands on Nanking. Hitherto Chiang Kai-shek has given way to Japan whenever pressure was applied, but recent reports have indicated that he is preparing for eventual resistance. A decision to fight Japan would not be as suicidal as is commonly supposed. During the nine years he has been in power, Chiang has built up the finest fighting force in the history of China. He has hundreds of modern airplanes, together with tanks, artillery, and other modern equipment. A war with Japan would unify the country and bring to Chiang's assistance not only the Chinese Red Army, described by Mr. Hanwell elsewhere in this issue, but the large, well-trained forces of Kwangtung and Kwangsi. Since the Japanese have not yet succeeded in establishing control over the whole of Manchuria, they would seem most unwise to attempt to take over additional sections of China now.

THAT EARL BROWDER WILL GO ON THE AIR over Station WCAE at Pittsburgh calls for three cheers and a loud horse laugh. The cheers are for the Federal Communications Commission, which decided that Mr. Browder, as Presidential candidate for a political party legally on the ballot in almost all the states, had as much right to make a political speech over the radio as any other candidate who could pay for the time, including Governor Landon. Station WCAE, which denied Mr. Browder the right to speak on August 28 on the ground that his party was controlled by the Communist International, was forced to eat its denial, and Mr. Browder will be heard on October 23 and 30, in addition to his broadcast on September 21. The horse laugh, of course, is for Mr. Hearst, who owns Station WCAE. After his latest apoplectic seizure over President Roosevelt's support from the Richberg reds and the Tugwell bolsheviks, not to mention Felix Frankfurter, the arch-Stalin of them all, it is amusing to think of Mr. Hearst being forced to permit the candidate of the Communist Party to speak over the Hearstian ether.

MR. SHAW IS ALWAYS AT HIS HAPPIEST WHEN he is engaged in a tiff. This time it is with the Catholic church, which is a pretty good tiffer itself; the occasion is the proposed motion-picture version of "Saint Joan." According to Mr. Shaw the screen version of the play was read by a group calling itself "Catholic Action," and not only innumerable words and phrases—including "God," "paradise," "halo," "damned," and "babes"—were marked for omission, but whole sections of the play, notably Joan's recantation of her recantation. Mr. Shaw rightly believes this to be censorship at its stupidest; unfortunately his alternative, federal censorship, has not been shown to be any better. But his challenge has been taken up with considerable loud-breathing by Catholics in this country as well as by the Hays office in Hollywood. Father Talbot, editor of America, thinks Mr. Shaw is muddled; Michael Williams, editor of the Commonweal, is even more unkind—he calls it just another Shavian publicity gag. Mr. Hays says that there is no such thing as Catholic Action, which is a slight error that may be pardoned an elder of the Presbyterian church; he adds that nobody in Hollywood ever thought of screening Mr. Shaw's "Saint Joan," and most important of all that there is absolutely no censorship before production on the part of Catholics or anybody else. The New York Times, however, gives the whole show away, we like to think with malicious intent. In its news story of September 15 the Times says that although a script of "Saint Joan" was not officially considered in Hollywood, it was reported that Joseph Breen had carried on "unofficial conversations about it." This is sometimes done, it seems, "to prevent a record being made."

CALIFORNIA FARM LABOR AND EMPLOYERS are moving toward a new showdown. The first clash came on September 16 in Salinas, in connection with a strike of lettuce workers. From all reports it followed the usual brutal course of a California mob of respectable citizens on a law-enforcement spree. About 250 citizens were deputized by the sheriff and sent through the city to disperse and drive out the pickets. Many of them were armed. They were accompanied by police who threw tear-gas bombs into the crowds of pickets, while the state highway patrol convoyed strike-breaking lettuce trucks. The workers of the Salinas Valley are strongly organized in the Fruit and Vegetable Workers' Union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor. For three years the union has had contracts with the growers. This year, as a result of a statewide campaign by the Associated Farmers, a group of large growers and packers, the Salinas Valley farmers are refusing to renew union recognition. In other words the Salinas riot in the name of law and order was not a local or isolated incident but an indication of the way in which the growers intend to handle labor trouble wherever it crops up.

AN AROUSED CITIZENRY CAN ACT IN VARIOUS ways. The Black Legionnaires of Michigan have shown us one; the citizens of Highland Park, Michigan, have recently demonstrated a better. Last spring 75 per cent of the teachers of Highland Park, a suburb of Detroit, voted their lack of confidence in Superintendent of Schools Allen, and on the promise that there would be no political reprisals, campaigned actively against his reelection. With a majority of just 72 votes out of 4,000 he was, however, returned to office. Whereupon he immediately discharged 42 teachers because of his "lack of confidence in your ability to cooperate in a satisfactory manner." It took no time for Highland Park to translate resentment into action. A mass-meeting was called, a Citizens' Emergency Committee formed, resolutions adopted, petitions signed, and a subcommittee sent to mediate between the Board of Education and the teachers. Step by step the pressure of united public action forced the board and the superintendent to retreat. They didn't want to accept the arbitration of the mediating body, but they had to. They didn't want to give the teachers a hearing, but they had to. They didn't want to make any reinstatements, but first they made ten and later all but six. Here is a group of average middle-class Americans (the chairman of the Emergency Committee is a broker, a staunch Republican, and a member of the American Legion) setting an example of the power that lies in orderly collective action.

Recovery Takes the Stump

MR. HEARST'S attack on President Roosevelt indicates among other things that he is discouraged with the campaign made so far by his chosen candidate, Alf M. Landon. It also tops off a picture of confusion designed to make the average voter feel as Governor Landon must have felt when he found himself riding on a merry-go-round at the Kansas Free Fair while the calliope played "Happy Days Are Here Again."

What has happened to the Presidential campaign of 1936, which as late as July was touted as sure to go down in history as the closest and bitterest fight in years? A few weeks ago the issues seemed clear-cut, the candidates ranged on opposite sides of the field. Landon, advocating the open shop, seemed to be saying that the Liberty League, Hearst, and the right in general had decided that the time had come to make a fight to the finish on the radical tendencies which were undermining the American system. Labor rushed with renewed enthusiasm to Roosevelt's standard, since it had neither party nor candidate of its own. Even the Communist Party, while nominating its own candidate, made it clear that keeping Landon out was the main consideration. Only the Thomas wing of the Socialist Party remained true to socialism, thus providing the final paradox on the left. Mr. Thomas himself must be startled at times to find himself far to the left of the Communists, while the presence in his ranks of a group of the followers of the revolutionary Leon Trotsky gives an added fillip to the present role of the gradualist Norman Thomas.

But if confusion finds its strangest forms on the left, it is no less rampant on the right. Mr. Landon's open-shop speech, though cold and dull, had the merit at least of being relatively clear and firm. Since then what seemed like fixed issues have shifted like twigs in a rising river. The freshet which has set everything loose from its moorings is of course the continuing recovery. It is flowing through a bed long dry with depression. On its surface float issues, candidates, and voters irresistibly drawn toward the middle. Business interests, reports the New York Times, appear indifferent to the outcome of the election! "Some signs of pre-election hesitation," it reports, "should be discernible in industry at this point, but after passing through a summer when there was not the usual slackening, it now appears that even a national campaign will have little effect upon the upward surge of business." It seems hardly likely that the Hearst headlines can offset the propaganda of rising profits.

Mr. Roosevelt, of course, is the gainer all along the line. Having taken labor into camp he has not needed to make any gestures to the left which might frighten the middle class. On the contrary, in proposing a power pool in the Tennessee Valley he is taking a tack which will tend to mollify the public-utility crowd and will not arouse the criticism of his supporters if only because the issues involved are complicated and have been given little publicity. His proposed conferences with business leaders are part of the same tack. He will probably continue to make "non-political" and highly literary speeches about green pastures and point to the increase in farm income.

One eloquent guide to the effect of recovery is the course of the Landon campaign. At the beginning the dominant note was a "common-sense" crusade on un-American practices, put forth to be sure in the guise of a defense of true liberalism and true democracy against the "autocracy" of the New Deal. Recovery having dulled both the voter's fear of autocracy and the business man's passion for a change, Landon slid, and was allowed to slide, back into his true character as a mild liberal. In recent speeches he has been offering not an end to government spending and interference but merely less of both. The relative positions of the two candidates were strikingly illustrated on September 18 when Roosevelt was celebrating freedom of the mind in the magnificent setting of the Harvard Tercentenary, rich with scholarly prestige and American traditions, while Landon was pleading for a "free America" in the vastly less impressive purlieus of the Topeka City Auditorium.

But if Landon was allowed to go his way, Knox was also given his head by the Republican Party. While the Presidential candidate was courting the liberals, denouncing teachers' oaths, and admitting that there has to be some government regulation of business, Colonel Knox has been trying to continue the fight in the spirit set by Landon's open-shop speech. The Colonel has come to seem quainter and quainter with his advocacy of employee stock ownership as a solution for our troubles and his admonition to labor to stay out of politics. It was not even quaint, however, when the Colonel made the statement that today no life-insurance policy or savings-bank account is safe. He not only went against the strong recovery psychology. He also gave the Democrats a chance to say that on September 28 it would be a whole year since a national bank had failed, and put himself in the same class as Father Coughlin, who also thinks that the banks are broke. No wonder Herbert Hoover, attending a meeting of the directors of the New York Life Insurance Company, refused to comment on his fellow-Republican's demagogic talk.

As we write, the election is six weeks off and the campaign is entering a new phase. Al Smith has announced an anti-New Deal speaking tour, Hearst apparently is about to conduct a red-hunt, and Landon is preparing for a new foray. But Al Smith and Hearst are not what they used to be, and Landon is not what he was cracked up to be. The President, meanwhile, is said to be planning fewer and fewer speeches. Obviously he intends to let recovery speak for him—and recovery has a golden tongue.

Stay Out of Germany!

HOW safe is an American citizen in Germany? For that matter how safe from the Nazi police is an American citizen on American territory? These questions arise out of the case of Lawrence Simpson, born in Chicago, for fifteen months a prisoner, first in the Fuhlsbüttel concentration camp near Hamburg, and now in Moabit Prison in Berlin. Simpson is an American seaman who was taken from his ship, the Manhattan, in Cuxhaven harbor on June 28, 1935. His locker was searched, alleged Communist documents were found in his possession, and he was seized forthwith. (Incidentally Simpson has never engaged in Communist propaganda while in the United States and has never been accused by the police of such activities.) Charges of treason and espionage were preferred against him, although the indictments have never been made public. The first charge was based, according to the police, on the documents found in his locker; the basis of the second charge has not been revealed. Simpson's trial was first scheduled for late in July of this year, but since that was evidently uncomfortably close to the Olympic Games, it was postponed until September 28. He will be tried in the German People's Court, at a trial from which foreigners and the public generally will be excluded except for an unofficial observer sent by the State Department. His lawyer has been appointed by the court. During his incarceration he has seen no one except the American consul and one other American, Gifford Cochran, who attempted to obtain for him an American attorney who would be associated with his Nazi lawyer. The interview with Cochran, however, took place in the presence of a Nazi guard and a none-too-friendly American consul. Mr. Cochran was not permitted to ask Simpson anything about his arrest. It is small wonder that the prisoner, suspicious of everybody, politely refused to have anything to do with him.

About a month after Simpson's arrest representations were made to the American State Department, which promptly promised that "the American authorities in Germany will render Mr. Simpson all appropriate assistance." This assurance, however, has borne little if any fruit. The case so far is being handled by the Bureau of Western European Affairs. The bureau points out that German law provides that an American citizen, if he makes invidious remarks about Hitler in America, may be arrested and charged with treason if he enters Germany. But the fact that Simpson not only was arrested on an American ship, which is American territory, but has been held so long without a trial, seems to the Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, which is attempting to defend him, to involve a violation of international law. The committee cites President Cleveland's speech of 1886 in which, referring to citizens charged with crime committed in a foreign land, he declared that "a fair and open trial . . . will be demanded for them." It also quotes from the proceedings of the Baldwin case between the United States and Mexico in 1842: "If Mexico wishes to maintain rank and fellowship among the civilized nations of the earth she must place her laws on a footing with the laws of other nations, so far as related to intercourse with foreigners."

In other words, it is the privilege of Nazi Germany to hold its own citizens under "protective arrest" for as long as it pleases, although individuals in other nations may unofficially criticize such action as unwise and unjust. But when it so treats a foreigner whose own country has not yet forgotten habeas corpus and trial in open court, the situation demands more than individual protest. The American Department of State, in addition to sending an "observer," should be urged to make a vigorous diplomatic protest against this high-handed treatment of a citizen of the United States.

Newton D. Baker and the Last War

NEWTON D. BAKER'S eighty-six-page article in Foreign Affairs depicting the reasons, as he sees them, for our entry into the World War is a nice illustration of the ancient art of setting up a straw man and then demolishing it with a show of valor. Mr. Baker has heard a great deal recently about munitions makers, bankers, and foreign loans, and is apparently incensed at the idea that such influences could have affected the Wilson Administration in its decision to wage war on Germany. With a naivete that ill befits a former Secretary of War, he interprets the economic argument in anthropomorphic terms and sets out to prove that neither President Wilson nor any member of the Cabinet was aware of, much less susceptible to, the direct influence of munitions makers or international bankers.

On questions of fact Mr. Baker is ordinarily very scrupulous. Consequently it is extremely mystifying to find no reference in his detailed analysis to the famous Sunrise Conference of April, 1916, which is described elsewhere in this issue. It is possible that he did not know of the conference at the time, but it seems hardly likely that he has not run across references to it in his recent researches. The omission is significant, for the Wilson who could have called such a conference has little in common with the Wilson whom Mr. Baker describes as being preoccupied at that very time with the vision of America's special mission as peacemaker in a warring world. In fact, Mr. Baker declares categorically that there was nothing in German-American relations between May, 1916, and the declaration of unrestricted submarine warfare in January, 1917, which threatened serious trouble. He pictures the submarine campaign as coming at a time when the President was still hopeful that the war might be ended without victory for either side.

Apart from this, there is little in Mr. Baker's elaborate exposition to which exception can be taken. Nearly half the article is given over to a résumé of the immediate causes of friction between the United States and Germany.

Mr. Baker reviews the diplomatic correspondence between the two countries in great detail, and is able to show, triumphantly, that nothing is said about the Morgans, the armament makers, or the basic economic forces which have been discussed in recent years. The notes to Germany dealt almost exclusively with legal questions pertaining to America's neutral rights and were in a lofty tone far removed from such mundane matters as trade, profits, and loans. Mr. Baker admits that there may have been bankers who were pro-Ally, but ridicules the idea that any of them could have had any direct influence on the President.

It is probably true that neither the President nor Mr. Baker was aware of any attempt by financial or business leaders to bring the United States into war. Yet only an incredibly naive person would insist that an individual's utterances, public or private, may be taken as accurately reflecting the forces which impel him to action. Doubtless Mr. Wilson had reason to be suspicious of the bankers after their fight on the Federal Reserve Act. If they had come to him directly and pleaded that the United States declare war on Germany, he would certainly have refused. But this does not mean that the forces which caused the bankers to desire war did not also affect the President. On the contrary, it is quite clear that he was driven, step by step, into actions which made war inevitable. The first step was a negative one. In the interest of general prosperity no effort was made to limit American exports of raw materials and war supplies, even though it was apparent that this trade was advantageous to the Allies. Mr. Baker himself points out how a year later it was suddenly discovered that a loan to the Allies was necessary if this trade was to be maintained and a serious depression to be avoided.

From this point the die was cast, although Mr. Baker insists that "no one for a moment considered any departure from our rights and duties as a neutral." The United States was placed in a position where it had no choice but to defend its "right" to trade. Once this step was taken, Germany's unrestricted submarine campaign was certain to follow; some measure had to be taken to stop American assistance to the Allies if there was to be any hope for ultimate victory. Even when faced by the threat of an "illegal" submarine attack, President Wilson, if he had really wanted to prevent war, could have withdrawn all American ships from the war zone and prohibited American citizens from traveling on belligerents' ships. Why did he not do so? Mr. Baker does not directly meet the issue but implies that it was because the United States "declined to yield to any aggression upon its rights as a neutral which involved the loss of American lives." But what was there about our neutral "rights" that justified our plunging into a conflict that was to take 50,000 American lives and cost more than $25,000,000,000? It is begging the question to say that we had warned Germany and had to back up our threat. We had warned the Reich because we were determined to preserve not abstract "rights" but an extremely profitable trade in war supplies. Words, Mr. Baker, are used as frequently to conceal as to express realities.

Can the Presidency Be Bought?

Washington, September 21

PRIMARY returns, registration figures, and the straw-vote crop to date leave little room for doubt that Roosevelt will be reelected in handsome fashion on November 3, but that little room is thoroughly and efficiently filled by a single question: "Isn't it still possible for big business to buy the Presidency for Alf?" My own belief is that the answer is no. I hold that the Presidency—at least this year—is not purchasable and that, even if it were, the price would be too high for the Liberty League. But I do not urge that belief upon you here. My purpose, instead, is to set down a few clinical notes and let you draw your own conclusions.

The first thing with which you must acquaint yourself is the part which money actually plays in campaigns. There seems to be a popular superstition that it is used to buy votes. As a matter of fact, the amount of outright vote-buying in a Presidential campaign is negligible; it is a practice in which political bosses and their employers can afford to indulge only in small election contests where the electorate is not emotionally aroused and the difference between the contending candidates is scarcely discernible to the naked eye. The money that counts is spent not on buying votes but on getting out the vote, and the rest is spent on propaganda. Enormous sums are spent on printing or broadcasting the output of the campaign committees' research and publicity divisions, and most of it is stupid, ineffectual stuff. At best the output of one division tends to do nothing more than cancel that of its rival; only the appeals to racial, religious, and class prejudice click in substantial fashion, and these must be handled not only gingerly but also subterraneously, for they cut both ways. The money that counts, the money spent on getting out the vote, goes for hiring cars to take voters to the polls and for hiring runners to see that the cars are kept busy and filled. Some of this money, and no inconsiderable part, goes into the pockets of ward-healers and other professionals whose chief stock in trade is their ability to make friends with a controlling minority of the residents of their bailiwicks, and much of that money is spent in turn on cultivating these friendships by providing the residents of ward and precinct with sandwiches, cigars, free beer, and clubrooms in which to hide away from their families, play poker, and acquire the feeling of being wise and valued members of the community.

The belief of those who lay out the dough in this manner is that the friendships so cultivated are transferable and that a substantial number of the citizenry who have enjoyed the hospitality and confidences of the precinct captain or ward boss automatically will mark their ballots for the candidates whom they have heard praised by their friend and benefactor. Sometimes the belief is baseless; it is less likely to be so if the professional leader has been more than a jolly host. If he has been able to get parking tickets torn up, a street paved, an alley repaired, a son freed from police clutches, or jobs for the faithful, the loyalty and size of his following are many times the capacity of his till to buy. And unfortunately for the Republicans in the present campaign, what the Democrats lack in cash they more than make up for in ability to do the favors that make votes, for they not only have control of the federal government but also hold the reins in a majority of state, county, and municipal governments.

For that same reason the Democrats also have the edge this year in getting the small money that fills the chinks in campaign coffers. There is a vast army of men and women holding civil jobs under them, and they will be tapped for contributions, down to and including the janitors and charwomen. Most of the small money comes from this source, and prior to 1932 its output poured into the Republican till. The rest of the petty cash comes from the emotional fringe of the so-called independent voters and from fanatical party loyalists, but the contributions from these two sources divide themselves about equally between the two major parties. The big money comes of course from the only possible source—the men and corporations that have it to give.

The size of their donations is determined not only by the depth of their purses but by the tax laws, which also to a certain extent govern the manner in which they distribute their largess. If you examine the lists of contributions at the end of the campaign, you will notice few individual gifts in excess of $5,000. But you will note that in many instances each member of a family has donated $5,000 and also that some individuals have given many times $5,000 but have distributed it in parcels of $5,000 each to several different campaign organizations. The federal gift tax allows an exemption of $5,000, with the result that a man who gave $20,000 to the Republican National Committee would be taxed on $15,000 but would escape the tax if he gave $5,000 to the National Committee, $5,000 to the Liberty League, $5,000 to the National Jeffersonian Democrats, and $5,000 to the Republican gubernatorial campaign committee in his home state. And perhaps you will discern in this some explanation why the Morgans, Rockefellers, Sloans, and du Ponts donated $50,000 to the Republican campaign in Maine in lots of $5,000 or less apiece instead of contributing direct to the Republican National Committee, where their bid for a Republican victory in Maine could have been kept hidden from the Lonergan committee and escaped publicity on the eve of the election in that state.

You will also note, if you examine the list of contributions to the Liberty League, that the tax laws play their part in yet another way. You will discover that a huge proportion of the league's working capital is made up of "loans." Most of these loans mature immediately after election. If the league is unable to repay them, their makers will have to write them off as bad debts and will then be entitled to deduct them from their income-tax returns, a thing that would not be possible if they had been "contributions." When the Liberty League reported to the clerk of the House a few days ago that its receipts between January 1 and August 31 had totaled $384,847, it set down among its receipts more than $90,000 in "loans" from seven different du Ponts. Others reported included "loans" of $10,000 apiece from Alfred P. Sloan, John J. Raskob, and Ernest T. Weir, and of $15,000 apiece from J. Howard Pew and George M. Moffett.

You will be foolish if you think that in the present campaign all the big money, considering its general source, will be piped exclusively into Republican, or anti-Roosevelt, coffers. The rich are not all Roosevelt haters. Joseph M. Patterson, publisher of the New York Daily News, already has given $20,000 to the Democratic National Committee and leads its list of donors. Ambassador Bingham, doubling his 1932 contribution, has given $10,000. Joseph P. Kennedy, who played party angel in 1932 to the tune of $50,000, and Vincent Astor, who gave $25,000, are only a few of the loyal pursemasters who have not yet disgorged but surely will. They will be followed by the usual horde of seekers after Cabinet posts, ambassadorships, standing invitations to the White House, and tax, tariff, and illegal legal favors. Then, too, as the campaign nears its climax and the fats cats backing Landon become more doubtful that they have put their money on the winning entry, there will be a rush to hedge those bets; corporations whose presidents have given thousands to the Landon campaign will produce vice-presidents eager to put up at least a few thousands for Roosevelt.

Already some of the market letters put out by financial houses are breaking the news to their clientele that Landon's chances, never good, are growing steadily worse and that Roosevelt's reelection is inescapable. There is even a chance that the money tide already has begun to turn. It seems to be definitely true that, lavish though the Landonward flow of funds has been, it has fallen far short of Republican expectations. Persons indubitably close to the Republican high command report that men from whom thousands had been expected have come through with hundreds. One of the party's solicitors of high-powered cash tells me he has found more than a few rich men who are afraid to give in proportion to their hatred of Roosevelt. They are afraid, he says, that Roosevelt will win in any event and that he will single out for some dire punishment all those who have registered in the upper bracket of Republican contributors this year. This fear, it seems, feeds upon a widespread belief that Mr. Roosevelt's consistency on the power issue is traceable solely to his knowledge of the power trust's grandiose expenditures in the fight to beat him four years ago. It is noteworthy in this same connection that the G. O. P. contributors' list so far is lacking in names of prominent utilities magnates and that a power-trust lobbyist recently informed me, in a moment of bibulous frankness, that his employers were afraid to put heavy dough on Landon and would knight any man who could tell them how to place their money in John D. M. Hamilton's hands without getting caught.

It is not possible now and it never will be possible to make an accurate estimate of the amount of money the campaign to defeat Roosevelt will draw. Reports thus far filed with the clerk of the House show that approximately $3,000,000 has been spent to date on the Republican side, as against a little over $1,500,000 on the Democratic side. Both sides will file another set of reports a few days before the election. In its election-eve report four years ago the Democratic National Committee registered campaign receipts totaling $1,441,117 as against $1,454,179 for the Republicans. Both sides already have passed those marks with the election six weeks away, and the campaign is just beginning to move into the final phase when purse-strings become ropes of sand.

Harvard's United Front

BY JOSEPH BARNES

Cambridge, September 19

TO the surprise of almost no one, the ambitious plan of Harvard University on its three-hundredth birthday to synthesize the specialized branches of modern scholarship into a unified and coherent system of thought and belief progressed no farther than the titles of the symposia. Even the most remarkable assemblage of scholars ever to gather in the United States, including eleven Nobel Prize winners and representing institutions which span the entire genealogy of the university tradition from Abelard to Antioch, could not produce from all their academic mortarboards the white rabbit of spiritual and intellectual unity.

But this is not to say that the Harvard tercentenary conference did not have large meaning for America both as symbol and as fact. As the first it was a reminder, at a time when many of its graduates may have needed a gentle hint, that Harvard, like the nation it helped to build, was conceived in dissent and developed in the spirit of rebellion. As fact it was notable for the open expression of ideas which have become in recent years steadily more repugnant to the groups in American life which Harvard College is supposed to represent.

The very organization of the symposia in the social sciences and the humanities represented a striking departure from the traditional procedure of learned congresses. After physiologists and psychologists had discussed Factors Determining Human Behavior, the conference moved as a whole unit to a group of symposia on Authority and the Individual. The state and economic enterprise, stability and social change, the place and functions of authority in life, and finally classicism and romanticism as illustrating the central intellectual problem of the eighteenth century formed the pattern within which social scientists went to work. Finally, except for the physical and biological sciences, the conference closed with a series of symposia for the humanists under the cumbersome, yet for American letters meaningful, title of Independence, Convergence, and Borrowing in Institutions, Thought, and Art.

The contributions were made for the most part by specialists preeminent in their fields. As the Master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, John Harvard's school, pointed out at the close of the conference, the Western educational system, by its largess of learning to poor scholars on the basis of competitive examination, has speeded up the trend toward specialization. With a few notable exceptions, such as John Dewey, Dr. Etienne Gilson of the Sorbonne, and Professor Masaharu Anesaki of the University of Tokyo, few of the scholars could go farther than a vague indorsement on what proved to be the central and recurring theme of the conference—a realization of the need for an intellectual unity as stable and as universal as that which Christendom enjoyed in the Middle Ages.

Yet this was something. And before the tercentenary celebration closed on Friday with President Roosevelt among the 5,000 alumni in attendance, the problems of the contemporary world had already reared their ugly heads.

For the discussion of the state and economic enterprise, the conference brought together three distinguished economists—Wesley Clair Mitchell of Columbia, Dennis Holme Robertson of Cambridge, and Douglas Berry Copland of the University of Melbourne. All three acknowledged the growing trend around the world toward collective interference with the patterns of economic life, and all three found in it promise of a richer life for human beings. Dr. Edward Corwin of Princeton University, a former president of the Political Science Association, spoke of the Constitution and the Supreme Court in words which the Liberty League could accept only as treason. Professor Anesaki challenged the whole tradition of Western culture as based on exploitation.

Much that was said by liberals at the conference was phrased in scholarly obliquity which left conclusions to be drawn by those who wanted them. The sessions of the alumni association of the Graduate School of Business Administration captured the true spirit of medievalism more successfully than all the regalia which Harvard College and its invited guests could muster. But in the social sciences and the humanities there were fewer stuffed shirts and more rolled-up sleeves than anyone had expected. With honorary degrees from Harvard awaiting them at the end of the conference, many of the invited guests in the liberal arts rivaled their colleagues in the physical and biological sciences in the toughness of their empiricism and in the roughness with which they handled some of the traditions long since grown mellow in American learned journals.

It was partly its heavy foreign tinge which accounted for the conference's careless way with some American totems and taboos. But there was enough reminiscent speech-making about Harvard's own three hundred years to point again in fresh terms the old paradox of Harvard College as a breeding place of radicals and dissenters and at the same time a private tutoring school for the aristocracy of New England.

"The very name of Harvard is stench in the nostrils of fundamentalists, patrioteers, fascists, and Nazis," the tercentenary's official historian, Professor Samuel Eliot Morison, reported. The names of Henry Thoreau and Theodore Parker and John Reed were mentioned in the proud surveys of Harvard's past with which the conference closed as often as those of any other of its graduates. The Adamses placed five men in an unofficial Hall of Fame of Harvard men selected for the occasion, and none of them was wrapped in patriotic mist.

At the same time, the financial and industrial groups in American life which in the last hundred years have made Harvard rich and powerful were represented at the conference. Both their State Street core from Boston and the younger branches by which Harvard has become tied to the industrialism of the continent beyond New England gave to the closing days of the celebration especially the authentic ring of a national and not a parochial festival. Economic royalists sang "Fair Harvard" in chorus with members of the Brain Trust, and the only dissonances audible in a week of dignified festivity were those inevitable to age and class reunions and a fitful September wind among the elms.

The explanation of the paradox may lie in Harvard's venerable three centuries or in the three open books bearing the word VERITAS which President Dunster in 1643 adopted as the college arms. It is more likely that it is to be found in the kind of emotional and intellectual synthesis, unconsciously developed for sections of American life, which Harvard's invited scholars were assigned consciously to seek for the entire world in the academic discussions which made up the bulk of the celebration. This synthesis, it may be, will no longer hold for Harvard. This was a retrospective pageant of the past, and newspapers and primary elections served to remind at least some of the delegates that there are new forces in American life threatening to break out of the Harvard pattern. But in the search for a new unity for the world, Harvard has made an impressive demonstration that scholars may turn for evidence of how such unities are formed and nurtured not only to the Middle Ages but to America's own past.

Are Annuities Safe?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THREE times within the past fortnight I have been besieged by agents who were anxious to sell me an annuity. Now the arguments for an annuity are far more intriguing than those for an ordinary life-insurance policy. Instead of taking money from you during your entire lifetime which is to be repaid to your survivors, if any, after your death, the annuity provides a guaranteed fixed income for life. In the case of life insurance, you can only beat the company by dying soon, so that your beneficiaries can collect more than you paid in. With annuities, on the other hand, you can win if you live longer than the company expects you to. A few hundred Methuselahs, if they had the wisdom to buy substantial annuities, might wreck any life-insurance company.

The principle behind the annuity is extremely simple, and is just the reverse of that behind ordinary life insurance. On the basis of experience, the insurance companies know, or think they know, just how long the average man of a given age is likely to live. Consequently they are willing to enter into a contract under which in exchange for a lump sum they will pay a fixed amount of money each year for life. The amount of the required deposit naturally varies with the annuitant's age, being high if he is young and reasonably low if he is of advanced age. Theoretically it represents the sum which, with accumulated interest at a given per cent (usually 3 or $3\frac{1}{4}$), will last just long enough to meet all payments and provide a small margin sufficient to defray the company's overhead. There are many variants. Instead of paying a lump sum, one may pay so much a month until sixty or sixty-five and then receive a fixed income for life. There is a joint-survivors annuity which provides that the income, naturally a somewhat smaller one, shall continue until the death of a husband and wife.

The idea of a secure income for life, even though it be small, is attractive to almost anyone, but there is something about the zeal of the agents which arouses suspicion. What lies behind the sudden anxiety on the part of the companies to sell annuities when formerly they tended to play down this type of business? The heavy losses which everyone has suffered in other forms of investment may account, in part, for the public's increased interest in annuities. But why the sudden emphasis on annuities by the insurance companies? The New York Life Insurance Company, to take only one example, collected $41,654,538 on annuities in 1935 as against only $30,898,349 in premiums on new life insurance. Although they are still overshadowed by the $193,000,000 receipts in old life insurance, annuities are coming to represent a far from inconsiderable portion of the company's business.

One rather obvious fact may explain why the annuity leaped to prominence during the depression. Annuities bring in spot cash, and during the depression many of the insurance companies were sadly in need of cash. On paper they have always been more than solvent. Even at the worst stage of the crisis their reserves and surplus totaled approximately twenty billion dollars. But like all other financial institutions their assets were tied up in investments which could not be liquidated except at large losses. About 40 per cent less insurance was written in 1933 than in 1929, but the payments to policy holders in settlement of death claims, matured endowments, annuities, surrendered policies, and dividends were more than 50 per cent higher than in the boom year. Moreover, there was a tremendous demand for cash in the form of requests for policy loans. None of the large companies failed, but in New York and other states insurance commissions forced them for a time to refuse policy loans except in cases of dire necessity. In need of ready cash, it is only natural that they should have looked around for a new source of income that would restore their liquidity. Whether by plan or accident, annuities fulfilled this purpose.

Taken at its face value the annuity appears to be an ideal form of investment. It involves a minimum of effort and worry on the part of the annuitant. It is devised to afford the maximum security in life, and is a logical supplement to life insurance. No other gilt-edged investment promises such a high return. With savings banks paying $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 per cent, and long-term government bonds yielding only 2.75 per cent, why not take advantage of a guaranteed rate of 3 or $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent? Thousands of wealthy men have done that very thing.

Before leaping, it seems wise to consider the possible disadvantages. In the first place, there is the question of liquidity. Irrespective of what the agent may say, a lump-sum annuity ties up one's money irrevocably. Regardless of what happens it cannot be recovered during the lifetime of the annuitant. The instalment variety is nearly as bad. If you deposit $100 as a first annual payment, the most that can be reclaimed during the year is $60. During the second year, after two such deposits, only $154 may be recovered; and it may be as much as ten years before the full amount, less interest, may be obtained. This is an important consideration for anyone who does not have liquid funds immediately available for a possible emergency, and it is also extremely relevant in case of inflation. (If you want to see a life-insurance agent lose his composure, merely utter the word "inflation.") For all its merits, an annuity is obviously the very worst possible type of investment in the event of a sudden skyrocketing of prices. In exchange for $1,000 the insurance company can guarantee you, say, $54 a year. But it cannot guarantee what that $54 will buy. Even a mild rise in prices, such as we have had in the last three years, can play havoc with an agreement of this kind. A man who invested $1,000 in an annuity in the spring of 1933 has already lost more than 10 per cent of his investment owing to the reduced purchasing power of his money. The same $1,000 turned into real estate, wheat, copper, or stocks would have a greater buying power today than it had three years ago.

In case of inflation the annuitant would have at least a good chance of getting his money back. Without it the prospect does not seem quite so favorable. The present annuity contract provides for a payment of 3, $3\frac{1}{4}$, or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest. In order to fulfil this contract the company obviously must find an investment which yields at least this high a return. Prior to the depression this was not difficult. There were a number of excellent investments available to life-insurance companies, including railway bonds, real-estate mortgages, and the obligations of states, counties, and municipalities, which paid 5, 6, and even 7 per cent. Today there are extremely few satisfactory new investments paying as much as $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and long-terms interest rates are steadily declining. Most of the companies have a substantial share of their funds in government bonds, although the maximum yield on these securities at present prices is 2.75 per cent. The return on first-class state, municipal, and railway-equipment bonds is but slightly more. As I write, the state of Rhode Island is issuing fifteen-year bonds which yield less than 2 per cent, and the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Equipment Trust is marketing ten-year certificates that offer a return of just 3 per cent. In the mortgage field the insurance companies must meet the competition of the government-financed Federal Savings and Loan systems and the Farm Credit Administration, which means that the day of the $5\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 per cent mortgage is definitely over. New mortgages pay no more than 4 or 5 per cent, and it is extremely difficult for the companies to obtain any volume of sound investments at these rates. Policy loans at 6 per cent constitute by far the most attractive investment obtainable today, but with the restoration of better economic conditions these have dropped off. At the recent conference of insurance executives at the White House, it was reported that loans to policy holders, which had totaled approximately 18 per cent of the insurance companies' resources in 1933, had declined to 14 per cent of the aggregate resources. This means another sharp loss to the companies.

It simmers down to this. If I buy an annuity, I want to be reasonably sure that the insurance company will be able to live up to its obligation. If it guarantees me $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, as does the Prudential Insurance Company, it is evident that it will have to invest my money at a rate at least that high in order to break even. Today this is virtually impossible. For 1935 the average rate of interest earned by Prudential on all investments was only 3.46 per cent. The Provident Mutual Life Insurance Company did somewhat better, earning 3.99 per cent on all investments. But what really counts is the investment of the funds now being received, for the old investments are rapidly being called in. The Provident Mutual admits that its average return on new investments for 1935 was only 3.10 per cent; the other companies are doing little, if any, better.

As long as they are glutted with funds for which they cannot find suitable investment, the companies are not likely to be troubled by any immediate financial strain. But what of the future, particularly if annuitants as a group live longer than is anticipated under the life-expectancy tables? For years the life-insurance companies have been using a table of American mortality based on nineteenth-century death rates. The fact that the present generation appears to be living somewhat longer than the table indicated worked to the advantage of the companies as long as they concentrated on life insurance. But with annuities the reverse is true. According to American Men Table of Mortality, widely used as a basis for computing annuities, the average man of 42 years may expect to live 27.66 more years, while a man of 62 should live 13.06 years. But a computation of life expectancy on the basis of the 1920 census shows that the average man of 42 may look forward to 28.08 more years, and that the man of 62 may expect to live 13.85 years. Analysis of the 1930 census has not been completed, but it is said to show an even longer life expectancy for men under 60. This is making no allowance for the fact that annuitants, because of their financial security, are notoriously long-lived—though complete figures are lacking—nor for the fact that they are a highly selective group. A recent study by the United States Public Health Service reveals that the death rate for professional men in general is only 74 per cent of that of all gainfully employed individuals; proprietors, managers, officials, and white-collar workers also have a lower than average death rate, while that of semi-skilled and unskilled workers is far above the average. The types of men who can make substantial lump-sum payments for annuities are likely to be among the most vigorous and prosperous of the more favored categories and may very well live, on the average, several years longer than is anticipated. New mortality tables especially designed for annuities are coming into use, but many companies are still using the old tables.

All of this, of course, involves taking a long look ahead. For the moment the companies need have no fear of insolvency. Insurance companies are probably fully as strong as the banks. They have profited from their life insurance by the same factors which threaten their stability in the case of annuities. It may be that to pay their annuities they will simply draw upon the profits which they have obtained from selling life-insurance policies. This, however, is only possible if annuities do not become, as they richly deserve to do on principle, more popular than life insurance. It is true that the companies can raise their rates on new business sufficiently to compensate for any loss on the old. But what if something should happen to make people stop buying both annuities and life insurance? Assuming that the interest rate continues to drop, until, as Keynes predicts, it approaches zero, could the companies meet their obligations? Such development is not at all impossible. The failure of one big insurance company might lead to distrust of private insurance in general. Or, what is more likely, the government may recognize its obligation to its citizens by going into the annuity, and possibly the life-insurance, business for itself. The companies had to fight tooth and nail to prevent an annuity scheme from being incorporated in the Social Security Act, and it is just possible that a future Congress will not be as subordinate to private interests as the present one.

For the government is clearly the ideal agency to maintain a system of annuities. It could throw overboard the most vicious element in the present annuity scheme—the dependence on interest—and base a national system of retirement allowances and old-age assistance entirely on the contributions of the existing working population. Annuities could also be sold for cash, as now, or in instalments and the interest factor could be either eradicated or greatly reduced. This does not mean that government annuities need be more expensive than those sold by private enterprise. Elimination of the ubiquitous agents would make possible a substantial saving. It might also be argued that instead of paying interest, which is an indirect tax on production, the government would be justified in assuming at least a part of the administrative expense necessary for setting up a comprehensive scheme of old-age security available for the entire population. The old-age-insurance scheme established by the Social Security Act merely scratches the surface of the need. It is conceivable that a more adequate program will not be forthcoming. Meanwhile, I am keeping my money out of the grasp of the insurance companies.

Red China on the March

BY NORMAN D. HANWELL

THE sudden appearance of a portion of the Chinese Red Army, 70,000 strong, at the gates of Titao, fifty miles south of the capital of Kansu, indicates that Chiang Kai-shek's repeated campaigns for the "eradication of the Communist menace" have not been conspicuously successful. The Kansu army, under the combined leadership of Chu Teh and Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien, is only one of the three main Red armies which are now well established in the western part of China. A second army, under Mao Tse-tung, has its base in northern Shensi and has penetrated into western Shansi. A third, led by Ho Lung and Hsiao Ke, at one time reported to be completely surrounded in Hunan, has followed the trail of the main Red forces last year, and is now in western Szechuan and Hsikang.

Why are these Red Army advances not reported in the daily press? Simply because the semi-official Central News Service, aided by press censorship, misreports them as government victories and Red Army defeats. For example, government troops following the main Red Army through Kweichow, and occupying cities purposely evacuated by the Reds, reported a new victory at each reoccupied town. In Szechuan the occupation of towns evacuated by the northward-advancing Red Army was also reported as a victory over desperate Red "remnants"—a favorite government misnomer for any Red Army group. After repeated reports of the successes gained by Shansi troops in this region against Reds attempting to cross the Yellow River, news suddenly leaked out that the Reds had occupied more than ten hsien (counties) in the western part of the province and were continuing their advance to the central plain of Shansi. Since most government victories have proved to be of this character, is it any wonder that one begins to substitute the word "defeat" whenever a supervised dispatch reports a government "victory"?

Why have the Communist armies been able to wander at will in the western provinces of China—Kweichow, Szechuan, and Shensi? General economic unrest and the geography of the region have certainly aided them, but there have also been special conditions contributing to their ease of movement.

Szechuan, a province so rich and fertile that its natural resources should insure all its inhabitants an adequate livelihood, has been completely under the thumb of war lords who amuse themselves by playing at war as others play at bridge. Land taxes in this province have in some instances been collected beyond the year 1985; and not only has the amount of the tax increased, but the number of collections a year has risen from two to as many as fourteen. The land surtax, legally limited to an amount equal to the basic land tax itself, has in some cases been more than twenty times as great. Figures show that land taxes in this province are four times those of any other province of China, almost ten times as great as in Japan, and approximately 2,100 per cent higher than the average farmland tax rate in the United States. These exorbitant demands by the military leaders have led many farmers to refuse longer to cultivate their land. Small wonder that the Communist troops have been welcomed with open arms wherever they have appeared.

In northern Shensi Communist propagandists have been at work for almost ten years, and aided by the poverty of the inhabitants and the rapacity of the government, have been so successful that they have actually been able to conduct open meetings at district fairs; magistrates are afraid to test their strength by arresting them. Northern Shensi has not been under the provincial government of Shensi for many years, control being exercised by opium-trading subordinates of the Shansi ruler, General Yen Hsi-shan. At present this region contains both organized Red armies and a new generation of communized youth, willing to fight for its ideals. Government troops marching into these regions have frequently been ambushed by the peasants, and whole divisions destroyed. Front-line government units have been cut off for long periods from their bases, unable to maintain contact with main headquarters except by air.

General Yen Hsi-shan, overlord of Shansi and northern Shensi, recognized the dangers of the present land situation and introduced what he called "village ownership of land." But this plan had to be abandoned because of the pressure of the Red armies. The trend in Shansi has been for owners to sink to the level of part owners, and for part owners to sink to the level either of tenants or of mere farm laborers. Such statistics as are available show that a disproportionate amount of land is held by small groups of landlords. In northern Shansi one hsien reports that 25 per cent of the total number of families owns 53 per cent of the land, or seventy-three mu (about thirteen acres) per family—considered a large holding in China! Further south concentration of the land in the hands of a few is even more marked; one hsien reports that 7 per cent of the population holds 44 per cent of the land and 86 per cent of the families only 39 per cent of the land.

Such, briefly, is the situation in those regions in which Red Army units have been active. What are the conditions existing in other provinces of China? The phrase most encountered in conversation and articles by both Chinese and foreign observers dealing with the economic conditions of rural China, the China of the masses, is nung-ts'un p'o-ch'an—"rural bankruptcy." Taxes, in spite of manifestoes claiming reductions, have not been decreased. In some sections the rates have not been increased but the decrease in farm income caused by low prices has made the burden actually heavier. Oppressive conditions of land tenure under which more than half the crop goes to an absentee landlord persist without even a verbal promise of improvement. More than 90 per cent of the rural loans in China are obtained from landlords, rich farmers, merchants, pawnshops, or money shops; less than 10 per cent from the much-publicized cooperative societies, with their lower interest rates.

This widespread state of bankruptcy has resulted in much unrest in provinces bordering on those in which Red armies are active. Both Honan and Hopei—neighbors of Shansi—have active groups of armed Communists—small, it is true, but constituting nuclei which can grow in suitable conditions. In addition, with educational facilities growing and the literacy rate of the peasants rising—by reason of adult mass education as well as a larger number of regular schools—more articulate discontent has developed among the peasants. This discontent of the masses makes them receptive to proposals for ameliorating their lot. The Communists offer radical reform of the prevailing system of taxation and land tenure, and the abolition of usury.

The present National Government of China is frankly unable to cope with the prevailing inequalities and distress. It is supported primarily by the exploiters of the peasantry—landlords and usurers. In addition, it has failed to offer resistance to Japanese aggression, a failure which an increasing number of Chinese consider treasonable. Growing recognition of Nanking's subservience to Japan has added to the prestige and the opportunities of the Communists.

Meanwhile, Japanese activity in the north has brought about a tardy revival of national feeling on the part of the student class. The central government has not only refused to accede to the students' demands but has adopted drastic repressive measures in an effort to stem the tide of patriotic fervor. But its attempt to prove that all students are Communists merely because they do not wish to turn their country over to a foreign invader has had unfavorable repercussions. Students whose interests and bias were naturally anti-Communist have turned in great numbers to the support of the Red Army simply because it appeared to be the sole defender of Chinese independence.

Geographic factors have also contributed greatly to the enhanced prestige of the Chinese Soviets. As long as the Soviet districts were confined to Kiangsi and remote sections of Szechuan, the anti-Japanese slogans of the Reds had very little meaning. But with their recent invasion of the province of Shansi, where only scattered Soviet districts previously existed, the Communists constitute not only a serious obstacle to Japan's immediate plans for a five-province "buffer state" but a formidable threat to the Japanese flank in the event of an attack on Outer Mongolia. The Communists' offer of a united front for a national war against Japan has become a practical proposal.

How Dead Is Liberalism?

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

III

THE keystone of Communist thought is the paradox which states that true liberalism can be achieved only through the violation of liberal principles. Without this paradox there would be no possibility of reconciling the aims which the Communist professes with the means by which he proposes to reach them, and it is not unnatural perhaps that he should turn to equally paradoxical solutions for other difficulties.

Anna Louise Strong, for example, once argued in the American Mercury that even the temporary dictatorship in Russia was really less a dictatorship than a Higher Sort of Democracy, and supported the contention with the following ingenious argument. The success of the enterprises carried out under the dictatorship was proof that what the people had been made to do was what, in their deepest selves, they willed to do—even if it was not what their shallower selves would have voted for had they had the misfortune to live under a government so unwise as to consult these shallower selves instead of accepting the mandate conferred by its mystic insight into the depths of the popular will. Miss Strong would, I presume, refuse to consider the success of the Ethiopian venture as proof that Italian fascism is also a truer sort of democracy than that which is crudely represented by civil liberties and the ballot box, but it is hardly worth while to argue the point or to indicate that her reasoning is precisely that of the church, which has always maintained that the only true liberty is the liberty to obey one's spiritual superiors.

For reasons which were, I hope, sufficiently indicated in the last previous article of this series, the liberal is less inclined either to match with the Communist such theological ingenuities as these or to look for flaws in the logic which links his concepts than he is to appeal to psychology on the one hand or to history on the other. When M. Malraux, for example, elaborates his theory of a purely political dictatorship which leaves the artist and the intellectual free to think and to create as their genius commands, the difficulty lies not in anything which is wrong with this quasi-utopian conception as such but in the fact that there is nothing in past human experience to suggest that it could ever be realized. With the exception of modern fascism, most dictatorships have, as a matter of fact, accepted "in principle" M. Malraux's thesis. Even the censorship of the Catholic church professes to concern itself with nothing except that which affects faith and morals, just as—so I was assured by Mr. Fischer during the darkest period of RAPP—the censorship of the Russian government differed significantly from all previous censorships in maintaining that its aims were purely political. But was anything ever found which could not, in actual practice, be shown to affect faith and morals on the one hand or to have political implications of some sort on the other? If the Catholic church could forbid the teachings of Galileo on the ground that the question whether or not the earth moves is a moral question, if the Russian government can take up an official position on the place of love in the good life on the ground that the question is, at bottom, a political question, then M. Malraux's solution of the problem of intellectual liberty under a political dictatorship is the purest moonshine.

Obviously the difficulty is not in reaching an agreement to limit dictatorship to political matters; the difficulty is in maintaining any practical agreement upon a working definition of political significance. And if M. Malraux actually believes that the matter has been settled when an artist or an intellectual walks in on a meeting of the Central Executive Committee to announce that he offers political submission in exchange for a charter of intellectual liberty, then M. Malraux is, to put it mildly, better as what I believe the Communists call a "theoretician" than he is at understanding the practical workings of government.

For the present, at least, I am not considering the proper limits (if any) of free discussion. I am illustrating with a concrete instance that tendency of the liberal to differ from the Communist, not over the ends proposed, but over the extent to which theoretical programs can be assumed to solve the difficulties in the way of achieving them. The difference is, if you like, largely a temperamental one; but it remains, for all that, very far from superficial. Nothing sunders more completely M. Malraux, let us say, from a typical liberal like Bertrand Russell than the fact that to the one the temporary dictatorship inevitably gives way to the new and true democracy because it is arranged in his ideology that it should do so, while to the other both history and psychology seem to indicate that dictatorships give birth to dictatorships just as wars give birth to wars.

The orthodox Communist may point to the new Russian constitution as evidence that the inevitable is happening. The liberal replies that the constitution provides neither for any possible candidates except those selected by the government nor for any modification of the present anomalous situation under which a person whose official position is nominally minor may rule with dictatorial power. He adds that there was no indication in the recent state trial of any disposition to grant the defendants the advantage of that legal machinery which is supposed to guard the rights of the meanest criminals under the democratic system, and he is likely to agree with the conclusion which Mr. Russell expressed to me in conversation: the new Russian constitution might possibly become significant if the present dictators should die without obvious successors. It is bound to remain merely a gesture so long as those rulers remain alive or leave behind them others sufficiently strong to establish a claim to succession.

It is the temperamental difference which is responsible also for the fact that so many of the attempts made by liberals and Communists to argue out their differences end in a pointless comparison of the compromises and failures of a working democracy with the neat perfections in the blueprints for a Communist paradise. The thoroughgoing Marxist is ready enough to point out how the society which the liberal philosophy imagined never actually came into being because the existence of money power stood in the way; but realist though he claims to be, he is quite unwilling to grant even the possibility that factors—like the power of bureaucracy—unrecognized in his blueprints tend to make Communist practice as significantly different from Communist theory as the actual liberal society is different from liberal theory. And it is, I think, rather through innocence than guile that he is always proposing for debate some such questions as "Can war be prevented under capitalism?" instead of another which the liberal, if he is sufficiently sly, would much prefer—namely, "Can war be prevented?"

According to early liberal theorists war was, of course, to be abolished by democracy. "The people," it was said, had nothing to gain from fighting one another, and "the people" therefore would be always for peace. No doubt the Communist can explain with clarity and truth why it did not turn out so, but he is little inclined to submit his own plans to a criticism conducted in an equally realistic spirit. On paper the Communist state would abolish that economic rivalry which is assumed to be the only cause of military conflict, and if a single Communist state were actually world-wide then obviously no war except civil war would be possible. But so would it be under any rule which was actually effective over the entire globe, whether it happened to be Communist or not.

In theory, no doubt, Communists ought to be able to get together and to form such an international state, but so, for that matter, ought democrats, and up to the present at least there is no evidence that to be a Communist implies any agreement with other Communists closer than the agreement at present existing between democrats. Does anyone seriously suppose that a Union of Soviet Republics under Stalin would necessarily live at peace with, let us say, a Union of Franco-German Socialist Republics under Trotsky? The basis of economic rivalry between them would be precisely the same as that of the rivalry between any other two states, and it is difficult to see how anyone who is familiar with the language used recently in Russia about the "Trotsky gang" can doubt that two Communist states could easily hate each other with a righteous hate indistinguishable from that which has proved so useful in the wars between "the peoples" of other nations.

M. Malraux, to whom I posed these questions, promised a reply by mail, which never came. Mr. Russell expressed opinions identical with my own, and under the circumstances it is perhaps not surprising that he reached the almost cynical conclusion that the sine qua non of peace is not any particular kind of international government but merely an international government of some kind. Half-seriously he said: The end of the next world war will find most of what is left upon the globe under the rule of American capitalists who will have financed the conflict in exchange for economic controls very much like those which they have demanded and received from the republics of South and Central America. It will not be a very good government—but it will do.

Not very long ago The Nation published two articles by its Moscow correspondent, Louis Fischer, on the new abortion laws in the Soviet Union. In one of them was a letter, obviously intended to reveal a more or less typical condition, from a woman who protested that she could not afford to have more babies because she was then living with three other persons in a single room.

I need hardly add that the letter was not intended to draw attention to housing conditions in Moscow, but it does so nevertheless and in a manner all the more striking because the conditions described are taken for granted. I know of course that it will be immediately replied that Russia has not had time to catch up; but the meaning of the situation has not been fully explored until it is added that many persons in the Soviet Republic are far better housed than this woman and that four people who live in one room have not been given their equitable share of what is actually available. It must be admitted, in other words, that neither plenty on the one hand nor equitable distribution on the other has been achieved, and it is hard to see how a society which, after twenty years, has established neither a decent minimum standard nor an equitable sharing of the little that is available can be said to have advanced very far toward a classless society.

No wonder that many of those who call themselves Communists tend—it seems to me in increasing numbers—to insist that one should evaluate communism not by the study of the only actually functioning Communist society but by the blueprints for a different one. It is possible of course that they are right. It may be that the failure of communism in Russia to approximate the truly liberal society in the midst of plenty which the Communist specifications call for is the result of mismanagement plus the peculiar conditions under which the experiment has taken place. But as long as Russia remains also the only experiment so far conducted, there is at least some justification for the suspicion that the failure is no greater than is to be expected when any plan is put into operation—no greater, for example, than the failure of actual working democracies to achieve all that the theory of democracy provides for. The liberal and the Communist do not disagree concerning the beauty of what the Communist is sure he sees just beyond the civil war and the temporary dictatorship of the proletariat. But to the one it is a Pisgah sight. To the other it may be only a mirage.

The Sunrise Conference

BY ALEX MATHEWS ARNETT

THE story has long been current that in April, 1916, when the submarine controversy reached its gravest crisis prior to the eve of hostilities, President Wilson held an early morning conference at the White House with a group of Congressional leaders at which he vehemently urged upon them that the time had come for a breach with Germany. They are said to have countered with equal heat that if he attempted such a move they would fight it on the floors of Congress, and as large majorities in both houses were firmly opposed to war, they would block any war resolution. The meeting was allegedly held at an early hour to avoid publicity, and thus it is referred to as the "Sunrise Conference."

In the absence of sufficient authentication, historians—with one or two exceptions—have not heretofore accepted this story. Some months ago, however, while examining the papers of Claude Kitchin—now available in the library of the University of North Carolina—the writer came upon correspondence in which Kitchin definitely confirmed the basic points. More recently, further confirmation has been obtained.

It seems that the first published account of the conference appeared in an article by Gilson Gardner in McNaught's Monthly in June, 1925, under the title Why We Delayed Entering the War. It was based largely upon hearsay evidence with some apparent confirmation from Claude Kitchin and Mrs. Champ Clark. Mr. Gardner had written to them, relating the story as he had heard it and inquiring about its truth. Both replies were apparently confirmatory, but upon scrutiny neither appeared conclusive. They left no doubt that some such conference was held, but Kitchin made no reference to what the issue was or what was said. Mrs. Clark only raised doubts as to whether she had in mind a conference in April concerned with the Sussex crisis or one of the secret meetings known to have been held in the preceding February.

If the Sunrise Conference was held in February, it would appear to have been much less significant than if it actually accorded with the traditional account. On the former occasion President Wilson apparently was not pressing for immediate hostilities, whereas in April he seriously considered such a move. It is known that he had Lansing prepare a note to Germany severing diplomatic relations, but he put it aside and wrote another which left the door open for our continued "neutrality." Why did he change his mind?

On March 24, 1921, C. H. Claudy of Washington wrote Kitchin:

I have been told that in 1916 President Wilson called a conference between the Honorable Champ Clark, the Honorable Mr. Flood, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and yourself, that this conference took place early in the morning in order to avoid the presence of newspapermen, and that at this conference President Wilson expressed his desire to declare war against Germany but was persuaded not to do so by you three gentlemen, who told him that if he attempted such a thing, you would fight him on the floor of the House.

If this is a true story (and my informant said that his information came from you) it is, of course, something that the country would be very much interested in hearing. If it is not a true story it ought not to be spread.

I, therefore, am writing you and asking you if in the first place it is true; and, in the second place, if it is a fact, would you be willing to give me an authorized interview to that effect or sign a statement to that effect, looking to publication?

To this Kitchin replied on April 2:

I have just been handed your letter at my residence by my clerk. I would rather see you in my office and talk with you about the matter as soon as I am well enough to go down to the Capitol regularly than to write you about it at this time.

Champ Clark, Flood, and myself did have early one morning, between seven and eight o'clock, such a conference with the President. At that time he seemed anxious to go to war with Germany immediately. This was in April, 1916. Champ Clark, Flood, and myself have talked about the matter dozens of times and our recollection as to just what was said exactly coincides.

As said above, some time after I get well enough to be at the Capitol regularly, you can come up and I will have Flood come in my office and we will talk with you about it, and you can have our recollections of the matter, but this is not written for publication at this time. When I recover my health and strength, I will give you the whole story, perhaps for publication.

Kitchin had suffered a stroke in April, 1920, from which he never entirely recovered; but his mind and his remarkable memory remained as clear as ever. So far as is known he never elaborated further upon the conference except in private conversation. He often discussed it in confidence with members of his family, his colleagues, and other friends. His son, Mills, who was an adult at the time, remembers having heard him talk of it then and often thereafter. He is quite positive that the conference occurred in April. Judge E. Yates Webb, who was then a colleague of Kitchin's, writes:

I do remember (and I think it was about this same conference) Hal Flood's coming to me on the floor of the House, rather much agitated, and saying that it looked like we were going to get in the war, judging from the President's attitude. I remember Flood's saying that he and others in the conference asked the President what we, the United States, would do in case we did get into war, and he said that the President replied, "Well, we will lend the Allies some money, send a few ships over there, and wind up the war."

Allan L. Benson also confirms the story. He was with Kitchin, he says, within a few hours after the conference; he found him "deeply stirred" and "indignant" as he told of the dramatic encounter. "He said that Wilson pounded the table with his fist and said that if this country were to declare war at once hostilities would be ended by August."

Shortly afterward the country was ringing with the campaign slogan, "He kept us out of war."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE Harvard Tercentenary was worthy of the finest traditions of that great university. What higher praise could there be than that? I do not mean merely the traditions of scholarship, or those of Brahmin Boston, which have often controlled it to its hurt, but the traditions of academic freedom, of the right of the scientist, the scholar, and the teacher to think their own thoughts, hold their own beliefs, and express their own opinions. That was the keynote of the proceedings put forward by President Conant with the support of President Angell of Yale and the President of the United States. Of course Harvard has sometimes honored this in the breach. Was not Professor Charles Follen driven from his chair because of his anti-slavery views? Did not the university share Charles William Eliot's hostile opinion of its graduate who was probably the foremost American orator and the most eloquent champion of liberty, Wendell Phillips? Is there not even the case of the conservative professor who was ejected because he criticized the public ovations to the revolutionary Louis Kossuth? But these and other inconsistencies and failings of the past only emphasize the more the admirable statements of what Harvard should and must stand for in our national life if it is to serve the Republic. Also the occasion stressed again the university's extraordinary good fortune in having as its new president a man aflame for the cause of academic freedom, who dared before that conservative audience to declare that the university must dissect "the forces of modern capitalism" just as it would establish "the origin of the rocks." The cheers with which his utterances were greeted were most hopeful signs that the tide of reaction is beginning to turn in this country.

I found the whole gathering, the entire procedure, profoundly impressive, but nothing impressed me more than the absence of uniforms, the total lack of marching hosts and helmeted heads. The few military officers present were in attendance upon the President and the Governor of Massachusetts. The ununiformed undergraduates who marched to their seats raised up no arms in salute and clenched no fists. They did not keep step; they bore no banners of prejudice, hate, intolerance, and war. Theirs are unregimented minds, and the three who spoke for their undergraduate fellows seemed determined to emphasize their freedom by the most outspoken criticism of their elders, of the university, of authority. Of course the ceremony was not as spectacular as the recent display at Heidelberg. There was no goose-stepping, no martial music, none of the thrills that come when thousands and thousands march in unbroken ranks. But one sat there and thanked God that one was an American, and that whatever the future holds, today there are men, the whole learned group, free to stand up for the most worth-while things in human life—the unfettered mind, the unimprisoned soul. Heidelberg? Well, its 550th anniversary last month did not bring out the most important fact about that university today, that in the last four years forty-seven of its professors and teachers have been driven from their chairs, more than 24 per cent of the entire faculty. That is all one needs to know to decide not to send one's son there—a place where men may teach but dare not say their souls are their own. Quite properly in all that great assembly of scholars there was only one official delegate from a German institution; and honorary degrees were conferred on a number of Jews.

There were other things to make one proud. The President of the United States rose to the occasion, not only as the foremost Harvard man but as the leader of the country. His speech measured up to all that was uttered on those two days. It was graceful, able, of literary flavor, and perfectly attuned to the moment and the occasion, without, of course, the slightest trace of partisanship, save one humorous reference to the fact that when Harvard was 200 years old the direful Andrew Jackson was President, and when it was 250 years old the Democrat, Grover Cleveland, "and now I am President." The applause and acclaim with which Franklin Roosevelt was received on that occasion will never be forgotten by those who heard them. Probably the majority of those in Sanders Theater who rose for the President when he entered will vote against him in November. That exhibition of tolerance, sportsmanship, and good-will to a political opponent should be written down in letters of gold in the annals of Harvard. For many of those who welcomed the fourth Harvard man to be Chief Executive of the nation are really deluded into believing that he plans to overthrow our system of government and deliberately to play traitor to the Republic.

Two days of ceremony and oratory and not a single false note! Two days without an official reference to the government—the President spoke before the Alumni Association and not at the official university celebration. Two days of stressing the things of the spirit, the glory of the intellectual life, the nobility and the continuing challenge of the search for truth within academic walls, and not merely Harvard walls, but the walls of every university in America. For this was the final prayer of President Conant—that a hundred years hence it be manifest that all the universities of this country "have led the way to new light, and may the nation give thanks that Harvard was founded."

I HATE to hear phrases cry out in agony. The practice of being cruel to words has gone on for centuries, but it seems to me that certain refinements in torture are peculiarly characteristic of the modern world. As far as I know, the Greeks and the Romans never took popular slogans and placed them on some rack by which they could be stretched wholly out of their natural shape and length. Perhaps they did. If so, the Greeks and the Romans were very much at fault. The present political campaign has proved that "freedom" and "liberty" may be transformed into brass knuckles with which to club the unfortunate. One of the favorite devices of the day is to address rhetorical questions to jobless ones asking them whether they are not sufficiently patriotic to insist upon self-reliance and starvation.

But of course the honey of the lot is "freedom of the press" as it is employed by publishers. Consider, please, the current situation in Seattle, where the Post-Intelligencer has suspended publication because of a strike by the American Newspaper Guild. Mr. Hearst and all his cohorts in the A. N. P. A. insist that this successful labor battle against a newspaper constitutes a violation of the constitutional guaranty of freedom of the press. As I read the amendment in the Bill of Rights, it does no more than specify that there shall be no form of censorship before the printing of the word. It does not say that a publisher may not be sued and punished for libel, obscenity, incitement to riot, or many other crimes and misdemeanors. I will admit that I would like to see it go much farther. But as it stands the pledge does not go beyond the promise that the man who has the power to print may do so without asking anybody's permission as to the quality of his reports or opinions.

However, I find nothing in the constitutional guaranty which says that the government must aid and abet each and every citizen in his desire to print. To be specific, I hold certain opinions just as stalwartly as any in the Hearst quiver are held. It so happens that I am not in a position to get out my own newspaper. I believe that condition is unfortunate, and yet I hardly feel that I am empowered to complain that natural rights have been taken from me. Much of what I want to say goes into the World-Telegram and into The Nation. But I do not control the policy of either publication. Certain ardent sentiments I swallow, or hold for the time being within my mouth as a cow retains her cud. Like the cow I am for the most part contented. It may even be that mastication will mellow and improve some of my political opinions. In all these matters I assert that I am far more reasonable than William Randolph Hearst. If a strike disturbs the publication of his Seattle P.-I. that is, from his point of view, unfortunate. But it is not a violation of any guaranty of free press. Mr. Hearst can print that paper as well as all his others the moment he is ready to discuss working conditions with his organized employees. Surely none will contend that reporters, printers, pressmen, stereotypers, and photo-engravers must proceed upon their endeavors regardless of pay and hours for the sake of the freedom of the press. Around the theater it is said, "The show must go on," but that obligation exists only when those who make the backbone of the show have entered into fair contracts with the entrepreneur.

Of late I fear that publishers have grown both greedy and heretical. Within the last few years there has grown up a feeling that provisions which obtain in other establishments must not be urged upon newspapers without a loud squeal on their part concerning tyranny. It is difficult to reduce the argument to its logical absurdity because none can be stated which certain newspaper owners have not seriously defended. For instance, I might set forth a hypothetical case about as follows: Suppose an American newspaper were printed in a building so flagrantly out of line with the building restrictions that it constituted a fire trap. Could anybody conceivably say that the municipal authorities might not call upon the publisher either to provide fire escapes or shut up shop until such time as the premises were made safe for the workers? And yet a case of this kind arose in Boston, and the newspaper concerned refused to put up fire escapes or so much as provide a rope for any beleaguered printer or reporter to slide to the street. The newspaper contended that the city of Boston in calling upon it to spend additional money was interfering with the freedom of the press.

Advocates of the child-labor amendment are familiar with the fact that their strongest adversary is the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. This organization maintains both state and federal lobbies to block any legislation which would make it impossible to use youngsters as carriers or newsboys. Children, of course, can be hired more cheaply than adults, and the organized newspapers of America contend that any change in this condition would constitute an interference with the freedom of the press.

I was arguing with the editor of a morning paper about the fake story which Mr. Hearst's Mirror ran concerning the murderer of Mrs. Titterton. J. David Stern exposed this shocking piece of invention in his New York Post. I asked my friend the editor why he had not done the same thing. "I just didn't think of it," he answered. "Well," I continued, "don't you think it would be a good thing if the Newspaper Guild were strong enough to pass and enforce a rule that none of its members should ever be compelled to write flagrant and manifest lies?"

"Oh, I couldn't go for that," he said.

"Why not?" I asked.

"Why, that would constitute an interference with the freedom of the press," he told me.

Here Comes the Mower

By IRVING FINEMAN

Here comes the mower with whirring wheels and clickracking ratchet, hauled by two horses, beasts driven by man perched on high,
his head high against the blue heavens:
Ineluctable will driving force, force driving the patterned process to inevitable consequence. Tall tender grasses fall from the grace of this green life, fall to the endlessly fruitful and greedy earth, fall to feed forces that enrich, destroy for enrichment . . . O proud tender grasses, do not despair! Do not bow to the oncoming reaper.
Stand and draw with delight the last sweet drop of dew as sharp death cleaves your side.
Nor fear nor vilify the knife that cuts you down to the pleasant earth that brought you forth and, relentless, will hold you to the knife.
Nor curse ratchet and wheels nor the driven beasts nor the will poised upon clouds; for this is all our destiny—even proud man's.

Stranger Than Fiction

CRADLE OF LIFE. By Louis Adamic. Harper and Brothers.
$2.50.

I NEED not remind the readers of "Laughing in the Jungle" and "The Native's Return" that Louis Adamic is a writer of unquestionable ability. In "Dynamite," as well as in articles for The Nation, he has shown himself to be one of the most energetic, most persuasive publicists in contemporary journalism. Because his writing is infused with great personal charm, I find it difficult to resist anything he has written. And with that charm he has employed a social conscience to excellent advantage. His treatment of peasant character in "The Native's Return" should serve as a model for young proletarian novelists, for Louis Adamic is one of the few writers of our time who have invested the peasant with human dignity and admirable strength. Mr. Adamic's autobiographies are read with the ease that we associate with the reading of fiction; his fiction, on the other hand, is read with the slow embarrassment that accompanies the reading of the falsified yet "true" confession story.

His "Cradle of Life" is a second novel, told in the first person of Rudo Stanka, an illegitimate descendant of the Hapsburg line, son of a Moravian countess and Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria. Under the shadow of mystery attending illegitimate birth we are led to expect a romance as fantastic as the story of "A Prisoner of Zenda," the romance that our mothers read, reread, and lent and borrowed. The expectation is not entirely denied. Illegitimate birth is followed by exploits in which men faint and out of which good, old-fashioned Balkan heroes and heroines are made. The plot and circumstance are of a pattern I had thought was broken long before the Theater Guild revived "Arms and the Man." There is scarcely a device of pre-Shavian operatics that remains unused: young Rudo's long memory (which defies even the most rudimentary laws of human psychology), his genius for attracting birds and animals, his disaster in a fire are here set down in the approved manner of our earliest imported romances of Central Europe—and there is no lack of action on any of these pages.

And yet, under all this melodrama that so closely approximates opera bouffe, there is a layer of careful observation, a genuine use of economic history, an understanding of peasants and their way of living, a perception of natural phenomena and their beauty. Rudo's wet-nurse, Dora, is the character that one remembers; it was her business to take charge of illegitimate children and then destroy them. Mr. Adamic derives the title of his book from the cradle rocking at her side, a cradle of life for some, of death for many—and when one thinks of the Yugoslavia that Mr. Adamic has created for us in "The Native's Return," the symbolic reference of Dora's cradle has emotional reality. But this reference has only the most tenuous relation to the artificial machinery by which Mr. Adamic propels his present story. The episodes in themselves might well have had their basis, I suspect, in the familiar record of phenomenal truth that is always stranger than fiction, the kind of sensational fact we encounter in the "Believe-It-or-Not" syndicated feature of the daily newspaper. Such fact, unrelated to symbolic reference or to psychological motivation, remains stranger than fiction and immeasurably less convincing.

HORACE GREGORY

A Study of Brahms

BRAHMS: HIS LIFE AND WORK. By Karl Geiringer.
Translated by H. B. Weiner and Bernard Miall. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THIS is the first good book on Brahms that I have encountered. As custodian of the collections of the Society of Friends of Music in Vienna, Geiringer has had access to hitherto inaccessible letters in the possession of the society; and he has supplemented these with other unpublished or unfamiliar Brahms correspondence. What is more important, however, is his use of this material: the author admires his subject but does not flinch at a wart on his nose; and writing with understanding as well as honesty, he has produced a credible portrait of a credible human being.

For his discussion of the music Geiringer has compared sketches in the possession of the society with the final manuscripts, and these with printed copies bearing Brahms's notations of changes for possible future editions, also in the possession of the society. These enable him to make interesting observations that stay, however, within the limits of complete acceptance of the music, instead of breaking through them. A critical revaluation of Brahms's music is still to be written.

Geiringer does lay the basis for such a revaluation in a concluding chapter on Brahms as man and artist. "A discord, a conflict of opposing forces, pervaded his whole existence, coloring his life and his work alike." In the man the conflict was between the "urge to freedom" and a "desire for subjection" to order; in the work this became a conflict between "fantasy" and "obedience to law"—between "his extravagance of feeling and his romantic enthusiasm" and "the striving for clearly articulated structure and established form"—or, Geiringer does not add, between over-sweet sentimentality and preoccupation with technical device, and sometimes not a conflict between them but a combination that is hard to endure.

Geiringer also makes the all-important observation concerning Brahms's variations that "the master's imagination rose to the greatest heights when under the constraint of the strictest laws." Brahms was essentially a lyricist, and as such a composer of small forms, and he was a marvelously skilful musical craftsman. Where he used his craftsmanship to inflate something small into something big—as in certain first movements—it is, like the music, an affliction. But in the variation form he was called on to exercise his craftsmanship on the task of saying one thing in a series of different ways, and to produce a large form by the process of writing a cumulative series of small ones. And his finest achievements are the sets of variations on themes of Händel, Haydn, Schumann, and Paganini, and the final passacaglia of the Fourth Symphony.

From Surrealism to Socialism

THE BELLS OF BASEL. By Louis Aragon. Translated from the French by Haakon M. Chevalier. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WHEN Louis Aragon, one of the founding fathers of dada and surrealism, turned to the proletariat for regeneration, he did so with that splendid violence characteristic of the cults he once championed. At that time the literature of the left was not so much being created as erupted, and Aragon's percussion effects and suave brutality went well with its dominant style. His poem, "The Red Front," brought down the wrath of the authorities upon his head, as their police minds would not put down to poetic license his open advocacy of the shooting of prominent politicians.

In time, however, Aragon's initial intoxication gradually gave way to the more sober tendencies in the literature to which he was now organically bound. And it is a tribute to the integrating powers of the doctrine he embraced that his first novel written under its influence should surprise us by its gravity of intention and maturity of performance. This poet of cosmopolitan rhetoric has turned into an eager student of history; and in his aspiration to the role of social analyst, he must needs rehearse the parts he once neglected. Like other contemporary novelists, Aragon returns to the pre-war scene in order to find and correlate the elements that shaped our present destiny. And the world he discovers in his expedition to the past is a world that cannot survive.

But in treating this material he adopts a particular angle of vision. His novel is built around the lives of three women, who become the focus of his insights into the society that produced them. Thus the story gains from the specific nature of its major theme, the theme of woman as a social animal. Diane, the first of the three, is an old-time courtesan, a worldly Maupassant heroine salvaged from her purely sexual existence in the traditional novel of passion and invested with the significance of a type representing the past of her sex. The second, Catherine, who claims most of our attention, takes all the lovers she has a fancy to, but is primarily afraid of love, for to her it is "the great swindle, the assertion of man's power over woman." To Catherine the revolution means the liberation of women from their debasement as creatures who either "sit with their embroidery behind window curtains" or pace the street corners waiting for men. Essentially she is the transitional type, attracted to revolutionary ideas, but unable to go beyond a mere tour of the classes in search of purpose and repose. Through her contacts with the anarchists we enter the submerged world of blind rebellion, which is contraposed to the world of Victor, the Socialist worker, who incarnates the discipline of consistent struggle. In the Epilogue, dealing with the International Socialist Congress in Basel, we are given an ecstatic portrait of Clara Zetkin. It is she who foreshadows the woman of tomorrow. Here the novelist sinks back into his poetic self, and the narrative dissolves into marine metaphors suggested by Clara's "measureless, magnificent eyes . . . blue and mobile, like deep waters crossed by currents."

But the mists of the happy future into which the novel vanishes cannot altogether conceal its defects. As with some other French writers, the charm and fluency of Aragon's prose is at times more expressive of the current level of French literary achievement, smoothly functioning in all of its works, than it is of the individual accents of an original creation. Catherine is somewhat too exotic to suit the part the author has assigned her within his social scheme; and Victor, intrinsically the same type as Edmond Maillecottin in Jules Romains, is nowhere realized as freshly and vividly as Edmond is in that remarkable seventeenth chapter of "The Earth Trembles." In fact, the whole section bearing Victor's name, which describes the great taxi strike in which he is involved, seldom rises above the plane of reporting. Aragon's problem, already solved in some measure by other revolutionary artists, is to wrestle with and overcome the tendency of his sociological facts to become the limbo of his imagination.

Markers for the Dead

POEMS OF PEOPLE. By Edgar Lee Masters. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

MASTERS first occupied himself with the writing of "poems of people" in 1923, selecting his subjects at random from history, imagination, and personal experience, with the idea of projecting—in the barbarous idiom of the dust papers—a "summation of life, of tragedy and comedy, of heroism and failure, of courage in battle and the walks of peace, of happiness and suffering, resignation and rebellion." To this end—a more pretentious one, surely, than the poet himself would be likely to confess to—the graveyards of Spoon River and the American dream tradition once more yield up their dead. From Spoon River in effect if not in fact are recruited the wraiths of Luke Crockett, "By the town worsted and his fight with solitaire and booze," of Tom Barron, destroyed equally by his will to life and "the cost of being good," of Dick Woodward, who renounced respectability for "the life of the loafers, quitters, and the dodgers." On the other hand a large portion of the book is devoted to patriotic eulogy of Washington, Jackson, Beauregard, Boone, Pickett, Lewis, and Van Buren, among others, all of whom are exhibited more as public monuments than as "people" and celebrated with aphorisms and limping meters. When every allowance has been made for the enormities notorious among ballad-makers, lines like the following must be set down as something less than heroic:

Let a nation-wide consumer organization advise you which brands of SHOES, TIRES and WHISKIES are "Best Buys"

Equal in Cost — Unequal in Quality

Brand X shoes cost $5.55 a pair—Brand Y, $5.50. Both are nationally advertised, widely sold. Almost exactly equal in cost, a typical Consumers Union test (reported in the current issue of Consumers Union Reports) shows that they are far from being equal in quality. Brand Y is rated as one of the two "Best Buys" of thirteen brands of men's shoes subjected to extensive laboratory tests—Brand X is one of the five brands listed as "Not Acceptable." (For partial details of this test see table below.) Read this report for accurate, technical information about shoes—it also rates, in terms of brand names, ten leading brands of women's shoes. Included in this report are Florsheim, Thom McAn, I. Miller, A. S. Beck, Walk-Over, Enna Jettick and other leading brands.

Saving from $40 to $100 on Tires

Whether you equip your car with one brand of tires or with another may mean an actual difference in cost to you of from forty to a hundred dollars in each 25,000 driving miles. A report in this issue, based on actual road tests of over 300 tires, shows striking differences in mileage costs of leading brands. Twelve brands, including Firestone, Goodyear, U. S., Dunlop, Federal and Goodrich, are rated in this report—three as "Best Buys," six as "Also Acceptable" and three as "Not Acceptable." (Note—this report is not in the $1 limited edition.) The current issue also reports on women's fall coats (including fleece, tweed, fur and fur-trimmed coats), men's and women's rubbers, hot water bottles, and other products. The labor conditions under which many of the products are made are also described.

A TYPICAL CONSUMERS UNION TEST

Results of 4 out of 19 laboratory tests made on the shoes mentioned above.

	Brand X	Brand Y
Number of abrasive strokes on test machines required to wear out equal thicknesses of soles	32169	43171
Number of pounds per inch required to tear or pull apart inner sole	284	638
Number of pounds required to burst outer vamp lining	261	319
Number of pounds per inch required to tear or pull apart vamp leather	103	131
Total rating on all of nineteen points	694	854

Seven Best Buys in Whiskies

Clear heads should call for one of the seven "Best Buys" out of thirty-two leading brands of American whiskies—but not for any of the nine rated by liquor experts as "Not Acceptable" in the current issue. To the left is one of the seven best buys—to the right, one of the most popular American brands—selling at the same price but listed as "Not Acceptable." This report—the first of a series of three on liquors and wines—also covers Scotch and Canadian whiskies. Included in the ratings are Seagram's, Vat 69, Calvert's, Old Overholt, Mt. Vernon, Hiram Walker and other well-known brands.

Coming!—Ratings of Electric Razors

Do electric shavers give as close or as good a shave as ordinary safety razors? Are they faster or slower? Will they cut or irritate the skin? Of three electric shavers, including two nationally advertised makes, only one is rated in the coming issue of Consumers Union Reports as a "Best Buy"—the others "Not Acceptable." Ratings will also be given in this issue of leading brands of gins, cordials and brandies. Coming issues will rate ordinary safety razors, razor blades, shirts, socks, canned fruits and vegetables, drugs, cosmetics and many other products.

Consumers Union of U. S.

CONSUMERS UNION OF UNITED STATES, headed by Professor Colston E. Warne, of Amherst, Arthur Kallet, co-author of 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs, and D. H. Palmer, now supplies 12,000 members (the number increasing at the rate of about 2,000 a month) with ratings of competing brands of products. If you, too, want this accurate and unbiased technical information—enabling you to save money and to buy intelligently—simply fill out and mail the coupon below. You will immediately receive the current issue. Membership will also entitle you to receive the yearly buying guide to be published late in the year. (Note: The limited $1 edition reports mainly on low-priced products and does not cover higher-priced commodities such as automobiles, refrigerators, etc. The full $3 service covers both types of products.)

If you missed

our first issues there is still time to get them. Simply write on the coupon the month with which you wish your membership to begin. You will immediately receive the issues dating from the month indicated and will receive future issues as they appear PLUS the yearly buying guide. Below is a brief summary of the principal subjects covered in each issue.

MAY, 1936 (full service edition)—Inexpensive hosiery, Grade A and Grade B milk, toilet soaps, breakfast cereals, Alka-Seltzer, tooth brushes.

JUNE, 1936 (full service edition)—Automobiles, gasolines, moth preventives, canned vegetable soups, vegetable seeds.

SHE SOUGHT A NEW LIFE —FOUND IT IN A NEW WORLD

Dorothy Ruth Kahn lived the life of a middle-class American girl until an inner conflict shattered her life and sent her to Palestine in search of integrity. Her book is not only a fascinating personal document; it conveys, as well, the pulsing life which she found in Palestine—the boisterous vigor of Tel-Aviv, the surge of new life in the countryside. She brings home with emotional force what she saw, heard and felt in a land which is being transformed. Ill. $2.75.

SPRING UP, O WELL

by Dorothy Ruth Kahn

A distinguished biologist gives us a lucid account of the marvelous development, from a single cell, of the human being and describes clearly the machinery which effects that development. The latter sections of the book tell how the genes make us the sort of persons we are and trace the path of vertebrate development. Prospective parents will be deeply interested in this book and it will appeal as well to all those interested in the future of the race. A clear exposition, profusely illustrated, of a fascinating subject. $3.75.

HOW WE CAME BY OUR BODIES

by Charles B. Davenport

To the complex problem of presenting the United States in its relationship to the rest of the world, Professor Bemis brings the lucidity and authority which won him the 1926 Pulitzer Prize in History. Here is the authentic record of the events which have formed our diplomatic history since our birth as a nation to the present. Here also is a brilliant analysis of the personalities, human motives and political exigencies which shaped those events. This book is certain to become the standard one-volume history of American diplomacy. Ready Oct. 9th. $5.00.

Her timbers were all true-hewed, but somehow she was voodooed
She had two hatchways only, and her captain had to stand
For the most part in the open to see with what he was copin',
To trumpet forth his orders and the battle to command.

In the concluding portion of the volume, where a more personal note is struck, the tone is one of mordant nostalgia for the past, of contempt for the sterility and possessiveness of modern life, of proud personal estrangement, and of a general insistence on the stoic virtues of soldierly self-reliance and the "heroic will." The significant fact to be noted about the book as a whole, aside from its unrelieved triviality, is that, though it appears to have been assembled over a period of thirteen years, the tense throughout is that of time past. Mr. Masters's story from the very beginning has been that of the stone-cutter who has devoted a lifetime to the carving of markers for the dead, and comes, in the end, to see life backward; which is another thing from seeing it whole.

BEN BELITT

A Parochial Orbit

NOW THAT APRIL'S HERE, AND OTHER STORIES.

By Morley Callaghan. Random House. $2.

I HAVE never cared much for Mr. Callaghan's novels, each of which, in spite of an interesting theme, seemed flat and pedestrian, more like a careful exercise than a freely moving narrative. But his short stories, if they have hardly more verve, are natural products of an artistic emotion; their sobriety, instead of mirroring the author's studious conscientiousness, emerges as a way of looking at life. Nor are they sober only: if they lack the transforming power of passion and wit, they have warmth and kindliness. In his novels Mr. Callaghan is often merely sympathetic with character, merely reportorial with events, merely plausible with causation, and the effect is too meager. But by choosing, in his stories, to treat of average people in simple situations, he does not use up all his ability on the stories themselves, and can employ what is left to deepen his moods. His people, studied with a single-mindedness that is almost an equivalent for the intensity he lacks, become after a while the symbols of common humanity with its pathetic helplessness and touches of tragic dignity. His people, furthermore, are in line with his own capacities: there are no heroes, no villains, no geniuses, no powerful personalities among them, as in Mr. Callaghan's writing there is no talent for being heroic, for being demonic, for being inspired, or for being richly personal.

This is a book filled with domestic situations, a book about mothers and sons, fathers and daughters, young husbands and wives, young lovers, brothers, friends, priests, old women. Almost all these people are destined for the same sort of existence, with the same problems, misunderstandings, difficulties, rewards; they live, almost all of them, inside a purely parochial orbit. It would not be difficult to sentimentalize them, particularly since Mr. Callaghan has none of the tough-mindedness of, say, a James Farrell; and perhaps by treating them over and over again, with no departures into worlds beyond their experience, Mr. Callaghan does finally leave a faintly sentimental impression. Still, the fault may be ours, may be due to our own over-cultivation, our own possession of too much sensibility and too little sentiment. For Mr. Callaghan handles his people honestly enough; his treatment has nothing in common with the homely pathos contrived by writers for women's magazines.

His stories vibrate, however slightly, with the lasting, immemorial emotions of circumscribed family life, and end by inclosing for our view a particular kind of existence.

But just that may constitute a danger. Mr. Callaghan's people seem too neatly labeled: they are what a less social-minded age used to refer to as "the little people." They are caught fluttering in a cage—not an economic cage but an environmental one which I think comes in for over-emphasis, as though they were incapable of separate identity. When so many short stories, written over a period of time, are collected in one book and leave so unified an impression, our first thought is that we must have been given the truth; but when we find so unified an impression based upon so rigid an interpretation, we may begin to wonder whether some of the limitations the author ascribes to his characters do not belong to the author himself. Perhaps his characters grope less and vary more than Mr. Callaghan has suggested; perhaps by narrowing their world he puts us in a position, not to understand them better, but to misunderstand them worse—to find them all alike, to think of them as performing a routine cycle, to depersonalize and isolate them. The result, in terms of reading matter, is a slight monotony; in terms of interpretation, a kind of completeness without fullness. Because Mr. Callaghan is lacking in temperament does not necessarily prove that his characters are.

The Popular Front in France

FRANCE TODAY, AND THE PEOPLE'S FRONT. By Maurice Thorez. International Publishers. $1.75.

FRANCE FACES THE FUTURE. By Ralph Fox. International Publishers. $1.25.

MAURICE THOREZ is secretary-general of the French Communist Party, and Ralph Fox is a British Communist journalist. These two authors undertake to interpret the present situation in France by glorifying the policy of the Communist International. They achieve this by clearly presenting a revolutionary situation and as clearly failing to draw revolutionary conclusions.

The policy of the Comintern toward the French situation is guided entirely—as it is the world over—by the needs of Soviet diplomacy. Right now this diplomacy, at least in the opinion of the Soviet dictatorship, needs an alliance with liberal bourgeois forces, to the end that no proletarian revolution whose success is not contractually guaranteed may weaken the Franco-Soviet military pact. Therefore Soviet diplomacy requires the French Communists to abandon the revolutionary struggle and to unite in a popular front even with the leaders of the Radical Socialist wing of French finance capital.

It is already clear that the Popular Front government has miserably failed. The fascist leagues—whose dissolution M. E. Ravage, in The Nation of August 8, showed to be purely legalistic—are steadily arming. Even l'Humanité, official organ of the French Communist Party, interlards the triumphant oratory of M. Thorez and other Communist leaders with articles showing that the French army is being prepared for a fascist coup d'état by the reactionary. Every reactionary force in France at this moment is taking its place in a calm and deliberate preparation for a fascist coup, which M. Blum prepares to meet exactly as Severing and Braun prepared to meet the Hitler coup, as Azaña prepared to meet the Spanish fascist rebellion—with the traditional paralysis

A Vital Subject about which there is entirely too much IGNORANCE

By the Author of MARRIED LOVE

CHANGE of LIFE IN MEN AND WOMEN

By MARIE C. STOPES. In this sane, scientific, common sense book Dr. Stopes lifts the shroud of ignorance from the facts concerning what is, after all, only a very natural development in the life process. She shows that although men as well as women undergo a change, there is no reason why both sexes should not enjoy nearly twenty-five years of love and happiness after the climacteric has passed.

HOW TO APPROACH THE "CRISIS"

Here is the information so many people have long needed for a sound, healthy and happy life. Dr. Stopes demonstrates that in reality there is no crisis, that if both sexes understand and appreciate the factors involved, normal, wholesome relations may be resumed when the period of change is over. She then tells how each sex should adjust itself prior to and during the change and offers constructive advice on diet, habits, mental attitudes, drugs and the like. Written in a calm, easy-reading style, her book belongs in every household. Get it today. At bookstores, or use coupon below.

of a Social Democratic government in the face of a social crisis.

To make the Popular Front seem the hope of France, Messrs. Thorez and Fox have to do two things: they have to rewrite the past and they have to misrepresent the present. About the past of the Comintern they are very glib. The party line has zigzagged in the past decade to suit the exigencies of Soviet diplomacy. These zigzags are deftly smoothed out with the fantasy that the strategy of the International since 1920 has been one continuous effort to achieve the united front. In 1924 the united front was proposed to the Socialists in a letter which called upon all workers "either to join the Communist Party in order to carry on a united working-class struggle against the entire bourgeoisie whether right or left, or to join the Radical Party against the Communist Party, which absolutely refuses to practice inter-class collaboration." The Socialists answered that they considered the letter an insult. In 1928 the offer was repeated, accompanied by an assurance to Communists that the party knew the Socialists would not accept, but that it was necessary to appeal to the Socialist rank and file over the heads of their leaders—in other words, the famous "united front from below." Later, in the hysterical days of the "third period," the Comintern discovered that all Socialists were fascists. And a united front with Social Democrats, let alone capitalist parties, was declared to be a counter-revolutionary crime. Then suddenly these fiery revolutionaries turned into reformists, not only united with quondam "social fascists" but practicing "inter-class collaboration" with capitalist parties. The reason, of course, is Hitler.

So much for the consistency of Communist strategy as dictated by the Comintern. The policy did not change. Ever since Stalin came to power it has been dominated by the obsession of "socialism in one country," and hence, of course, revolution nowhere else. Popular Front reformism today, like the infantile leftism of the "social fascist" period, is paralyzing the Western working classes in the face of the rising tide of fascism. "Social fascism" raised up a fanatically anti-Soviet fascism in Germany. Popular Front reformism seems well on the way to raise up an allied fascism in France. Soviet diplomacy, for all its reputed cleverness, seems once more to be defeating its own end.

It is unfortunate for these authors that their books appear in the midst of the fascist rebellion in Spain against the Spanish Popular Front government. For they give no intimation that fascism is to be defeated only by the arming of the working class against a fascist coup, by revolutionary changes in the military personnel, by reorganization of the police, by a desperate fight against finance capital. On the contrary they depend upon a Popular Front government pledged to carry out a reformist program which, according to M. Thorez, "can be realized within the framework of the capitalist regime." The revolutionary aims of the Communist Party can wait. But revolutionary situations do not wait upon reformist programs.

Faced with fascist preparations, the best M. Thorez can offer the French working class is bombast, bourgeois pacifism, and the slogan "Defense of the Soviet Union in all cases and by all means." But leaders who mean business do not lead against gas bombs and machine-guns masses of untrained followers armed only with a will to peace and the clenched fists of the Communist salute. Therefore one must assume that M. Thorez does not mean business. But the fascists do. Theoretically, of course, the Popular Front government controls the army; but we have the Spanish rebellion to show what that means. And a popular militia improvised at the last minute will stand no chance against the most efficient fighting force in Europe if that force can be led by fascist generals to throw in its lot with the reaction. One cannot read these two books without being reminded of Marx's caustic comments on the French democrats in "The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte":

Weakness had, as it ever does, taken refuge in the wonderful; it believed that the enemy was overcome if, in its imagination, it hocus-pocussed him away; and it lost all sense of the present in the imaginary apotheosis of the future that was at hand, and of the deeds that it had in petto but which it did not yet want to bring to the scratch.

Now, as Marx said then, "the days are gone by when the cackling of geese could save the Capitol."

DRAMA

ALL of those concerned in "The Golden Journey" (Booth Theater) seem to have worked almost too hard. At least one of them, the director, Harry Wagstaff Gribble, is an expert in his line, and if doing one's best went as far toward making a good artist as it is said to go toward the making of a good man, then the piece would deserve high praise. The author not only tries to be funny but tries to be funny every minute and arranges for someone to fall down or pull someone else's hair whenever nothing else is happening. The actors act all over the place, and just to show that they are not sparing themselves, rush back and forth across the stage even if there is no very good reason for doing so. In addition, two goldfish, a canary, two dogs, a monkey, and a macaw are introduced at various points, thanks to an ingenious dramatic device which provides that any animal commonly stocked by the pet shops can be appropriately introduced at any moment. Unfortunately, however, the tale of three young would-be writers who are living on nothing a week in a rather handsome apartment is neither very convincing nor very pointed.

Several times it looks as though the author might be meaning to say that his protagonists are preposterous frauds typical of post-depression decadence. Several other times it looks as though he might be meaning to say that the vie de Bohème is still going on. In the end it is evident that he is not meaning to say anything at all. Perhaps it was only because under such circumstances one is grateful for small favors, but Leona Powers seemed quite good as the publisher's wife with a talent for making gigolos out of aspiring authors, and Raymond Bramley seemed amusing in a wildly farcical way as the publisher himself.

Many plays are now on the eve of production, but at the present writing the theatergoer can do no better than to stick to the D'Oyly Carte Company, which is continuing at the Martin Beck and which reached new heights with "The Yeomen of the Guard." Probably none of the other Gilbert and Sullivan operas brings any company quite so surely to the test. It hasn't the unquenchable gaiety, the jiggling, self-sustaining vivacity of some of the other more popular pieces. As a matter of fact, it is almost somber; it neither sings nor acts itself, and those who have heard it only in mediocre performances may wonder why devotees sometimes declare it the finest of the operas. But the preference is not hard to understand when it is given as the D'Oyly Carte Company gives it—with vocal perfection and a very high degree of dramatic skill.

Undoubtedly Gilbert was indulging in a bit of not too obviously appropriate self-pity in his conception of Jack Point, the tragic jester. He may himself have had a broken heart, but he was certainly not unappreciated or unrewarded, and the character could easily be maudlin. Martyn Green, however, is superb. It is the best of his impersonations so far, and it is very rare indeed to find anyone who can dance, sing, and act, all nearly equally well. Gilbert and Sullivan were always demanding that almost unrealizable combination of talents, but it is not often that their unreasonable demands are so adequately met. Special praise is also due to Marjorie Eyre, especially for her singing of "Were I Thy Bride," one of the loveliest, though not one of the most obvious, of all Sullivan's melodies.

"Iolanthe," my own particular favorite, is current this week.

Stationary War

THE ROAD TO GLORY" (Twentieth Century) illustrates once more a defect in the Western Front as material for fiction in any form. Once more a war is going on in which there are no battles. Millions of men are in a deadlock the monotony of which may best be expressed by saying that both the noise and the danger are constant. The story can neither rise nor fall to a climax, just as it can have no hero and just as it can have no end. Movement, the life blood of story, can be only illusory here, where to be sure trenches are occupied and reoccupied and individuals go once in a while to incidental death, but where there can be no movement in the large sense necessary to drama. This is why "The Road to Glory," like "All Quiet on the Western Front" and "Journey's End," is ultimately depressing in spite of the fact that for an hour and a half it seems to be and is exciting. The excitement of the spectator is never healthy. It feeds his claustrophobia and is fed by it, the result being in fact a sort of madness in the mind which corresponds to the madness of the theme and which if prolonged would grow intolerable. The emotions involved are the last thing from liberating; the soul goes on no journey.

If this is true it is most true where motion pictures are concerned. The capacity of the sound film for reproducing the pandemonium of a European war is fatally great; we are no sooner convinced that we have never heard so authentic a barrage as this one in "The Road to Glory" than we are reminded in a new degree of the meaninglessness of all such things. So too with the other properties which Mr. Sherriff has made traditional: the neurotic captain, the enlisted man who reads irrelevant letters from home, and the dugout which for everybody is a living grave. T. S. Eliot recently dismissed the kind of war we have today as "degrading." It was both an aesthetic and a moral judgment, and hence applicable here. The story of a war without movement is a story without morality, which is to say without meaning.

Mr. Eliot presumably prefers an older kind of war; and, leaving aside the question whether any kind is desirable in nature, it does seem plain that only the mobile kind is desirable in art. "The Last of the Mohicans" (Rivoli) makes the difference felt at once. It is a relatively inept film, with a great many incredible Indians in it and with a bulky fable which it is not always careful to keep clear. But Cooper's very noble narrative instinct drove him to occupy a large area with figures and forces the significance of whose comings and goings cannot be questioned; and the American forest which he bequeathed to all romancers after him is undeniably here. The British army, the French army, the self-interested settlers, and of course the Indians compose a moving background against which Hawkeye (Randolph Scott) can serve freely and spaciouly as the hero that fiction was created to have; and the death of the Colonel at Fort William Henry is a human event, as nobody's death is in "The Road to Glory." "The Road to Glory" is a better picture of its kind, and for the moment tells a more exciting story; but the kind is not so good, nor, since it is incapable of development, can it be said to have so much future.

"The General Died at Dawn" (Paramount) is set in contemporary China, where the war lord Yang (Akim Tamiroff) and the young American champion of oppressed provinces (Gary Cooper) fight it out over a wide field of intrigue. Clifford Odets, who wrote the scenario, has therefore not been trenchbound; and the result of his collaboration with the camera is a superior film, continuously interesting and often quite genuinely terrible. He has, however, made a number of minor mistakes; as when he puts into the wry mouth of his American hero pious words that do not belong there, and as when he lets his love story lapse into the commonplace. He may very well have lacked a free hand with the love story, but it is doubtful that anyone in Hollywood directed him to write the set speeches. They are right, but this charming and modest fellow would not have said them. Fortunately the war lord does not understand himself so well; it is he who merely by continuing to be himself carries the excellent moral with which Mr. Odets has been concerned.

Horace as Reformer

Dear Sirs: Alvin Johnson's review of the Modern Library edition of Horace, in your issue of August 29, admirable as it is in many respects, shows quite clearly the danger of passing judgment on any poet without proper consideration of his age and environment. Surely any comment on Horace's attitude toward slavery should begin with mention of the fact that Horace was the son of a man who had been a slave. If his acceptance of the institution of slavery seems too complaisant, would it not be well to remind the reader that Roman law provided a certain safety valve for the injustice of slavery, namely, the fact that a slave could be set free, and that thereby he became a Roman citizen, subject to few if any disabilities?

To say without reservation that Horace "accepts the existing situation," merely because his book is generous to overflowing with the joy of transitory pleasures and delight in simple things, is to see but a part of the picture.

The outstanding fact of Horace's first thirty years of life was a world torn asunder by civil wars; and the outstanding cause of those civil wars, a cause cited almost without exception by every contemporary historian, was greed—greed for wealth which passed imperceptibly into greed for power. Exploitation of the provinces brought much capital to Rome. Capital was most safely invested in land. The dispossessed, unable to compete with the slave labor on the large estates, flocked to Rome to swell the ever-growing mass of clientes. This large restless body of unemployed and propertyless men proved an easy prey to the demagogic appeal of adventurers in search of an army. From Marius and Sulla through Catiline to Caesar and Octavian the broad outlines were the same. The army followed the leader who promised most, and significantly what was most frequently asked and promised was land. The result was civil war.

It is in the light of these conditions that Horace is to be read. Why is it that again and again, in Odes as well as in Satires, the extreme from which Horace wishes to turn men proves to be the extreme of wealth? Nor can it be wholly accidental that these Odes are all contained in a book which begins with a cry of protest against the folly and destruction of civil war. Indeed, Horace's preoccupation with this vice is to be explained only by the experience of the times and the fact that, far from lacking even "a scintilla of social sense," he was deeply concerned for his fellow-men.

To say that Horace was "not a reformer, even in his most unguarded moment," is strangely to misread his moralizings and to mistake the function of his satire. If Horace was no reformer, then neither were the muckrakers of the first decade of our century. That Horace was fully aware of the social consequences of avaricious accumulation, apart from the issue of civil war, and was deeply moved by them is apparent from the Seventeenth Ode of Book II, with its picture of the peasant driven from the farm, clasping his household gods to his breast and followed by his wife and ragged children, all because a greedy patron coveted their lands.

Abortion Is a Serious Business

Dear Sirs: This is a long overdue comment on Louis Fischer's article on abortion in Russia in The Nation of July 25. I was much amused to think Mr. Fischer could write such a glorification of what after all must be a rather unpleasant experience. It might interest some of your readers to know that when I was in Russia during the summer of 1925 I heard a great many Russian physicians and women leaders comment on the abortion situation. The general opinion seemed to be that while abortion in individual cases might be desirable, its unregulated practice was taking a frightful toll in the health of women.

The usual comment was that during the hardest years following the revolution the practice of abortion was economically justifiable, since food was so scarce and the problem of an additional child was often almost tragic. Today there is almost no such justification. Obviously no one could wish the enormous birth-rate of pre-revolutionary times to prevail. But isn't it rather far-fetched to promote abortion as a means of birth control?

Dakota Has Shakespeare!

Dear Sirs: I write to object! Dakota wants Shakespeare? Surely, but why single out Dakota in the heading of your editorial, in The Nation of September 12, which says nothing about Dakota? Omaha is in Nebraska.

The implication is, of course, that Dakota is culturally illiterate. At Jamestown, North Dakota, each year the Jamestown College students present a Shakespearean play for townspeople and students. In addition, a small but competent troupe of Shakespearean players has visited the community at least two or three times during the last six or seven years.

Not only do we have Shakespeare in Dakota; we also have grand opera. Presentation of a standard work is the major project of the music department of Jamestown College each year.

Only a Few of Them Left

Dear Sirs: I do not miss a single issue of The Nation and one of these days I will send you my yearly subscription. . . .

I have just received a letter from the Republican National Committee asking me to become chairman of a taxpayers' division in my county. I thought you might be interested in my reply:

I am sorry to decline your above kind offer. I was associated with the Republican Party in this county for several years until I discovered that it was operated by William Randolph Hearst and the international-banking racketeers. In 1932 I switched over to the Democratic Party. The only fault I find with the New Deal is that it does not go far enough with its program. . . . I do not know whom to suggest to fill the above place in this county. Outside of the few financiers in the county I do not know of a single Republican left.

*

DESPITE THE LOSS OF TOLEDO THE SPANISH government forces appear to have rallied appreciably in the past week. The opening of the flood gates at the Alberche River dam not only was an effective weapon in stopping the fascist advance on Madrid, but, what is more important, symbolized a determination and imagination in the government defense that had appeared to be lacking at Maqueda. Government forces also are reported to be engaged in bold flanking attacks on Maqueda and Talavera which may appreciably hinder the fascist drive on Madrid. At Bilbao, the seat of an important government munitions factory, the situation has been greatly improved by the arrival of three loyalist warships from Malaga. The warships have succeeded in lifting the rebel blockade which threatened to starve out this important center, and their guns have proved an important factor in checking the rebel advance. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that the capture of Toledo and the relief of the Alcazar is a serious blow to civilian morale. Owing to an unjustifiably rigorous censorship, the civilian population in Madrid, Barcelona, and other government centers had been led to believe that the loyalist forces were everywhere victorious. When Spanish supporters of the republic learn that they have been at least partly deceived, their confidence in the government is likely to suffer, although recognition of the true situation may spur the people to greater sacrifices than they have made thus far.

ALTHOUGH THERE ARE AS YET NO GROUNDS for despair, the gravity of the government's plight cannot be underestimated. Thanks to Hitler and Mussolini, the rebels are well equipped with the best of modern airplanes and essential war supplies, while the government forces, because of the virtual blockade imposed by France, Great Britain, and the United States, are desperately short of both airplanes and munitions. Since the bulk of the fascist troops, consisting of conscripts, civil guards, and fascist volunteers, are wholly unreliable, the fighting has been carried on almost exclusively by the Moors and the Foreign Legion, concerning whose fighting ability there can be no question. Should the superior equipment of the rebels prevail against the superior numbers and determination of the loyalist forces, a heavy weight of blame will rest not only on the French Popular Front government, which is directly responsible for the present unequal "neutrality," but on all democracies which have failed to render legitimate assistance to the Spanish government. As Julio Alvarez del Vayo, Spanish representative at Geneva, pointed out in his recent speech before the Assembly, Spain merely happens to be the stage on which the initial battle of an impending world conflict between democracy and oppression is being waged. If collective security has any meaning, the League of Nations must undertake to protect its members from "rebellion and disorder fomented and aided from outside." It is too much to expect the League to take a stand, even though its existence is at stake. But, apart from the League, M. Blum or Mr. Baldwin might yet remove the embargo and save Spain from the terror of fascism.

POLITICAL POINTS WON AND LOST OVER THE past week are as follows: The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, owned by the Pulitzer family, takes its lead from the Baltimore Sun and formally announces that it will not support the President in the coming election. It goes farther than the Sun, indeed, and comes out for Governor Landon, although it "holds itself free to criticize" his views. Mr. Roosevelt's alleged substitution of federal bureaucracy for constitutional government is the main reason. . . . On the other side, the President seems to have won the American Bankers' Association if not to his support at least away from bitter criticism of the New Deal. The bankers, meeting in San Francisco, stressed the importance of a non-partisan attitude, and while they deplored high taxes they expressed enduring faith in the credit of the country. The bankers are waiting to see which way the cat jumps. . . . The New York Times declares that President Roosevelt's part in the negotiations which resulted in the devaluation of the franc is the sort of master-stroke which turns elections; it will inspire the public with new confidence in the Administration's handling of foreign affairs. . . . Mr. Knox, Republican candidate for Vice-President, returning from a trip to the Pacific Coast, admits that California is Democratic at the moment, "although if the Communist element in the Democratic Party gets any stronger, decent Democrats are going to enter the Republican Party." . . . The annual convention of fortune-tellers, meeting in Trenton, New Jersey, predicts that the Yankees will win the World Series and President Roosevelt will be reelected. . . . With all due respect to the Post-Dispatch, not to mention the Literary Digest straw vote, this seems to add up to a gain of a considerable number of yards for the President.

GOVERNOR LANDON HAS NEVER BEEN ON stronger ground than in his vigorous criticism of the old-age section of the federal Social Security Act. He justly points out the gross inadequacy of an old-age insurance scheme under which those who are insured—only about one-half of America's workers—would have to work twenty years at $125 a month to qualify for a monthly pension of $37.50. He is also sound in pointing to the unnecessary hardship imposed on the working class by the 3 per cent tax on wages and pay rolls, and especially in denouncing the absurd and dangerous $47,000,000,000 reserve fund. He is undoubtedly right in criticizing the unwieldy bureaucracy made necessary by the complex nature of the machinery established by the act. But when it comes to proposing an alternative, the Governor bogs down completely. While approving of economic security in principle—what Presidential candidate today would dare oppose it?—he would abandon the old-age annuities altogether and leave unemployment insurance to the states, knowing full well that the great majority, including his own Kansas, would never adopt such a law without federal prodding. As a sop to the millions of insecure workers in America he holds out the promise of old-age pensions for persons sixty-five years of age and over who are actually in need. Thus, instead of building a system of social security comparable to that possessed by every other advanced country in the world, Mr. Landon would go back to a plan almost indistinguishable from the old American program of poor relief. Much as we disapprove of the details of the Social Security Act, we cannot but admire John G. Winant's courage in resigning from the board in order to defend the Administration's hard-won gains against ill-concealed reaction.

TO SECRETARY MORGENTHAU MUST GO FULL credit for uncovering the latest Moscow plot to induce panic in the money markets of the world. A few years ago, it will be recalled, Russia was accused of starting the depression by dumping wheat at a price which was alleged to be below the cost of production. The capitalist countries counteracted that bold gesture by selling wheat at even lower prices. In the present instance the Soviet Union is accused of selling $5,000,000 in pounds sterling "at the market," on the day on which France abandoned the gold standard, with a view, allegedly, of wrecking the British-French-American tripartite currency agreement. Unfortunately, no one was able to suggest a plausible reason why the Soviet government should wish to break down the stabilization agreement, or why, if such was its intention, it threw as little as $5,000,000 into the market. Nor has anyone found an effective reply to the Soviet government's statement that it needed $6,870,700 to meet a payment due to the Swedish General Electric Company. Possibly the Soviet attack on capitalist institutions is more insidious than Mr. Morgenthau has suggested. It has been whispered that even the bankers' faith in the capitalist system has been shaken by the Soviets' record of meeting obligations promptly.

WHEN AL SMITH WAS A CANDIDATE FOR President in 1928, American liberals and radicals defended him, in the name of freedom of conscience, against the vicious anti-Catholic bigotry which was largely responsible for his defeat. On September 20, before the national convention of the Holy Name Society, Al Smith challenged the theory "that religion is individual and not social." In language more resembling a papal bull than a Smith speech, he said, "We further challenge the theory that it makes no difference what you are if you keep it to yourself"; and he ended by identifying himself with the Catholic drive against communism which has already become a flaming crusade. The transformation of the genial and tolerant Al Smith into a spokesman for religious bigotry matches his shift from East Side derby-hat democracy to high-hat Liberty League reaction. It also parallels the shift in the attitude of the Catholic church from one of watchful tolerance to a violent declaration of war against the forces which threaten its power. Spain was the immediate signal for alarm; to the church the defenders of the Spanish republic are "diabolical, blood-crazed enemies of God and of His Church" (Cardinal Hayes). The church is desperate and has made it clear that it will give no quarter and will enter every field. At present Father Coughlin is the outstanding political crusader in this country. To be sure, he has gone too far to suit some of the more sedate church officials. Moreover, the chant against communism has been accompanied by a fervid chorus of support for democratic forms of government, and Coughlin's attacks on President Roosevelt are sour notes in this song of loyalty. But Coughlin is merely the fascist vanguard of a reactionary hierarchy which may object to his more violent language but will not hesitate to use him in the main drive.

BY THE TIME THESE WORDS APPEAR, THE SAN Francisco waterfront may be deserted except for pickets and police. On September 30 the agreements and awards which grew out of the general strike of 1934 expire. The shipowners, taking the offensive in what seems to be a deliberate attempt to provoke a strike, are asking for drastic modifications in new agreements; the unions are not only determined not to yield any gains but are making a few new demands. Negotiations have been proceeding, but as we write there are no settlements and the two positions are obviously far apart. The objective of the shipowners is written in their demands. They want longshoremen to handle "hot" cargo; they want "neutral" instead of union dispatchers in hiring halls; they want what amounts to longer hours; in a word, they want to wipe out the gains of 1934, which means that they are trying to take back from the maritime unions the measure of control over the waterfront so far won. The employers are strong. The maritime unions, with 37,000 members, are also strong. Strategically they are in a good position because the agreements of all the unions expire on the same day, giving them an organized mass power which has some relation to the organized power of the employers. Add to this the talent for strategy of Harry Bridges, and there is at least a chance that the port of San Francisco will remain peaceful and busy.

THE DOUBTFUL BLESSING OF HAVING A Hearst newspaper for breakfast is still denied the population of Seattle. So far the inhabitants of that city seem to be bearing up well under the strain. At present Edwin S. Smith, of the National Labor Relations Board, who is conducting a hearing into the American Newspaper Guild's complaint against the P. I., is providing the city and the nation with some valuable lessons in labor's difficulties in maintaining its rights. The representative of Hearst, in an attempt to obscure the issue, has charged the guild with a national boycott of the Hearst press; he has also accused the labor movement of Seattle of maintaining a dictatorship of violence with the help of the maritime unions. So far Mr. Smith with admirable skill has kept the issue clear, and Hearst has failed miserably in rousing public opinion to defense of his version of freedom of the press. At least one of Seattle's leading citizens has expressed the hope that another conservative newspaper would settle there, thus restoring the working force to its jobs without restoring the Hearst voice to the journalistic chorus. Certainly it would be a gain if even one snake on the head of the Hearst Medusa could be lopped off.

IT TOOK THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT FIFTEEN months to bring Lawrence Simpson, an American seaman arrested on an American ship, to trial for treason. It took the Nazi People's Court half a day to convict him and send him to prison for three years, less fourteen months for time already served. Simpson was convicted of "treasonable activities," the more serious charge of espionage having been dropped. On the witness stand he freely admitted that he had brought with him stickers and handbills inscribed with "Death to Fascism" and similar slogans, intending either to distribute them on board ship or to drop them over Hamburg. This was the extent of his "treason." Owing, one may suppose, both to the official protests and to news stories in this country, a group of correspondents and two American consuls were present at the trial. The severity of the sentence was a surprise. It is not possible to appeal the verdict to a higher court, but Simpson may appeal for a pardon. Secretary Hull, when asked after the trial what further action was contemplated by the State Department, replied that no action would be taken until he had received a full report of the proceedings. Surely a further protest should be made, and it should be published along with the German reply.

IN DRESDEN DR. FERDINAND SAUERBRUCH, the leading surgeon in Germany today, has just said outright what many Germans have been afraid to say during the last four years. Speaking before a national congress of doctors and scientists, he warned that science would be ruined if it allowed itself to be flattened out by the steamroller tactics of Nazi ideology. "Liberty," he said, "remains an essential characteristic of science, and spiritual and intellectual freedom is a necessity for scientists." Contrast these words with those of Dr. Ernst Kriek, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg and a good Nazi: "The epoch of 'pure reason,' of 'objective' and 'free' science, is ended. Absolute academic freedom is absolute nonsense." Even though he is one of the most widely respected men in Germany and Hitler's personal consultant whenever the Führer has one of his periodic frights about cancer of the throat, Dr. Sauerbruch probably risked his life for his convictions in saying what he did. It is too much to hope that he has made the party leaders stop and think. But the many who heard him will not forget.

THE BIG NEWS GUNS ARE ROARING AND THE shrapnel of world events is falling thick and fast. But we have picked our way among the shell holes of French devaluation, Spain's civil war, and Japan's new "peace" offer to China to inform our readers of some really important developments in American life. Major Bowes, according to Variety, hires professionals to keep his "amateur" hour bearable (the last word is ours). What is more, "amateur night" in local theaters within a 300-mile radius of New York is more likely than not to be staffed in the same way by a Broadway booking office. Most of these amateurs are "show-stoppers who have worked up sure-fire acts." Our only doubt of the accuracy of this story arises from the fact that we have never seen an amateur night which showed signs of being anything else. . . . The Summit Hotel in Uniontown, Pennsylvania, has bought John Gilbert's bed and installed it in the bridal suite. Price, $1,250. "I have looked over the situation," said the manager. "I anticipate a tremendous demand." Romance, obviously, is just around the corner. . . . A troupe of Doukhobors are being billed, again according to Variety, "as a freak attraction for American platforms. Religious sect flourishes in Canadian Northwest, with nudist angle a part of their theory." . . . You can now get a B. S. degree at the University of Wyoming for courses in dude-ranching. "You know," says Dr. Arthur G. Crane, president, "dude-ranching is becoming a big business in Wyoming, totaling $10,000,000 annually." The horses, as we understand it, will be in a class by themselves. . . . When Roosevelt speaks over the radio on October 1, it won't be the first time Al Smith has given F.D.R. the air.

Will China Fight Back?

JAPAN'S ambitions on the Asiatic mainland are sharply revealed in the new demands presented to China. Heretofore Tokyo has been content to move slowly, absorbing China province by province. While these tactics have not been unsuccessful, their success was threatened if Chinese opposition crystallized into open war. During the last few months this has proved more and more difficult to prevent. Anti-Japanese feeling has swept the country. Leaders of the opposition groups have brought increasing pressure on Chiang Kai-shek to force him to abandon his policy of cooperation with Japan. As a result Japanese penetration has been effectively checked. The anti-Japanese movement in China proper has spread to North China and prevented Tokyo from exercising even there the control that it believed it had won.

Angered by this turn of events Japan has shown its hand. The Japanese Ambassador at Nanking has demanded that China accept three "principles" which, if carried out, would transform the whole of China into a second Manchoukuo. The first "principle" calls for "cooperation" in the suppression of communism in North China; wherever Chinese government troops are facing the Communists they must have an equal number of Japanese troops brigaded with them. Since struggles have been going on with the Communists in practically every province of China, this demand is obviously designed to subject the entire country to Japanese military control. Japan also asks that Japanese troops be permitted along the Soviet and Outer Mongolian frontier, a move that is scarcely open to misinterpretation. As a second "principle," Japan suggests that China accept Japanese advisers in all branches of the government, including both the military and civil departments. This is not only calculated to put an end to anti-Japanese agitation through control of the police, the press, and the schools, but would provide a means of closing the door of economic opportunity to all except the Japanese. As a final "principle," Japan demands that the power of the puppet government in Hopei and Chahar be extended over the five provinces of Hopei, Shansi, Shantung, Chahar, and Suiyuan as was projected last fall. Thus the former Republic of China would be divided into three "autonomous" states, fully outfitted with Japanese advisers and dominated by Japanese military garrisons in the principal cities.

Left to himself it is probable that Chiang Kai-shek would prefer to capitulate to these demands rather than risk defeat in war. In the past he has always found a basis of concession which left him master at Nanking. But China is no longer the China of 1932 and 1933. The wave of assassinations which have precipitated the crisis indicates that the Chinese people are thoroughly aroused against Japan. Although the Japanese may wish to lay the murders to the innate lawlessness of the Chinese, the facts are against them. Until recently political murder was practically unknown in China. That resentment against its imperialist neighbor should have penetrated so deeply as to provoke five political murders within thirty days in widely separated sections of the country is highly significant. One must assume that Chiang can no longer guarantee the safety of Japanese nationals while their country continues its aggressive tactics.

Since neither Nanking nor Tokyo is in a position to yield on essential points, the danger of war is greater than at any time in the past three years. China is ordinarily assumed to have no chance in such a conflict, but this assumption may be premature. In 1932 the Nineteenth Route Army, without the support of Nanking, fought a superior number of Japanese to a standstill. Even today there are vast areas of Manchuria which have not been brought under effective Japanese control. In the event of war Japan might conceivably gain control of all the principal cities of China, but the effort would probably leave both countries economically prostrate. Political developments move slowly in the East; the crisis may not be reached for weeks or even months. The Oriental genius for compromise may triumph once more. But ultimately Japanese imperialism must find its match in the power of an awakening China.

The Fall of the Franc

AFTER two and a half years of costly and senseless defense of the franc the French government has followed the example of the United States and Great Britain and revalued its currency in terms of gold. Switzerland and the Netherlands hastily followed suit. Today, as a result, no currency is inviolate in terms of its pre-depression pledge. Germany, Italy, and Poland have maintained their currencies at their normal gold parity for certain international transactions, but have long since suspended free gold payments. The rest of the world is either frankly on a paper standard or, like the United States, Czecho-Slovakia, and Belgium, on a new gold basis.

The devaluation of the franc was no surprise. Ever since the United States abandoned gold in April, 1933, it has been assumed that France would sooner or later have to take a similar step. The stubborn resistance of a succession of French Cabinets to this inevitable move stands in sharp contrast to the behavior of the United States, which abandoned gold the first time the dollar was seriously assailed. In April, 1933, France had a gold reserve of approximately $5,500,000,000, or about a billion dollars less than that of the United States. As a result of a long series of crises this reserve had been reduced to less than $3,500,000,000 at the time of devaluation. There remained sufficient gold for domestic uses, but the drain reflected the fundamental instability of French economy. For years France has labored under a severe handicap. Because of the high value of the franc its exports have been too expensive for foreigners to buy, while imports have been stimulated by low foreign prices. Although tourist traffic was greater last summer than at any other time in the last six years, the amount spent by the average tourist was extremely small. Moreover, a serious shortage in capital for productive enterprises has developed as the result of the heavy exodus of funds in anticipation of eventual devaluation. All of this has placed an intolerable burden on the Blum government in its efforts to push through social and economic reforms. The increased wages, shorter hours, and vacations with pay recently won by the workers have imposed additional costs on French business without bringing a compensating return in greater business activity. While devaluation will bring an increase in living costs, it should correct the fundamental instability in the French economic structure and help to restore business to its normal level of activity.

Perhaps the most hopeful aspect of the French action is that it was taken as part of an international agreement. In the hands of the United States devaluation was an offensive weapon calculated to embarrass the countries still remaining on gold. The Administration not only refused to await the arrival of French and British representatives who were on their way to Washington to discuss preparatory plans for the London Economic Conference, but went out of its way to sabotage all talk of stabilization at that conference. Devaluation of the franc, on the other hand, is defensive rather than offensive and has merely reestablished the monetary equilibrium which existed before the depression. Improvement in business conditions throughout the gold bloc should benefit the entire world indirectly. France's action simply means that the world has somewhat belatedly put into effect the specific remedy for the depression proposed nearly four years ago by Keynes and other leading economists.

The political effects of devaluation are more difficult to predict. Although improved business conditions should lead to a lessening of political tension, it is possible that Blum has waited too long to be able to reap the full advantage of this move. For the moment the political repercussions are likely to be unfavorable. The fascists will accuse the government of having gone back on its promise and will charge it with betraying France to the foreign bankers. This argument will doubtless strike an echoing chord in the hearts of the rentier class, which for the second time in a decade finds its income cut by governmental fiat. It may have some effect also on the great middle class of shopkeepers and government servants as they find themselves squeezed by rising prices. But this should only be temporary. If the government can last long enough to allow these groups to enjoy the benefits of increased business activity, it will be the stronger for having had the courage to act in the face of opposition. For regardless of what may be said today in the reactionary press, prosperity is always good politics.

Picture of a Labor Rat

MOST of the testimony given during the past week before the Senate committee investigating violations of civil liberties has been concerned with the activities of the Railway Audit and Inspection Company. As its name would imply, this organization audits the cash collections of street-railway companies, railroads, and bus lines; it also inspects elevators; but one of its important sidelines is labor espionage and strike-breaking, in which it does a large and successful business, with a gross profit in the years 1932-35, inclusive, of $1,210,000. Six officials of Railway Audit, including the president and vice-president, are at present under indictment for contempt for having refused to answer a subpoena from Senator La Follette's committee. But various employees of the concern, their memories refreshed by torn-up records carefully pieced together by the Senate investigators, have testified to the variety of the firm's activities in labor ratting.

Railway Audit has been pleased to supply guards with guns (but with no permits to carry firearms) for strikes; they have furnished machine-guns, tear gas, nauseating gas; they have supplied men to daub the house of a company official with red paint (strikers were supposed to have done this, of course), men to pump live steam on pickets, men to charge a fence with electricity so that at least one striker was electrocuted. But these thuggeries are as nothing compared with their classical efforts inside unions. Men in the pay of Railway Audit have wormed their way into industrial plants, have gained the confidence of union men—often men in financial difficulties who were glad to make a little money on the side—and when inside information was forthcoming have duly reported it to their bosses. A steel worker testified that he had, for money, reported the union activities of two of his friends, one of whom he had known for twenty and the other for ten years. He did it, he said, because he had "a wife and three kids."

One of the most interesting results of piecing together the documents taken from Railway Audit's wastebaskets was a list of sixty-seven clients who had found it necessary to employ the services of this concern. They include the American Aluminum Company, the Borden Milk Company, National Dairy Products, Norfolk and Southern Railroad, the Pennsylvania Railroad, Western Union, Westinghouse Electric, Pennsylvania Greyhound Lines, the General Motors Corporation, and the Chase National Bank. It would be enlightening to know what Albert G. Milbank, philanthropist and president of the Borden Company, or that great and good man, Owen D. Young, director of the General Motors Corporation, or General Atterbury, holder of the Distinguished Service Medal, Commander of the Legion of Honor, and president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, thinks of Railway Audit's services to these various companies.

In case these gentlemen or any of our readers fortunate enough to have access to Roy Howard's World-Telegram for September 24 are curious to know what a labor spy looks like, we refer them to a photograph on page twenty-one of that newspaper. The photograph is of Sam (Chowderhead) Cohen, who testified that he had been in the business of labor espionage for twenty years and that he would be pleased to take money for labor ratting from any company that would give it to him. Mr. Cohen is not a pretty fellow. Handsome, however, is as handsome does, and Mr. Cohen's rogues'-gallery portrait and his New York police record, introduced in evidence by the Senate committee, are witness to that fact. The record showed fourteen arrests and five convictions on charges ranging from larceny to receiving stolen goods. Mr. Cohen some time ago was arrested on suspicion of complicity in the notorious murder of Vivian Gordon. He indignantly repudiated murder as one of his interests, however, declaring that he was by trade a "box-man," which in case our readers or General Atterbury do not know it, is gangsterese for safe-cracker. And lest anyone think Mr. Cohen's record unique, E. J. McDade, for fifteen years a professional strike-breaker and labor spy, mostly in the employ of Railway Audit and Pearl Bergoff, estimated on the witness stand that 20 per cent of the agents so employed have criminal records.

It is men of this sort, and organizations of this sort, which are employed by our great industrial corporations to interfere with the legitimate business of trade-union organization. In spreading these facts, however ugly and unpalatable, on the record, Senator La Follette's committee is performing a public service for every working man and woman in the country—which is to say, the vast majority of the citizens of the United States.

It Hasn't Happened Yet

THE announcement that the Federal Theater Project will produce Sinclair Lewis's "It Can't Happen Here" has sent something more than a ripple along Broadway. For the first time the federal theater has entered the lists with a name and a play designed to attract large audiences—the directors of the theater in New York City already have demands for seats sufficient to keep a theater filled for three months. In the discussion that followed the announcement Arthur Hopkins and Lee Shubert said that they did not find the prospect alarming. Mr. Hopkins agreed with the directors of the project that it is creating a whole new group of theatergoers—which can do the theater no harm. Mr. Shubert stated that, since the prices are low and expensive actors cannot be hired, the project has not so far provided competition.

Brock Pemberton, however, pronounced it a menace. He said it ought to be abolished and he gave reasons. It competes with the regular theater because it pays lower wages to stagehands, musicians, and actors. What seems to annoy him even more is the "radicalism" of the federal theater. "It's funny, to begin with, that the WPA can tackle something which the films cannot." (We think it's funny, too, for different reasons.) "Everybody knows," continued Mr. Pemberton, "that the federal theater is definitely way over to the left. It's not surprising that, since the Administration is on that side, too, they should want to produce an anti-fascist play." Actually the Federal Theater Project pays the prevailing wage. This wage, however, takes into consideration the fact that the actor and the stagehand have regular employment; it also is based on five performances a week instead of eight. The minimum for actors in the regular theater for eight performances is $40. The federal actor gets $23.86 (and so do the stagehands) for five performances, but whereas the regular actor may be thrown out of a job at any moment the federal employee works steadily week in and week out. The Federal Theater is barred from certain Broadway areas. The rentals it pays are in general the prevailing rentals. Whether, with its top of 55 cents, it cuts into the audience of the regular theater whose prices begin at a dollar and rise to $5.50 is genuinely open to question. That it may ultimately increase the demand for cheaper seats for the first-line shows seems to us no unmixed evil.

As for Mr. Pemberton's charges of radicalism, they also point to a genuine issue but one which may properly be postponed. Certainly a federal theater in the hands of a dictatorship would be used to no good end. The menace does not seem sufficiently imminent, however, to warrant advocating suppression of the present federal theater under the present Administration. Before a fascist government seized upon the theater as a weapon it would probably have taken over many more important weapons, including the press and the radio and perhaps Mr. Pemberton himself. Meanwhile, there is nothing to prevent Mr. Pemberton from putting on a rousing pro-fascist drama entitled "It Can and Should Happen Here."

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Roosevelt Faces the Power Boys

Washington, September 28

RADICALS and progressives generally have been willing to set down only one nearly perfect mark on the score sheet of Franklin D. Roosevelt's performance as President, and before the words that follow here appear in print, even that may have had to be erased. Whether it goes or stays will depend on what happens a few days hence at the White House conference to which the President has summoned spokesmen for the various federal power agencies and representatives of the private power companies.

It is almost impossible to overestimate the importance of this conference, scheduled for September 30. The least that can be said of it is that it will determine the fate of the New Deal's prime achievement, the TVA. But its implications will be far broader than that. Its outcome will provide the nation with the only revealing glimpse it is likely to get before November 3 of the sort of Administration to be expected of Mr. Roosevelt after Election Day.

Ostensibly, the conference has been called merely to work out a scheme for a cooperative pooling of the TVA's power resources with those of the private companies in the Tennessee Valley in the interests of efficiency and the greater good of the valley's citizens. Actually, the conference has been forced by the fact that the TVA has at last reached the stage in its development where it must come to death grips with the power trust or, forsaking its purposes, surrender and be delivered over by its master, Roosevelt, to the Insulls, Hopsons, and their heirs and assigns. The power of decision rests with the President in this case, and it will be impossible to make excuses for him if he chooses not to fight. He is in a position to drive a hard bargain. Drought and the TVA-induced boom in power sales have given him the upper hand. What have his enemies, the power boys, in their armory? Only the threat of further lawsuits to harass the TVA's progress if he fights, and the promise of peace and campaign contributions if he does not press his advantage.

The problem before the White House conference will be the negotiation of a new agreement for the sale of TVA power to private power companies. The present agreement expires November 1. When it was signed on January 4, 1934, the private companies had the upper hand. The TVA had just taken over Muscle Shoals and had to find an outlet for the power being generated there. It had to sell cheaply. It was in no position to dictate the rates at which its power was to be retailed by the wholesale buyer. It was, in fact, without even a choice of buyers, for Alabama Power, a Commonwealth and Southern subsidiary, was the only company in a geographical position to make a contract with the TVA. By virtue of its location it had for years been enjoying a monopoly on Muscle Shoals power and had frustrated every move by the government to boost the rate it paid by simply threatening to cease buying.

Under the January, 1934, contract with Commonwealth and Southern the TVA agreed to supply the private company with power from Muscle Shoals. As a part of the agreement the company ceded to the TVA certain territory for its experiments, and each side pledged itself not to poach upon the other's territory. In the months that followed, purchases of TVA power by Commonwealth and Southern mounted steadily. Cuts in retail rates, which TVA publicity had made necessary, had precisely the effect the TVA had predicted; they caused power consumption in the area to skyrocket, with attendant profits to the private power companies. One company won the Edison Electric Institute medal for leading the nation in increased power sales. Then came the drought, and purchases of TVA power by Commonwealth and Southern subsidiaries bounded still higher, as the output of the private companies' own plants dwindled with the streams that fed them. The TVA was able to meet the demand for more power because the construction of Norris Dam, four days' stream flow above Muscle Shoals, was beginning to prove the TVA theory that efficient development of a region's power resources depends not only upon the integrated development of a whole region but also upon the coordination of stream control and other conservation methods with the basic program of power production. Through Norris Dam, in other words, the TVA was able so to control the flow of water at Muscle Shoals that, while the plants of the private companies thirsted, Muscle Shoals had an abundance of water and hence of power. In the twelve months that ended June 30 Muscle Shoals produced 467,000,000 kilowatt hours, an increase of 281 per cent over the preceding twelve months, and from the sale of this power the TVA grossed for the federal treasury $1,197,000, an increase of 100 per cent. Nearly two-thirds of this revenue came from private utilities.

The figures would have been larger had not the private utilities, by resort to hamstringing litigation, kept the TVA cut off from markets in many communities whose citizens had voted by overwhelming majorities to set up municipal systems and buy power from the TVA. But even as they stand, they serve as a sufficient indicator of the private companies' reliance on the TVA as a power source. I am informed by technically skilled persons deep in this fight that if the private companies are cut off from TVA power, they will have to invest millions in new plant facilities, that in the months before those facilities can be installed the companies will have to turn away or cut down on many of their customers, and that community demands for TVA rather than private power will be doubled. It is plain that the tables have been turned since January, 1934, and that now the Roosevelt Administration is in a position to choose the customers for TVA's power and—more important—to say what retail rates those customers shall charge.

That, in fact, is precisely what the TVA and the other federal power agencies to be represented at the conference will press for, if Roosevelt permits. They want a new agreement under which the private companies may go on obtaining cheap power at wholesale from the TVA, but must bind themselves contractually to retail that power—and their own, since it will be indistinguishable when running through the consumer's meter—at the same low rates that the TVA has dictated for the communities that have sought to enter the municipal-ownership field with TVA aid. But there is more to the proposal. It is founded on the belief that the only way to deal with the private power boys is to manacle them. The TVA already is dizzy from turning first one cheek and then the other. There is no reason why it should continue to coddle and cozen the power trust. Those boys have made it amply plain that they will not play square. Each party to the "gentleman's agreement" of 1934 promised not to duplicate the other's distribution facilities. The TVA has kept its pledge; the private companies have not. Even they admit that the TVA has not taken a single customer from them, whereas the only duplicate facilities built have been constructed by companies signatory to the agreement. "Spite lines" have been built in TVA territory and in communities contracting for power direct from the TVA. Every community that has negotiated a PWA loan to build a distribution system so that it might avail itself of cheap TVA power has had its project blocked by lawsuits which the private companies have instigated.

Despite that record, it appears that the power boys are prepared to press for a renewal of the present agreement and even may be so bold as to demand further concessions from the TVA. There are indications that their opening bids will be a demand that the TVA relinquish all claims to direct development of the Tennessee Valley and confine itself to selling its power at switchboard to the private companies in whatever quantities and at whatever prices the latter may elect. They, it seems, are prepared to hold that the TVA needs them more than they need the TVA, that their withdrawal as TVA customers would leave it without adequate markets for its power, and that through another barrage of lawsuits they can impede its efforts to find new markets by bringing into play the $100,000,000 authorization Congress has given it to build transmission lines and finance the construction of municipal distribution systems. In extremis, they will fight to prolong the issue through an extension of the present agreement for a few months, counting on Alf Landon to attain the Presidency and set matters right.

The attitude of the power boys toward the public that pays their board bills is not unlike that of certain gentry who appeared before the La Follette committee this week and tried to make the trade of labor espionage and strike-breaking seem a holy calling. There was, for example, Walter Gordon Merritt, the crusading anti-union lawyer who will be remembered as the real-estate barons' field marshal in the New York elevator strike. Merritt appeared in an attempt to justify the recent purchase of $17,000 worth of tear and nauseating gas by his client, the Anthracite Institute. The mine owners had intended using the gas in a big drive against "bootleg" miners. Records of the Lake Erie Chemical Company, put in evidence, indicated that the only thing that held the operators' hands was fear that some of the miners, being injured, would sue for damages. Merritt heaped abuse upon the "bootleggers." Coal bootlegging was damnable, un-American, and lawless and had reduced Pennsylvania to a "state of anarchy." But when mine operators take the law into their own hands, that is merely resorting "to the American right of self-help."

Merritt and "Chowderhead" Cohen, ex-convict and Bergoff "noble," who served in Merritt's army during the elevator strike, were the stars of the week's parade to the witness stand. There would have been a third star if La Follette at the last moment had not decided to excuse Jesse Cooper without calling him to the stand. Cooper, another "noble" who pals with "Chowderhead," wore a Landon sunflower in his lapel. Both he and Cohen were firmly of the opinion that the whole proceeding was "unconstitutional." I wish I could feel certain that instead they meant "uncomfortable," but they both seemed to be enjoying the show. None of the witnesses got the currying that such rats deserve. So far the investigation has produced fundamentally little more than Eddie Levinson gave us in his "I Break Strikes," but this fact, La Follette vows, will be remedied when the hearings are resumed in November. What has occurred thus far, he says, has been merely of a "preliminary" nature; the big fight is yet to come. The opening skirmish has served at least to give us an inkling of the extent to which the army and navy intelligence officers collaborate with the Pinkertons and other operators of labor-espionage services, and it has shown that the strike-breaking agencies have not changed their ways since the first Congressional investigation of them back in 1892, after the Homestead strike. The evidence taken to date also has destroyed all claims by General Motors and the steel companies that they do not operate elaborate espionage systems, and it has tied tight to the Tennessee Coal and Iron management at Birmingham the kidnaping and beating of Blaine Owens as "an active Communist." It has shown that the Wisconsin law requiring detective agencies to register their spies was sufficient to drive the Pinkerton agency out of Milwaukee and to that extent has pointed the way to further remedial legislation. Finally, it has shown one hitherto unrecognized virtue in the Social Security Act—the act may be construed to require all the agencies to list their spies with the federal government. To dodge this requirement, the Pinkerton Agency has transferred all its undercover men from the status of employees to that of "independent operators," and it is still a large question whether the dodge will meet the requirements of the law.

The Morgan-Lilienthal Feud

BY J. CHARLES POE

WHEN President Roosevelt invited the private power interests to discuss with him and the heads of the Tennessee Valley Authority the formation of a power pool, it sounded as if a truce were being declared in a fierce and many-sided struggle. Any such assumption would be premature and, in the end, probably mistaken. The conference now in progress at the White House can hardly do more than temporarily obscure some of the conflicts of interest and policy in the TVA and postpone a showdown until after the election.

One of the major conflicts is raging within the TVA itself. Chairman A. E. Morgan and Power Director David E. Lilienthal of the Authority's three-man directorate are locked in an internal policy war which will probably not be ended short of the retirement of one or the other. Persons familiar with the TVA situation have been aware for many months that Chairman Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal do not get along well. But it was not until the spring of this year that the gossip began to leak out. Lilienthal had drawn the shortest of the three terms for the directorate, three years, and his place was to be filled in May. It had been generally assumed that he would be reappointed. However, in April it began to be whispered about that Chairman Morgan was opposed to the reappointment of his young associate. Mutual friends sought to patch up the quarrel, with no success.

Finally Dr. Morgan protested to President Roosevelt against Lilienthal's reappointment. He seems to have made little impression in that quarter. Then he played his trump card: he would resign if Lilienthal were reappointed. But Lilienthal was reappointed and Morgan did not resign. He hasn't resigned yet. Whether Morgan has changed his mind and now plans to fight it out with Lilienthal is known only to himself.

When the TVA was created in 1933, one of the first acts of the directors was to establish a power policy. The essence of this policy was that electricity would be furnished at the same rate at all points. This was to further the policy of decentralization of industry advocated by President Roosevelt, and also to increase the use of current on the farms and in the small villages. Realizing how easy it would be for private utilities to block its power plans if it adopted an aggressive electrification program, the TVA sought a truce with the subsidiaries of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation. A contract was signed under which the TVA was to purchase certain small utility systems in a few counties in northern Alabama, in the neighborhood of Muscle Shoals, and in northern Mississippi. The TVA was to be given the exclusive right to promote power systems in these and a few other regions where no electric service then existed.

In return the TVA agreed not to invade any Commonwealth territory. This contract expires in November.

Dr. Arthur Morgan has contended that the contract should be renewed. Lilienthal and Dr. H. A. Morgan, the third director, oppose it. The chairman appealed to the President, who sided with Lilienthal and Dr. H. A. Morgan. The idea of government competition in a fight to the finish runs counter to Dr. Arthur Morgan's philosophy of the purposes of the TVA. He contends that the TVA should purchase a given territory from the Commonwealth and Southern, and should agree to confine its activities to that area. Thus a true "yardstick" would be set up. The two areas could be compared as to service and rates and thus would develop a measure of the relative merits of private and public ownership.

But Lilienthal and H. A. Morgan argue that since the territorial agreement has already been violated, why renew it? As soon as the TVA started to put in rural power lines in territory near Chattanooga in Tennessee and in Georgia, northern Alabama, and western Tennessee, the private utilities began to erect what the Chattanooga News calls "spite lines." For years farmers and small village residents had asked for power, only to be refused or else offered service at rates beyond their ability to pay. Now, as soon as the TVA cooperative-association lines were begun, the utilities began to erect their own lines in the same territory. This fight has taken on many of the colorful aspects of the old railway right-of-way battles. One Georgia woman took a shotgun and warded off the utility pole setters until the TVA could get in. At other places private-company poles have been burned down. The people are on the TVA's side.

President Roosevelt's proposal of a conference between the government and private power interests to discuss a power pool in the valley, somewhat after the British "grid" system, has been construed as a setback for Lilienthal's policies and consequently a victory for Dr. Morgan. This is an erroneous interpretation. Lilienthal is still the enthusiast for public ownership he has always been. He has said publicly that the pool plan should not prevent any community from building its own power system. Dr. Morgan, on the other hand, has accepted the plan only conditionally, and gives the impression that he is doubtful whether it will work. Under Lilienthal's plan for the pool, wholesale power rates would be kept down to about the present low TVA level. Retail rates would also have a limit, and a limit that would make it impossible for utilities to maintain their present rate levels.

This is the catch in the pool proposal. Private rates are higher than the TVA's. If their rates are forced down much farther by the pool plan or any other, the utilities must squeeze much of the wind and water out of their capital structures. This deflation must take place principally in the common stock, nearly all of which is owned by the holding companies.

Although the President and Lilienthal have kept their plans closely guarded, this latest move on the embattled TVA front has evidently several objectives. First the preferred stockholders and the bond-holders are being placated by an offer of an equitable and peaceful settlement of the strife. If the offer is accepted, these groups will be protected; let the common-stock boys worry about themselves. Consequently, there should be a demand arising from the "widows and orphans" and the public generally for an acceptance of the olive branch. If the holding companies do not accept the peace plan, the onus falls on them. They, not Roosevelt and the TVA, have elected to make a finish fight.

A good guess is that the big power men will refuse the pool proposal. But they will not refuse on September 30 at the conference in the White House. They will ask for time—enough time to carry them over until after the election. If Landon is elected, I am sure they will end the negotiations at once. But if Roosevelt is reelected, the battle will still go on.

We must go back three years to get the beginning of the dissension among the three directors. Dr. A. E. Morgan was appointed first and made chairman. He immediately started hiring personnel. Key positions were filled without consultation with the other directors. That was the chairman's initial blunder, because it drove Dr. H. A. Morgan into the waiting arms of Mr. Lilienthal. Moreover, Dr. Arthur Morgan started off with many plans for the social and economic rehabilitation of the Tennessee Valley which took little account of electricity. He talked of restoring the lost folkways, of dancing and singing, of basket-weaving, of wood-carving, and other handicrafts. He urged the formation of cooperatives for the barter of goods. He established a land-planning and housing section and spent more than $3,000,000 on model housing at Norris Dam as a demonstration project.

Dr. Morgan assumed that his task was to create a new way of life in the valley either by imposing it upon the people by experts or by setting up demonstrations which would be gratefully copied. Lilienthal would give them income and let them order their own lives. A real friend of the land, the chairman once advocated a law which would deprive a farmer of his land if he farmed it in such manner as to let it be destroyed by erosion. Referring to the toll taken from the rural areas by the cities of the North, he attributed it to the fact that all transactions had to flow through some Northern financial or commercial center. He said the valley would have to stop this toll-taking by trading more with itself. He even suggested that possibly a separate system of coinage would have to be established in the valley.

All these ideas irritated Lilienthal, if we may judge by signs, although he kept his peace until quite recently. On June 12 he made a speech to the TVA employees in Knoxville. He had just been reappointed over the chairman's protest. It was his statement of principles. He began by citing the success of the electricity program, which, although hampered by lawsuits in the big cities, has had a phenomenal record where it has been permitted to operate. Then he launched his answer to the Morgan theories.

"There is, as I see it, no turning back from the machine," he said. "Perplexing as the problem is, we cannot admit defeat. We cannot return to a simpler standard of living, for that is to begin a retreat—a retreat which will only stop when we reach the level of the fourth century. I am against beginning that retreat. I am against 'basket-weaving' and all that that implies, except perhaps as a temporary expedient. . . . We cannot confess our failure, we cannot prepare for 'the second coming of Daniel Boone' in a simple handicraft economy."

Dr. Arthur Morgan came back on July 27. Although he carefully avoided any reference to Lilienthal, he outlined his own point of view in a speech to the TVA employees. This speech dealt largely with the scientific method of free inquiry. He discussed what he called the "engineering approach." We could never be certain, he said, that any method was the best method. He explained that possibly the great power-transmission systems were as good as doomed because of the development of the highly efficient Diesel engines. Back of the Diesel, said Dr. Morgan, "looms an even more significant development, now in an interesting experimental stage, the conversion of coal directly into electricity without any engines whatever, using coal somewhat in the manner of a discharging storage battery." But, he said, since such possibilities loom only in the distance, "present activity along recognized lines cannot be deferred."

Then this modern Hamilton made this reply to the Jeffersonian Lilienthal: "An increase of economic wealth is not enough. We might build a dam at every site in the valley, make every farm fertile, put electricity in every home, and protect every city from floods, and yet we might not stabilize or permanently benefit the country. Years ago with my engineering associates at Memphis we planned and directed the reclamation of many hundreds of thousands of acres of very fertile land. The philosophy of that development was that if you give people the means for creating wealth and comfort they will work out the situation without further help. Yet today that most fertile land in America is the locus of the most miserable share-cropper tenantry, where poverty and bitterness are general, and violence appears."

To Dr. Morgan nothing is sure except the experimental attitude and the belief that the people cannot always be trusted to make the right choices. Give them wealth and they will squander it. Give them the means to erect a new home and they only build shacks bigger and uglier than their ancestors' log cabins. They must be shown the way. Lilienthal, on the other hand, urges the freedom of economic opportunity. Give the people jobs and income and let them find their own satisfactions in the spending—that is his philosophy.

Thus the old battle rages—the battle which began with Jefferson and Hamilton and which has not ended to this day. Usually the Hamiltonians have won. Perhaps they will again, but I do not think so.

G. B. S. Interviews the Pope

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

An Imaginary Conversation

HIS Holiness Pope Pius XI is seated at his desk in his office where his private audiences are held. George Bernard Shaw enters jauntily, glances quickly about, approaches the desk stepping on the balls of his feet. He begins talking before he has reached the Pope.

G.B.S.: My dear fellow, you are even more difficult to see than I. (Shaw pauses before the Pope's desk. Pius XI extends his left hand, on which is his large signet ring. Shaw gazes at the ring. He extends his own ringless left hand. The Pope stares at Shaw in astonishment.) I say, let's dispense with formalities. (Shaw sits down, and comfortably crosses his legs. The Pope's perplexity increases.) I trust that you are not dismayed because of my reputation. You know, it is delightful to meet you. You are the only man alive who has received as much dignified publicity as I have.

G. B. S.

PIUS XI: In Rome we are accustomed to order, reverence, and the rendering of due respect to authority.

G.B.S. (with a gesture of dismissal): I am fully acquainted with that subject. Clever fellow, Mussolini. He's done a fairish job of things, considering the bad human materials with which he has had to work. Before he became dictator Italy had not won a battle in centuries. Under him, you have succeeded in winning a few skirmishes with those fellows over in Africa, the Ethiopians. Before he is finished, Mussolini might even win a battle or two against a first-class military opponent.

PIUS XI: We were oppressed by the tragic and unhappy spectacle of our countrymen at war in Africa. The re-establishment of peace brought great joy to our heart.

G.B.S.: I'll discuss that later. I have traveled a considerable distance in order to do you a favor.

PIUS XI (with interest): Perhaps you have come to make a generous offering which will defray the expenses of constructing a floor in the new college we are building in Rome to educate the youth of Christendom for our struggle with the Bolshevik heresy.

G.B.S.: My dear man, I fear that you have mistaken me for one of those American Knights of Columbus. The youth of Christendom will be even better educated if it reads my books. And that will put money into my pocket instead of drawing it out. My purpose here is to save your organization from appearing ridiculous in the eyes of the civilized world. I have here a ten-thousand-word letter which I have just addressed to the London Times. It deals with the Americans. One of these days intelligent Europeans will face the task of civilizing the Americans.

PIUS XI: We are gratified by the struggles our brothers in America are conducting against paganism.

G.B.S.: You are badly informed. The Americans are cutting up again.

PIUS XI (as if uttering a mild curse): Gloria in excelsis Deo! Anti-Christ walks the face of the earth, and we have courage only because of the promise of Divine protection which Our Master gave to Saint Peter.

G.B.S.: Saint Peter was neither a saint nor a clergyman; he was a boorish Syrian fisherman.

PIUS XI (scandalized and in dismay): In nomine—

G.B.S. (interrupting with a flourish): Don't disturb yourself, my dear fellow. The Americans are not intelligent enough to understand socialism and bolshevism. The Americans are amusing themselves not with bolshevism but with censorship. A group of amateur busybodies calling themselves Catholics and the Legion of Decency are meddling with art. They are disrupting the plans for the motion-picture production of my play "Saint Joan," which, as you know, has rescued Saint Joan from Protestant bigotry.

PIUS XI: We have been warmly encouraged by the good sense of the American people in their efforts to destroy the evil and satanic influence in motion pictures which are offensive to truth and poison the wellspring of Christian conscience.

G.B.S.: Stuff and nonsense! I am here to save you from being chagrined and disgraced by the Americans.

PIUS XI: There is no compromise with error.

G.B.S.: I agree with you. And have I not proved in my play "Saint Joan" that your organization is sufficiently flexible and intelligent to canonize a Protestant saint such as the Maid?

PIUS XI (in alarm): You have described the great Saint Joan as a Protestant?

G.B.S.: I understand your confusion now. You have not read my play.

PIUS XI: Error is a cancer which must be destroyed, rooted out, and it is our duty to see that it is.

G.B.S.: I have stated that thought more clearly in my play. After you read it, you will be a better Pope, because you will learn how to express Catholic sentiments with greater force and clarity.

PIUS XI: The justice of the church is not a mockery, and we will not allow it to become such.

G.B.S.: I suspect that you are twiddling me. You have read my play, and you are giving me back the very lines which I have written. You really are a clever man, almost as clever as I. And do you remember the defense of the Dogma of Infallibility in my preface: "Perhaps I had better inform my Protestant readers that the famous Dogma of Infallibility is by far the most modest pretension of its kind in existence. Compared with our infallible democracies, our infallible medical councils, our infallible astronomers, our infallible judges, and our infallible parliaments, the Pope is on his knees in the dust confessing his ignorance before the throne of God. . . ."

PIUS XI (beginning to show signs of fatigue): We admonish that you pray for guidance. In our encyclical "Divini illius Magistri" we have already deplored the possibilities for evil potent in the cinema and its misuses as an incentive to evil and passion.

G.B.S.: Do tell me! Do you approve of this Catholic Action, and this American Legion of Indecency?

PIUS XI: We have imparted our affectionate and apostolic benediction to our bishops and pastors of souls who have organized, and who direct and guide, that great spiritual endeavor.

G.B.S.: Well, old chap, if you don't want to be made a fool of I advise you to read my play, and restrain the zeal of those Americans.

PIUS XI: We do not wilfully expose ourselves to heresy. And we again admonish you to pray for guidance and to repent the sin of pride while there is yet time. We instruct you to become one of the faithful, and we announce that Catholic authors must advance Christian doctrines in all their publications, and we forbid them to use the weapon of half-truth, however effective, against our adversaries. We further advise that you place yourself under the guidance of Saint Francis of Sales, whom we have proclaimed as the patron saint of journalism.

G.B.S.: I clearly perceive that I am a better Catholic than the Catholics.

PIUS XI: We state that we bear no malice to heretics, and we bestow our benediction even upon our enemies, and upon our erring sons whose minds and Christian consciences have been blackened by the sin of pride and poisoned by the Protestant and Bolshevik heresies.

G.B.S.: My character Cauchon utters those sentiments much more clearly. You really must read my play. My dear chap, it has taken your outfit six centuries to canonize Saint Joan. But I have immortalized and understood her. It may take you six centuries to understand and appreciate my services. And when you do, you'll canonize me. But I enjoyed my visit. I think that now I'll drop in on Mussolini for a little chat. I'm anxious to see how much he has learned in these last fifteen years. (Shaw, stepping lightly on the balls of his feet, goes out, and the Pope, wearied, begins to nod his head.)

British Labor Stands Pat

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, September 14

THE Plymouth meeting of the Trades Union Congress has been hailed by the conservative press as a triumph of the forces of sanity, and the right-wing leaders, like Sir Walter Citrine and Mr. Ernest Bevin, have been bedecked with laurels by those journals which usually rise to the attack on labor as men rise to go forth to a feast. Certainly the radicals made a poor show. Their organization was poor, and they presented their case with nothing like the power or the authority of their opponents. It is not easy to assess the true strength of the forces at issue there; that will not be revealed until the Labor Party conference at Edinburgh next month. But in so far as Plymouth was the curtain raiser to Edinburgh it is clear enough that the right wing is firmly seated in the saddle.

The proceedings divide themselves naturally into two parts. A number of formal resolutions on social policy were passed. The congress came out for the forty-hour week and condemned the hostility to it of the British government at Geneva. The vicious means test was unanimously condemned, but every direct action which might stimulate open hostility to its passage was attacked by Sir Walter Citrine with much the same arguments that Mr. Baldwin might have used. The boycott of the coronation was suggested; Sir Walter protested against dragging the King's name into politics. A hunger march was advocated; the General Council saw no use in the proposal. Some kind of demonstration strike was proposed; Sir Walter warned the congress against coming into conflict with the law. In a word, everyone knows that the means test is indefensible, but nothing effective can be done against it until the next Labor government is in office. Trade-union reorganization was proposed with a view to greater coherency and striking power, but Mr. Bevin persuaded the delegates to tread lightly where such delicate issues as existing union structures were in question. On the distressed areas, the long hours of shop assistants, and similar matters the congress passed its usual resolutions and the delegates made their usual speeches; but as everyone knows, nothing will be done about them either until the next Labor government. One imagines that, despite the unanimous passage of these resolutions, Cabinet ministers will continue to sleep quietly in their beds.

The two fundamental debates were on Spain and the united front with the Communists. On the first, the congress accepted almost unanimously the Blum-Eden formula of non-intervention with the emphasis that fascist powers must not be permitted to evade the regulations. The fact that the regulations are being evaded daily to the profit of the rebels, and that Spanish democracy may well have perished before these lines appear, counted nothing as against official insistence that to supply arms to Spain might mean a European war. The congress was in no mind to face the fact that at some stage a stand will have to be made against fascism. Everyone praised the courage of the Spaniards, but no one save the handful of Communist delegates was prepared to take any risk for them; and it must be said emphatically that Russia's adherence to the non-intervention pact made the Communist attack on the official policy look very unreal. What emerges is, I think, that no one is prepared to resist fascism if it means the risk of international conflict, and no one, either, is prepared to face the grim fact that Hitler and Mussolini are as a consequence conquering piecemeal the very territories their ambition covets. The congress did not even suggest the summoning of Parliament in order that the working of non-intervention might be publicly examined there. As things are, Mr. Eden can honestly say that so far as the overt declaration of intervention is concerned, there is little difference between him and Mr. Bevin or Sir Walter Citrine.

The congress voted to discuss the possibility of a rapprochement with the trade unions of Soviet Russia, but it reaffirmed its uncompromising hostility to any united front with the Communists. The lead against them was taken by Sir Walter Citrine, and his onslaught aroused vivid enthusiasm in the conservative press the next morning. The Communists were a negligible force; they were disruptive; they merely obeyed the orders of their paymaster in Moscow. His argument was one that has been familiar these fourteen or fifteen years. It showed, I believe, no sense at all of the changed situation in Western Europe, and it assumed throughout that nothing that has happened in Continental countries could possibly happen in Great Britain. Its whole thesis, moreover, was that while the trade unions believe in "democracy" and "constitutional means," Communists are committed to "dictatorship" and "revolutionary civil war." I do not need to emphasize how false, because oversimplified, are these antitheses. What is more interesting is the ease with which they were accepted. Why was this?

Primarily, I think, for three reasons. Above all, because all the friends of Soviet Russia have been dismayed by the recent executions. Many people who would have spoken were silent because they uncomfortably felt that there is too much unexplained about the terrorist plot, not so much in the trial itself as in what preceded it, and too much in its manner that looks like the methods of Hitler or Mussolini. Secondly, I believe, because though the rank and file of the trade unions are much more favorable to a united front than their leaders, the heritage of ill feeling over long years of Communist intrigue still goes deeper than the realization that the cause of socialism is lost unless working-class unity can be rapidly achieved. Thirdly, there is still a profound faith among the leaders (a) that the swing of the pendulum will give them a majority in Parliament next time, and (b) that the British capitalist class has a different attitude toward constitutionalism than has the equivalent class in fascist countries. I do not think I misinterpret Mr. Bevin and Sir Walter Citrine if I say that they believe the united front provokes fascism and that they prefer the present position to the risks which they feel working-class unity might involve.

To me, at any rate, it is clear that British trade unionism is in a completely defeatist mood. It is so impressed by the power of fascism that it will take no risks to stem its offensive. It gambles on the hope that, somehow or other, the rebels will at long last be beaten in Spain. It is convinced that sooner or later the tide must turn against the Baldwin government, and it is willing to gamble on the possible achievements of a third Labor Cabinet as the corrective to the present misfortunes. It believes that a quiet respectability is the highroad to an electoral victory, and it will do nothing that may jeopardize its chances. Its leaders believe that the policy of hanging on to what they have is the truest wisdom. They hate the Communists far more than they hate their opponents, and they cannot be induced to experiment with the possibilities of working-class unity.

And on the whole they impose their view on the movement without undue effort. Enthusiasm for the united front, though far more widespread than was apparent at the Congress, is scattered and ineffectively organized. It is injured by the memory of past Communist blunders; it is injured, also, by the wide feeling that Russia cares far more for peace than for international socialism. But deepest of all, in my own judgment, are two other factors. The first is the defeatism of the trade-union leaders. They have not yet recovered from the general strike and the débâcle of 1931. They are far more impressed by the strength of their opponents than by their own power. They are furious at Mr. Baldwin's inertia, but they are not prepared to take the risks of an alternative and positive policy. The second fact—common to them and to the executive of the Labor Party—is that they think of the political situation almost exclusively in terms of parliamentary majorities. The Communist Party is small; it could win only one seat in 1935; therefore an alliance with it, from an electoral angle, is a waste of time. And since they are unceasingly told, by the Times and Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Churchill, that a popular front in England is a challenge that will be taken up by property, they feel that discretion is the better part of valor.

I do not doubt the sincerity of any of the Trade Union General Council, but I am confident that all the postulates on which their position is based are tragically mistaken. It is a law of political life that a movement which wants power and office must take the offensive. At bottom the trade-union leaders still think that terms can somehow be made with capitalism. Unconsciously they reject altogether the view that the class war is real. They believe that the constitutionalism of British capitalists is really beyond question; it "can't happen here" is the unstated major premise of all their thinking. They think there is a community consciousness among Englishmen which will gradually erode the claims of privilege; and for most of them, at least, the "inevitability of gradualness" is something like a fundamental dogma.

How Dead Is Liberalism?

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IV

WHEN liberalism was born out of the skepticism of the Renaissance, its birth was accompanied by a tremendous and confused hubbub about "reason." Looking back we can see that the dispute was really about the claims of "logic" versus the claims of what we today should probably call "reasonableness" rather than "reason," and it is not difficult to understand why each side in the controversy honestly believed the other to be flying in the face of reason itself.

The church, barricaded behind the volumes of St. Thomas and a score of other logicians, challenged the skeptic—as it still challenges him today—to fight logic with logic. But however fallible or infallible the logic of scholastic theology may have been, the church lost her grip not so much because fallacies had been pointed out in the process by which her conclusions were reached as because too large a portion of mankind came to feel that the conclusions themselves were obviously absurd, and that all this reasoning had somehow ended by generating both an unreasonable society and an intellectual atmosphere which was generally unreasonable.

Now that liberalism has come to what many profess to believe is its deathbed, it is interesting to note that a very similar hubbub has arisen. Once more vast "ideologies," intricately elaborated by deductive reasoning, are set up as a challenge, and once more the liberal finds himself less inclined to become involved in such verbal mazes than to reply as he replied in the Renaissance. All this reasoning led in the recent past to intellectual conclusions and to political acts which even the average Communist now admits to have been fundamentally unreasonable. Heresy became, for example, the most awful of crimes, as it always does in any society dominated by theology. And Marxian logic which proves that those who truly love liberty must work for a dictatorship convinces him no more than he was convinced by Dominican logic, which proved that men must be lovingly burned at the stake in order to save their souls. Where the conclusion is nonsensical, it is not, he insists, worth while to look for the flaws in the logic.

The more one undertakes to explore such reactions as these, the more convinced one becomes that they are fundamental indeed, and that they may prove in the end far more significant than others less difficult to state and, for that reason, more often the center of political disputes. So far as the prospect for any permanent cooperation between liberal and Communist is concerned, it makes little difference that they seem to agree on what a liberal society would be like so long as they insist upon taking diametrically opposed roads toward it, and faith or lack of faith in such programs as a dictatorship to end dictatorships goes back ultimately to a profound difference in temperaments and in types of thinking.

It is, for example, extremely doubtful that the liberal and the Russian Communist have actually been brought very much closer together by the latter's professed enthusiasm for democratic institutions which recently found expression in the new constitution. Even if the provisions of that constitution were broader than they appear to be, the atmosphere surrounding the conduct of the trials which succeeded with ironic promptness would be far more significant than any paper institutions could be. The fact that such a trial and the executions which followed it seem to the Communist right and reasonable, while they remain to the liberal—even to many very left liberals—blankly incomprehensible, is the important fact, since it illustrates the divergence of both temperaments and mental habits. Until the two sides can agree in their reactions to such a set of circumstances, it makes little difference whether or not they agree in theory upon the ultimate nature of the good life.

Nor is the situation very different when one turns to consider the field of relatively minor civil liberties like that of the right to dissenting opinion. With characteristic logic the Communist may insist that no government permits the expression of opinions which have come to seem dangerous to the state, and that therefore there is no real difference between the theoretical liberty of a democracy and the theoretical absence of such liberty under a Communist dictatorship. But without stopping to argue the premise, it is plain enough that the actual degree of liberty permitted depends, even if the premise be accepted, upon what seems to those in authority actually dangerous to the state, and that this in turn depends upon the temperament of the rulers and the prevailing mores of the society. Surely, to take a concrete example, the Communist would be the last who would want to deny that Communist doctrine is dangerous to the capitalistic state, and yet he can hardly fail to admit that the New Masses has been freely published in the United States, whereas a weekly review advocating a return to capitalism would not survive for very long in Russia.

In other words, while the temper of America and the American government is relatively placid and untimorous—despite the almost Russian timidity of such organizations as, say, the D. A. R. or the American Legion—the temper of Russia and the Russian government sees a danger to the state in every mere doctrinal heresy and is, besides, so habituated by now to dictation from above that a dissenting opinion looks as threatening as it did to the Inquisition. How free speech actually is at any time depends, that is to say, rather more upon the temper of a civilization than it does upon whether or not one accepts some such abstract proposition as that which declares that the state cannot tolerate opinions which threaten its life.

And if this is true, then the most significant answer to the question "How dead is liberalism?" is not an answer, for example, in terms of the present status of economic laissez faire any more than it is one in terms of the sincerity of the Communist hope for democratic government in the future. Liberalism is dead if the liberal temper and the liberal type of thinking are dead, and liberalism is alive if that temperament and that type of thinking are still capable of constituting a significant force.

No one—and certainly not the liberal himself—could deny that liberalism in this sense is sick, that the liberal temperament is far less common than it was even ten years ago, and that far less of the thinking now being done is thinking of this type. Whether it is actually dead or dying I do not pretend to know, though I am compelled to admit the possibility that it may very well be. There is no a priori reason for refusing to believe that the mental habits of the civilized world might not undergo another change as profound as that which took place when the Christian temper exterminated the classical spirit or when the rationalism of the Renaissance triumphed over the "reason" of the Middle Ages. The time may come when what is now called liberalism will be as completely incomprehensible as it would have been to a professor of theology in a medieval university. Nor do I mean by this comparison to beg the question of the respective merits of the two types of thinking—however passionately I may be inclined to prefer the one. I make the comparison only because it is the most nearly parallel one I know, without meaning to imply that if one repudiates the conclusion of medieval theology one must, by that token, repudiate those of the Communist ideology.

Few if any liberals within my private definition of the term actually disagree with the Communist in his conviction that economic factors have interfered to an increasing extent with the proper functioning of our present democracy. Few if any fail to admit that the problem of the moment is the problem of meeting in some adequate manner the crisis which this failure to function properly has provoked. But the differences which find expression in the inability of the one to accept the vast and violent program of the other, in the refusal of the liberal to rush headlong down a series of deductive syllogisms into a civil war intended to establish a bloody dictatorship, are differences which penetrate below the level of political programs into the personality itself. Whether the Communist logic led to the Communist state of mind or whether the state of mind made possible the logic, the fact remains that the two, both fundamentally alien to the traditional liberal mind, exist, and that they are factors of primary importance. Because of their existence it is possible for the Communist to accept complacently as logical inevitabilities both actual physical horrors and petty doctrinal tyrannies from which the liberal turns with revolted stomach and to which syllogisms can no more reconcile him than the syllogism of another time could have reconciled him to the odor of burning flesh at an auto-da-fé.

Certainly the little series of conversations which furnished the starting-point for this whole discussion brought home to me the fact that the most significant difference between the individual Communists and the individual liberals with whom I talked was a difference so deep, so pervasive, and so impossible to reduce to a mere difference in political programs that it can only be called a difference between kinds of men. Bertrand Russell, for example, disagrees with even so unorthodox and intellectual a Communist as M. Malraux in ways which cannot be adequately suggested by merely indicating divergence of opinion on concrete problems. They could not possibly work together very long no matter how hard each might try to reach common conclusions on the basis of a cooperative study of the same situation. The world in which the Illuminati dwell and function is not the same as the world of the skeptic and the humanitarian.

There is no use attempting to blink the fact that any cooperation between the two types for a specific end—like the defense of democratic institutions against fascism—cannot possibly be more than temporary, even though it might, of course, find some way of continuing until that specific end had been achieved. Ultimately one temper will rule and the other go below ground—just as pagan reasonableness went below ground in the Middle Ages—whether liberalism dies the death its present enemies see as inevitable or whether liberalism survives by interpenetrating and taming the Communist spirit. What the world will look like a hundred years hence, what the normal man and the normal life of that time will be, what it will feel like to live then, depend largely upon whether what has here been called liberalism is dead or not. There are many ways in which two states, each operating upon collectivist principles, might differ almost as profoundly as, say, capitalist America now differs from Communist Russia.

The Marxian would, I suppose, insist that the answer to the question "How dead is liberalism?" as well as the answers to the questions which I have just suggested lies in existing economic factors. To him the future is being worked out by the dialectic processes of nature, and any rational difference of opinion concerning what the future will be like can be based only upon a difference in analyses of the present situation as expressed in terms of production and distribution. But just in so far as all that is assumed to be true, just so far is liberalism surely dead. For the liberal—and this constitutes the final difference between him and the Communist—cannot abandon the belief that what the future will be like depends in no small measure upon the tempers of the men who make it.

Big Parade — 1936 Model

BY JOHN DOS PASSOS

Cleveland, September 24

THROUGH the swirl of dust and torn strips of last year's phone books and old mail-order catalogues that fly into your eyes and mouth and find their way down the back of your neck, they come, marching between hedges of faces, sweating in their cheap shimmery costumes out of old romantic musical comedies—the bands, the bands, the junior bands, cowboy bands, the redskin bands, the ladies' auxiliary bands (every lady has a fresh permanent frizzle, every lady sucks in in front and sticks out behind); cheeks puff, snare drums rattle, cymbals clash, and in front of every band stalks, minces, goose-steps, hobblewalks the inevitable drum major. There are tall drum majors, short fat drum majors, male and fairy drum majors, tiny-tot drum majors, pretty-girl drum majors. Their pants are tight, they suck in in front and stick out behind. There are the natty police bands, and cops, more cops than you can imagine, cops on motor cycles, cops on horseback, cops afoot, cops in radio cars; plenty of firemen, too, and the cheerful little locomotives and freight cars of the Forty and Eight societies; painted-up cars with bells and saluting cannon; various automotive whimsies—and it takes them eleven and a half hours to pass a given point.

On the sidewalks behind the ranked backs of the gazing public, in front of the plate-glass windows the storekeepers have protected with lattice and chicken wire, in the boom and tinkle of the old marching tunes, the boys keep up the traditional Legion whoopee now nineteen years stale; but all the same, in an intonation or a wisecrack, in the gesture of a man in shirt sleeves carefully measuring the contents of a pint into paper cups and at the same time popping his eyes at a girl, a trace remains perhaps of the old Battle of Paree, the kidding, the feeling of being on the loose in a town full of food and drink and women and comic adventures when next week you're just as likely as not to have your block blown off, and looking forward to telling tall stories to the guys in the outfit when they come back from leave—whatever it was that made the A. E. F. bearable nineteen years ago. Two men, each a little high, are wrangling about whether something happened at St. Quentin or in the Argonne. In the way they look now you can see how they looked then, nineteen years ago. "You better keep still till you find out what you're talkin' about, buddy." "Hell, boy, twenty years from now you'll be tellin' 'em you won the war."

In the convention hall it's not so much fun. There's a prayer. A bald-headed representative of the Legion of Valor refers to some communistic business (the C. L. U. pamphlet it must have been) that he found on the seats, and says he'd be sorry for them if they showed their ugly heads in this crowd, and goes on, amid ill-suppressed titters and finally hearty laughter, to a long-winded account of how the legionnaires had given him a royal welcome just like he'd entertained the Duke and Duchess of Kent when he was on a government post in Haiti. He was led away from the mike with difficulty. More addresses. The head of the Veterans' Bureau. A traffic-safety expert. Representative Rankin, white-haired, silver-tongued, from Alabama, quotes Tennyson on peace. A letter from Josephus Daniels, signed your old shipmate. Mr. Pratt of the American Educational Association makes a sensible conservative speech on the schools which is received with little enthusiasm except when he says that teachers should not teach subversive doctrines in the schools. He gets a big hand before he has time to continue that, nevertheless, in the opinion of American school teachers, it is their duty to give their pupils a fair picture of the pros and cons of social change. Then comes William Green, looking more like Uncle Wiggly than ever with his pink cheeks and gleaming glasses, to make a vague plea for peace in general and for cooperation between the A. F. of L. and the American Legion in particular.

The speeches, except for Mr. Pratt's unexpected note of good sense, were cut-and-dried occasional oratory. The main business of the day was the choosing of the next convention city. In spite of the pleas of Los Angeles, Denver, and Montreal (where, a little prematurely it turned out, they had named a street for Ray Murphy, the retiring national commander), New York, represented by Governor Lehman, Mayor LaGuardia, and 90,000 first-class hotel rooms, won the day. Then everybody hurried out to lunch in spite of the fact that the committees on Americanism and National Defense were reporting resolutions. A voice droned off a long set of vaguish resolutions in favor of a big navy, officers' training, a better army, aviation, a return to dirigibles, that were passed by acclamation without any comment by the few delegates left. The Americanism Committee came out with resolutions against relief for aliens, for cutting down immigration, against sedition, and home loans to non-citizens, for deportation of reds and jailing of subversive influences, but the hall was getting emptier and emptier. Finally merely the titles of the resolutions were read off and they were passed in bunches. It's lunch time. Sure, Mr. Hearst, it's O. K. by us—but the boys' hearts don't seem to be in their work.

What has happened is that in spite of the hopes of the founders that the Legion would be an aggressive arm against labor unionism and dangerous thoughts and a defense for the vested interests, it has settled down in this its year of greatest membership, of its biggest parade and smoothest convention—not a controversial matter reared its head from the floor—to being just another fraternal organization with its clubrooms and bridge parties and social work and poker evenings and fascinating internal politics. As such it is the field for the careers and supplies the meal tickets of thousands of professional organization workers. The legionnaires' interests, and those of the increasingly important women's auxiliary, lie in the bands and the parades and the junior baseball teams and in the comfortable feeling of belonging so necessary to people now that small-town life is broken up and the family is crumbling and people live so much by themselves in agglomerated industrial masses, where they are left after working hours with no human contact between the radio and the car and the impersonal round of chain stores and picture palaces. The fraternal organizations give people a feeling of belonging to something outside themselves. They are the folk life of America. We've got to have it. It's lonely being a unit in a parade that takes eleven and a half hours to pass through the public square. Makes you feel too small. Until something else more urgent arises to draw people together and as long as the little fellow can pay his dues, the professional organizers will continue to lead Elks and Redmen and Veiled Prophets and Mystic Shriners and legionnaires and their wives and little ones in brainless antics, decked in fatuous costumes, behind really excellent marching bands (that's one thing we do well) from convention city to convention city across the country. And steadily the American passion for a smooth-running machine, if nothing else, will tend to eliminate troublesome ideas, outstanding personalities, and dissenters who ask awkward questions about how and in what direction the parade is being led.

Spain's War Cabinet

BY HENRY BUCKLEY

Madrid, September 12

THE Spanish Republic has learned a lesson. It has given up worrying about the feelings of its democratic neighbors and has chosen the strongest Cabinet possible under the circumstances. It is not derogatory to the Republicans or to the former Premier, José Giral, to say that his government was weak. A fundamental question of administration is involved. Etiquette in Spain demands that the thousands of posts which change hands with each Cabinet be filled only by members of the parties represented in the government. So the entry of Communists and Socialists into Caballero's government is not just a question of eight new ministers. It means that from the ranks of the Socialist Party with 70,000 members, the Communist Party with 120,000 members, and the General Union of Workers with a membership of 1,500,000 will come under-secretaries, ambassadors, civil governors, mayors, and other officials. The moral effect is equally important. Caballero is certainly the most popular political figure in Spain today. As Premier and head of the War Department he will inspire a degree of enthusiasm which a person as little known as José Giral could not possibly command.

Conservative elements are dominant in this Caballero Cabinet. There are five Republicans, including two regionalists. There are three right-wing Socialists—Prieto, Negrin, and de Gracia—all of whom stand much nearer to the Republicans than to the Communists. The sector, therefore, which might justifiably be called radical is reduced to five in number, namely, Caballero, Vayo, and Galarza of the Socialists, and the two Communists, Uribe and Hernandez.

Only one important group is omitted from this popular-front Cabinet—the Anarchists. The dashing boys with the red-and-black silk scarves who race around Madrid in big cars painted over with F. A. I. and C. N. T. are not represented. To be sure, the Anarchist policy is traditionally non-political. But this has not prevented them from naming a representative in the Generalidad and another one in the Basque Committee of Defense. Some say that the various groups among the Anarchists themselves could not agree on a representative in the government.

This is a war government, not one designed to carry on social revolution. But the political element is bound to be strong in any civil war which is not just a struggle between rival praetorians. Spain's present conflict is just as political as was the American War of Independence or the clash between Cromwell's Roundheads and Charles's Cavaliers. So it is important to understand the political groupings behind Spain's new Cabinet. With the masses in arms it is the labor movement which wields the chief influence. Direct control of the masses in Spain today is in the hands of three groups—the left-wing Socialists, the Communists, and the Anarchists. The Socialist group is most widely known abroad. In its leadership are Caballero, Alvarez del Vayo, Araquistain, and others. Its press organ is Claridad. The Caballero section preaches the necessity for breaking down the strength of the old feudal state and its organs and building a new state based upon socialization of banks and perhaps a few key industries but continuing capitalist collaboration in some degree. This group differs from those who prefer the leadership of Prieto chiefly in that its components have more faith in the people as a whole. Prieto thinks and talks like a professional politician even in dramatic moments such as these, whereas Caballero is far more willing to cut himself adrift from old ideas and prejudices and to move with the tide. Prieto's speeches and newspaper articles make far more interesting reading than do any declarations by Caballero, but in critical moments it is the latter who must spur on or brake the Socialist masses.

The Communist Party has experienced a mushroom growth. It had 15,000 members twelve months ago and it now has 120,000. It wields considerable influence in the General Union of Workers, into which its labor unions entered about six months ago as a result of a fusion agreement. Its sudden growth in power is due in great part to the change in policy of the Third International. In the first days of the republic the Communists fought hard against the Republican-Socialist authorities. The change in policy which has induced Communists all over the world to cooperate with Socialists and liberals gave the party in Spain a new lease of life.

The positions of the Socialists and the Communists are easier to explain than that of the Anarchists. The syndicalist organization, the National Labor Confederation (the C. N. T.), is a federation of labor unions with an unknown strength variously estimated as between 400,000 and 1,000,000 and is strongest in Barcelona, Valencia, and Andalusia. It is controlled by the Iberian Anarchist Federation (the F. A. I.), and its statutes enjoin that only Anarchists shall hold posts of control. The syndicalist slogan has always been "No politics!" Today the syndicalists are up to their necks in politics and they have promised their support to the new government, but they still insist on their non-political stand.

If the progress of the war makes it possible, Premier Caballero is likely to bring about important changes in the methods and organization of the army. Unification is necessary and the avoidance of too many movements undertaken simultaneously. Officering the new citizen army is not an easy task. An army composed of soldiers, police, and citizen militias needs tactful leadership. The militias, whether Socialist, Communist, Republican, or Anarchist, all come under the control of the War Department, where Lieutenant Colonel Barcelo regulates their activities. In the field they take their orders from regular army or police officers, but they themselves elect their own under officers. The government has been fortunate in finding men like General Mangade, a veteran of sixty-four but young enough in strength and spirit to lead the young loyalists as a citizen army must be led. Major Perea, Colonel del Rosal, General Asensio are also officers who inspire confidence in the new republican army.

Stories of excesses against private persons have been featured in the press abroad. The incidents in the Madrid model prison which caused the death of Rico Avello, Melquiades Alvarez, and others have given a formidable weapon to news writers in hostile countries. But it is no light task for the government to keep its followers in hand when news arrives of massacres committed by the other side, like those at Badajoz, Algeciras, and elsewhere. Every possible precaution, however, is being taken. To prevent armed bands from entering private houses the night watchmen are no longer allowed to carry keys. Any citizen who forgets his key must go to the nearest police station with the watchman and establish his identity and his right to enter the house before the key is furnished. Special passes are given to the police and the militia, who alone are entitled to make searches in private homes. In the model prison a guard has been formed composed of equal numbers of the militia of all the government parties.

Republicans, Socialists, and Communists have so far been wise enough to adopt policies which have the support of part of the middle class. The decree reducing by half rents up to 200 pesetas ($30) a month benefits not only the workers but also the state and office employees. The spokesman for those members of the middle class who sympathize with or at any rate are not directly hostile to the government is Angel Ossorio Gallardo, a prominent lawyer who once led a Christian Socialist Party of which Angel Herrera and José Maria Gil Robles were active members. The party died later of malnutrition, since Spanish conservatives would give neither money nor support. Ossorio Gallardo said recently: "At the present moment all that we bourgeois can hope for is that the masses should be dominated by a sense of constructive revolution. In order that this be possible it is first necessary to win the war, and for this all parties must continue in a united front. In this way we bourgeois will lose a great deal. But otherwise we lose everything—absolutely everything!"

The final result depends on many factors. When a whole people rises in arms, it is hard to beat. Nearly 200 years ago American civilians defeated a professional army. The French after the revolution faced the massed armies of Europe and won. But war is such a science these days that all the courage in the world cannot triumph over great superiority in arms. Since the democracies of the world did not see fit to offer full support in the legitimate government of the republic, the least they can do is to see that their so-called neutrality becomes a reality and ceases to be a farce. By enforcing a similar "neutrality" toward the rebels and by ordering their ambassadors to their posts, where they belong and where for some weeks they have not been, the democracies of the world would be giving the young Spanish republic merely its due.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I HAVE read with profound interest those amazingly fine dispatches to the New York Times in which Frederick T. Birchall has recorded the happenings at the congress of the Nazi Party in Nürnberg and the unparalleled display there of human power and organization: "Once more," he writes, "there comes over the beholder the stunning conviction of Germany's unequaled strength." Undoubtedly as a mass display it was without precedent. As a bit of showmanship it surpassed anything ever staged before. In the perfection of the arrangements and of every detail of the gigantic spectacle we had human ability to handle great masses of people in a limited area raised to the highest possible degree. It was even more remarkable as an overwhelming piece of propaganda and as a movingly beautiful mass appeal, and Hitler was justified in his pride in the success of the whole proceedings—in its costing the government a single cent since every participant defrayed his own expenses, and in the overpowering homage rendered to this house-painter turned Caesar.

No other German in history has ever received such plaudits or been enshrined in the hearts of such multitudes. There is no use blinking this fact, or that he has welded the people together as no Bismarck and no Kaiser was ever able to do, and given them a tremendous sense not only of their reawakened nationalism but of their latent power. Those of us who feel that Hitler is the most dangerous and despicable ruler on earth will only fool ourselves if we fail to recognize these facts and if we let ourselves underestimate his strength among his deluded people. It is "stunning," as Mr. Birchall has put it, and it is also terrifying, for Hitler has at his service not only the national genius for organization, not only all the modern dictator's methods of mass propaganda, but also all the aid and support of the scientists of a painstakingly scientific nation. Now in the hands of any man the possession of such resources and such power would be a dreadful thing. When it has come to a man who is utterly unscrupulous, impervious to the truth, ready to stop at nothing, not even wholesale murder, to achieve his ends, whose soul is corroded with hate and venom for all who oppose him, we have one of the most alarming phenomena of modern times. As long as the blindly subservient manpower Mr. Birchall describes is in Hitler's hands, the world cannot be safe, nor Europe free from the menace of an overlordship which quite conceivably may make the domination of Europe by Napoleon seem by comparison the veriest child's play.

Nor is this menace any the less dreadful because Hitler has achieved much of his success by the cowardice, shortsightedness, and stupidity of those who have ruled over the leading Allied nations, dominated the League of Nations, and wrecked the principle of collective action against a nation which is a wrongdoer. There is no use looking backward. We are face to face with a man made drunk by extraordinary success, hero-worshiped to an extent which surely no ego can withstand, and already reaching out to impose his will upon those outside the boundaries of his own state. What could be more dangerous for the peace of the world than his unparalleled attacks upon a friendly power with which he is officially on the best of terms, and with which, incidentally, Germany has a trade of many millions of marks on both sides? If the Bolsheviks are such horrible monsters, why take their filthy gold? What could more completely presage the international anarchy of war than this man's declaration that he would not tolerate "ruins of nations" at his door, or than his open coveting of the Ukraine and the Urals? One may search the annals of intercourse among modern nations and find nothing comparable to his announcement of his purpose to rob and despoil a friendly nation because he dislikes its form of government and because, as he falsely declares, 90 per cent of its leaders are Jews.

All of this means that European politics and, far more than that, actually the life and death of Europe now center about this strange and, to outsiders, revolting personality. Unfortunately the other statesmen of Europe have no idea of combating this menace except by armaments and more armaments. The Baldwin government can see nothing else to do but to bring its air force up to date and enormously increase its supplies of ammunition, and while this is being done to let Hitler have his own way, humbly accepting humiliation and loss of prestige while rearmament is going on. But Hitler isn't going to sit calmly by and let the English catch up with him, particularly in the matter of aircraft; and no capital can be sure that some bombing planes will not slip through the defense cordons when war begins. The chief lesson of the World War—that nothing is accomplished by war except to make the whole world a worse place to live in—is lost upon these men. They refused to use an effective economic boycott in the wars against Ethiopia and Manchuria. They are not using the League in connection with the Spanish revolution. They are thinking in terms of 1914 and the old idea of the encirclement of a country by bayonets without regard to new weapons and new conditions, and are thereby courting complete disaster. Yet there are other ways out; there are means of bringing world pressure to bear on Hitler without bloodshed. But the horror and the tragedy of it is that the time for this is rapidly slipping by, and with each month Hitler is putting himself in a stronger position to dominate Europe.

BOOKS and the ARTS

LIBERALISM'S FAMILY TREE

BY MAX LERNER

I CAN recall few books that left me in a more saturnine frame of mind than Harold Laski's "The State in Theory and Practice," published last year. It swept with a clean logic to a prophecy of doom for my generation and then called on me and my fellows to embrace a fighting faith which by Mr. Laski's own logic had something less than a fighting chance of success. Mr. Laski's new book* is written in the same mood. It takes our most cherished ideals of liberty and individualism, links them with an unanswerable cogency to the achievement of power by the capitalist class, and leaves us to console ourselves with what moral we can muster. He seems himself to be of a divided mind in the matter. Liberalism as the garment of the capitalist ideal he handles with a mercilessly ironic detachment. But liberalism is today also one of the principal hurdles in the path of fascist barbarism. And this liberalism Mr. Laski cannot despise or abandon. The result is a strangely moving odi et amo mood that lends an eloquence and intensity to the writing at the same time that it withholds the note of finality which a book written in less troubled times would possess.

Being a political theorist Mr. Laski is concerned primarily with the shape of power. Being also one of the most civilized human beings alive he is sensitive to the fragile career of the human spirit, which power may serve but which crude and naked power can so easily crush. His writings contain therefore a masterly analysis of the capitalist state as an instrument of class power. But he is too canny a thinker to rest in the belief that naked force, whether it be political or economic, represents the mainstay of the existing class structure. In his latest book he has accordingly sought to get at the real fabric of capitalist power—its panoply of ideas. These ideas, it is his thesis, add up in the main to the doctrine of liberalism. Mr. Laski has set out to dig into the past, to write a historical survey of the rise of the liberal doctrine and its full flowering, to give us in short liberalism's family tree.

As a study in the history of ideas the book is superb. It is a historical epistle addressed to the academies but written from the battlefields of Europe. Mr. Laski has for years been reading the tracts of seventeenth-century religious worthies and eighteenth-century mercantilists; he knows the Bullionists as he knows the Monarchomachs; he has been through the literature of the physiocrats as he has been through the literature of the Levelers and the Fifth Monarchy men and the French imaginary voyages. What he has given us is nothing less than a re-writing of the history of European social thought in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with a prelude for the century before and a postscript for the century after. And because he is passionately interested in the conflicts of power today and because he has followed Maitland's injunction to write history backward, the scholarship in the book takes on life and meaning. The rise of liberal doctrine is narrated as part of the moving current of social history as affected ultimately by European economic development.

This is therefore one of the important attempts in English not to expound or defend Marxism but to use it as a technique in the history of ideas. Mr. Laski's problem was immensely difficult. Liberalism is the body of doctrine that claims for the individual freedom from interference of any kind—in his religious life, in the expression of his opinion, in his economic activity. Its philosophical core is the doctrine of individualism; the canons of its ethics are those of the individual conscience; in the realm of science it moves to the conviction that man may by rational inquiry become master of the universe; its religious corollary is the idea of tolerance and freedom of belief from the power of the state; its political faith is the rule of law and the doctrine of laissez faire; its economic program is the Manchester ideal of free trade, free enterprise, and the competitive system; its legal vestments are freedom of contract and the sanctity of property; it is saturated with an optimism about human possibilities; its dream is the dream of progress. Liberalism is thus not a simple and satisfying universal formula but a complex tissue of belief ramifying into every area of life.

Liberalism found a Europe caught in the icy grip of feudalism and ecclesiastical authority. Today after three centuries the scene of its action is a Western world dominated by the struggle between the big property interests and the forces of labor. In the span between the two the role of liberalism has been to express in the realm of ideas the deep social struggles and economic changes. It aided these changes, adjusted itself to them, realized itself through them. It is Mr. Laski's strength that he understands, like Pareto, that formal doctrine and popular opinion are rationalizations of deeper drives in men. But unlike Pareto he does not regard any body of social thought as mere word magic and self-deception. He sees it as the orientation of each era to its new set of living conditions. Liberalism was hammered out by the same forces that hammered out the reign of business enterprise. Once in being it was used to justify the operation of the new economic system and its set of values.

Mr. Laski gives a sense of the inevitability of its progress—an inevitability that came from powerful impulsions within the system of production and the alignment of economic power. It is these impulsions, and not its own beauty or consistency, that make a doctrine succeed, spread, conquer. But Mr. Laski is wise enough to see that not only is there an outer logic of the relation of ideas to events, but within ideas themselves an inner logic that shapes a doctrine and contributes to its victory.

In liberalism this inner logic manifested itself most clearly in its drive toward the universal. Men's imaginations could not help being caught—even our own imaginations today are still caught—by the claims which liberalism staked out for the freedom and tolerance and expansion of the human mind. But as happens with all doctrine, the men who stood to profit from the triumph of liberalism identified these lofty claims with their own class interests. They equated their own power in society with the universal and permanent truths they had discovered about human beings everywhere. Liberalism as a revolutionary instrument had helped bring the new revolutionary capitalist class into power; they made out of it, in the sweep of their zest and recklessness, a universal; but when a new class took this universal and extracted its implications and learned its lessons all too well, the bourgeois thinkers called a halt. They tried to prune liberalism, limit it, hedge it in. They saw that the liberties they had with its aid wrested from the feudal nobility and the church potentates and the despotic monarchs could by the same token be wrested from them by the underlying population. Cromwell and the English merchants in the seventeenth century saw that the liberal doctrine, pushed far enough, might lead to genuine social revolution. Voltaire and the French men of substance in the eighteenth century saw the same. And when in the nineteenth century an increasing chorus of voices invoked the promise of liberalism for the new proletariat that industrialism had created, liberalism was converted from a credo for freeing the oppressed into a code for keeping them in their places.

This is what the capitalist class is still seeking to do with liberalism. But liberalism is too fluid to stay confined thus. What has happened to liberalism, so far as America is concerned, is that it has split into four fairly distinct tendencies. The first represents the atrophied liberalism of the past, coming out more or less unashamed as the defender of the existing class alignment, and using in defense of the modern Bourbons all the old catchwords that had once served to beat a Stuart despot with: this is the liberalism of Lewis Douglas, Alfred Landon, Walter Lippmann, Nicholas Murray Butler. The second, represented by figures as diverse as Justice Brandeis, Senator Borah, Dorothy Thompson, cares passionately for human rights but shares the distrust which the old liberals had for governmental activity: it is in essence Jeffersonian. The third, represented by Mr. Roosevelt and his group of advisers, cares passionately for human rights but turns increasingly to governmental activity and the social-service state in order to protect them. The fourth, the liberalism of the progressive labor movements, seeks to reaffirm for our own age the original direction of liberalism, calling for a new class base for it, claiming for the rising ranks of workers and professionals the protection of the civil liberties which once helped the rising ranks of merchants and factory-owners to come to power. Liberalism no longer exists as a unity. What does exist is the gigantic struggle over democracy in which liberalism plays a various role.

Whether liberalism can ever be converted into genuine democracy, without convulsing the whole world, remains to be seen. Can the basic doctrine of the able and enlightened élite be converted into the doctrine of the informed and creative mass? Above all, can liberalism ever be stripped from the body it has thus far clothed—the body of capitalist power—and used to qualify and eventually transmute that power? Mr. Laski, who is concerned only with the history of liberal doctrine, does not attempt an answer. The answer will be written in another generation by another historian.

BOOKS

Haymarket Fifty Years After

THE HISTORY OF THE HAYMARKET AFFAIR. A STUDY IN THE AMERICAN SOCIAL-REVOLUTIONARY AND LABOR MOVEMENTS. By Henry David. Farrar and Rinehart. $4.

JUST as before the Civil War the conflict between slaveholding and abolitionism divided the nation, and earlier in the century New England was split between Calvinism and Unitarianism, so after the Civil War the struggle between capital and labor became the significant force for polarization. Such eruptions as the railroad strikes of 1877, the Haymarket affair, and the Pullman strike disclosed to public view the ever-widening separation of classes. Certainly the most vivid of these outbreaks was the Haymarket affair, which acted as a kind of catalytic agent to precipitate bitter opinion either for or against labor. The effect was probably best seen among the intellectuals, who suddenly found themselves stripped of all liberal pretense and faced with choosing between justice and the propertied hatred for the anarchists. And, of course, the bulk of the liberals—including clergymen, writers, and statesmen—revealed a naked and quivering property sense.

There have been numerous accounts of the Haymarket affair, but they have had the defects of brevity, incompleteness, and inaccuracy. After a thorough examination of the court records, the newspapers, the government reports, the social-revolutionary literature, and the remembrances of persons involved, Mr. David has produced the long-needed complete history of the affair. The first third of the book lays the foundation by a factual description of the condition of labor in the 1880 decade and, particularly, by exhibiting the confluence of social-revolutionary doctrine and the eight-hour movement at Haymarket. With remarkable skill Mr. David conducts the reader through the tortuous paths of social-revolutionary thought during the preceding twenty years and analyzes the peculiar mixture of "propaganda by deed" and primitive syndicalism preached by the Chicago anarchists. At the same time, even though he regards the Haymarket bomb and the eight-hour movement as "only indirectly related," Mr. David is careful to show the interplay of the two. However important the social-revolutionary movement may have been in the Haymarket affair, it is clear that the eight-hour strikes of May 1 rendered employers, police, and press willing to use the Haymarket bomb even deliberately to crush the aggressiveness of labor. Without the eight-hour movement, the bomb might not have been thrown, or, if it was thrown, most likely the ensuing "red scare" would not have been so malignantly unrelenting.

Because of his fulness of treatment and his knowledge of the source materials, Mr. David is able to correct many errors, half-truths, and distortions of emphasis in previous accounts of the bomb-throwing itself and the subsequent trial and persecution of the eight Chicago anarchists. However, the succession of events, the dramatic sequence, remains the same. It is a story that almost tells itself. And yet one can say over and over that the trial was an ugly travesty of justice and that eight innocent men were sacrificed for their social views, without obtaining the crushing realization which is achieved in this history by the weight of evidence, quotation, and fact. The police terror, the public hysteria whipped up by the press, the packed jury, the obvious bias of Judge Gary, the perjured witnesses for the state, all were combined to bring in the indefensible verdict based on the assumption that since they had advocated in general the use of force to overthrow capitalism, the eight anarchists were guilty of the specific murder of Policeman Degan. As Mr. David points out, if this theory of conspiracy was legal, "then William Randolph Hearst should have been tried as an accessory to the murder of McKinley because he wrote, in an editorial attacking the President, that 'if bad institutions and bad men can be got rid of only by killing, then the killing must be done.'"

Unless some further material is discovered to solve the mystery of who threw the bomb, this book should remain the definitive history of the Haymarket affair. It is not a mere scholarly exercise; it is the entire story of an important episode in American labor history, carefully organized, thoroughly documented, and well written.

SAMUEL YELLEN

Utopia Warmed Over

THE ANATOMY OF FRUSTRATION. By H. G. Wells.
The Macmillan Company. $2.

PROPHECY and exhortation still flow freely from Mr. Wells. It has been his favorite method to illumine the ills of the world today by describing the charms of the world tomorrow, and now he once again sets out to tell us the kind of world we ought to live in. But for some curious reason he has seen fit to adopt the stratagem of pseudonymity. His book purports to be a digest and critique of some fourteen volumes entitled "The Anatomy of Frustration," the work of one William Burroughs Steele. As man created God in his own image so Wells created Steele, though it is hard to see why he needed him. One wonders why Wells could not say what he had to say directly instead of holding Steele on his knee like a ventriloquist's doll and speaking his own words in Steele's voice. As one reads along, ideas and phrases awaken echoes, and it begins to dawn that not only is Steele Wells, but Steele's "Anatomy" is really a synthesis of all Wells's past work. But Mr. Wells has already summarized the thinking of a lifetime in his "Autobiography," one of the most vivid personal histories by a living writer. What he gives us now is simply yesterday's Utopias warmed over and served up with a new sauce.

That the time is out of joint Mr. Wells admits. But he feels it no cursed spite that he is born to set it right. On the contrary he enjoys setting it right and plunges into the task with all his old gusto—and all his old ideas. His central thesis is that divergence of "a thousand contrasting faiths and creeds" is the root of our difficulties. Unity is our solution. To this end he proposes the merger of nations into a world state and a world civilization. "He [Steele] contemplates a world so unified, so understanding, so clarified and harmonized that its advancing welfare and the vigor and happiness of its individuals reflect and complement each other." One has only to look in Mr. Wells's autobiography to discover where one has heard that before. There he says that in "Anticipations" (1900) "I had already grasped the inevitability of the world state"; "in my 'Modern Utopia' (1905) I took the inevitability of the world state for granted"; and "I was already trying to get the world state recognized as a war objective in 1916."

The merger theme runs through Mr. Wells's panaceas for all our other problems like a white thread through a multi-colored weave. The individual must solve his frustrations "by merger into some greater being"; education can be made effective only by merging the sum of human knowledge into a World Encyclopedia; sex possessiveness is the root of frustration in love and therefore monogamous units must be merged into a system of group marriage. These remedies rouse echoes too. The whole scheme of the "Outline of History" was to attempt a World Encyclopedia in embryo, and group marriage was planned in detail in the "Modern Utopia."

Mr. Wells is, of course, quite aware that he is repeating himself. In fact, he even does himself the courtesy of quoting himself when he is pretending to quote Steele. What he is not aware of is that he oversimplifies both the disease and the cure. He says men "have no right" to countless divergent creeds, but the fact remains that, right or no right, men have them. It is no solution to say: eliminate difference of opinion and we will all live in harmony—because that is perfectly obvious. Only by examining why men differ as they do is there any chance to melt down these differences and open the path toward unity. So eager is Mr. Wells to reach a final goal that he ignores complicating factors which might slow him up on the way. How neatly did Henry James put his finger on the spot when he wrote that Wells suffered from an "unawareness of complexity."

BARBARA WERTHEIM

A World Between Two Wars

TO READ these poems is to encounter a new creative energy of a high order, expressing itself with a sure dominance of its medium. From his recently published first novel, "The Asiatics," it was evident that Frederic Prokosch had the sensitiveness to word and image which constitutes poetic receptivity; this volume shows that he can bring to the materials of poetry the formal discipline needed to make a complete poem. The images are brilliantly, even bizarrely colored, and at times unexpected to the point of violence. A less skilful and less serious poet would use them merely to disturb. Here, however, through their power of evocation, their canalization into stately music, and their organization into a unified mood, they not only excite but exalt.

The mood which recurs throughout the book is a reptilian watchfulness and tension, the hushed breathing of a world between two wars. It is conveyed by images of cutting, of fever, of nocturnal fears and sudden whirring wings. The poet's theme is the search, over the exotic places of the earth, for "the concerted will and the quiet heart, and the sure and sharpened spirit." The assassins are "the dead, and the dead of spirit"; they are preparing to strike, and they elicit visions of falling cities:

This is the final dreading

Of history ending, an end to living and terror spreading,
The dead destroying, the living dying, the dream fulfilling,
The long night falling and knowledge failing and memory fading.

These lines have analogies with the poetry of T. S. Eliot, yet Prokosch's world, one feels, has recuperative powers that are not present in Eliot's except by hocus-pocus: it is alive with a vital force that is dammed, warped, tortured, but full of subtle potencies still. The realm of nature has, for transient moments, generated the realm of grace, and may do so again, after the destruction. Such is, perhaps, the framework of doctrine behind the poems; yet it is not allowed to obtrude. The realization is so consistently in sensuous terms that one must read it several times before perceiving that this is not sheer poetry of feeling.

Frederic Prokosch is an American cosmopolite not yet thirty. If there is immaturity in these poems, it is not to be found in a mechanical echoing of his masters. He appears to have learned from Valéry, Auden, and above all St.-Jean Perse, as well as from Eliot. But he has put what he has learned to his own uses, and his adaptations of Greek metrical and stanzaic patterns have a rigor of form latterly desired but not achieved by many other poets. His shortcomings, such as they are, consist in a tendency to lushness, a reliance upon exotic imagery in some places where quotidian would be more effective, and a substitution of décor for drama.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Cults and Cultures

HEADS AND TALES. By Malvina Hoffman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

AMERICANS will always read heavy treatises on economics or physics; but a dry work on art would get about as far as a dull volume on humor. This opulent book, with its undistinguished title, is so exciting a mélange of autobiography, travel, technology, aesthetics, anthropology, philosophy, and religion that it will not lack readers.

Shrewdly dividing human beings into two classes, "great" people and "tame" people, our author early chose the great. Richard Hoffman (her father), Rodin, Pavlowa, Mestrovic, Eames, Paderewski, Lord Reading (then Viceroy of India), Tagore, and dozens more live in her pages, as she lives in them.

Already famous, she was in 1930 confronted with a proposal from the Field Museum to be one of four or five artists to be sent to various countries to make sculptures of race types for its Hall of Man. While thinking it over she was suddenly inspired. "My Daemon cast his spell over me," she exclaims. So she offered a counter-proposal to do it all herself—and did it! It took her five years. Round the world, Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines, Bali, Java, Malaya, the South Seas, Burma, India, Ceylon, Central Africa, the Sahara, Europe, America, forest, jungle, desert, the sea, savages, heat, wild animals, sickness, gruelling work—and triumph.

Perhaps the most interesting thing in an unusually interesting and richly illustrated book is the artist's attitude toward her work. She is a great intuitive. She remembers what her father said when she was very young: "One must be an artist first of all, and then one can create art." Today she writes movingly of the aesthetic achievement of primitive savages: "The art that is not taught but comes forth from the blood spontaneously."

FACTS and FRAUDS in WOMAN'S HYGIENE

A Medical Book About All the Things That Women Should Know

By RACHEL LYNN PALMER
and SARAH K. GREENBERG, M.D.

This volume, the first of its kind, is of vital importance to every American woman who purchases commodities associated with those problems peculiar to her sex—those problems "about which many women hesitate even to ask their physicians." It is the work of an expert on consumer problems and of a noted obstetrician and gynecologist, and does for widely advertised articles of women's hygiene precisely what 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs accomplished in the field of foods, drugs, and cosmetics.

"Of the greatest importance to millions of women and girls."

May Cameron in the New York Post.

"That unique and excellent book."

Margaret Sanger.

"Courageous, and honest, and highly informative."

Dr. Hannah M. Stone in the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

A glance at the table of contents will reveal to some degree the invaluable nature of this book:

CHAPTER

- I. The Feminine Hygiene Field
- II. Menstruation—A Simple Explanation
- III. Dysmenorrhea—"The Cramps"
- IV. Drug Vendors and "Periodic Pain"
- V. Other Menstrual Irregularities
- VI. Adolescence
- VII. "The Change of Life"
- VIII. Leucorrhea, or "the Whites"
- IX. The Unnecessary Doucho
- X. Lysol and Zonite
- XI. The Abortion Business
- XII. Sterility and Sterility "Cures"
- XIII. Beauty—Can It Be Bought?
- XIV. Contraception—Four Methods

UNDER THE SWASTIKA

NOT a treatise for or against Nazi Germany—not another collection of horror stories. A serious, readable, dispassionate account (by an American eye-witness from 1931 to 1935) of what has taken place and why; of the present political structure and functioning; of the basic ideas of National Socialism; how these ideas have been developed, propagated, and maintained.

DISCUSSED IN DETAIL ARE:

The power of the authoritarian Volk state—Agrarian policy: "blood and soil"—Partial socialization of wealth—Labor and Industry—outlawing of unions—Education: "culture consciousness" and death of liberal science—Religion and conflict with churches—Race discrimination and propaganda.

The classic seeks the final average; the romantic seeks the final variation. Miss Hoffman seeks neither. She seeks a ground where her personal vision seizes the individual who is of a certain race and no other. Her work at the Field Museum demonstrates—if paradox be permissible—this unique order. This is the point where science and art can meet. For there are two kinds of knowledge: knowing about things and knowing things—in other words, scientific data and aesthetic realization. Miss Hoffman's best work, in its fusion of these means, may lend even more to science than to art.

The book before us is thus a curiously palpable book. For who, watching a great amateur handle a vase or figurine, can occasionally help wondering if a sensitive blind man could not be after all the greatest connoisseur of sculpture? Miss Hoffman's feeling for substance, texture, mass reveals on every page that, though many-sided, she is first of all a sculptor.

The social and mystical musings shot through her pages are at times penetrating. "Savages, scholars, saints, and heroes of all creeds and colors could understand one another, were they to be sounded in the depths of their being." She does not add that such understanding depends largely on the common emotional factor in all great art. Insistence on this would render more valid her final prophetic warning that "man would do well to study the most ancient cults and cultures before growing too convinced that modern progress is based on modern invention."

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT

Armies of the Aged

AN ARMY OF THE AGED: A HISTORY AND ANALYSIS OF THE TOWNSEND OLD AGE PENSION PLAN. By Richard L. Neuberger and Kelley Loc. Caldwell, Idaho: The Caxton Printers. $2.

THE TOWNSEND CRUSADE: AN IMPARTIAL REVIEW OF THE TOWNSEND MOVEMENT AND THE PROBABLE EFFECTS OF THE TOWNSEND PLAN. By the Committee on Old Age Security of the Twentieth Century Fund, New York. 50 cents.

VISION or fantasy? Promise or menace? How shall we characterize the now famous Townsend Plan—Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd.? Its advocates claim that the provision of adequate care for the aged is merely an incidental feature of the plan, which will restore national prosperity, eliminate unemployment, reduce taxes, balance the budget, and come near to establishing the millennium. Critics, on the other hand, insist that among all the wild schemes which have been hatched in the minds of men during the stress of the Great Depression this is the most harebrained and fantastic.

The two small volumes listed above complement each other so well that there is little or no duplication between them. Messrs. Neuberger and Loc are journalists who undertake to review the movement historically; their treatment of the subject is rich in personalities, graphic in presentation, and decidedly ironic in tone. Their analysis consists largely of the cynic's basic question, Who got what? Dr. Townsend himself, Clements, Wunder, Downey, McGroarty—all the leading figures in the movement—appear in their various roles. We see them behind the scenes at conventions, guiding and molding assembled multitudes of the faithful, and after Representative Bell's Congressional investigation we see some at least stripped of their glamor.

On the economic side the analysis is poor. A chapter is devoted to The New Arithmetic, but the arguments for and against the plan are not effectively marshaled. At one point, in commenting on the new federal Social Security Act, the authors have confused contributory old-age benefits with old-age assistance for the destitute. But these are minor faults which do not seriously detract from the interest aroused by the book.

The Committee on Old-Age Security of the Twentieth Century Fund presents a coldly factual economic analysis of the Townsend Plan—"a friendly and impartial study." In simple, non-technical language the Townsend proposals are elucidated and the principles underlying them examined. Ample statistical evidence is presented at each step of the argument. The good faith and sincerity of the advocates of the plan are taken for granted, and their claims receive careful attention throughout. The reviewer has seen no more effective summary of the pros and cons of the Townsend Plan than is given in the Report of the Committee, which is encompassed in a single chapter of only eight pages. The analysis is thoughtful, dispassionate, but wholly devastating to Townsendism.

Yet the committee hastens to add a word of caution. This movement does not derive its strength from the merits and the soundness of its proposals but rather from the zeal and faith of its adherents. Nor can any battering ram of economic theory destroy the movement so long as urgent need impels the destitute aged to seek a solution of their basic problem.

We shall have more Townsendism in the future, not less. Students of population growth in the United States are convinced that within a few decades this nation will be faced with an appalling problem of old age. The decrease in the birth rate, with a consequent decline in the proportion of young people, will give us a population in which persons over sixty-five years of age will constitute about one-eighth of the total; those over fifty years will constitute about 30 per cent. Unless some reasonably adequate community provisions for the care of the aged can be worked out by the American people, we may expect to see the continual recurrence of such plans as Dr. Townsend's. And the aged, with their vast numbers, will have the votes to make such plans a source of worry to politicians and a threat to the economic system.

EWAN CLAGUE

DRAMA

Career Woman

GEORGE KELLY is a playwright whose very failures are usually more interesting to a critic than the successes of less original and less talented men. Even so unsatisfactory a piece as "Daisy Mayme" was marked by that same dour sincerity which one could feel below the surface of such popular successes as "The Show Off" and "Craig's Wife." Somehow or other he always inspired, in me at least, the conviction that he could never write a really commonplace play; that he would fail, when he failed at all, through an inability to communicate the basis of his almost puritanical moral sense. And yet the fact remains that "commonplace" is the one adjective which precisely describes both the theme and the treatment of "Reflected Glory" (Morosco Theater). It will serve as a vehicle for Miss Tallulah Bankhead, who has a personal following large enough to give the play some chance of a moderate success. But any one of a score of other dramatists might have written it. At one time or another two or three of them have, as a matter of fact, actually done so.

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they are well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and are apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain to harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D.D.

"FROM a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly." Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is one of "the bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. IN THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no one need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, as the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

I should like to think that Mr. Kelly originally intended to say something which he somehow never got around to saying, that his reason for telling again the story of the temperamental actress who likes to fool herself into believing that her essentially domestic nature is "tired of it all" was not merely that he thought such a character "cute" and "glamorous." After all, he has been in the past almost misogynistically severe in his judgment of women, and I can imagine the author of "Craig's Wife" or "Daisy Mayme" flaying the heroine of the present play inch by inch until the sympathy of the audience revolted—as it threatened to revolt when Craig's wife had visited upon her a poetic justice almost too implacably administered. But if anything of the sort was originally intended, no trace of it remains; and it is odd to see a playwright who has usually taken integrity as his theme assuming what appears to be the attitude of a stage-door Johnnie toward a very vulgar conception of the temperamental actress.

The action is, moreover, as stereotyped as the central character, and it would be a very inexperienced playgoer who could not anticipate well in advance every turn of the plot, who would not know well ahead of time that the lady's most persistent wooer would have a wife in the offing, that the old-home sweetheart would turn up with a bride just when our heroine thought of settling back upon him, and that the final curtain would go down upon that inevitable scene in which she forgets her broken heart in excitement over a new bit of business which her director has just suggested. As each long-anticipated scene is carefully unfolded, one finds oneself wishing that it had been taken for granted and arguing that a mere "The curtain will descend for a few minutes to indicate the passage of three weeks" would have taken care of it well enough. But by the time the play is over one realizes that if that method had been adopted, the play would have been composed exclusively of brief intermissions.

There remain of course two possible explanations. The one is that the original play was revised out of existence to suit Miss Bankhead, who probably does not want to be anything less than a heroine. The other is that even Mr. Kelly, despite the fact that he managed to emerge originally out of vaudeville, has got submerged in Hollywood. In any event he has obviously lost somewhere the uncommon touch—a thing really very much more important than that common one which for some reason or other is more often discussed.

Last week the D'Oyly Carte Company devoted itself with delightful results to "Iolanthe," and this week is offering "Pinafore" to audiences which are doubtless equally large and equally enthusiastic. In "Iolanthe" the very attractive and capable Brenda Bennett appeared for the first time this season; but if I were to vary the monotony of my weekly praise with a complaint it would be that the general stage management of the productions is not as good as the individual performances. The transition from one scene to another is not always as easy as it might be, and there is a tendency to play the pieces as though each were a succession of specialties. Surely, I might add, it is a mistake to bring the fairies on in the opening scene of "Iolanthe" under the most brilliant and disillusioning of flat lightings. The chorus is composed of vocalists not all of whom are fairy-like, and a somewhat more artful illumination would not be amiss.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

In "So Proudly We Hail" (Forty-sixth Street Theater) the case against military academies as institutions for the chastening of the young idea is argued with some spirit. In the course of two acts and ten scenes Richard Cromwell is, to all intents and purposes, transformed from a sensitive young man with a penchant for playing on the fiddle to a chevroned young sadist whose talent for violence and opportunism win for him commencement kudos and a place at the head of his class. Unfortunately, the text is muffled in special pleading and the largest part of Mr. Cromwell's transformation appears to have taken place in absentia in the intermission between the first and second acts. The play's simple concern is with the fact rather than the process of change, with preachment rather than analysis, and the author is compelled to underscore the former out of all proportion to keep his contrivance in motion. The result is something less than credible, and Mr. Cromwell's sustaining earnestness and intelligence are required to see it through with a minimum of mishaps. Edwin Philips is admirable in a supporting role, and Edward Andrews and John Call are convincing enough as upper-class hoodlums.

THERE are people who can believe there is a difference in the tone and style of one violinist and another, one 'cellist and another, one flautist and another; but who cannot believe there is this difference in the playing of one group of a hundred such players conducted by Stokowski and another group conducted by Toscanini. The truth is, however, that conducting, like violin-playing, involves the operation of sensibility and intellect on the music with which it deals, the sounds in which it formulates itself; that these qualities of mind and feeling and taste are as personal and individual in conductors as in violinists; and that they impress on an orchestra's performance tonal and stylistic characteristics that distinguish it as completely from a performance led by another conductor as Heifetz's playing is distinguished from Huberman's. One may shut one's eyes and know that this is the lush sumptuousness of a Stokowski performance; and that these, on the other hand, are the contours of sounds and phrases that are produced from an orchestra by only one living being: Arturo Toscanini. Or, now, one can put on a phonograph record and hear the same thing.

Toscanini's records of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (Victor: five records, $10) were made without the benefit of trips to Indo-China, research in Hollywood, and the other forms of mumbo-jumbo; but they are the most marvelous orchestral records I have ever heard. This is partly because of the superb job of recording that was done by the technicians; but also because of the nature of what they were given to record. Those unique, sharply defined contours of tone and phrase lend themselves to recording; they emerged unmistakably even from the records of seven years ago; and now, given life-like coloring and body and spatial relationships, the tones and phrases are on records what they were in the concert hall—an endless wonder.

Another notable Victor release is that of Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, Opus 114, for violin, viola, 'cello, bass, and piano, played by Artur Schnabel, members of the Pro Arte Quartet, and Alfred Hobday (five records, $10). This is one of the earlier and weaker of Schubert's mature works; but the weakness is in the structure of the important movements—the first, second, and fifth—not in their material, which is of characteristic Schubertian loveliness. And if there were nothing else one would want the set in order to marvel at Schnabel's playing—the saliency of its phrasing, the incisive and subtle rhythm that carries the lifeless playing of the strings, and withal the wonderful feeling for what they are doing.

Worth your attention are recent additions—some interesting, some enjoyable—to Victor's educational catalogue. Interesting are a record of Hindu music made by Sarat Lahiri and Todi ($.75), and one of Chinese music ($.75), on the back of which is a reconstruction of the ancient Greek Hymn to Apollo. The coupling is explained by the fact that most of these records were made for use with a book, but you do not need any book to enjoy two records of the English Madrigal Group directed by T. B. Lawrence ($1 each); on one, Morley's "My bonnie lass she smileth," his "Now is the month of Maying," Byrd's "I thought that love had been a boy," and "Summer is icumen in"; on the other, Wilbye's "Sweet honey sucking bees," and Gibbons's "Ah, dear heart." And you can get pleasure from merely listening to the two records dealing with fugue ($1.50 each); or you can read about fugue first, and then listen to various examples played by Rosalyn Tureck: a two-part invention, fugues in three, four, and five voices, with one and two counter-subjects, and illustrations of augmentation, inversion, and stretto. Included among these are the marvelous fugues in F minor and C sharp minor in Volume I of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord. Miss Tureck's playing is beautifully sensitive.

On a single Columbia record ($1.50) Yella Pessl plays a Fantasia in C major and a Capriccio in G minor from Händel's Third Collection for Harpsichord, and three pieces of Purcell. The music is fine, and she plays it well. On another ($1) she plays two slighter pieces: Daquin's "The Guitar" and Couperin's "The Baby Rattle." Also on a Columbia single ($1.50) is an excellent performance by Ciampi of Liszt's "St. Francis Walking on the Water." B. H. HAGGIN

The Newspaper Guild Wins a Strike

Dear Sirs: The strike of the Milwaukee Newspaper Guild against the Wisconsin News, which began on February 17, was ended on September 1 when the strikers accepted the conditions agreed upon by John Black, publisher of the News, and a committee set up by the Milwaukee Federated Trades Council. All the striking editorial-department employees returned to work on September 2 at 9 a.m. A number of the strike-breakers were discharged on the day of the settlement.

The terms upon which the guild agreed to end the strike included an agreement regarding minimum wages, hours of work, and other working conditions contained in a bulletin-board statement witnessed and signed by the four members of the Federated Trades Council committee and by Mr. Black.

The bulletin-board statement of policy, which will be in effect until September 1, 1937, includes provision for a minimum salary of $40 a week for experienced editorial employees, the week to consist of five days of eight hours each, and a minimum salary of $25 a week for employees with less than three years' experience. These rates constitute raises for a majority of the strikers. It includes also pay or time off for all work done in excess of the forty-hour week, vacations of two weeks for employees with one year's service or more, dismissal bonuses of one week's pay for each year of service with a maximum of five weeks' pay. The statement provides that the bonus must be paid to all discharged employees except in cases of "wilful misconduct." The management expressed in the statement its willingness at all times to meet with the employees or any representatives they may designate.

Included in the conditions upon which the guild agreed to end the strike was a verbal understanding reached between the Trades Council committee and Mr. Black. Under this agreement there will be no discrimination against any member of the guild, and duration of the strike is not to be considered a lapse of employment for the purposes of determining vacations, dismissal bonuses, and so on.

Guild officers and the individual strikers expressed themselves as highly satisfied with the settlement. Since the strike began, membership in the guild has increased by 1,500.

Progressives in the Primaries

Dear Sirs: I wish to congratulate The Nation on publishing the excellent Issues and Men by Mr. Villard, in the issue of September 12. The praise given Ross Collins, former Congressman from Mississippi, was well deserved. Since the publication of this article Mr. Collins has been renominated, and his renomination amounts to election.

There is another able Mississippian who merits high praise—Representative John E. Rankin, coauthor with Senator Norris of the Tennessee Valley Act and persistent foe of the power trust, which spent a fortune trying to beat him for the renomination he has just secured. Representative Rankin's championship of municipal ownership of power has been a source of genuine gratification to all liberals.

The primary returns showed victories for an encouraging number of progressive Congressmen, mainly in Democratic ranks—Fred H. Hildebrandt of South Dakota, outspoken advocate of public ownership and defender of the farmers and workers; Maury Maverick of Texas, whose sturdy liberalism blocked many a reactionary move in the last session; Byron Scott of California, former educator, whose cultured but cutting blows made the bigots wince more than once; Fred J. Sisson of New York, whose sledgehammer oratory came down with crushing effect on the late and unlamented Mr. Blanton; James H. Gildea of Pennsylvania, editor of a labor paper in the coal belt, who has marched through the streets with strikers in many a demonstration; and many other deserving men.

HENRY FLURY
Alexandria, Va., September 17

Dear Sirs: In the gloomy but unfortunately pretty accurate forecast of the next Congress by Paul Ward in your September 12 issue there is one omission that I believe should be corrected. He mentions the defeat of Congressman Hoeppel in the California primaries among others and states that "among their conquerors there is not a single likely addition to the progressive bloc."

Hoeppel's conqueror was Jerry Voorhis. If he is elected, he will be one of the most valuable additions not merely to a progressive bloc but to a production-for-use bloc. Formerly a Socialist, Mr. Voorhis left the party to support Upton Sinclair's EPIC campaign in 1934 and has been one of the most uncompromising advocates of production for use, both as an unemployment measure and as a general national policy. The continuing strength of the former EPIC forces provides an excellent chance for an addition to Congressman Byron Scott's lone Congressional representation of radical California.

Why Not Vote for Thomas?

Dear Sirs: In a letter in your issue of September 12, R. W. G. declares that while he recognizes that neither Roosevelt nor Landon is the answer to our prayers, yet since Roosevelt is less reactionary than Landon, and since Norman Thomas has no chance of winning, his vote is going to Roosevelt.

May I state in reply that no one expects Norman Thomas to win, but that nevertheless hundreds of thousands of people will vote for him in November because they know that every vote cast for a party that stands solidly behind labor acts as a pressure upon the government to enact labor legislation; they realize that in a period of the decline of capitalism, concessions are wrung from the capitalist class not by indorsement of its candidates but by independent action on the part of labor.

PERHAPS THE HIGH LIGHT OF THE WEEK'S campaign news was Governor Landon's announcement that, if elected, he would not make Mr. Hamilton, Republican National Chairman, Postmaster General. . . . Al Smith's walk around Carnegie Hall in New York City will, according to Republican estimates, cost the President 3,000,000 votes. Since the latest poll of the Institute of Public Opinion gives Mr. Landon only 225 electoral votes, including the doubtful states of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Massachusetts, he will need Al's 3,000,000. . . . Former President Hoover, when asked how the Republican campaign looked to him, declared that it was "making progress." He had probably just read Governor Landon's farm plan, which proposes to pay farmers the equivalent of the tariff rates for agricultural commodities consumed in the United States, to the extent of two billion dollars. . . . President Roosevelt at Pittsburgh showed himself the most skilful campaigner of the century by talking about the budget so entertainingly that almost every sentence was interrupted by applause. Shortly after the speech he got a medal from the United Mine Workers of America. Also, what may prove more useful, the promise of 40,000 votes from the same source. . . . Following in the footsteps of the bankers who refused the other day to be unkind to the New Deal, the United States Chamber of Commerce has just reported that (1) unemployment figures are greatly exaggerated, (2) our monetary future is bright as a result of French devaluation, and (3) the prospects are good for a balanced budget in 1937-38. Translated, this probably means, why swap horses? . . . Senator Borah not only refuses to back Landon but declares that if he is urged too far he will "tell all," not only about the Cleveland convention but about who really wrote the telegram read to the convention over Governor Landon's name. We hope he is urged too far.

ITALY'S ACTION IN DEVALUATING THE LIRA by 41 per cent as against an approximately 30 per cent reduction in the value of the French and Swiss francs suggests that the danger of a world currency war is not yet averted. While it is generally conceded that the lira was overvalued in terms of other Continental currencies, Mussolini's action is bound to arouse suspicion and animosity and, if successful, may result in devaluation becoming an accepted weapon in economic warfare. Germany's next step will particularly bear watching, since it is probable that Hitler will tear a leaf from Il Duce's notebook and also try to undercut the franc. The most hopeful aspect of Italian and French devaluation is that both countries have seen the wisdom of cutting tariffs simultaneously with the depreciation of their currencies. This prevents the prices of imported articles from skyrocketing to the full extent of the change in currency, and reduces the danger of retaliation by other trading nations. It implies a recognition of economic realities which was wholly absent when the United States abandoned the gold standard. Unfortunately, the action cannot be construed as a reversal of the trend toward economic nationalism. The additional barrier to imports imposed by devaluation—varying from 43 per cent for France to 69 per cent for Italy—far more than offsets the mild 10 or 15 per cent reduction in tariffs, and will probably render the abolition of quotas meaningless. With all the world currencies, except that of Germany, nearly in equilibrium in terms of purchasing power, the time is ripe for an international stabilization agreement. Unless this can be made, and made reasonably quickly, the present recovery movement may be cut short by a fresh outbreak of economic war.

THE REBEL THREAT TO MADRID HAS BEEN AT least temporarily lessened by the recapture of Maqueda and a general strengthening of the government's lines of defense. Since the capture of Toledo more than a week ago, the rebels have apparently made no progress in this sector. The vital railways to Andalusia and to Valencia and Alicante appear to be functioning regularly. Life in the capital is reported as normal except for minor shortages of meat and dairy products. Meanwhile, the morale of the government forces has been improved by the report of important victories in the Huesca sector and near Bilbao. After the reorganization of the Catalan government to include representatives of the important proletarian groups, the Barcelona militia attacked and captured Mount Aragon and Quinto Pass to press closely upon Huesca. At Bilbao the government forces have started a vigorous counter-offensive which has carried them halfway to San Sebastian. The victory at Bilbao, which was accomplished with the aid of government warships from Malaga, has been partially offset, however, by the rebels' success in reopening the sea route to Africa, which has enabled them to bring across several thousand additional Moorish troops. Even more disquieting is the fact that there has apparently been no cessation in the flow of war materials from Germany and Italy. The Spanish people cannot be expected to hold out indefinitely in a single-handed fight against world fascism.

THE FULL EXTENT OF GERMAN AND ITALIAN aid to the Spanish rebels has been revealed for the first time during the past week in Alvarez del Vayo's statements at Geneva and William E. Dodd's testimony at hearings conducted by the British Labor Party. Mr. del Vayo pointed out that the rebels possessed a considerable number of tri-motored Junker planes although there were no German planes in the Spanish air force prior to the July outbreak. He cited a dispatch to the London Times to the effect that twenty-one Junkers had been received at Burgos on August 25 and a dispatch of Gerhardt Fieseler to the London News-Chronicle telling of the arrival of twelve German pursuit planes at Seville on September 4. The evidence of Italian aid is even more voluminous. An Italian Fiat plane commanded by Captain Monico, an Italian officer, was brought down on August 30 at Talavera. Del Vayo's report of the arrival of twenty-four Italian planes at Vigo was confirmed by Mr. Dodd, who quoted the British pro-consul at that port as having witnessed the arrival of a large shipment of Italian planes on August 23 and of another shipment on September 20. Mr. Dodd also confirmed the report that Vickers and various German firms were engaged in a flourishing trade in arms at Lisbon. From a number of sources it has been reported that Italian war planes were instrumental in defeating the government's attack on Mallorca and that they participated recently in the rebels' successful attack on the smaller Balearic island of Iviza. In the face of clear-cut evidence that fascist aid to the rebels has been unaffected by the non-intervention pact, it seems incredible that M. Blum should continue to maintain his unneutral embargo on war shipments to the legitimate Spanish government.

THE FASCIST FORAYS IN LONDON AND PARIS early this week demonstrate first that popular feeling against the La Rocques and the Mosleys is deep and wide, and second that the fascist bands are bold, well-organized, and undeterred by law or principle. With deliberate insolence the British blackshirts attempted to parade through the Jewish sections of London, where they have lately concentrated their efforts under the protection of the very guaranties which safeguard freedom of speech and religion. The incident outlines sharply the problem confronting democratic governments. The British Home Office met the situation in what seems to be the only forceful way compatible with democratic methods. The permit for the parade was granted; when violence broke out even before the fascists had formed their ranks, the police prevented the march and gave the fascists protection from thousands of anti-fascist onlookers. In France 20,000 police met a similar situation by giving armed protection to a meeting of 100,000 Communists and Popular Front sympathizers which La Rocque's French Social Party had threatened to break up. The meeting was held peacefully though there were numerous minor street battles on the outskirts and 1,500 arrests. Immediately afterward came reports from "reliable quarters" in France that the fascists are engaged in a systematic campaign to undermine the loyalty of the national police forces, that they are smuggling arms from Switzerland, and in general proving that the disbanding of the Croix de Feu is a myth. In numbers the Popular Front is obviously far superior to the fascists. But while the fascists are secretly or openly armed—not only with guns but with the money of the big industrialists—the people must depend upon the loyalty of the police and the army.

REPORTS OF THE THREATENED DEFEAT OF this or that member of the progressive bloc in Congress are probably too pessimistic. Political experience seems to prove that when a really outstanding member of Congress seeks reelection, the opposition party generally either concedes defeat and runs a nincompoop against him or, refusing to surrender, puts forward the best it can offer in the shape of a candidate. But even that realization will not quell the alarm one feels at hearing that such men as Sisson, Kopplemann, and Marcantonio are involved in hard fights for reelection and will need every bit of support they can get to defeat their rivals. Marcantonio is the most fearless crusader in the House and one of the few Congressmen who can be counted on to form the nucleus of an effective progressive wing. There are not more than a dozen such men in the House, unless one admits to the bloc all the money nuts and crackpots whose sole claim to inclusion is their ability to shout louder than their confreres about "Wall Street"; they vote "Main Street," which is only Wall Street on small time. Sisson's defeat would be a blow to all foes of teachers' oaths and similar Hearstian obscenities and would be hailed as such. His record in the House is less brilliant than Marcantonio's but one that leaves him no less deserving of liberal support. As for Kopplemann—it is hard to believe that the working men and women in Hartford will let him down. He has never let them down. Of course, he has betrayed the arms and munitions manufacturers by voting "right" on every peace issue that has come before Congress since he entered its halls, but that should not be held against him by the great majority of voters.

THE REPORT OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION on conditions in the New York milk shed was released at too opportune a moment. With the producers in a militant mood and consumers talking of boycotts, the commission apparently tried to play safe by saying as little as it could about the disparity between producers' prices and consumers' costs. Yet one incident that found its way into the report indicates why New York farmers are at the point of rebellion. To avoid paying the price for fluid milk established by the state control board, Muller Dairies, a subsidiary of National Dairy Products Corporation, leased three of its plants to an affiliated company engaged in the processing of milk for non-fluid purposes—for which the producer receives a lower price. Its supply of fluid milk for delivery in the metropolitan area it obtained from Pennsylvania. "The manipulation of sources of supply by shifting plants from one subsidiary to another," says the report, "caused the farmers delivering milk to the three Muller Dairies plants in New York State to receive surplus instead of fluid-milk prices, as a result of which producers lost over $17,600 during April, 1935, or at the rate of over $200,000 a year." Of the two major producers' cooperatives operating in the state, one was definitely shown to be controlled by Sheffield Farms Company, another subsidiary of National Dairy Products. Thus the producer in selling to the distributor finds himself represented by his customer. Here we have all the major faults of our system of distribution—starved producers, bilked consumers, faked competition, dominant monopolies. If the FTC pulls its punches now, it will miss the opportunity to do one of the most important jobs in its history.

THE ARREST OF MR. BROWDER, CANDIDATE OF the Communist Party for President, because he proposed to make a political campaign speech, is as clear a violation of the Bill of Rights as we have had for a long time. Since the Mayor of Terre Haute invoked both Mr. Roosevelt and Governor Landon in his announcement that he would protect his city from Communist agitators—"Both of the major-party Presidential candidates . . . recognize communism as a menace to the nation," he said—it would have been fitting if the President and Mr. Landon had issued a joint statement declaring Mayor Beecher's action illegal and unconstitutional. Neither of them saw fit to do so, although Mr. Browder's more immediate rival, Norman Thomas, sent a number of protesting telegrams. The New York press, with the exception of that great champion of Americanism, Mr. Hearst, was quick to declare that the right of free speech had been violated. The Times led the way in a firm and forthright denunciation of Terre Haute's officials and a clear statement of the constitutional infringement. Even the new commander of the American Legion, Harry W. Colmery, said that "if the sole purpose of his [Browder's] arrest was to prevent him from speaking, it is contrary both to American principles and to the principles on which the Legion stands." When a Legion commander defends a Communist's right of free speech, not only is it news but it ought to awaken an echo even in the mind of the Mayor of Terre Haute.

GERMANY'S MINISTER OF EDUCATION, DR. Rust, has just issued one of the most disheartening decrees that have come out of the Third Reich. The period of elementary and high-school education is to be reduced by the equivalent of three years; one year is lopped off in toto and two by cutting out one day or more a week over a period of twelve years. The time saved will be devoted to goose-stepping and learning to swallow the principles of "Heil" ideology. Once Germany had a right to be proud of one of the most thorough educational systems in the world. No better comment on its present degeneration could be found than the figures showing that the number of university students is now half what it was before the advent of National Socialism. From the journal Swiat of Warsaw comes a report of the type of arithmetic problems now given in German schools: "(1) Bombing planes have a speed of 280 kilometers per hour. Calculate how long it would take to cover the distance from Wroclaw to Prague, Munich to Strassburg, Cologne to Metz. (2) The World War, in which Germany mobilized 13,250,000 soldiers, lasted 1,563 days. How many German soldiers sacrificed their lives per day? per hour? How many died each minute? (3) Up to March 15, 1935, Germany had a frontier of 6,000 kilometers guarded by 100,000 soldiers, while France had a frontier of 2,700 kilometers guarded by 600,000 soldiers. How many soldiers per kilometer guarded the frontier of Germany? of France? How many soldiers ought Germany to have?" If this is typical of the education young Germans receive today, Dr. Rust's decree will not result in much loss to them after all.

Mr. Landon's Ethics and Social Security

G OVERNOR LANDON has made one of his costliest blunders on the issue of social security—an issue out of which he had every opportunity to make political capital. No law passed by the Administration falls as far short of the President's glittering promises as the federal Social Security Act. The Administration had no excuse for failure. Committees of experts had been working on the general problem for nearly eighteen months before the law was finally passed. Yet when it came to a showdown the Administration deliberately rejected the advice of practically all the experts it had assembled. Responsibility for a bad law must fall directly on the President and his Cabinet.

Thus the stage was set for a masterly political stroke on the part of Mr. Landon. He had the reactionary forces of the country solidly behind him. Why not make a bid for support of the masses by revealing the weakness of the Administration's measure and advocating a more rational and far-reaching social security? He had the ammunition in hand in the form of an excellent report on the Security Act which had been prepared for the Twentieth Century Fund. As we pointed out last week, Mr. Landon did an expert job in that part of his Milwaukee speech which was devoted to criticism of the existing law. That speech was in strong contrast with the general run of his campaign utterances; it was obvious that the Governor had definite factual data on which to base his attack. But unfortunately there was a marked hiatus between his criticism of the existing law and his constructive proposals. After a withering attack on the old-age-insurance provisions of the act, Mr. Landon could only propose that the whole plan be scrapped and that the aged be forced to depend on state pensions which would be available only to those who had definitely established their need.

Politically, the whole thing might have been passed over as simply another inept Landon speech if John G. Winant, former Republican Governor of New Hampshire, had not resigned as chairman of the Social Security Board in order that he might be free to reply to Governor Landon. In his letter of resignation Mr. Winant took pains to point out that the Social Security Act was a bipartisan measure, that three times as many Republicans had voted for the act as against it, and that what Mr. Landon was proposing was nothing else than "a dole with a means test," which in New Hampshire includes "the pauper's oath and disfranchisement." Thus forced into a corner, Governor Landon made a second blunder even more stupid than the first. In an attempt to defend his position he issued a statement declaring that he had based his Milwaukee speech on an unpublished report of the Twentieth Century Fund, prepared by "some of the most competent men in the country in this field." The Twentieth Century Fund, he added, was supported by the "Filene Foundation" and had withheld publication of the report for the sake of Mr. Roosevelt's campaign. Unfortunately for Mr. Landon, it soon developed that (1) there is no "Filene Foundation"; (2) the document which the Governor released was not a report of the Committee on Old Age Security appointed by the Twentieth Century Fund, but a preliminary report prepared by a member of the research staff which, among other reports, is yet to be considered by the committee; (3) a draft of the report had been given Landon with instructions that it was to be considered confidential until after the committee had acted upon it; and (4) Governor Landon's conclusions are diametrically opposed to those contained in the document which he released to the press.

The criticisms of the Social Security Act contained in the research report prepared for the Twentieth Century Fund follow closely those which have frequently been made in The Nation and which are ably argued in an article in this issue by Abraham Epstein, executive secretary of the American Association for Old Age Security. Since the research report is limited to the problem of old-age security, it naturally does not touch on the Administration's failure to provide protection for the millions who are now unemployed. It does, however, make a frontal attack on the inadequacies of the old-age sections of the act. It points out that about two-thirds of the adult population of the United States is permanently outside the contributory system of old-age insurance, and that the size of benefits derived from this source during the next fifteen or twenty years is pitifully small. A very vigorous and effective attack is directed against the pay-roll taxes as well as the absurdity of the $50,000,000,000 reserve fund, which Landon very properly denounced. But instead of describing the plan as "a cruel hoax" on the workers, the report calls the old-age provisions of the act "a significant beginning in the direction of providing really adequate care for the aged." Instead of advocating that the compulsory insurance plan be repealed, as Mr. Landon does, the report recommends not only that it be maintained but that it be broadened in scope to include as large a proportion of the population as possible. The Governor and the report have opposing views, also, on the question of financing social security. Mr. Landon advocates a special tax, earmarked for the purpose, which "should be widely distributed," presumably a sales tax. The report declares that as much revenue as possible should be obtained from progressive income taxes and the remainder from contributions by the insured. It states that such a scheme "cannot adhere to actuarial principles," but should receive at least partial support "from the general revenues of the government."

On the ethics of giving out a confidential report little need be said. It appears obvious that a man who would violate a confidence merely because it seemed to further his political ambitions is unworthy of the office to which Mr. Landon aspires. What is much more important, no man with Mr. Landon's views on social security should be permitted to set foot in the White House.

The Moscow Trials

THE People's Commissariat of Justice of the U. S. S. R. has issued in English an official "record of court proceedings" in "The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Center." The Soviet government is correct in assuming that the English-speaking world is still interested in the strange trials in which sixteen men, among them several old Bolsheviks, repeated, confirmed, and seemed to revel in confessions of guilt. In these confessions the "employees," as they are designated in the indictment, involved themselves and one another in a widespread plot to assassinate the principal Soviet leaders and seize power. Most of all, however, they incriminated Leon Trotsky as the spiritual leader and actual director of their activities; and one of their number, Valentine Olberg, testified that Trotsky had conspired with the German Gestapo to bring about the assassination of Stalin and the overthrow of his regime. It was this last charge that fell like a thunderbolt not only among the proletarian organizations of the world but also in the ranks of those liberals and democrats who have defended the Soviet Union since its desperate beginnings.

The official record of the court proceedings, unfortunately, does not decide the issue. The reader is not helped by the fact that it is not a transcript—instead, large sections of important testimony are merely summarized in terms not usually to be met with in the records of a court of law. What is more disturbing, there is no indication, with one minor exception, of the presence in court of any documentary evidence beyond the confessions which had already been made in private examinations and set down in the government records. Most of the defendants, as the newspaper accounts indicated at the time, were voluble and often melodramatic in confirming the charges against them. But one of the witnesses was recalcitrant throughout. This was Smirnov, described as "the closest friend of Trotsky and the actual organizer and leader" inside Russia. Smirnov "denies his own direct part in the terroristic activities and only partly admits his crimes," reads the official report. At such times as he denies charges he is confronted with his own confession made privately beforehand or with the testimony of his codefendants, whose confessions are also already on record. "Under the weight of all these irrefutable facts," says the report, "Smirnov at last admits" his guilt. At one point he is "completely exposed" by an outside witness who is not a codefendant but due to be tried on other charges. This witness is his wife, Safonova.

Like all the important political trials that preceded it, this one was conducted in a manner foreign to democratic ideals of justice. The pre-trial conduct of the government-controlled press was particularly shocking. On August 16, three days before the trial began, the Soviet papers, according to the Daily Worker, recorded that the Russian masses were demanding that the defendants be shown no mercy. On the same day a dispatch quoted Pravda as follows: "Investigations disclose a monstrous plot. . . . In an open court, before the whole world, these criminals will answer for their abominable work, and receive the punishment they deserve." Given this overwhelming presumption of guilt, it is at least a question whether the proceedings could be in any true sense a trial.

An underground opposition undoubtedly exists in the Soviet Union, if only because public opposition is impossible. It seems probable that Trotsky's open and persistent criticism of Stalin's regime provided the ideological basis of this opposition. It is inevitable that the Soviet government should try to stamp it out; and if Trotsky was actually directing it, he was liable to the penalties an established government exacts in such cases. But the Soviet government, by conducting an open trial, was under every obligation to conduct that trial according to the ordinary rules of evidence and the ordinary personal safeguards. Genuine evidence of guilt, if any existed, would only strengthen the government's case.

To the outside world the charge that Trotsky conspired with the Gestapo is on its face the most serious and least credible. Yet it is precisely on this point that the fabric of proof, as it is spread out in the official record, becomes most thin. Trotsky is actually linked with the Gestapo only by the testimony of Valentine Olberg, who made his first and last world appearance in the Moscow trial. Before his forcible internment in Norway Trotsky, whose position in world affairs is of somewhat longer standing, stated that he had documents to show that Olberg attempted to become his secretary and was rejected as being a possible spy in the beginning of 1930. It is Olberg's word against Trotsky's.

Olberg at least has had his day in court. Trotsky is entitled to no less, and he has asked that his case be submitted to an international proletarian commission. Yet it was at least partly as a result of the Soviet demand for his deportation that the Norwegian government chose to interpret political asylum as imprisonment incomunicado and confined Trotsky without notice to a remote villa shortly after the close of the Moscow trials. On another page appears the letter which Trotsky wrote to the Minister of Justice, Trygve Lie, telling him why he could not accept the more stringent conditions then laid down for his continued stay in Norway. This letter, except for a copy smuggled abroad, was interned with Trotsky along with other material presumably relating to his defense against the Moscow charges. Trotsky's partisans are now attempting to bring his defense before the public through a court action in Norway.

The mystery that veils the motives and conduct of the Moscow trials cannot conceal their essential implications. Despite the safeguards promised by the new constitution, political considerations still dominate the administration of justice in the Soviet Union. And political considerations dominate the interpretation of political asylum even in a democratic country.

Mutiny and the Bounty

ARUMOR is going the rounds that the employers of San Francisco, good Republicans all, have been waiting for an opportunity to close their establishments up and down Market Street as well as on the docks, put the blame on labor, raise a rip-roaring red scare, and swing California to Landon. Rumors, like other tall tales, often contain a basic element of truth. In this case it was clear that President Roosevelt did not want a major test of strength just now between the shippers and the 37,000 members of the Pacific Maritime Federation. He hastily made three temporary appointments to the Maritime Commission authorized by the ship-subsidy act which he signed late in June. Although they have no actual jurisdiction as yet, they persuaded the employers to back down a bit from demands which could only have resulted in a strike and lockout. A fifteen-day truce is now on.

The Maritime Commission, though temporary and as yet incomplete, was in a position to talk turkey to the men who go down to the sea in ship subsidies. This commission will have powers over shipping comparable to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission over land transportation, with the added power to grant direct subsidies for the construction and operation of new ships.

Will the history of such subsidies turn out to be any less infamous than that of mail subsidies? Much depends, of course, on the personnel of the permanent Maritime Commission. But even if the Maritime Commission is manned entirely by persons of the caliber of Joseph Eastman, and even if the shippers and their lobby suddenly become as pure as the driven snow, the ship-subsidy act gives scope for one of the most expensive marine sprees in history. The commission is charged with building up an "adequate and well-balanced" merchant fleet. In addition to the wide powers implied in this phrase, the commission will have authority to establish regulations for wages and working conditions. Shipping men, it is reported, think this plan will eliminate seamen's strikes for higher wages, since the government will make up the difference between the American scale and that paid on foreign ships.

It is no accident, of course, that two of the temporary appointees are navy men, one of them being Rear Admiral Wiley, past commander of the fleet. The next war will undoubtedly play an important part in determining what constitutes an "adequate" merchant marine.

In a later issue The Nation will publish an analysis of the ship-subsidy act and its implications for labor and the public. It will keep track of the Maritime Commission in its administration of vast powers and large funds. Meanwhile it is just as well that the Pacific Maritime Federation is already strong enough to bring effective pressure not only on the employers in San Francisco but on the President in the White House. Particularly in view of the possible uses to which the powers of the Maritime Commission may be put in time of war, every ounce of labor's pressure must now be directed toward having a genuine friend appointed to the permanent commission.

A. S. Ailes, who sells gas to break strikes: "I'm not only improving industry, but I'm improving society."

Senator La Follette to A. S. Ailes, vice-president, Lake Erie Chemical Company: "What do you mean by 'toxic gas'?"

Senator Thomas to Mr. Ailes: "You can't use gas promiscuously, can you?"

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Roosevelt Stands Firm on Power

Washington, October 5

ROOSEVELT still holds the fort. In the series of conferences held here in the last few days on the fate of the TVA, he has not yielded an inch to the power boys, and in consequence the power issue continues to be the one major issue on which Roosevelt has not trimmed. It is true, of course, that ample time for trimming still remains and that no one can yet be certain that the TVA will not at some future date be sold down the river, but the course of the power parleys here this past week offers little ground for such fears.

You may not have gathered this from the daily press. In fact, if you read the financial journals, you probably have just the opposite impression as to the outcome of the meetings. It is one of the amusing factors in the situation that a large section of the daily press and all the financial journals that I have seen, in attempting to play the game of the power boys, unwittingly have played the Administration's game instead. They have broadcast accounts which pictured the power parleys as a peace conference and pictured the Administration as on the verge of a truce with the power trust. In so doing they have pushed utility stocks upward and allayed the fears of thousands of investors whom the power trust has been laboring to keep in a state of anti-Roosevelt panic.

Spiking the political guns of the power gang is precisely the effect Roosevelt hoped to achieve when he announced the conferences in a statement that spoke fulsomely of cooperation between the TVA and the private power companies. When he got them in his office he said he wanted to hear nothing except discussion of "pooling transmission lines." Thomas W. Lamont could achieve nothing better than the sort of speech usually given at cornerstone-layings. Owen D. Young, addressing himself as usual to the hemispheres, discoursed at Roosevelt's bidding on the prospect that a few centuries hence there will be no transmission lines to pool, power being distributed by radio. None of the power boys were allowed to get a word in edgewise about the pressing problem of competition between the TVA and the private power companies.

Even in the conferences with TVA officials and other federal power experts that followed their meeting with the President, the power boys were not permitted to gain the foothold for which they had hoped. The Administration planned to make them sweat, and it succeeded. It is proceeding on the theory that when they have sweated a little longer—and Election Day has passed, destroying their hope of substituting Landon for Roosevelt—the power boys will be ready to talk business. They are nearly ready now, in the opinion of Roosevelt and his TVA aides, but not quite. They have yet to test their political strength in the election, and their only other weapon, the courts, has not as yet been fully tried. That is why the conferences were not permitted to get anywhere, although the power boys avowedly wanted to come to terms. They were ready with three proposals and, in fact, had reduced them to writing, but they never got a chance to lay them on the table. They were ready to propose, first, that the TVA either confine itself to producing power and sell only to private power companies or buy out all the companies in its area lock, stock, and barrel, through negotiation or, if that failed, by resort to condemnation. They were ready to propose as an alternative that the TVA bind itself to stay within its present bounds, selling power only to private companies and to those few little municipal systems already established in its territory. The third alternative they were prepared to urge was that the TVA buy out the private company serving some one metropolitan area in the Tennessee Valley and bind itself not to attempt to extend its domain any farther into the territories which the private utilities serve.

The Administration is unwilling to accept any of these proposals. To accept either of the first two would be plainly to contravene the act setting up the TVA and to abandon the purposes for which the TVA was created, if one may count out the proposal that the TVA buy out all the private companies in the valley. The government is not prepared at this time to commit itself to any such program involving the outlay of hundreds of millions. As for the third proposal, the TVA takes the position that it cannot legally bind itself to agree to sell power to one municipality and refuse to sell to others. It does not quarrel with the power boys in their contention that once the TVA gets into a metropolitan market, it will be forced into all the other metropolitan markets in the valley and will squeeze the private companies out of the field one after the other in rapid succession unless its spread is put under contractual restraints. Instead, with Roosevelt's apparently firm backing, it is waiting for the power trust to surrender to the inevitable and come to terms.

Federal officials believe the power boys already have begun to change their tempers. Out in Seattle they have at last given up their thirty-year battle against public ownership and sold out to the municipal system. A similar sale is in process of negotiation at Los Angeles; and at Springfield, Illinois, the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation—which controls the Tennessee Valley power companies most immediately threatened with direct TVA competition—has just sold out to the municipal system. In all three cases public and private systems have been in competition for from twenty to thirty years. Federal officials hope that Commonwealth and Southern will shortly be ready to sell its Chattanooga property without demanding assurances that the TVA will not later take over Memphis, Knoxville, and Nashville, where the citizenry also have voted overwhelmingly to set up municipal distribution systems and buy TVA power.

Commonwealth and Southern is only one of the holding companies involved; it controls the Chattanooga and Nashville properties. And it is anxious to come to terms with the TVA because its subsidiaries in the valley have $600,000,000 in bonds and preferred stocks outstanding at interest rates nearly double those of the present money market. Uncertainties arising from the TVA situation have made it impossible for the company to refinance those obligations and get fresh capital for badly needed plant expansions. Present interest rates take more than thirty-eight cents out of every income dollar, and this sum could be cut in half by refinancing, with an attendant freeing of funds for dividends on the operating companies' common stocks, which are held by the holding company. Another evidence of the pressure under which Commonwealth and Southern is operating is the fact that, with refinancing closed to its operating subsidiaries in the TVA area, it has had to dip into its own coffers and lend them $20,000,000 to meet maturities.

Roosevelt's handling of the power conference was only a little slicker than his handling of the tripartite agreement for international currency stabilization, and this last was, if anything, too slick. He slipped when he let Secretary Morgenthau raise his fantastic howl about Russian meddling with the pound. His eagerness to seize upon any club at hand with which to beat down the Hearstlings who cry out that he is in cahoots with Moscow is understandable, but in this case it betrayed him. You may be sure that Morgenthau raised his howl under orders from Roosevelt, for Morgenthau never says anything of more than accidental importance without permission in advance. Morgenthau admittedly had talked with Roosevelt a number of times that morning before he called in the press to hear his incredible announcement that Moscow had tried to bust Mr. Roosevelt's stabilization agreement through a raid upon the pound. He adjured the reporters to stop questioning him and to put the news on the wires.

Accentuating this political shenanigan is a nasty story that is making the Washington rounds. It seems that the stabilization-agreement ballyhoo was contrived merely to help the Blum government through its painful task of devaluation and that the United States, England, and France are actually little nearer a real agreement than they were a year ago. According to this tale, which emanates from an almost too authoritative source, the British are insistent on stabilization of the pound at $4.50, and the United States Treasury is willing to go no lower than the pre-war parity of $4.86. Morgenthau screamed bloody murder across the front pages of the nation because a routine exchange transaction by the U. S. S. R. drove the pound down to $4.91—five points above the level to which this government is willing to see it drop.

U. S. S. R. in 1936

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Kiev, early September, 1936

THE Soviet Union is becoming less like its past and more and more like its future. The numerous ugly vestiges of Czarism and the wounds of a costly revolution are disappearing before the emerging contours of another era. The U. S. S. R.'s present is beginning to be a blueprint of its future.

Tiflis has a new and broad Riverside Drive, straight new streets hewn out of the hills in the town, blocks of new students' dormitories, and rows of new workers' homes. Hundreds of fine, big school buildings, started several months ago, are nearing completion in all Soviet cities—in Leningrad alone 116 were erected this summer. Kiev in the last year put up numerous excellent apartment houses—not so coldly cubistic as the inconvenient architectural abominations of an earlier formalistic period. The eye of every Soviet traveler feasts on thousands of recently laid-out parks, some large for culture and rest as in Baku, some consisting only of a few flower beds and benches—a vacant lot converted into a haven. Millions of trees have been planted in double or quadruple lines along streets and roads to banish the shadeless thoroughfares of Czarist times. Benches with wooden umbrellas over them for the hiker have been placed on hot country highways. There are children's day nurseries on crowded Black Sea steamers. Most cities now have richly equipped playhouses for boy and girl pioneers, and Kharkov has devoted one of its finest palaces, formerly the headquarters of the Ukrainian government, to this purpose. Rostov has just completed the grandest theater erected under the Soviet regime. It also boasts a new trolley-bus line through a new central avenue. Novorossisk is building more factories and more homes, and is absorbing a neighboring village. Nalchik, a gem in the North Caucasian republic of the Kabardinians, is expanding ambitiously. Since my last Soviet journey a year ago this one-story town of 40,000 people has finished about twenty structures of two and three stories. Moscow's growth astounds even the permanent resident when he goes on a housing hunt. Leningrad, the laggard, is also slowly trying to accommodate its increasing population.

Every collective farm I visited has a "hut laboratory"—a small building supplied with charts, pictures, models of agricultural equipment, a microscope, and so on. Here the peasants take courses in the proper preparation of seed, the proper use of machinery, plant and animal diseases, fertilizer, crop rotation. Thus is science being brought down to the lowest producing unit, the mujik, who now resents that name, once synonymous with serfdom and backwardness. Today he is a kolhoz-nik. A considerable number of kolhozi have acquired one-and-one-half-ton motor trucks during the last year. Consequently crops are moved more quickly with less loss, human backs and animals are spared, the chauffeur joins the tractor driver in forming a bridge between farm and city, and the peasant discovers a hitherto unknown interest in good roads. He begins to lay them. The bicycle too has come to the village, and tractors and combines are ubiquitous. Electric threshers are being manufactured. At the giant Zernograd state farm near Rostov specialists have been experimenting with an electric tractor, an electric combine, and a tractor that runs on rubber balloon tires.

Mechanization and an improved agrarian technique proved their value this summer. But for them there would have been a bad crop failure. Most of the Ukraine, which grows 25 per cent of the country's grain, had only one good rain between sowing and reaping. Nevertheless, the Ukraine boasts a better yield this year than in 1935. A better yield was likewise obtained in the North Caucasus, the Soviets' second most productive granary. Everywhere in the collectives I asked for an explanation, and everywhere it was the same. Fallow is now a universal feature; it conditions the earth for richer harvests. Tractors made it possible to plow when the ground still held all its winter moisture and before a horse could have turned the heavy soil. The seed was selected, and planted much deeper than before. That was a guaranty against the effects of drought. When the mad heat wave of July-August smote the fields, burning wheat and rye, the peasants rushed out with their combines and speedily put the grain in barns. On August 15, 1935, some 57,126,000 hectares had been harvested; on the same date this year the figure was 62,318,000 hectares. Earlier in the month on August 10 the discrepancy was greater—7,801,000 hectares.

The U. S. S. R. is garnering the fruits of the expensive process of collectivization. There may yet be bad crop years, but the arbitrary dictatorship of nature is now countered by the will of collective man armed with the mechanical wonders that spring from his inventive brain. These and the soil he puts to their maximum use. As a result, living standards in the countryside are obviously rising. In a Kabardinian peasant hut I asked what articles the family had recently acquired. Among the objects were two pairs of shoes for each of the women folk—a pair for Sunday and another for week days—and a fancy umbrella. A household without a cow is now a rarity. Herds are appreciably bigger. Horned cattle in the Ukraine increased 26.7 per cent in the last year; hogs over 60 per cent; sheep 42.5 per cent. A kolhoz near Kharkov was proud of a stable of beautiful young horses which had never worked; animals receive the tenderest care from experts. More is expected of the peasants—I found shock brigades and "Stakhanovites" in the collectives—and more is given to them. The peasantry never ate so well as it eats now. In a tobacco-growing Crimean village a husband and wife last year earned 8,000 rubles in cash, plus fruit, nuts, vegetables, cheese, and so on. I refused to believe this statement until I saw it in black and white in the book-keeper's ledger. That couple was not an exception. This year there are many like them in the same village. Eight thousand rubles is a year's wage of two good city workmen. In grain regions the income is smaller but large enough to be hard to spend. There is still a shortage of consumers' goods owing to the continued over-emphasis on heavy industry and armament-making.

The peasant dislikes this, yet understands. He has learned to think collectively. The kolhoz destroyed the fence that separated the peasant's field from that of his neighbor. Therewith, after a time, the fence around his mind also disappeared. His small plot of ground, his rude dwelling, his family, his primitive agricultural work, the church, used to be his whole world. Today he is part of the collective; the collective's business is his business. It is a complicated business. His mind grows in following it and in listening to reports about it. The collective's life depends on industry, on the supply of machines and gasoline, on state policy. Bolshevik politics and, inevitably, international affairs become the peasant's daily concern. He wants to read a paper, listen to the radio. Talented youngsters are sent to the best city educational institutions. A new generation of able, intelligent organizers and leaders is springing up.

A young engineer showed me the Dnieper Dam. I asked him about his life. He used to tend the cows in an Azerbaijan village. The director of the Chakwah tea factory near Batum is also a former shepherd boy. I passed a new students' dormitory building in Rostov, entered, and unceremoniously knocked at one door after another. Three women were preparing for a history examination. They gave correct and clever answers to questions about the American Civil War, the French Revolution, and so on. Two had come from a village, worked as housemaids in the city, and gone to night school. Now they were village school teachers taking a six months' special course. The third woman was a Greek Armenian, aged thirty. Five years ago she was illiterate, working underground in the Donetz coal mines. She has been teaching school for a year. She asked penetrating questions about the capitalist world. Such cases are legion. These people are the new Russia. They have remarkable dignity and self-assurance. They make higher demands on life. They will take the new constitution very seriously.

Dignity is also the outstanding impression made by racial minorities. With the coming of Sovietism the suppressed ethnic units of old Russia emerged as communities with their own individuality, their own cultures, their own governments. They are endlessly grateful for their new existence. Among them the regime finds some of its staunchest supporters. The Bolsheviks leaned over backward to meet the needs of these national minorities. The result is a bulwark against nationalism. Throughout the Soviet Union the observer encounters endless pride in the latest achievements of the country. But it is not a pride in the achievements of "Russia," for half of the U. S. S. R. is not Russia. It is made up of scores of national minorities. Stalin the Georgian, Kaganovich the Jew, Ordjonekidze the Georgian, Mikoyan the Armenian—all of them members of the paramount Politbureau—cannot be proud of "Russia." Nor can they suppose that Georgia or Armenia is responsible for Soviet successes. All the nationalities of the country have contributed to them. The U. S. S. R. is itself a real international.

Public enthusiasm is greater and more widespread than I have ever known it during my fourteen years in the Soviet Union. The fact is as undubitable as the reason is simple. The enthusiasm is not mere sentiment which has to be fed by "stunts" as in some other countries; it is based on solid material improvement. In the last five weeks I have traveled thousands of miles through the country, visiting many villages and twelve cities. I have inspected factories, rest homes, sanatoria. I have talked to people in trains, on steamers. Of every person to whom I spoke I inquired how much he or she earned. I must have asked over a thousand people. In all instances they earned more this year than last. Usually it was considerably more. At the Kirov (formerly Putilov) plant in Leningrad the average wage of a worker was 252 rubles in 1935 and 311 rubles in the first half of 1936. The income of engineers, technicians, and the like rose from 475 to 599 rubles in the same period, and that of the factory's clerical staff from 223 to 269 rubles. I estimate that average wages have risen 20 per cent throughout the Soviet Union in the last twelve months. Simultaneously prices have fallen, but not as much as people expected and hoped. Prices are still excessive. This applies especially to bread, shoes, and many articles of clothing. The Stakhanov movement, which was launched late in August, 1935, simply means more efficient work by individuals and more rationalized operation by plants. This brings higher individual incomes, more employment, and greater economies in factories—half of the savings, according to a recent decree, must be spent on home construction. In the intervening twelve months the industrial output of the U. S. S. R. has increased 30 per cent. Consumers' goods, however, do not bulk as large in this increase as heavy mechanical equipment. Yet the availability of consumers' commodities is an important determinant of the general price scale. A price slash is promised for the end of 1936. Every price reduction implies another improvement of a living standard which has left the Czarist level far behind but which is still much too low for a socialist state.

Above all, the population needs homes. Housing has made vast progress, but is still sadly inadequate. Seven years ago the Soviets laid the foundation of a new, industrialized nation. That process yielded iron, steel, bricks, glass, for building purposes. From 1929 on these materials went into new plants and into the houses connected with them. This division of materials between industrial and private needs caused housing to lag. The same division persists today owing to the construction of factories, schools, military structures, offices, and so forth. Next year the present emphasis on schools may be shifted to hospitals. Moreover, there is always a shortage of labor. In Moscow I know of large apartment blocks which remain unfinished owing to a scarcity of workingmen. Labor efficiency in this branch is extremely low. Few processes are mechanized. Less living space was created in 1935 than in 1934. Plumbing is poor, interior finish bad, and modern conveniences like refrigeration or air conditioning are unknown. Much could be accomplished by a commissar of housing endowed with the energy, talents, and authority of a Kaganovich or Ordjonekidze. Housing must now be placed in the center of Soviet attention, for overcrowding in homes creates serious problems. And nothing so effectively blots out the fact of Czarism as a fresh row of fine houses on the spot where miserable tenements once stood. If prices go down and homes go up, the U. S. S. R. will be able to stop harking back to the pre-1914 period and start making comparisons with advanced Western nations.

Social Security Betrayed

BY ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

I FAR from being a radical social measure, the New Deal Social Security Act is the most reactionary social-insurance plan in existence. Its major features are neither social nor conducive to security. In a world ruled by slogans it is not surprising, however, to find American liberals ensnared into unquestioning acceptance of the act. The promise of security is most alluring. The slogan of "social security" encompasses all fond hopes and pious wishes. Even enemies of social legislation insist that they favor the idea of social security.

The vast range and complexity of the act have served to obscure its social limitations and sinister implications. The combination of ten different insurance and relief programs, based on three different philosophies of governmental operation, has made understanding well-nigh impossible. The embodiment of good, bad, and indifferent plans in one measure has impeded critical discussion of the socially questionable features.

Sooner or later the American people are bound to realize that, despite its glittering title, the act does not solve the problems of insecurity. The law does not even attempt to meet the major ills of present-day society. The great modern hazards afflicting millions of wage and salaried earners are sickness and invalidity, unemployment, old-age dependency, industrial accidents, death, widowhood, and orphanage. Although illness is one of the major causes of economic insecurity, threatening workers in good times as in bad and accounting for nearly half of all dependency in normal times, the act completely ignores this problem. It does not touch upon accident compensation, which is still non-existent in two states and extremely inadequate in most others, nor does it make burial provisions. Except for the destitute blind, it fails to provide for the invalid. Its chief concern is with unemployment and old-age dependency.

The inequities of the act, however, do not lie in its omissions. Constructive provision for the two major hazards of unemployment and old-age dependency would justify the New Deal claims. The deficiencies of the act lie in its commissions, because it not only offers little security against the hazards which it covers, but may tend actually to aggravate present insecurity. The act offers little or no security to the unemployed for these reasons:

1. It ignores and evades the most immediate and pressing phase of unemployment—the huge army of unemployed. Even if all states enacted unemployment-insurance laws, those now out of work could not possibly benefit until they had been reabsorbed and then again thrown out by private industry. Under no conditions can benefits be paid until two years after a state has enacted an unemployment-insurance law. Since so far only about one-fourth of the states have enacted such laws, benefits can be paid in but few of them before 1940.

2. The act offers insignificant protection even for the future unemployed because the 3 per cent levy on pay rolls will, at best, allow only about ten weeks of benefits. Even in good times more than half of the insured workers will fall outside this short benefit period. For example, the most that will be collected under the New York unemployment-insurance law in 1938, when the full 3 per cent tax becomes effective, is approximately $90,000,000. The total collected will not equal the expenditures now made by New York City alone for its unemployed during three months. The problem of what to do for workers who have exhausted the short benefit period is completely ignored. Nor is the problem of migratory workers met.

3. National coverage in unemployment insurance is extremely uncertain under the present tax-credit device. Not only have the states been slow to enact these laws, but it is not likely that complete state coverage will be attained in the near future. Many states will encounter constitutional difficulties in levying pay-roll taxes as well as in meeting the other federal requirements. The inducement which the act gives employers to seek state action is nullified by burdening them with two duplicating tax and record systems as well as with additional taxes in some states.

4. Even if all the states enact laws, national uniformity will not be attained because the act encourages a variety of state schemes, regardless of their efficacy. The states are offered five different unemployment-compensation schemes: the single pooled fund, individual company-reserve plans, merit-rating systems, employment-guaranty plans, or any combination of these four. Each state has complete freedom to determine the rates of contributions, the amount and duration of benefits, and when these shall begin. The act specifies only when payments cannot, not when they must, begin. Each state act may or may not require contributions from employees and the state government. Benefits may be $15 a week for twenty weeks or $3 or less a week for five weeks or less. This will result in a miscellany of state plans and in endless confusion and great inequality among workers and among employers in the different states. There are already vital differences in the thirteen existing laws. Since the Social Security Board boasts of its "neutral" attitude on the basic principles of unemployment insurance, the hope of establishing a uniform and adequate system of unemployment insurance throughout the United States is frustrated.

5. Most crucial is the fact that the tax-credit device employed by the act makes future improvements almost impossible. The equalized federal tax, levying the same tax on employers in all states, will deter states from liberalizing their contribution and benefit scales for fear of placing their employers at a competitive disadvantage. Indeed, states with laws which improve upon the federal standards are already encountering difficulties with the federal authorities, who refuse to extend the advantages of the credit device for such purposes. On the other hand, as more states comply with the present act, federal improvement will become more difficult, because Congress will hesitate to require the reorganization of each state system by any important amendment. Moreover, should the federal act be voided by the Supreme Court the individual state laws will be difficult to retain, not only because most of them have been made contingent upon the federal law, but also because the overemphasis which the act gives to national action will militate against state legislation.

With respect to its provisions for old age, the best and soundest part of the act is the federal grant-in-aid of 50 per cent, up to a maximum of $15 monthly per person, to states paying pensions to needy persons sixty-five years of age and over. This is stimulating states to enact new laws and to liberalize their previous provisions for the dependent aged. But the advantages of this part of the act are nullified by the unprecedented plan for old-age insurance which aims to replace the non-contributory pensions in the shortest possible time. The aged are thus also offered little security, and for the following reasons:

1. The plan cannot meet the needs of the aged for almost a generation. The average monthly annuity for most workers during the next twenty years will be less than the maximum now permitted under the state non-contributory plans. To earn an annuity of $32.50 per month a worker now forty-five years of age will have to earn at least $100 each month until he reaches sixty-five. The maximum of $85 monthly can be attained only by an employee earning $3,000 each year for forty-three years. The contributory system cannot, therefore, meet the problem of old-age dependency for the next twenty or thirty years, even assuming that our current money rates remain stable. During this period the worker's compulsory contributions will afford him no additional security. The requirement of retirement from work upon the receipt of an annuity is thus utterly meaningless. No one will surrender a job for a pittance. Indeed, most needy workers will be considerably better off under the non-contributory pensions.

2. Not only will the annuity be insufficient for the insured, but the act provides nothing for the dependent wife of an annuitant. Under the non-contributory pensions a needy couple may receive up to $60 monthly under most state plans. But a man who has contributed for twenty or more years to the insurance fund will get for himself and his wife only about half the amount his neighbor and wife may receive without any contributions. This will necessitate not only additional help from the non-contributory plan but two duplicating systems to cater to the same person or family.

3. The insurance funds are neither certain nor safe. Since the act creates no legal claim to benefits, there is no assurance that the annuities will be paid. Payments will depend upon each Congress. For in order to avoid additional constitutional difficulties, the act stipulates that the taxes go first into the general fund of the government. They reach the Old Age Benefit Reserve Account only as Congress makes the necessary actuarial annual appropriations. But what assurance is there that Congress will regularly allocate this money either in sufficient amounts or at all? If experience with other funds in this country and abroad offers any guide, Congress not only may be disinclined to do so but may even dissipate the funds for other purposes.

4. The act places an immediate back-breaking burden upon the younger workers. These workers will not only have to bear, as taxpayers, their share of the cost of the non-contributory pensions, but will have to provide fully for their own annuities and, in addition, pay a higher premium in order that they as workers, rather than the taxpayers as a whole, may provide for those now old and in middle age. Workers entering the system at the age of twenty when the 6 per cent rate goes into effect in 1949 will, together with their employers, pay a premium rate about 40 per cent higher than would be required for the same annuities by a private insurance company.

Of even greater significance is the act's anti-social and uneconomic base, which may aggravate the existing insecurity. The insurance plans use exclusively the reactionary revenue tax, which falls heaviest on workers. A tax on production is a tax on consumers, since employers nearly always transfer such taxes in increased prices. The Social Security Act does not utilize the federal power to tax incomes and inheritances in order to bring the financial resources of the nation into the insurance schemes, as practically all progressive social-insurance programs have done. On the contrary, it hopes to bring security to the unemployed and aged by a tax which, while relieving the well-to-do from their part of the social burden, merely divides poverty among the poor.

modern social insurance would effect, the act actually accentuates the present maldistribution of income by diminishing the purchasing power of the masses through the withdrawal of some of their immediate income and through higher prices; this is especially dangerous in the face of continued unemployment, increased state and municipal taxes, and depressed wages. Heavy pay-roll taxes inevitably react adversely on employment and wages, since they tend to curtail consumption and to increase unemployment by discouraging employers from adding to their working forces and by encouraging displacement of labor by mechanical improvements.

Grave dangers are also inherent in the huge reserves contemplated under the old-age insurance plan, provided Congress does not dissipate them for other purposes. For a great many years the contributions will exceed the benefits. The reserves will mount until they reach $47,000,000,000 in 1980. These huge funds, paying interest at 3 per cent per annum, may be invested only in government obligations, and since this sum is about $17,000,000,000 above our present outstanding indebtedness, a premium is placed on increasing the governmental debt burden. It is difficult to forecast the consequences of concentrating all governmental debt and securities in one account held and controlled by the government itself.

The Social Security Act also sets up an unnecessarily cumbersome method of administration in both old-age and unemployment insurance. Although social insurance can succeed only with the simplest structure, the framers of the Social Security Act gave no thought to this problem. They incorporated a complex administrative system difficult to carry through even in small and homogeneous countries. Unemployment insurance is coordinated neither with old-age insurance nor with relief. Two separate systems are used for unemployment insurance and old-age insurance for practically the same body of workers. Every state must duplicate the unemployment-insurance set-up of the federal government. The simple system of collection by stamps cannot be employed because the tax must be computed not only on the varied wages but also on the board and lodging, the tips and bonuses received by workers.

The unnecessary blunders in the act will react adversely on the development of a constructive social-insurance program in the United States. Its economic and social fallacies, coupled with its administrative perplexities, are bound to bring hardship to the workers and disappointment to the law's political friends. There is danger that the American people may become so disillusioned that they will cast out the entire act, good and bad, and conclude that social insurance is beyond the capacity of our government. Whereas a Supreme Court nullification of a beneficial social-security program would strengthen the case for a constitutional amendment and pave the way for a reenactment, a court decision adverse to this act might, in the face of an aroused public antagonism, deal a death blow to the entire movement for many years.

[A second article by Mr. Epstein showing what can be done to improve the Social Security Act will appear next week.]

Who Killed the King?

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

ON OCTOBER 9 it will be two years since the assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia at Marseilles and the fatal (apparently accidental) wounding, in connection with that attentat, of Foreign Minister Barthou of France.

I did not admire King Alexander. I predicted his eventual end at the hand of some assassin in consequence of his misrule more than a year before it occurred. I was shocked by the news of the outrage, but I was not surprised. None the less, ever since the horrible event, which I studied closely in the excellent news films exhibited in America, I have been puzzled by all sorts of things connected with the assassination. The incident is one of the great murder mysteries of recent years.

We cannot be sure even about the identity of the assassin. By certain marks on his body it was allegedly determined that he was Vladimir Georgieff Chernozemski, a young Macedonian komitadji. But I have word of rumors in the Balkans that Chernozemski is alive, and the assassin might easily have been another person. His mangled body was put away in great haste "in a Marseilles cemetery in the presence of two detectives and a gravedigger," and both the French and the Yugoslav government did everything possible to limit the investigation which was held immediately after the outrage, while they exploited the assassination for their own political ends. In Yugoslavia free discussion of the King's death was not allowed, nor could the news films be shown; and even now under the Stoyadinovich regime, when censorship is slightly relaxed in many other respects, not a word can be written about the "mystery."

I do not wonder, of course, nor does anyone else, why the assassin pulled the trigger. What puzzles me is this; why was the assassin allowed to kill the King? I can put my query thus: why did French officials responsible for the King's safety give the assassin almost direct aid in the commission of his deed? Or thus: who, besides the Macedonian and Croatian terrorist organization wanted the assassin to succeed and induced the French officials to make the killing of the King easy?

King Alexander's visit to Paris for the purpose of strengthening Yugoslavia's politico-military and economic relations with France was rumored throughout Europe for weeks in advance of the official announcement. Alexander was going on a mission of vast importance not only to Yugoslavia and France but, since peace or another war might be the issue, to Europe. There is no doubt that Alexander's personal secret service knew that terrorists intent on killing him had lately entered France; the King made no secret of his fear of assassination. Shortly before his departure for France he discussed with Ivan Mestrovich the poor prospects of his living much longer. The famous sculptor, who was a friend of his, has since recorded their conversation in Nova Evropa, one of the leading journals of Yugoslavia.

Two or three weeks before the King left for France, the Yugoslav government, no doubt by his own personal direction, requested the French government to allow it to send thirty (some say forty) Yugoslav secret agents to France to guard his life during his stay there, but the French government declined the request. Eleven days after the assassination, on October 20, 1934, the London Daily Mail printed a dispatch from its Belgrade correspondent, Ward Price, stating that King Alexander had expressed his fear of being murdered to Prince George of England and that Prince George had appealed to Scotland Yard, which requested the Sûreté Nationale to allow ten Scotland Yard detectives to come to France for the duration of Alexander's visit. The French authorities, the dispatch stated, had refused the request. This news story was never denied.

Immediately after the King was murdered, the Sûreté Nationale in Paris tried to throw the blame for the miserable protection of his life on the Marseilles police. But the Marseilles police declined to take the blame, and curious things began to come to light. On October 12 and 13, 1934, Paris newspapers printed the following official statement of the municipal government of Marseilles:

Since rumors are being circulated in Paris that the municipality of Marseilles was opposed to certain measures being taken for the protection of His Majesty King Alexander, especially as regards the use of the army for the service of order, the municipality feels obliged to state that it was not consulted regarding the organization of the reception of the King; that all instructions to maintain order were issued by representatives of the Sûreté Nationale of Paris; and finally, that the Mayor of Marseilles was not invited to take part in the parade.

Simultaneously, the Prefecture of the Bouches-du-Rhône issued this public statement:

The Sûreté Nationale alone had all the responsibility for the organization of order and protection; the Marseilles police were only the agents for the execution of that organization; and the Marseilles authorities had urged that the King's automobile be surrounded with special agents on motor cycles, but the officials of the Sûreté Nationale had rejected their recommendation.

The French government promptly removed from his post Prefect of Police Jouhannaud of Marseilles "for neglect of duty," whereupon the municipal council of Marseilles in public session on November 1, 1934, adopted a resolution of protest "against the campaign of calumny carried on against the city on the subject of responsibility for the assassination on October 9," and gave M. Jouhannaud the Grand Medal of the City of Marseilles.

The Jour, a Paris newspaper, undertook an inquiry of its own and published its findings on November 6, 1934. It said that M. Jouhannaud and his assistants had organized a special guard of fourteen agents on motor cycles. This police detail was to encircle the royal automobile and accompany it on its progress through the streets of Marseilles. But at the last moment Commissioner Sisteron, chief of the bureau charged with the protection of distinguished visitors, which is part of the Sûreté Nationale, ordered the motor cycles to stay away. He never openly admitted this charge but he gave the press the following evasive declaration: "Conscious of my duties as a state official and respectful of my chiefs, I have kept silent, and I cannot but continue silent until a definite decision is taken in regard to me."

It is now an established fact of history that twenty years earlier Archduke Franz Ferdinand was allowed to go to Sarajevo, where, as Belgrade had warned Vienna, there were plots against his life, and was given no protection on arriving there. In view of the foregoing facts in the case of King Alexander's assassination, is it not natural to conclude that someone, or some group of persons, in Paris had decided or agreed that if there was anyone in Marseilles who wanted to kill him, those responsible for his safety would do nothing to prevent the murder?

Other questions occur. Whose instructions controlled Sisteron in his order against the motor-cycle guard? Who, if anyone, paid that person or those persons? Italy? Hungary? These two countries had a chance of benefiting from Alexander's death; for whatever may be said against him, he was a good soldier and the center of the great Yugoslav military machine, with which both of them might eventually have to contend in connection with their aspirations for territories now a part of Yugoslavia.

The Nazis? Alexander was traditionally pro-French, and it is possible that German influence is becoming stronger in Yugoslavia, and the Balkans generally, because he is no longer there.

In Yugoslavia, I am informed, the following rumor is circulated—obviously by the reactionary, anti-Soviet, pro-Nazi elements in Belgrade: Someone in high authority in France who was responsible for the King's safety permitted him to be killed at the instigation of the pro-Soviet political groups in France, which hated Alexander for his obstinate refusal to recognize Russia and cooperate with France in its pro-Soviet policy, which was directed against Hitler. This tale is the most fantastic of the lot.

Much more credible is the next rumor—to give just one more—namely, that freedom of action for the assassin was bought by the great international munitions interests. King Alexander came to France in the interest of peace. One of the chief purposes of his trip was to have France force or induce Mussolini to cease his wild imperialist propaganda against Yugoslavia. If successful, Alexander might have greatly lessened the fear of imminent war and, thereby, the orders for munitions. So, says the rumor, the munitions interests had him killed! And not a few people in Yugoslavia believe this.

Yugoslavia is a small country, but by reason of its geographical position and military strength not an unimportant one in the present European set-up. It certainly is not, even without the strong-armed, shrewd Alexander, a helpless vassal state. Then why did not Yugoslavia—why does not Yugoslavia—seek or demand the solution of the "mystery"? I don't know, but I can suggest an answer.

Immediately after the King-Dictator's death the government of Yugoslavia was in chaos. The blood on the bullet-pierced tunic was not yet dry when Alexander's former yes-men began to fight among themselves for power. Chief among these was his Foreign Minister, Yevtich, who came to France with him on that fatal journey and who immediately after the assassination announced "Preserve the Franco-Yugoslav friendship!" as the King's last words. These were printed as such in Belgrade and throughout the world that same day. But no sooner were the words flashed around the globe than Yevtich, deciding that another phrase might better serve his purposes, declared that what the dying King had really said was Chuvaite mi Yugoslaviyu! ("Guard Yugoslavia!"), and Yugoslavia was promptly plastered with this alleged saying. As a matter of fact, before the assassination, when the King could conceivably have said that to him, Yevtich was a good distance away from him. Alexander could not have said anything to him after he was shot, for he immediately lost consciousness and never regained it. But Yevtich made everybody in Yugoslavia more or less believe that the dying King had commissioned him personally to "guard Yugoslavia"; in other words, to continue the dictatorship as he had conducted it.

In short, the outstanding item on the first page of the history of the Belgrade government after the assassination is a lie. On the next page we find an attempt by Yevtich and his government to manufacture another lie. Yevtich wanted the League of Nations to condemn Hungary and Italy, but especially Hungary, as directly and solely responsible for the assassination and thus officially to establish that Yugoslavia's internal situation had had no part in influencing the assassin. Also, Yevtich was in the main pro-French, in close contact with the dominant reactionary elements in France, and therefore did not want to do or say anything which might embarrass France. He forbade the showing in Yugoslavia of the films which all but proved that someone in France responsible for the King's safety had let him be murdered. Yevtich's enemies have long since kicked him into oblivion, but the official Yugoslav position that he established continues.

It is quite certain that no one connected with the Belgrade government had anything even remotely to do with the assassination. And it is almost clear that France as a government was not responsible for it. After all, Barthou was the second most important member of the government at that time.

Does anyone in France, apart from those responsible for the "negligence" in Marseilles, know the truth? Possibly. But if there are such persons, they—in great probability—are not free to speak. The truth might implicate God knows whom, God knows what power or head of state, and strain still further the European situation.

Campaign Train

BY BARBARA WERTHEIM

HERE comes the boss now," said one of the newspapermen indifferently. It was dark on the station platform with only a few lights shining through the rain. Reporters and photographers who were going along on the campaign tour stood around in slickers, talking in small groups. The President climbed on board in silence. There were no greetings; no one said anything. Only a Secret Service man standing on the rear platform, every muscle alert, his head turning this way and that, his eyes darting over the groups of men below as if to ward off any hostility, gave one a sense of excitement.

Our first stop the next morning was Thomas, a little mining town in West Virginia. Because of the rain none of us knew whether the President would take the drive through the hills that had been planned. Dr. Ross McIntire, his physician, came out on the platform, looked worriedly at the sky, shook his head as he held out his hand to the rain, and went in again. "Old Doc Mac doesn't like it," said one of the reporters. "He gets worried sick if the President gets his feet wet." But Roosevelt came out anyway, and as he climbed into the open car shrill cheers broke from the hillside, where people from miles around had been waiting patiently in the rain to see the President. Their faces as we drove by were all slightly agape with a look of delighted wonder at being visited by the nation's number one celebrity.

We made five stops at mining towns, each one bigger and grimmer than the last. The crowds, too, grew in size and enthusiasm till we reached Fairmont, where there were over 15,000 massed in the station, the streets, on the bridge and house-tops. At one stop I shoved in among the crowd hoping to hear revealing comments, but all I heard was, "There he is! No, that ain't him. Sure that's him," which was no help in predicting how West Virginia's eight electoral votes would go. No distinguished guests were in our party, but just before each station we would make a short stop and several cigar-smoking, well-fed gentlemen in thick overcoats would climb on. These, in the words of the irreverent press, were the "local boll weevils"; they would then appear on the rear platform, smiling and graciously waving to the crowd, which was so proud to see its home-state leaders traveling with the President.

At these stops the newspapermen would rush back to hear the President express his joy at seeing smoke coming out of the chimneys again and tell about that telegram he had "just received" announcing the first year in fifty-five with no national-bank failures. As he finished, everyone would clamber back on board, disappear into separate compartments, and immediately fill the train with the sound of clicking typewriters. Nearing Pittsburgh we wondered why no release of the speech was forthcoming, the delay, some said, being to safeguard against a possible Landon spy wiring its contents on to Al Smith in New York. As a matter of fact, although there were many pro-Landon papers represented, there were very few pro-Landon journalists. One reporter told me that while 80 per cent of the newspaper owners are Republican, 80 per cent of the individual journalists are pro-Roosevelt. And there is the story of the still unpublished poll taken by the Herald Tribune of fifty editorial employees, which showed forty-four for the President. When one of the correspondents said he was going to stay on the train and listen to the Pittsburgh speech over the radio in order that the enthusiasm of the crowd might not color his story, I asked why he wanted to be so objective. "When you're a New Dealer writing for a Republican paper," he said, "you have to be as objective as hell."

Judging from the reception Pittsburgh gave to Roosevelt, Pennsylvania, which has been steadfastly Republican in every election since Lincoln, stands a good chance to go Democratic for the first time this November. Hardly listening to what the President said, the crowd cheered their heads off, blew whistles, and jangled cow-bells whenever he paused for breath. Once when he said, "And during the late war we piled up a national debt of 25 billions," the crowd answered, "Hooray!" And when Governor Earle gave his list of Pennsylvania bad men—the Mellons, Pew, Ware—the crowd delightedly roared back "Boo!" to each name, ending with the richest, fruitiest boo of all when the Governor, drawing out the final s into a long hiss, cried "the du Ponts!" As the band played the Star Spangled Banner at the end, and the President stood erect, his profile immobile and stern, he looked (consciously perhaps?) not unlike one of those heads of Washington carved out of a mountain. Just then an aide nudged him, and without looking down the President reached for his hat and folded it across his bosom in the proper gesture of patriotic reverence. An almost imperceptible move, but it made him once more a mortal. Everywhere we went, with his sumptuous voice and dominating presence, he was invariably the best speaker on the program.

In Jersey City the next morning the reporters' theme song, "Hey, Bill, what do you estimate the crowd?" was brought into full play as we drove through the incredible demonstration staged by Mayor Hague, who was making show of his loyalty to the man he called a "weakling" when he led the "Stop Roosevelt" movement in Chicago in 1932. As we crawled through the three miles of shrieking, flag-waving school children (half of Hague's turnout was below voting age), we were heckled with such remarks as "Aw, it's oney de press . . . say, ya got it pretty soft . . . gimme a lift, mister? . . . hey, mister, take my pitcha . . . ooh, lookit, a woman repawter, hi-ya, toots."

Back in New York no machine organization turned out the crowds which sprang up impromptu to cheer the President. Except on Park Avenue. There the sidewalks were no more crowded than usual, and the only heads peering out the windows were the servants'. It called to mind the story, which no one would swear was not apocryphal, of Knox in San Francisco. As he was driving through the streets, someone in the crowd yelled, "Hurrah for Roosevelt!" The cry was taken up and Knox began to get red in the face until a Republican committeewoman driving with him leaned over and said, "Never mind, Colonel, they're only working people."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AS USUALLY happens about this time in a Presidential campaign, I am receiving inquiries about how I, personally, am going to vote. It is quite usual, too, to meet people who say, "Well, there is a lot I don't like about Roosevelt and his Administration, but the all-important thing this year is to keep Landon out. Don't you think so?" That has a most familiar sound, for in every election there are multitudes who vote with an eye to the immediate peril and without attention to the longer vision. It is partly because of this that the two old corrupt and reactionary parties have held together as long as they have.

This year the appeal to reelect Roosevelt meets with much liberal response because there is no question that the sins of the Administration and its lamentable administrative failures are in considerable degree offset by the liberal orientation of the government as a whole. No one can deny that though there has been maddening abuse of the appointive power purely for spoils purposes, an exceptionally fine body of men has been drawn into the government service. No one can question the great service rendered to the country in committing it—if haltingly and inadequately—to the principles of social security and the right of every citizen to a job, and to a humane relief policy; no President hereafter will ever seek to do away with social insurance. Innumerable social workers and friends of labor are also ready to forgive the President for all his shortcomings out of gratitude to him for writing upon our statute books the principle of collective bargaining through representatives of labor's own choosing. Still other liberals will vote for the President because of their belief that the election of Landon would mean a step toward fascism.

These are all, save the last, sound arguments, with which I cannot quarrel if they satisfy those who advance them. But I feel that it is not true that the election of Landon would do more to advance fascism than would that of Roosevelt. If Roosevelt is elected and continues his reforms, the embattled masters of capital will be much more ready to undermine our institutions than if they find a fairly obedient servant in Mr. Landon. Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt's rapid militarization of the country has created just the weapon for fascists to use if they should come to power. Look at Spain and cry, Absit omen! The power of the army and navy lobby in Washington can hardly be exaggerated. Again, Mr. Roosevelt's challenging of big business and then seeking to compromise with it and to woo it to his standard has weakened his position. As Ernest Lindley has pointed out in his "Half Way with Roosevelt," the President erred completely in not realizing that he must break with the great capitalists entirely if he would achieve his program, that no compromise with them was possible. The very title of Mr. Lindley's book is the most damaging indictment of the Roosevelt regime—it has been "halfway" at all times. But to this my inquisitors will reply: "Better halfway than none of the way."

If we look beyond this election, what hope is there that the Democratic Party will continue liberal and progressive after Mr. Roosevelt retires? I will insult no one's intelligence by commenting on the foolish rumors spread by crazy men and women that the President will proclaim martial law and call off this year's elections, or that he will demand a third term in 1940. I left the Democratic Party years ago because it was obvious that there could be no hope of its becoming a genuine reform party when it was composed in part of the reactionary Southern politicians, in part of the corrupt Northern municipal machines. If Roosevelt's successor should prove a real and not a halfway reformer, we should see the party disintegrate rapidly.

While I admit that the decision is not an easy one, I shall not cast my vote for Mr. Roosevelt, much as I personally like him and grateful as I am for the orientation of his Administration. My reason is not merely my distrust of the party behind him or my feeling that it is absolutely necessary to encourage a third-party movement. I could not conscientiously vote for an Administration which has so militarized the country and given us for military and naval purposes a budget for this fiscal year of about $1,200,000,000. I agree with Secretary Hull that war is "a cruel mill," whose grist is "death to youth, death to hope, death to civilization." Each one of us has his paramount issue. Mine is this question of war and peace and the saving of civilization. I feel that Mr. Roosevelt, unwittingly, if you please, despite his great peace speech at Chautauqua, has set us on the road to war and to the "death of civilization." As I thus feel, so must I vote. If I am charged with thereby helping to instal reaction in Washington, I can only cite once more my most threadbare but my dearest quotation. It was Wendell Phillips who said that he stood at all costs for human liberty and left the working out of the details to "Almighty God."

So I shall vote for Norman Thomas. Not as a member of the Socialist Party, for that I have never been, but because I think Norman Thomas the most civilized and the most enlightened of the candidates, and the soundest on the issue that concerns me most. Of course if anybody should put a pistol to my head and bid me choose between Landon and Roosevelt, I should vote for the President without a second's hesitation.

AL SMITH'S Carnegie Hall speech was a shocking performance. It was really worse than the Liberty League address. In that, at least, there was the pretense of certain idealistic concepts. But at Carnegie Hall Al reduced the whole problem of his political position to a sort of accountant's game as to whether he had done more for Roosevelt or Roosevelt more for him.

I don't know whether the quality of arrogance has grown on Al in recent years. It was not so palpable in the past. But in those days Smith actually was engaged in pursuits in which his real talents had some sway. To face present facts fairly, it must be admitted that Governor Smith has made no significant contribution to his community for a good many years.

He put a vast amount of emotion into his campaign for the Presidency in 1928. Of course the result was a disappointment; worse than that, the loss of the Southern states was a personal humiliation. Smith has never recovered his poise. But in lashing out he gives most of his blows to people who befriended him. For instance, there was the extraordinary situation in regard to the Carnegie Hall speech that Alfred M. Landon and Herbert Hoover sat side by side and listened to it over the radio. Governor Landon made a public statement thanking Smith for his services. Herbert Hoover allowed his gratitude to go without words. Perhaps he felt that it was still a little soon to thumb over the wounds of 1928.

Smith's speech had a very small amount of deeply reasoned political or economic theory. It was more largely a discussion of underlying personal-motivation stuff, a little as if Louis Sobol were to write an article entitled Why I Am Not Speaking to Walter Winchell. It was, indeed, as petty and as personal as that. It seems to me that the entire Al Smith address could be summed up in the following two paragraphs from Carnegie Hall:

Then, of course, there was suggested also that I was a little bit disturbed because I wasn't offered a position in the Cabinet. Well, that is silly. That is about as silly as anything could be. Why, as a matter of fact, I couldn't afford to take a position in the Cabinet. I couldn't live in Washington and give all my time at the salary that a Cabinet office pays, but there is one thing that I could have done, and one thing that I always was ready to do, and would not have hindered a moment of my business time. I was always ready to give advice, but I was never asked for it.

The fact of the matter is, I only saw the President once since the day he was inaugurated. He asked me two questions. He asked me what I thought of the appointment of Jimmy Hoey. I told him I thought it was a good appointment, that Mr. Hoey was a friend of mine and he is an upstanding citizen. Then he inquired for the grandchildren, and of course I told him they were wonderful.

The beginning of the break between Roosevelt and

Smith occurred before Mr. Roosevelt went into the White House. They say in Albany that Al was more or less prepared to take over and run Roosevelt's first administration as Governor. Smith undoubtedly felt that Roosevelt was his own personal protege, and while he had a fondness for him this was mixed with a slight measure of contempt. He didn't think the Harvard boy really had very much on the ball.

For his soul's salvation Roosevelt had to thrust Smith aside even if he took poorer counsel or none at all. The whole relationship had been one in which Roosevelt would have been compelled to remain in the role of pupil. It can hardly be denied that Al Smith's advice on New York State affairs would have been highly competent. But that doesn't necessarily go for federal matters. And in any case it was Roosevelt's administration and up to him to take the responsibility and the rap.

Al is merely clowning when he seeks credence for the belief that President Roosevelt surrounded himself with dim and obscure persons. Governor Smith in his Carnegie Hall address asked rhetorically: "Who is Ickes? Who is Wallace? Who is Hopkins, and, in the name of all that is good and holy, who is Tugwell and where did he blow from?"

The paper records that this sally brought applause and laughter. Those are not difficult commodities to command in a political audience. Still Smith had to stoop pretty far to play for his laugh. Ickes has been a familiar figure in progressive politics for a number of years; his name was not unknown to Al Smith. It is possible that at the time of his appointment Governor Smith had never heard of Henry Wallace. But that would argue a parochial quality on the part of Smith. After all, Wallace's father was a Republican Cabinet member and the present Secretary of Agriculture is probably one of the best-known men who have ever held that post.

It was Al Smith's proud boast when Governor of New York that he was wholly familiar with the educational set-up of the community. In that event Rexford Guy Tugwell should not have been an altogether outlandish name. A considerable amount of publicity beats upon Columbia University, and when one of its best-known professors is snatched away for the public service it can hardly be held that the country's Chief Executive is drawing the rabbits out of a hat.

The final flourish in Al's Carnegie Hall address comes at the very end when he says, "I firmly believe that the remedy for all the ills that we are suffering from today is the election of Alf M. Landon."

In saying this Al is practically saying that Hoover had the right idea in 1928. And so in taking a walk Governor Smith has completed a full circle; not only has he left the camp of his friends but he has fallen right into the citadel of his enemies.

The Season in Snow

BY MARYA ZATURENSKA

See how the declining year disrobes itself of light,
The green, the ruddy gold, the sunny blue
To the fixed seasons true:
The rose fades from the hour, dissolves in cloudy white,
White, white the beautiful hour, silent and white
Immure our lives to changing atmosphere.
The cold descends like brightness from the air,
Fair, rare the aging year grows, white and fair
With the stripped garlands on her changing hair.

Let us sing Winter, the fair, unbeloved:
Only the fastidious mind is finally moved
To love her naked, bleak, and delicate line
When time's fixed touch is careful to refine
The chill and difficult world where loveliness
Divests herself of her rose-bordered dress,

And waits on memory, sees closed rivers sleep,
Follows the frozen clouds' authentic fleece
With large, doomed eyes of peace,
And sees the cool, bright-plumaged wings of the snow
And men with muffled footsteps walking slow.

The Career of Brandeis

BRANDEIS. THE PERSONAL HISTORY OF AN AMERICAN IDEAL. By Alfred Lief. Stackpole Sons, New York and Harrisburg. $3.

MR. LIEF has done a serious and searching study of Justice Brandeis's career, apropos probably of his subject's fast-approaching eightieth birthday (November 13). That Mr. Lief writes con amore, with prejudice in favor of his subject, is evident. Yet it is also true that he has presented the other side of the unending controversies in which the Justice played a part until he went on the Supreme Court. He has given to the fight against Mr. Brandeis's confirmation as Justice no less than fifty-one pages, two chapters, and has scrupulously repeated the arguments against the confirmation, not omitting the assaults upon Mr. Brandeis's personal character and the allegation that he had betrayed former clients. Mr. Lief seeks to emulate Mr. Brandeis's kindness toward his opponents by the respect with which he treats those who attacked his hero, even when they were obviously in the wrong. The book is long and not always easy reading, perhaps because of the necessity of compressing so much into even this space, and at times because of a rather staccato style.

But the record is of an amazingly full and useful life, and no future student of Brandeis and his times can possibly overlook it. Others may draw a clearer personal portrait of Mr. Brandeis than is given us by Mr. Lief, who has plainly preferred to let the Justice stand out through his actions and his words; others will doubtless characterize and evaluate the Justice with bolder and more penetrating strokes of the pen. It will be difficult, however, for anyone to give us a better understanding of the extraordinary extent of Justice Brandeis's activities and influence upon our national life. Whether anyone will ever be able to picture his career in all its ramifications and estimate the extent of his contribution to the national welfare is questionable. Mr. Lief is entitled to gratitude for treating the Justice as what he is—a great American rather than a great Jew.

Certainly this is a career, whatever its faults, to hearten all who believe in democratic processes. Brandeis fought his own way upward by sheer ability, though not in the face of great obstacles, for he made a multitude of friends as well as enemies wherever he went and labored. He was able to avoid most of the pitfalls which confront the successful lawyer because from the beginning he set apart some of his time for unpaid public service, and because he was soon able to choose what clients he would accept. As he accumulated means he gave more time to public service for the city, the state, and the nation. He fought the public utilities, beat the proposed merger between the Boston and Maine and New Haven railroads, rendered invaluable service to organized labor, and gave his support to every worthy reform movement. He created the savings-bank insurance system in Massachusetts, which has grown so steadily and soundly, but has unfortunately not spread over the whole country—he considers this, Mr. Lief says, his "greatest achievement." He fought President Taft in the Ballinger case, and although the President decided against the Brandeis contentions he decided wrongly, and his political fate was sealed by this blunder—in conjunction with others and the tariff bill he made into a law. By 1910 Brandeis was a national figure and a leader in the fight against the trusts.

Finally, Mr. Lief admirably reviews Mr. Brandeis's triumph in the pioneering Oregon minimum-wage case and his career on the Supreme Court, and leaves him with us as a mellow octogenarian, with unshaken faith in humanity and in the ability of Homo Americanus to master his problems without resorting to dictatorship and destroying personal liberty. Visitors might come to his home utterly disheartened by the world outside. They found—and find—him cheerful, serene, philosophical, with spirit undaunted.

Crusading for Co-op

CO-OP: A NOVEL OF LIVING TOGETHER. By Upton Sinclair. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN ONLY one respect, the concreteness of its social program, does "Co-op" differ from the bulk of Upton Sinclair's earlier work. Though Sinclair has always regarded fiction as a medium of political persuasion, it was to the ideals of social justice rather than to any one panacea that he dedicated his novels. Now, however, that he has become an advocate of EPIC, he has written a novel about the benefits of cooperative societies. His new book shows the familiar indignation at the system of exploitation, but the course of every event and every character is detoured into the history of a cooperative in California. Bankers, hobos, Communists, rebellious children of good family—there are eighty-five characters—are all sucked into the orbit of this brotherhood, where they learn that by pooling their labor and their resources they can obtain their necessities through a simple system of barter. In this way relief is made unnecessary, and the unemployed can be put to work without competing against private industry.

The story demonstrates the method of building a cooperative, from its humble origin in the dream of Charlie Day, resident of a California Hooverville, to a flourishing establishment of several thousand members. There are disheartening difficulties, of course, such as red-baiting, the hostility of business men, and sabotage by government agencies. But, under the leadership of Day and Sig Soren, "ex-sailor, ex-convict, and builder of humanity," and with the help of Mabel Saugus, a Socialist who has inherited an income, the co-operative wins the confidence of some local bankers and of a good part of the community. Nevertheless, it appears that the experiment is doomed to failure unless it is able to produce enough to supply its needs, and for this a large grant of money from the government must be obtained. With this query—will Roosevelt subsidize cooperatives in America?—the book ends, and Sinclair leaves his co-op to the mercy of history. By its own industry and with the aid of rich men of good-will, the Self-Help Exchange (as it is called in this novel) was able to thrive. But once it ran up against the basic economy of the country, its destiny passed out of its own hands.

Under such creative restrictions as its political thesis imposes, one could hardly expect "Co-op" to have a more fluid and more complex humanity. The narrative unfolds with the velocity and fervor of a crusade, and though the characters have the engaging seriousness of people passionately devoted to a cause, they lack emotional integration. If "Co-op" adds little to the world of fiction, it displays, nevertheless, Upton Sinclair's unabated powers as a propagandist.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

With Apologies to the Bear

MAINLAND. By Gilbert Seldes. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

TO review this book as angrily, as noisily, and as unfairly as it is written would surely profit nobody. It is necessary, however, to say that it is not useful social criticism and that, as journalism, it is diffuse, verbose, and more irritating than provocative.

Like the bear, Mr. Seldes went over the mountain to see what he could see. What'd he see? The other side of the mountain . . . was all the bear could see. The book contains occasional passages of accurate and intelligent perception, not, however, particularly novel. For the most part it is an astonishingly naive, pseudo-patriotic, tub-thumping appeal to the American middle class. In his glib survey of history, economics, and the arts Mr. Seldes sees many things that aren't there, overlooks a number of fundamental problems that have occupied more serious students, misrepresents by quotations taken out of context a score or so of his contemporaries, and concludes with the following triumphantly proclaimed News from Nowhere: That America is not Europe, and that even Marx didn't think it was. That neither American capitalism nor American political democracy is quite done for. That American capitalism can be "saved" for a while without resorting to fascism; that possibly it can be somewhat liberalized by loosening the grip of finance capital on the forces of production—the Ford idea—and by protecting civil liberties.

As Mr. Seldes may have heard, the current effort to establish a Farmer-Labor Party proceeds on similar assumptions, and revolutionaries of all kinds are going along with this effort as a practical means of serving the masses. The expectation of radicals is that in this process the workers, farmers, and a section of the middle class will be educated through victory and defeat; that a mass basis will be matured for the ultimate revolutionary struggle which, they think, the unfolding of successive capitalist crises is bound to precipitate. (Mr. Seldes, incidentally, admits that if American capitalism fails to parallel Russia's rising production line, that will clinch the argument for communism.) Mr. Seldes is equally trite when he proclaims that a workers' dictatorship involves serious and costly suppressions of individual liberties, and that any dictatorship, including the workers' state established in Russia, has a definite tendency to perpetuate itself, and to develop internal class divisions, instead of "withering away" into the classless society.

In his initial "Countercharge" of 176 rather hysterical pages Mr. Seldes denounces the "treason of the intellectuals," including Dreiser, Van Wyck Brooks, Glenway Wescott, and others. These persons will save themselves needless annoyance by skipping this section, which Mr. Seldes summarizes as follows:

That the intellectual attack upon America has been ill-natured or ignorant or both; that the literary belittling of America has carried forward a propaganda for the destruction of the American political system and the abasement of the American standard of living; that the intellectuals have made no effort to understand the variety and excellence of life in America; and that their constant attack has left America helpless before the impact of hostile European systems.

Does Mr. Seldes speak as an intellectual? Yes and no. Presumably, Mr. Seldes turned in his card in that union when, after covering the intellectual front for the old Dial, he turned to intellectual-spoofing in the columns of the Saturday Evening Post. There, as in the present book, he has done much to soothe the hurt feelings occasioned by the alleged failure of intellectuals to establish "the moral grandeur of the pioneer, the nobility of the business man, the fine enraptured cultivation of his wife, or even the average decency of the American people." But Mr. Seldes's value to Mr. Lorimer and his prestige in the eyes of the middle-class readers of "Mainland" derive from his standing as an "intellectual" of some sort. And unquestionably Mr. Seldes regards himself as a member of the elite—in fact, on page 274 he says as much. Having read Nietzsche, he says, "I am not aware of a sense of brotherhood with every other human being. It is, in fact, because all men are not my brothers, that I would prefer to live in a society which treated them honorably and decently." A class society, in other words; Mr. Seldes makes this abundantly clear by quoting Hamlet's injunction to Polonius to treat the players, not after their desert, but "after your own honor and dignity," a passage in which the feudal philosophy of life is admirably epitomized.

I can only remark that I have met truck drivers and tailors who, without benefit of Nietzsche, would feel toward Mr. Seldes precisely as he feels toward them. That honor, dignity, and even a certain pride and condescension might reside in any other class is an idea that the middle-class mind finds hard to grasp.

Mr. Seldes is very middle class, quite sincere, and intellectually much sloppier than most of the intellectuals whom he attacks. I don't think he meant deliberately to misquote Anatole France or to misrepresent the "Communist Manifesto" in his footnote on page 129; he just couldn't get it through his head—that, and a good many other things.

Tactics for Consumers

THE DECLINE AND RISE OF THE CONSUMER. By Horace M. Kallen. D: Appleton-Century Company. $2.75.

IN THE epilogue to his book Dr. Kallen remarks that "forecasts should be left to weather men, statisticians, and fortune-tellers." Being a philosopher, Dr. Kallen should therefore have been content to deny himself the pleasure of gazing into the crystal ball. Unfortunately he was not, and his final chapter, in which he lyrically describes the good life in a cooperative world, is a dead give-away of some of the essential weaknesses of this economic pattern and of the willingness of even one of its more objective expounders to delude himself. According to Dr. Kallen's prophesy, another World War (which will start in 1942) will be required before the international cooperative state can be established. The carefully analyzed history of the cooperative movement which Dr. Kallen presents, its rise during times of depression, its decline when the business cycle turns upward, confirms the view that a world-wide cataclysm may be necessary to give cooperation its great chance. But today, only six years before the date set for the concerted attack by Japan and Germany on Soviet Russia, consumers are unorganized either in or outside cooperatives. How they will achieve the necessary strength to defeat fascism and communism Dr. Kallen does not adequately explain. In any event, workers of the world, or in the cliché of cooperation, consumers, arise! The pattern for the cooperative Utopia follows closely the one laid down by Edward Bellamy in "Looking Backwards." Add the words "consumer" and "cooperation" to the Bellamy plan, and you have Dr. Kallen's. In other words, Dr. Kallen has taken the idealist's Utopia and made of it a reality through the magic of consumer cooperation. This is the kind of wishful thinking that makes so many cooperators unable properly to evaluate the movement.

The book itself is a valuable addition to consumer literature. Besides a complete description of cooperatives both in the United States and abroad, we have here social and economic history interpreted in terms of the consumer. In scope and in treatment Dr. Kallen's study is impressive. But his exaggeration of the potentialities of the cooperative movement is apt to alienate those who cannot accept it as the sole panacea for all the world's ills.

RUTH BRINDZE

Natives of the Delta

GREEN MARGINS. By E. P. O'Donnell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

MR. O'DONNELL'S Houghton Mifflin Fellowship prize novel refreshes one's dwindling faith in literary prizes. "Green Margins" introduces a new writer of unquestionable competence whose talent has not been worn thin by repetition. He is a fluent narrator and an unusually vivid observer of a submerged section of American life.

The scene of the novel is the Mississippi Delta country, about ninety miles down the river from New Orleans. The warm abundance of this alluvial region is reflected in the richness and variety of its inhabitants. Here the Cajuns, descendants of French Acadian wanderers, mix with Slavs, Negroes, Italians, and Filipinos to form a population as bewildering and colorful as the tropical vegetation by which it is nourished. The wealth of this land, its abundant plant and animal life, is restored to fulness and splendor in Mr. O'Donnell's imagistic prose. The novelist's most impressive achievement consists in his sure control of this riotous beauty.

If Mr. O'Donnell's characters are not quite so effectively portrayed as their environment, it is not because he lacks either sensitivity or ambition. He is too receptive to the multiplicity of moods in an undisciplined personality, and this results at once in a tendency to over-explore the possibilities of temperament and in a failure of definition. The vagaries of Sister Kalavich, the central character of the story, are traced in all their intricate ramifications; she is as wilful and unsubdued as a tropical storm, as defiant as the river on whose green margins she lives; but she remains indistinct, after 500 pages, because the novelist cannot detach himself from her inability to understand herself. She is a remarkable creature, this young rebel against church, home, and convention. Her first child, a defiant gesture of freedom, never knew its father because Sister loathed his tameness and escaped his plea to make things right by marrying her. Much of this unmoral spirit, so different from the prudery of her father Tony and the lazy indifference of her brother Mocco, she had inherited from Grampaw, who lived across the river with his dreams of organizing an association of fishermen to fight the exploiters from the city. When she went to live with Grampaw, Sister discovered a new world. She learned to read Voltaire and to assert her "queerness," which had become traditional among the folk, as a human right. For a brief interlude Sister was softened by the New Orleans manners of Loretta Dobrovich, only to rediscover her hatred of conventional forms. Nor was the influence of René Davidson, the painter, who was forgetting Paris on the Delta, final. All the years of loneliness and change were a preparation for a return to Mitch Holt, native of the Delta, powerful and untamable like herself.

But the characters are interesting for what they do, instinctively and inarticulately, rather than for what they think, in their confused introspective moments. When Mitch wrestles alligators or smuggles skins or seduces women he is most alive; when Sister weaves fishing nets or struggles with the fields she seems more real than when she speculates about the meaning of destiny. Mr. O'Donnell is at his best when describing nature and physical action; when he attempts to look through the Delta people, his story follows conventional fictional patterns.

A Philosophy of Politics

POLITICS, WHO GETS WHAT, WHEN, HOW. By Harold D. Lasswell. Whittlesey House. $2.50.

THIS new book offers to uninitiated readers an opportunity to become acquainted with the orientations and formulas that Harold Lasswell has been elaborating for several years. Lasswell's aim is to substitute for liberal-moralistic and Marxist-deterministic criteria of scientific analysis some more comprehensive and elastic intellectual patterns. These patterns are not meant to exert any formative influence on political reality; neither are they devised for the exclusive sake of knowledge. They are tentative organs of orientation, ingenious feelers that may warn those who know how to use them of the trend of political events, so that places of hiding or means of personal adjustment may be accordingly designed. Lasswell tries to integrate and to mellow the Marxist conception of class interests with psychological criteria that proceed from the assumption that man is determined in his actions by his individual personality, his peculiar attitudes, and his specific skill. What men are seeking for, he maintains, is a place as high as possible in the hierarchy of deference, income, and safety. Those who get the most of these values are the elite.

Have you heard a Victor Record Lately?

This is what the perfection of Victor Higher Fidelity Recording has done for you: When you listen to Victor Records, the musicians come to life exactly as you hear them at an actual concert! For the first time, every sound of the music is heard when it's reproduced by a Victor Higher Fidelity Phonograph from Victor Higher Fidelity Records.

How wonderful it would have been for us if there had been Victor Higher Fidelity Recordings in the days of Liszt and Jenny Lind! Equally priceless, though, are the living records we can own and preserve of the music of Toscanini, Stokowski, Heifetz, Rachmaninoff, Tibbett, and all the musical titans of our day.

Why don't you stop in at your Victor dealer's soon, to hear a Victor concert?

Is YOUR HOUSE Also a Museum Specimen?

NOT from the outside, perhaps—but what of the inside? You would not drive a 1920 automobile; it would be obsolete and inadequate for modern service. Houses become obsolete, too. Your house, if it is more than 15 years old, is probably almost as inconvenient inside, compared with "New American" standards, as this outmoded museum specimen.

Now, in 1936, your family should be living in a truly modern, a "New American," home. Scientific planning of rooms saves steps and lightens housework. Electric servants work for better health and greater comfort for the whole family. "New American" living costs are even lower than in your present home. This is not a dream house, but a home you can own—one to be proud of. General Electric, by fostering the "New American" demonstration homes, opens the door to new living comforts for you.

"New American" is not an architectural style—it is a new conception of living. For information on how to obtain "New American" comfort, convenience, and economy—in your present home or in a new house—write to the General Electric Home Bureau, 570 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Politics is the art of getting the most; the study of politics is the analysis of how the most is got.

Obviously this position, stimulating as it is, calls for many objections. Politics, as Lasswell understands it, embraces in itself the activity of the social and economic, as well as of the strictly political, elite. The problem is complicated by the approaches that the author suggests, and the book is merely the outline of a possible science. As long as the project remains in blueprints, Lasswell is the best qualified to take care of it, but when the definite treatise comes to be written, the chapter on violence will have to be intrusted to a strategist, the chapter on goods to an economist, and so on.

The author is at home when he is studying personality; he is a first-rate psychologist who for some strange reason wraps his insight in psychoanalytical elusiveness. Unfortunately, he forgets that the science of politics must consider not only those who get, but those who lose; unless its function is merely the conscientious and systematic bookkeeping of what somebody gets, with a small percentage for registration fees.

In the portion of his book concerned with problems of our day, Lasswell advances some remarkable ideas about the revolutions running through the world and their possible arrival on these shores. All modern revolutions, he hints, including the Russian, represent the emergence of the small middle class, or, as he calls it, the middle-income skill groups. Increasing groups of intellectuals mix with workers trained in every kind of skill, including propaganda and violence. The revolution of the proletarians, if it will come at all, is still far away. The emergence of the middle-income skill groups will most probably occur in this country too, Lasswell assumes. Possibly, he thinks, without violent upheavals.

It would be unfair to press Lasswell with more questions, asking him whether he is for or against this trend, and which of the various possible outcomes he prefers. Since the coming of the two great modern revolutions, the traditional mild liberalism of some outstanding American social scientists has been constantly moving toward a clever non-committalism. I do not think that this non-committalism is equivalent to opportunism. It is perhaps the suspense and the twisting upon itself of social science in an era which, as Lasswell repeats on almost every page, is one of complete insecurity. And I am even less inclined to think of opportunism when I consider how irritating this attitude is to all those who take extreme sides in politics. Lasswell is too intelligent not to know that if fascism ever came to this country, he would quickly find himself in a concentration camp.

MAX ASCOLI

DRAMA

Mauvais Quart d'Heure

THEATRICAL entrepreneurs commonly assume—probably with some justification—that the higher centers of the brain do not begin to function until after October 1. Apparently, however, the nerves can be counted on to respond a little before that date, and certainly the two new English shockers, "Night Must Fall" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) and "Love from a Stranger" (Fulton), are at least better in their own way than any other play of the season has been in its. Both come here after highly successful runs in London, and both can be guaranteed to give even the sophisticated spectator at least a mauvais quart d'heure. The last phrase, incidentally, is used advisedly, since both—especially the second—are a bit slow for two acts and depend upon the agony of the last fifteen or twenty minutes to satisfy their audiences.

As all crime fanciers know, the mode of the moment is for either the highly intellectual puzzle or the study in abnormal psychology. Neither of the present plays goes in for deduction, and so both concern themselves with killers who kill in a state of high ecstasy and who explain to the audience just what the subtler pleasures of murder are. You may take your choice between an ingratiating bell boy, beloved by old ladies, who cuts off heads because it gives him the feeling that he is somebody after all, and a be-tweeded, pipe-smoking Canadian who marries girls with money, partly because it is a well-paying business, partly because there is nothing which gives one so delightful a sense of power as to realize that what one holds in one's arms was a woman a moment ago but is now only a thing. At the same time you will be choosing between a last act in which an old lady—so extremely disagreeable that you don't mind—is smothered in her wheel chair and a last act in which a wife, suddenly realizing for the first time that her husband is a notorious sadist, an account of whose exploits she has just been compelled to read aloud to him, holds him off with a series of cock-and-bull stories until the rescuers get there. "Night Must Fall" is the first, "Love from a Stranger" the second, and I must confess that at both I enjoyed the ambivalent pleasure of being scared out of my wits.

It is a well-known fact that English thrillers are a bit less hectic and also a bit less irresponsible than the American ones, rarely going in for trapdoors, clutching hands, or other such fripperies. As a matter of fact, both of the present pieces play for the opposite effect by arranging that all the attendant circumstances, as well as the central characters themselves, shall seem on the surface as stodgily commonplace as possible; and if the result is to make the first half of each seem a bit plodding, one gets the compensating advantage of really knowing at the end what it was all about. Emlyn Williams, well-remembered here for his hair-raising performance of a few years ago in "Criminal at Large," is the boyish villain of "Night Must Fall," and Frank Vosper, another popular English actor, is the bluff, good-fellow murderer in the second. If I had to choose between the two plays I should probably find the balance tipped in favor of the first by the presence of the suppressed girl who loves the bell boy even after she has discovered his little weakness. Others, perhaps, would prefer the sinister mystery of the peroxide bottles in the second.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Federal Theater's "Project No. 891" notes with some unction that "Horse Eats Hat" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) is a twentieth-century adaptation of an old Labiche farce which, apparently, was concerned with the efforts of a determined young simpleton to replace the macerated hat of a lady of quality. Edwin Denby and Orson Welles are responsible for the text and clearly prefer Labiche's livestock and millinery to his comedy; but they come bearing gifts of their own. The notion of translating the old French play into surrealist slapstick might have proved amusing had Mr. Welles not elected to submerge it in costume and décor and to stifle the musical score in an obliterating hubbub. A small army of masqueraders are suffered to pursue one another in and out of doorways; fountains are turned loose; props are sent crashing; chairs collapse; and farce flies in all directions, as broad as it is long (five acts, a prologue, and an intermission devoted, among other things, to antiphonal responses between a circus cornettist and a nickelodeon). In the end the deliberate use of bathos and disorder is no less tiresome for being deliberate, though the venture as a whole is not without flashes of lively spontaneous fancy.

Unfortunately "Bright Honor" puts in its appearance at the Forty-eighth Street Theater a week after Mr. Viertel's "So Proudly We Hail." It carries forward the same problem with a restraint and skill that cancel the Cromwell vehicle on every score except that of violence. It is to be regretted, however, that Charles Powers, who plays the recalcitrant cadet, is unable to achieve the authority of Richard Cromwell in a role that should, by all rights, require considerably less of the actor.

Fun in Flanders

A NEW theater has been opened in New York with the design of proving to interested persons that the studios of Europe are once more, after several years of faltering and eclipse, a challenge to Hollywood. The inaugural program of this theater, named rather unpleasantly the Filmarte, offers "a haven from all that is philistinism in the movie-at-large" and "a rendezvous for the cinema devotee to whom films are something more than an innocuous diversion." The Battle of the Films, with all of Europe on one side and all of Hollywood on the other, is to my mind something of a bore; but this does not prevent my being glad that the facilities for seeing foreign films have been increased, and it certainly does not discourage me from saying that the Filmarte's first picture, "La Kermesse Héroïque," is one of the most diverting I have ever watched, innocuous or noxious as the case may be.

It comes with a grand prize from France, and its director, Jacques Feyder, may well be the successor to René Clair for whom we have been looking. The scene is a Flemish village and the date is 1616; and the theme, while generally reminiscent of "Lysistrata," is better stated in the immortal sentence of Henry Fielding concerning Letitia Snap, who would have been ravished by Mr. Fireblood "if she had not, by a timely compliance, prevented him." While the trembling burghers of Boom are busy with a foolish piece of strategy against the approaching soldiers of Philip II, their women prepare to meet the Spaniards considerably more than halfway—with wine at the gates and with a key to the village which unlocks everything from the Town Hall down to the smallest bedroom there is. The result is peaceful and blissful occupation for a night, with the troops moving off the next morning wreathed in flowers and smiles, and with the burghers blindly congratulating themselves upon the success of their strategy. The film as a whole is deliciously high-spirited, and its many details are directed with fine care toward a comic end which leaves everything in Boom exactly as it was before, only more so. The acting of Françoise Rosay as the mayor's wife is alone worth going miles to see. But perhaps it is more to the point to speak of the way the entire cast wears its clothes. I have seldom seen a more convincing costume piece, and the reason seems to be that nobody is aware that he has stepped out of a seventeenth-century Low Country painting; or if he is, then the fact amuses him somewhat as Hals's people are amused—if that is what they are laughing at—by their ridiculous rig. The clothes are worn, in other words, both naturally and with art.

And thus "La Kermesse Héroïque" becomes a satire no less upon the stilted costume picture than upon the male vanity which is ostensibly its target. It becomes in addition, because it is good comedy, a commentary upon all of life which experience permits us to know. But if nothing else it will be remembered by those who see it as an extraordinarily finished film.

It was preceded on the program by a brief and simple but very moving piece, "Millions of Us," in which a young unemployed American worker learns the importance of being a picket instead of a scab.

The authenticity of the costumes in "Romeo and Juliet" (Astor) has been much advertised, along with the care bestowed by every responsible person upon such things as the scenery and the architecture. The success of the film—for it is successful as "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was not—can better be attributed, however, to Shakespeare and to Norma Shearer. Leslie Howard's Romeo is at best an understatement; at its worst he is lost in the mazes of a too veritable Verona, whose streets swallow him up and whose palace gardens are so extensive that as he walks away from Juliet's balcony the poetry he has been speaking dissipates among a maze of marble columns. Mr. Howard is intelligent and pathetic rather than tragic, and so for that matter does Miss Shearer incline to be; yet her tenderness is honored throughout by a certain simplicity of background, and its own purity gives it a special kind of power. The lines of the play are in general well spoken. But many of them are missing, and some to no advantage. The clowning in the first scene would be better with more words, and the tendency everywhere to isolate significant couplets gives them an unnaturalness which they do not have in their context. Nevertheless "Romeo and Juliet" is one of the two or three best current films, and for my part I am eager for more from the same author.

ART

Toward an American Art

ONE comes away from the exhibition now being held at the Museum of Modern Art by the Federal Art Project with a feeling that the depression of 1929-? may prove to have been the best thing that ever happened to American art. The government relief projects—the PWAP and the Artists' Project which has succeeded it—have not made the artist rich, but they have kept him alive and given him what he sorely lacked—opportunity. He used to be poor and discouraged. Now he is poor and encouraged. And that is a profound change in his condition. Moreover, the Artists' Project is giving opportunity not merely to the artists in a few large centers but to artists all over the country. Let any doubter attend this exhibition. And strident critics of governmental extravagance in relief may very well calm down long enough to ponder this passage from the introduction to the catalogue, written by Holger Cahill, director of the project:

A far wider demand for works of art has developed on the part of schools, libraries, and other public institutions than the Federal Art Project, with its large body of workers, has been able to meet. "Our schools are bare." "We have no art of any kind in our community." Appeals containing statements of this kind are constantly being received by the directors of state and regional

CREATING A NEW SOCIAL ORDER

In 1921 the new government in Mexico began one of the most dramatic and significant social experiments ever undertaken on a national scale: the education of its people. The enormous task of welding a population of diverse and mixed racial strains, largely illiterate, into a nation of enlightened citizens capable of governing themselves called for more than ordinary pedagogy. The story of this profound national awakening: the technique adopted, the problems met, the training of teachers and the building of a plant on a national scale, are studied in this sympathetic volume by an American educator working under a grant from the Julius Rosenwald Fund. In so doing, he presents the historical and cultural back-projects. . . . An attempt to bridge the gap between the American artist and the American public has governed the entire program of the Federal Art Project.

This exhibition has been well chosen and arranged to give the visitor a sort of bird's-eye view of the project's activities. There are sketches for mural decorations and sections of finished work, supplemented with occasional whole decorative schemes in miniature. There are many paintings and water colors, lithographs, woodcuts, etchings, and drawings—and even an interesting sand-picture by a Colorado Indian artist. There are posters and photographs. The valuable Index of American Design is represented in selections which give a comprehensive idea of both the remarkable regional variety in the early American industrial arts and the careful workmanship which has gone into the making of the graphic record. There is a small but creditable showing of sculpture, outstanding in which are the wood carvings of Patrocino Barela, inspired by the Catholic-Indian tradition of New Mexico. And last, but by no means least in interest, is the truly remarkable work which is being done by children under the project's teachers, work full of imagination, humor conscious or unconscious—as in a ten-year-old's idea of a cutie ready for parade—and a lively feeling for color and design. One sculpture here merits special mention—fifteen-year-old Mike Mosco's head of a miner.

Among the easel pictures one meets names of artists who need no introduction to the public. Indeed, this exhibition could no doubt have been made up from the works of artists not only well known but deservedly so; and it is to the credit of the director and his assistants that it is not. Instead of yielding to the temptation to make the best possible showing, they seem to have been guided throughout by the resolve to make the show representative both regionally and artistically. As a result it gives one a sense of growth, of spirit stirring to life under the impetus of governmental interest and help.

Because mural painting has been the most backward of American arts—in spite of acres of wall space smeared over with the precious conceits of alleged mural painters—and because I have never seen how the condition could be remedied by any other means than that of trial and error, I am particularly pleased with the section devoted to mural projects. The method of trial and error in this field is for obvious reasons not available to the artist working "on his own"; therefore the decorative schemes which the project is carrying out are of special significance for the future of American art. The results already obtained through giving artists all over the country opportunities to decorate the walls of public and semi-public buildings are astonishing when one considers how short a time the project has been in existence. In style the work ranges from the naturalistic to the abstract, in quality from competent to excellent. I find especially pleasing the original and charming murals for children by Hester Miller Murray, the amusing decorations for a playroom by Max Spivak, the interesting scenes from contemporary American life by Edgar Britton, Alfred Crimi, Karl Kelpe. In this last category the influence of Diego Rivera is strongly in evidence, which is both natural and fortunate. We are doubly indebted to Rivera for having taught our painters what magnificent material lies ready to hand in the manifold activities of American life, and for having revived the art of fresco painting. Outstanding among the frescoes shown here is the fine work of James Michael Newell, whose ambitious scheme, "The Development of Western Civilization," for a reading-room in a Bronx library, promises to be one of the most important decorative works that have been done in this country.

A Letter from Trotsky

[The following letter from Leon Trotsky to the Norwegian Minister of Justice was sent to The Nation via London by one of Mr. Trotsky's secretaries.]

TO MR. LIE,
MINISTER OF JUSTICE, OSLO.

Sir: I have always endeavored to comply with the conditions governing my stay in Norway, both in the letter and in the spirit, at least as I understood them. It develops, however, that the Chief of the Central Passport Office has interpreted these conditions in quite a different manner, and as far as I am aware, his interpretation is approved by you, the Minister. As I am deeply concerned in further enjoying for myself and my wife the favor of Norwegian institutions, I would be prepared to accept the interpretation of the conditions of which I was not made aware before my coming to Norway if I could gain the conviction that this new interpretation could be reconciled with my dignity as a human being and as a writer. I can only sign what I have clearly understood and what I can really undertake to fulfil. According to the Chief of the Central Passport Office, who, incidentally, when I came into the country, gave me a somewhat hostile interview without waiting for any action of any kind on my part, my activities are to be confined solely to "historical works and general theoretical essays which are not directed against any country."

How am I to interpret this limitation? Is, for example, my autobiography a general theoretical essay or a topical political work? Three weeks ago I wrote a detailed analysis of the development of the Soviet Union. I myself am compelled to pass judgment now: I have the impression that this work contributes no small service to social science. On the other hand, this work, by the mere concrete analysis of facts, is directed against the ruling bureaucratic caste which is continuing to exploit the people economically and suppress it politically. Is it really possible in a democratic country to accept the stricture that the Chief of the Passport Office may decide whether this work is only scientific or also politically topical?

I could quote an incomparably greater and more worthy example. My great teacher and master, Karl Marx, wrote a book called "Capital." I try to imagine for a moment that the Chief of the Passport Office or any other authority had to decide whether this grandiose work was only scientific or whether it also had a topical political character. The decision would not be so easy to make, for this work, built upon the granite foundation of science, is illustrated by thousands of topical examples and has as a whole today far greater political importance than on the day of its first appearance. It is not a coincidence that the whole struggle of reaction, of the official and unofficial type, is directed against Marxism and Marxists.

The Chief of the Passport Office reproaches me for an article in which I took the position that the struggle in France could only end with a victory for military reaction or with the building of Soviets. Perhaps I am mistaken in my analysis. In any case I attribute to this analysis a thoroughly scientific character. The article in question appeared in the universally known bourgeois-democratic American journal, The Nation. If I had written an article in which I explained theoretically the general advantages of an autocratic regime over democracy, would this article have been disapproved by the Chief of the Passport Office? Unfortunately, this question is not yet clear to me, especially after the visit I had today from the Chief of the Passport Office.

The declaration demanded of me includes also the promise "not to allow myself to be interviewed by any Norwegian or foreign journalist." During the whole of my stay in Norway up to the last days I have given only one single interview, that is, to the editor of the Arbeiderbladet, and this, sir, in your own presence, and even with you kindly taking part, which even now I appreciate. You may perhaps recall that I personally tried to avoid even this single interview in order to provoke as little noise and sensation as possible in connection with my name.

But now the question is different. I have been accused by the judicial authorities of Moscow of being the organizer of terrorist acts. The entire world press is dealing with this historic trial. If you, as Minister of Justice, or the authorities controlled by you, or the Norwegian government, deem it possible or likely that I have misused my sojourn in Norway or anywhere else for this kind of activity, I expect immediately a warrant for my arrest. I desire nothing else but to have the opportunity to bring into the light of day, before an open juridical forum, this monstrous crime of the G. P. U. and of the powers behind it. But if the Norwegian authorities deem it impossible to interfere in this matter, they have the duty—I repeat, the elementary duty, which is not necessarily even a democratic one—to allow me complete liberty to tell the truth to the whole world by the means at my individual disposal. The principal means of informing public opinion is through the press. To refrain from bringing me to trial before a Norwegian court and at the same time to rob me of the possibility of appeal to public opinion on a question that concerns myself, my son, my whole political past, and my political honor, would mean to transform the right of asylum into a trap and to allow free passage to the executioners and slanderers of the G. P. U.

These are the reasons which make it impossible for me to fulfil the demand of the Chief of the Central Passport Office to sign the declaration which he has presented to me without drawing the attention of the government and of public opinion in advance to the unforeseeable consequences of such action for the moral existence of myself and my family.

Taking from Peter to Pay Paul

Dear Sirs: In the wake of Harvard's spectacular tercentenary celebration lie the dust and ashes of the School of City Planning, a burnt offering on the altar of tercentenary ambitions.

The aims and ideals embodied in "Harward national scholarships" and "roving professorships" swept the slate clean of all minor considerations and lesser interests of the university. The drive for the Tercentenary Fund has trampled under foot every just claim and will continue to do so for an indefinite period. As President Conant said, the $5,488,000 is just "a beginning."

This is not the time to denounce the tragedy and injustice of discontinuing the school or to raise moral issues, for mere criticism will not answer the present need. Dr. Conant is proving himself a far-sighted leader. Great tasks deserve the undivided energies of great leaders; lesser monuments must be carved by means of the determination and devotion of helpers.

Are there any such helpers—persons who, not necessarily professing allegiance to the name of Harvard, live or work in the name or spirit of the social ideals that permeate comprehensive physical planning? Would that they could contribute effectively to undoing the violence that has been done! Harvard University's Graduate School of City Planning promised to be a noble edifice. It should not be allowed to die.

WITH THE APPROACH OF THE ANNUAL convention of the American Federation of Labor, the voice of the peacemaker is heard within the two hostile camps which have pitched their tents in the field of American labor since the last convention and provided spirited and significant controversy for the enlightenment of the general public as well as of the mass of workers. Max Zaritsky of the Hatters' Union is the active agent in the negotiations now going on between the Committee for Industrial Organization, headed by John L. Lewis, and the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. These negotiations had reached an apparent deadlock at the time these lines were written. The executive council had agreed to the proposal by Mr. Zaritsky that committees from the federation and the C. I. O. should hold a conference. It had insisted, however, that the C. I. O. must dissolve before the executive council would revoke suspension of its constituent unions and allow them to be represented as regular members in the next convention. The C. I. O. in turn had reiterated its refusal to dissolve until the executive council should agree to the industrial organization of steel and the other mass-production industries. This of course is the crucial point. If the C. I. O. dissolves and its constituent unions enter the convention without first obtaining this stipulation and nailing it down tight, industrial organization of steel can again be voted down by a majority—and the craft unions can probably rally a majority. John Lewis is reported to be standing firm. He can hardly do otherwise without sacrificing the enormous prestige he has acquired in the past year with the public and the unorganized millions.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN for the settlement of the crisis arising from the recent assassinations of Japanese citizens have been under way in Nanking for nearly three weeks. Despite a concentration of Japanese war vessels at Shanghai nearly as large as that of January, 1932, Nanking has shown no sign of giving way to Tokyo's sweeping demands. Caught between growing agitation on the part of the Chinese public for resistance and intensified pressure from Japan, Chiang Kai-shek has resorted to the dilatory tactics for which his countrymen are famous. During the first week negotiations were held up awaiting Chiang's return from Canton. The next week he retired to his summer home in Kuling and denied himself to visitors. On his return to Nanking he held several conferences with Ambassador Kawagoe and then turned the negotiations over to Chang Chun, Minister of Foreign Affairs, with the stipulation that they should be continued only if Japan consented to deal "on a basis of equality, justice, and respect for the sovereignty of China," which, of course, neatly begged the question. In the face of this "unsatisfactory" response on the part of Nanking the Japanese have moved with unusual caution. No open demands have yet been made and no time limit has been set for the termination of negotiations. But while Japan apparently is not anxious to prod China to the point of war, it has not given any indication of whittling down the terms of its secret ukase. Both countries are stalling for time, hoping against hope that hostilities can be avoided.

THE LATEST REPORTS FROM THE SPANISH front are somewhat more reassuring than those received at the end of last week. Although the rebels have made progress in the sector to the west of Madrid, they have not—up to the time of going to press—reached a point where they immediately threaten the capital. On the Toledo front the government forces have moved to within two miles of their former stronghold and are intrenched at Olias de Rey, about thirty-five miles south of Madrid. Rebel air raids have damaged the Valencia-Madrid railway, but the insurgents have so far been unable to cut this vital line of communication. In the north General Mola's troops captured the important town of Sigüenza on the Madrid-Saragossa railway, but later lost it in a counter-attack. The most serious threat to Madrid is in the Escorial area, where the Moors and Foreign Legion appear to have broken through and inflicted a substantial defeat on the untrained government militia. Elsewhere along the sixty-mile arc surrounding the city the situation is unchanged. As the government forces outnumber the rebels by a considerable margin, the decisive factor in the struggle is likely to be the supply of arms. The lull in the fighting during the early part of last week was attributed to the rebels' lack of munitions, a deficiency that was later remedied, according to the Times correspondent, by the arrival of supplies from "abroad." If the democratic countries could be maneuvered into a position where they would match the aid sent by the fascist powers, Madrid would yet have an excellent chance of pulling through.

THESE ARE NOT COMFORTABLE DAYS FOR Father Coughlin. Following the arrival of Cardinal Pacelli in this country, the radio priest developed throat trouble which prevented him from addressing an open-air meeting in Newark. Suddenly the candidates of his Union Party were scratched in Albany. Father Ryan, long noted as one of the few liberal members of the upper Catholic hierarchy in America, in a radio speech on October 8, denounced him in vigorous terms. In plain words, he told him that it was a sin to lie. Besides administering this lesson in the catechism, Father Ryan took sharp issue with the priest of the Little Flower in his "despicable assertion that the President of the United States is a Communist." He attacked Father Coughlin's economic views, stating that his "explanation of our economic maladies is as least 50 per cent wrong, and that his monetary remedies are at least 90 per cent wrong." In his reply to these charges, Father Coughlin was evidently on the defensive. He indulged in no personal attack, he spoke no more of blood and bullets, and he neglected to repeat that President Roosevelt was anti-God. He was even quoted in the press as stating that if he did not have his own candidate in the field he would advise his followers to vote for Roosevelt. These events all tend to bear out Mr. Farrell's thesis on another page of this issue. The church is wise in politics. The chances of President Roosevelt's reelection increase daily. While the church does not seem ready to silence the radio priest, it will probably be tolerant of Father Ryan's liberalism. For the church's policies are calculated with an eye to its own ultimate advantage.

SENATOR ROYAL S. COPELAND, WHO HAS been nursing along the sadly weakened food-and-drug bill, has now turned the patient over to the manufacturers of patent medicines. At a conference this week Dr. Copeland discussed with leading members of the Proprietary Association how the bill might be further revised to meet the approval of the industry. The consultation between the doctor and the medicine men was conducted with the greatest secrecy, and the meeting was opened with a warning that the press must not even learn it had taken place. The impropriety of Dr. Copeland's collaboration with the Proprietary Association is too obvious to require comment. Apparently there is no justification for the rumor that at the next session a bill providing real protection for the consuming public will be introduced.

WHY DID BRITAIN ABANDON SANCTIONS? Why is the British rearmament program now receiving the support not only of the Conservative government but of the Labor Party and even the church? The alleged answer to these questions is contained in a news release of the Imperial Policy Group recently sent out from London. The Imperial Policy Group began its activities a little more than two years ago, and it then consisted of the Earl of Mansfield, Kenneth de Courcy, and a couple of M. P.'s. It has now grown until it numbers fifty-five members in the two houses of Parliament. Its program is strictly nationalistic and isolationist; it favors a large army and navy, a strict limitation of European commitments, and a "vigorous government"—not fascist, you understand, but one that is strong and will take no nonsense from any other country. The group claims not only to have pressed the government to abandon sanctions but to have "worked in every possible direction to help Sir Samuel Hoare and to prevent his resignation." It has sent an unofficial commission to Europe to interview the heads of the various governments, notably Signor Mussolini, Dr. Benes, Chancellor von Schuschnigg, and Hitler's ambassador at large, Herr von Ribbentrop. Its latest success was to call "the Bishops of the Church of England together in the House of Commons," and to tell them "in perfectly plain words that unless the churches supported rearmament and took a patriotic line and withdrew their support from the League of Nations, they would lose their following among the majority of young people." Whether or not Mr. Baldwin and the bishops were duly impressed by these arrogant and fascistic (if not fascist) young men, the fact remains that official British policy agrees to an alarming extent with theirs.

MEETING IN CLEVELAND ON OCTOBER 8 TO 10, the Cooperative League of the United States recorded the progress and urged the necessity of consumer cooperation. Although they have but a fraction of the power of such groups in the Scandinavian countries and even in the British Isles, consumer cooperatives are growing with amazing speed in this country. In the bad years 1929 to 1934 the cooperative purchase of farm supplies increased from $125,000,000 to $250,000,000. Moreover, according to Dr. James P. Warbasse, president of the league, business failures during the depression years among the 1,500 member societies were both numerically and proportionately insignificant when compared with profit businesses. There is no record of the failure of a wholesale cooperative group. Unquestionably the union and organization of consumers in buying and distribution will help to mitigate the worst evils of the profit system. But there are limits to the advantages of consumer cooperation. As George Nelson, Socialist candidate for Vice-President, saltily puts it in Mr. Rorty's article elsewhere in this issue: "Cooperation is a good crutch to limp with," but it won't put the workers and farmers on their two feet.

AS HOSTS OF THE 1940 OLYMPIC GAMES THE Japanese are even now preparing the country to receive the barbarians from the West. Eiji-san, or "Mr. Foreigner," is to be made as comfortable as possible, defeated in the games as often as possible, and sent home as charmed as possible with his visit. To do all three at once will call for finesse. We have always thought "Oriental guile" a much overrated quality, but if it exists, 1940 or never will be the time to use it. Already, we hear, the problem of getting the Japanese tongue to cope with the English / is being made the subject of scientific research. Later classes will be organized to teach waiters, taxi drivers, policemen, bell-hops, and geishas how not to say "Olympics." But athletic training will naturally receive the most attention. Impressed by the prowess of the American Negroes at Berlin, the Japanese, not to be outdone, are mobilizing the swift-running savages from the island of Formosa. These aborigines have learned speed by playing an ancient game known as head-hunting, in which the goal is somebody's head shriveled small and tied to a pole. You can't get greyhounds to race without a mechanical rabbit to lead them on, and we wonder if the Formosans will run at all unless a prize is held out. Of course there is always Avery Brundage.

The Soviets Force a Showdown

THE Soviet government's warning that it would withdraw from the non-intervention pact if Germany, Italy, and Portugal continued to give direct aid to Spanish rebels is the first sign of resistance to the drift toward a fascist Europe. It is unfortunate that the Soviet Union should be the first to come to the rescue of Spain. Any action that the Soviets take will seem to justify the rebel charge of "Communist" influence on the Madrid government. France, as a sister republic with a Popular Front government much like that of Spain, has a far greater stake in the outcome of the war and is geographically in a position to send immediate and effective aid. But M. Blum is committed to "neutrality," and not even the specter of a fascist France has dislodged him from his position. There was even less hope that Great Britain would come to the aid of Spanish democracy. Although the very existence of the British Empire would seem to depend on the frustration of German and Italian ambitions in the Spanish islands and African possessions, Britain's ruling class appears to have been taken in completely by the fascist propaganda concerning the "red" Madrid regime.

Each week has brought increasing evidence of the extent of German and Italian assistance to the Spanish rebels. Rebel censors no longer take the trouble to delete references to Junker planes or "ammunition from abroad" from the dispatches of American correspondents. The efforts of the London committee on non-intervention in Spain had no effect on the steady stream of supplies passing through Lisbon. Even when faced with strong Soviet pressure, the committee has displayed more energy in seeking to prevent defections from its ranks than in attempting to stop munitions shipments to Spain. German and Italian counter-charges, completely lacking in concrete evidence, were given equal weight with Soviet charges based either on authoritative neutral sources or on photographs and captured war supplies.

The chances are overwhelming that Europe will be divided into two hostile camps on the Spanish issue. Recent reports indicate that the Little Entente, which hitherto has been united on foreign policy, has already split on the question, with Czecho-Slovakia supporting Russia in demanding that the Spanish loyalists be given the aid to which they are entitled under international law as the legitimate government of Spain, and with Rumania and Yugoslavia on the side of the rebels. Should such a fundamental division between the democratic and autocratic nations develop throughout Europe, the democratic countries would obviously be in a worse position than if they had never sponsored the non-intervention pact. At the beginning of the conflict any assistance they might have given the Madrid government would have been entirely legal, while the fascist powers would have had to risk the stigma of illegality in helping the rebels. The neutrality pact made it illegal for the democratic powers to aid the Spanish government, but did not impose any additional barrier against help to the rebels. On the contrary, it probably stimulated German and Italian assistance by greatly increasing the chances of rebel success; not even a fascist likes to back the wrong horse. The agreement has had the further result of putting the democratic countries in a position where any future aid that they may extend to Madrid will be technically illegal, while Germany and Italy could justify their assistance to the rebels on the ground that Russia and France had broken their agreement. The situation is filled with dynamite, yet the fact remains that almost any action in defense of democracy is less risky than allowing the fascist powers a free hand in Spain.

Republican vs. Democratic Relief

DURING the past week relief took its rightful place as one of the most important issues in the campaign. Charges and counter-charges as to the administration and political complexion of the WPA flew thick and fast between the lesser spokesmen of the two camps, and it was no accident that the fight centered on the politics of relief in the doubtful state of Pennsylvania.

The main engagement occurred between the two principals when, on the same day, Landon and Roosevelt made speeches in which the issue was actually joined. The burden of Roosevelt's thesis was that relief is a national problem to be met nationally; he would continue to use relief funds for a wide range of public improvements. Landon, on the other hand, would return the administration and planning of relief and part of the financing to state and local agencies; he is opposed to the use of relief labor, at relief wages, for the construction of federal public works. "If the government," he said, "will give American initiative a chance, 11,000,000 men and women will not long be looking vainly for jobs." These are fine words; but they serve to bring back in a way which will not win votes for Mr. Landon another rugged Republican who practiced Mr. Landon's theory to the bitter end in the fall of 1932. The fact that the history of Republican relief forms the most sprightly half of a new book by Harry Hopkins entitled "Spending to Save" will no doubt also be set down in Republican quarters as playing politics with relief.

Herbert (Canute) Hoover for three long years not only tried to hold back the flood of unemployment and misery by shouting "Prosperity is just around the corner," but demonstrated his confidence in his own powers by refusing to feed the hungry, by shooting the bonus army out of the national capital, and by lying about the extent of joblessness. He was consistent to the very end. On October 22, 1932, just before the waters closed over his head, he protested bitterly to the electorate, 12,000,000 of whom by that time were unemployed, that the Democrats had forced the passage of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act, which appropriated $300,000,000 to be allotted to the individual states for human relief.

Throughout, well-fed right-hand men stood beside the President and defended him from socialistic legislators. They devised campaigns with such slogans as "Spruce up!" "Give a job," and "Spread the work," all of them calculated to put the burden of relief chiefly on low-income groups still fortunate enough to have jobs. The ideologists of the day were Walter S. Gifford, who felt that an employee with a six-day job had no right to complain if his employer asked him to share it with another worker; Irenée du Pont, who told Mr. Gifford in 1931 that he could not guarantee to raise adequate funds for relief in Delaware unless the wealthy were assured that Congress would not raise the income-tax rate or "remove the provision whereby losses may be offset against other income"; and Myron C. Taylor, who in 1931 proclaimed that "the individual with a will to work must fit himself into the new scheme of things" and accept whatever job was at hand.

There was one exception. This was Arthur Woods, who headed the President's Emergency Committee for Employment set up in October, 1930. This committee made recommendations to President Hoover which, if followed, might have lengthened his public career. The suggested message which is printed in Mr. Hopkins's book was full of Rooseveltian phrases: "The ravages of unemployment must in our minds be compared to the ravages of war or disease. It is the great blot on our economic system today." Its remedies were Rooseveltian remedies. It proposed a vast program of public works, including highways, low-cost housing, rural electrification. "We have the resources, the materials, the labor, and the skill. An effort should be made to release these forces in correcting a long-recognized defect and in increasing the health, safety, and beauty of our communities." In a memorandum dated November 11, 1930, Colonel Arthur Woods recommended a two-billion-dollar construction program.

The recommendations went unheeded. Instead Mr. Hoover told Congress that the country was fundamentally sound. Instead of quoting the Woods committee's recent conservative estimate of 5,000,000 unemployed, he used an April estimate of the Census of Unemployment which put the figure at 2,500,000. He asked for an appropriation of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000.

The relief record of Herbert Hoover seems, in 1936, almost incredible in its stupidity and cruelty. By using it as a foil for the activities of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, Harry Hopkins has produced a campaign handbook from which party workers and voters will be able to extract endless material. The easy conclusion—the one which Mr. Farley no doubt hopes the average voter will draw—is that it is the Democratic Party which has met the issue of relief and, as a corollary, that the Republican Party, if returned to power, would duplicate the Hoover record. And Mr. Landon's speech at Cleveland lends color to the suggestion. The truth is, however, that during the depression the people of the United States for the first time in history were confronted with the problem of unemployment and relief which the European nations have known on a much smaller scale for decades. Today the public understanding of that problem is such that no administration, short of a military dictatorship, would dare to repeat the Hoover formula. At the same time there is no doubt that Harry Hopkins personally and the relief administration as a whole has conceived of work-relief as a constructive force and has fostered the conviction among its recipients that the government of the United States owes to its citizens social security, health, the opportunity to work—and even the opportunity to enjoy life.

We have turned over the American board [writes Mr. Hopkins] and seen how many people live like slugs beneath its plenty. . . . The regeneration of the individual worker no longer needs to be the only concern of a national work program for the unemployed. We have come to a second concept, which is that his work is necessary to enrich the national life.

The American people have come a long way since 1929 in their thinking and feeling about questions of security and government responsibility. They know now, for instance, that unemployment is neither accidental nor temporary. Large sections of employed and unemployed know even better than Mr. Hopkins how inadequate present relief is; they are learning that the Roosevelt word is always more eloquent than the deed and that there is a growing tendency, as Mr. Ward points out on another page, to curtail both the quality and quantity of relief.

No average American will find it hard to choose between Republican relief—the dole—and Democratic relief, inadequate as it is. Meanwhile behind the fireworks over relief remains the monstrous fact of 11,000,000 still unemployed, although recovery is already far advanced. On that issue neither party has been heard from in convincing terms.

Steps Toward Economic Disarmament

THE action of Italy and France in reducing tariffs and eliminating quotas in connection with the revaluation of their currencies has stimulated the efforts of the Economic Committee of the League to bring about a general leveling of trade barriers. For the first time since the break-up of the London Economic Conference there seems to be a definite possibility that the world trend toward economic nationalism can be checked. With the exception of the Reichsmark, all the principal world currencies have been revalued at a point where they are in approximate equilibrium. In its reciprocal trade agreements the United States has made a breach, small though it may be, in the growing barriers to trade. The French and Italian trade concessions may seem insignificant as compared with the new obstacles created by devaluation, but they contrast markedly with the increased tariffs which Great Britain imposed after it abandoned the gold standard in 1931 and with the failure of the United States to make compensatory adjustments when it devalued the dollar in 1933.

Thus despite the short-sighted economic policies adopted by most countries in the past few years, the international economic structure is more nearly balanced than at any time since 1929. As a result of tremendous losses on both private and public loans, the international investments of the United States have been reduced to manageable proportions. In spite of devaluation and spasmodic increases in the tariff, our normal "favorable" balance of trade has been transformed into an "unfavorable" balance. This is due not so much to a rise in imports as to a tremendous decrease in exports, but the effect, as far as stability is concerned, is approximately the same. Doubtless the minor tariff concessions made in the Hull reciprocal agreements have helped, as have the drought and the crop-reduction program under the AAA, but the primary factor in bringing adjustment has been the gradual rise in domestic prices which has accompanied the recovery movement. Whatever was the situation in 1933 and 1934, the dollar is no longer undervalued in terms of world currencies.

Nevertheless, the basic drift toward economic nationalism will not be easily reversed. Along with the favorable factors in the present situation are others which are clearly ominous. The Italians set a dangerous precedent by revaluing their currency 10 per cent below that of France and Switzerland. Great Britain has allowed the pound to drift to its lowest point in many months. President Roosevelt has just announced that he will ask Congress for a renewal of authority empowering him to reduce the value of the dollar to 50 per cent of its former gold content. The British representative at Geneva has made it clear that England is unwilling to make any reduction in its tariff, and has intimated that he cannot guarantee that the pound will be maintained at its present value unless France abolishes all its quotas. This France declares to be impossible as long as Germany maintains its exchange controls and its abnormal clearing and barter agreements, and continues to subsidize its exports. Yet the Reich would probably be compelled to retain its exchange controls even if the mark were devalued. Lacking a reserve of gold or foreign currency, it would have no way of defending the mark unless it were granted a substantial credit by one of the other powers.

At first sight the three-power "stabilization" agreement between Great Britain, France, and the United States would appear to intensify the danger that monetary manipulation may become an accepted weapon of economic nationalism. As a compromise between a fluctuating currency and a fixed gold standard, the new plan has none of the advantages of either. A paper currency, though subject to violent fluctuations which can be reduced by an exchange stabilization fund, will ultimately adjust itself to its true purchasing-power value. The gold standard provides a mechanism whereby world prices may automatically be brought into alignment, and has the additional advantage of being free from political manipulation. The present scheme contains no automatic mechanism for the stabilization either of exchange or prices. Each country is to retain full independence in establishing a day-by-day rate at which gold is to be bought and sold. This opens a wide and extremely treacherous area to the conflict of nationalistic forces. What the policy of the various governments will be under existing circumstances remains to be seen. A few years ago each country was striving desperately to raise the exchange value of its currency for reasons of national prestige. As this proved disastrous, efforts have been more recently directed toward reducing the exchange value of the currencies as far as possible without provoking immediate retaliation. Either course is filled with danger, and until our political authorities grasp some of the basic facts of world interdependence it is wise to have our currency systems as automatic and free from political control as possible.

Essentially, the vicious circle of tariffs, quotas, exchange restrictions, and currency depreciation remains unbroken. But psychologically the present situation is much more favorable than that of three years ago. Domestic recovery has developed sufficiently in many countries to lessen the blind drive toward nationalism. Not a few countries have reached the stage at which the fallacies of autarchy have become glaringly obvious. Today the most serious obstacles to world economic stability are political rather than economic. Although it is hard to see how the prevailing demand for national independence in monetary affairs can be reconciled with a liberalizing of trade restrictions, it is even harder to envision Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia reaching an amicable economic agreement. The ever-present threat of war makes it imperative for countries like Germany and Italy to continue to seek self-sufficiency even though they are seriously in need of food and raw materials.

At the moment when constructive leadership is desperately needed at Geneva, it is particularly unfortunate that the United States should be engaged in a Presidential campaign in which the opposition party is assailing the meager concessions made in the trade pacts. As one of the two leading creditor countries, the United States must assume at least a part of the burden of leadership. The election obviously prevents the Administration from making the gesture that would be most likely to inspire a favorable response—an offer of a general reduction in the American tariff as part of a world program of economic disarmament. There still remains, however, a kind of leadership which the President could very advantageously exercise. Thus far the discussions at Geneva have been seriously obstructed by the narrowness of the frame of reference. Economic nationalism will yield only to a frontal attack on all phases of the problem simultaneously. Trade barriers are inextricably connected with such problems as colonies and the distribution of raw materials. As a leading creditor and as the owner of the richest stores of raw material, the United States might well take the initiative in asking that the present discussions be broadened to include a study of these fundamentals. The obstacles to a more general agreement of this type are enormous, but without it any attack on trade barriers is bound to fail.

How to Dress Though a Voter

IN THESE loud-mouthed October days it is remarkable that no one has said anything about keeping politics out of fashions. Yet this is a crucial question on which we feel the public should be enlightened without delay. It all began with a taxi strike in Paris following the victory of the Front Populaire last May. One spring evening the Avenue de L'Opéra was electrified to see a gentleman bicycling to the opera in top hat, white tie, and tails. In no time bicycling became the rage. This demanded a special costume, and with promptitude the great designers rushed into the breach. Any day thereafter the haut monde in shorts, slacks, knickers, and culottes could be seen bowling gaily through the Bois de Boulogne. It was all delightfully democratic, says Vogue, describing how the Princesse Jean Louis de Faucigny-Lucinge appeared in gray flannel shorts, Tyrolean sandals, and sapphires from Cartier.

Reflecting the revolutionary feeling, the mid-season collections showed Robespierre stiff collars, Danton tailcoats, Little Corporal tricorne; and Schiaparelli, oracle of the Place Vendôme, came out with a "liberty cap" described as having a "forward, upward movement." As her comment on the somewhat heterogeneous composition of what Vogue, still new to political reporting, calls "the Front Populaire, Blum's party," Schiaparelli made a sensation with her cotton-print evening dress in imitation of a patchwork quilt. Meanwhile, continues our faithful chronicler, a marquise is heard to call Stalin by his first name and Monsieur is buying cravats "in the popular colors of the lower classes." A neighboring revolution, too, is reflected in the fashions. "While the daughters of Spain wage war," we learn from Harper's Bazaar, "Vionnet makes history with black-lace mantillas." Here is a thought that covers us with confusion. In our blind way during the last few months we had been anxiously following events on the battlefield, and all the time behind our backs history was really being made in a black and gold salon on the Avenue Montaigne.

In this country Vogue, ever up to the minute, prepares its readers for the polls. If you're a radical they suggest, among other things, "love birds for your hair." Perhaps we move in the wrong circles, but if we were faced with a love bird in someone's hair we should take it for an emblem of the lunatic fringe indicating a vote for Lemke. However, Vogue goes on imperturbably to recommend "a bag on a long gold chain . . . if you're a conservative," presumably to prevent the love birds, excuse us, we mean the radicals, from snitching your carfare. If you're a "Laborite" you are advised to try "a removable peplum evening dress." We don't want to seem indelicate but just what does Vogue mean by "Laborite"?

In any case it looks as if our wardrobe would be quite inadequate come November 4. "James, order the Rolls, we're going out shopping for a United Front fedora."

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

It Pays to Stay on Relief

Washington, October 12

THE most amusing aspect of the Presidential campaign, aside from the fumbling stupidity of the Republican tacticians, has been the way that liberals and radicals have swallowed the propaganda of the G. O. P. and the Liberty League. The bull-roaring that has emanated from those twin citadels of reaction in denunciation of New Deal spending for relief and kindred activities seems to have so deadened the wits of many progressives that they actually have come to believe the Republicans would, if elected to power, cancel relief, wipe out the PWA, and toss back to the bread lines the thousands added to the federal pay roll under Roosevelt. The truth is, of course, that on all these points there is no material difference between the Republicans and the Democrats, and that the Republican attack, stripped of its disguises, is not an attack on relief and spending but a howl that the spending and the dishing out of jobs are handled by Democrats instead of by G. O. P. stalwarts.

In less hysterical days liberals and radicals would not have allowed themselves to lose sight of that fact, and the New Deal's smug defense of its record on these scores would have seemed as funny as the Republicans' attacks actually are. There would have been no goggle-eyed adoration of Roosevelt as the champion of the status quo. In its place there would have been demands that Roosevelt implement his bid for reelection with apologies for the status quo and a detailed explanation of how he proposes to end the scourge of unemployment in the next four years or, failing in that, put the relief system on a more decent basis. He would have been asked, for example, whether he proposes to continue his arbitrary trimming of the federal relief rolls and its attendant pushing of helpless thousands back upon the mercies of the flop houses, soup kitchens, and parish poorbaskets. He would have been asked when he intends to fulfil his Administration's announced plans for a genuine program of public works. Finally, he would have been asked to quit ogling the chambers of commerce with his pious proclamations for decentralization of relief and tell the country, instead, what he proposes to do about the existing decentralization which in many places permits the use of the relief roll as a club for beating down private wage rates.

A case in point is the recent suspension of WPA projects in a large part of Mississippi in response to the complaints of planters that they could not get their cotton picked because all their field hands were holding down WPA jobs. According to the official rules and regulations of the WPA, men are not supposed to be forced off its projects and into private employment unless the private employment offered them is reasonable and decent. The wages offered by the private employer must be high enough to support a standard of living at least comparable to that under WPA wages, and if the job offered is merely a temporary one, then the WPA worker cannot be forced to take it unless assured of reemployment on a WPA project at the conclusion of the private job. So say the rules and regulations. But they were not obeyed in Mississippi. Down there the schedule of WPA wages is $21 a month for unskilled labor, working 120 hours a month for an average of 17½ cents an hour. What do the planters pay their hands? According to the Federal Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the typical wage of a Mississippi farm hand in July was $17.50 for a month of 10 and 10½-hour days, and that is overstating the case, for the bureau's statistics apply in general only to the more or less permanently employed farm hand; the cotton pickers driven off the WPA rolls and into the planters' fields do not fall in that category.

There are no data available on what the Mississippi planters pay their cotton pickers, but it is possible to set down here the typical wages paid such workers in adjoining sections of the Mississippi Delta. In Concordia Parish, Louisiana, for example, 7½ cents an hour is a prevalent wage for cotton pickers. More pickers get that wage than get a higher one. Concordia Parish's cotton pickers are Negroes. In Karnes County, Texas, another Delta area, the picking is done by Mexicans. They get from 8 to 14 cents an hour with the largest fraction in the 8-cent bracket. These, mind you, are wages that actually are being paid and not merely offered, and from all these areas have come loud-voiced protests that the WPA has pauperized the pickers to a point where they prefer relief work to the labors of the field.

In too many cases, under the "decentralized" relief system, local WPA officials have obligingly responded to these protests by forcing the requisite number of men off the WPA rolls and on to the pay rolls of the planters. In Louisiana, where even the permanently employed farm hand, according to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, did well to average $19.75 "without board" for the month of July, the WPA wage for unskilled labor is $23.10 for a month of 128 hours, or an average of 18 cents an hour. In Texas, where the typical wage of the more or less permanently employed agricultural worker was $27.75 "without board" in July, the WPA wage for unskilled labor is $21 for a 105-hour month, or an average of 20 cents an hour. Contrast these averages with the 8 cents and 7½ cents an hour paid the cotton pickers forced off relief rolls.

These cases are not without precedent. Harry Hopkins repeatedly has stormed against them. But new instances continue to occur. The Mississippi case, for example, is not the first in that state, and the man responsible is the Mississippi WPA administrator, Wayne Alliston, in private life a clergyman. Alliston is the gentleman under whom a number of Mississippi communities were allowed to get WPA funds to build tax-exempt and rent-free factories disguised as industrial schools and designed for the use of sweatshops fleeing from union labor in the North.

Washington had another taste of General Hugh S. Johnson this week. Old Iron Pants slipped into town to appear before the National Labor Relations Board as mouthpiece for a company union. This whilom New Deal valiant—whose newspaper column recently assured the nation that Roosevelt does not think of E. T. Weir and Walter Chrysler as "economic royalists" and that if the world were only full of Weirs and Chryslers it would be paradise enow—was trying to do for David Sarnoff and the RCA what he did for Weir in 1933 and for Chrysler and the other automobile magnates in 1934, when he was NRA administrator. You will recall how, when a strike shut down the Weirton Steel plant, the workers were persuaded to return to their jobs on the promise of a collective-bargaining election, and how this was at first stalled by the NRA and then blocked by Weir himself. And you will recall how in 1934 Johnson engineered a skilful gypping of the automobile workers in a negotiation that set up the famous Wolman board, which proceeded to impose upon the workers a company-union system of such marvelous capacities that it was adopted by International Harvester in preference to its own company union. Johnson this week was engaged in a similar shenanigan. He had helped engineer a peaceful settlement of the RCA strike at Camden, a settlement that involved an election at which the workers would choose their collective-bargaining representatives. The election had been held and the outside union had won it by an overwhelming vote. But only 3,000 of the 9,000 eligible workers had voted, the usual boycott pressure having been applied in an attempt to discredit an unpreventable union victory. Johnson, fulfilling what now seems to be one of his major missions in life, roared down to Washington to tell the NLRB it must not certify the union as the collective-bargaining representative of the RCA workers. To certify the union would be "shocking" to all friends of labor like himself, Johnson said. He argued that the 6,000 RCA workers who did not vote should be recorded as desiring no representation in collective bargaining, and that the union, having polled only a "minority" of the workers, had lost the election. Which is like arguing that the 60 per cent of the eligible voters in this country who in some years do not bother to vote or do not want a President, and that in those years the White House should be boarded up and left vacant.

The Pope Needs America

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

I
THE aged Pope recently appeared before 400 exiled Spanish refugees, spoke solicitously of the mystical Body of Christ and the ills and sorrows of war-torn Spain, and called benignly for a world-wide anti-red crusade in the spirit of Christian tolerance and charity. It was a scene rich in irony, but the Catholic press was too concerned with heralding the words of the Pontiff to catch the note of irony. The Jesuit weekly America drew a touching contrast between the Holy Father forgiving Communists who are raping Mother Church in Spain, and Joseph Stalin brewing new vials of hatred in the Kremlin. Stalin's adherents make him out to be infallible; the church attributes to him other characteristics of the early popes, one of whom wrote in the eighth century: "Do not the Franks know that all children of the Lombards are lepers? . . . May they broil with the devil and his angels in everlasting fire!"

The Roman Catholic church has been built and defended not only with prayers and the will of the Almighty but also by means of blood and the sword. Neither the Holy Ghost nor Saint Peter ever contributed as effectively to the defense of the papacy as did, say, the Frankish king Pepin and his great son Charlemagne, who restored the weak Pope Leo III by force of arms. Down through the ages the Roman Catholic church has balanced prayers with the rack, canonization with the might of the sword, the power of wealth and oppression with appeals to the dreams and ignorance of the masses. It has, by the variety of its instruments, weathered the storms of centuries. Revolutions have come and gone, but Mother Church has remained the pillar of Christendom. In Spain today she stands with gun in hand defending churches which have been turned into arsenals. Her priests lay down their weapons to grant absolution to those who are about to be massacred by rebels wearing the badge of Mary on their sleeve and by those great defenders of Christianity, order, and authority—Mohammedan Moors. And the Vicar of Christ gently restrains them, forgives the "reds," and tacitly gives his benediction to the slaughter. The American Catholic press backs up the rebels. Thus America recently commented: "With such an enemy [communism] there can be no compromise; the Americans with liberal ideals will join the Bishops of Pamplona and Vittoria in calling down a blessing 'on those who at the moment are sacrificing themselves for religion and country.' " And when Michael Williams rather mildly dissented from this kind of rabidness in a recent issue of the liberal Catholic weekly the Commonweal, a priest took the trouble to write in to correct him.

The Catholic church in America has never been more alert, more militant, more on the offensive than it is at present. E. Boyd Barrett, an ex-Jesuit, has written in the opening pages of his excellent and well-documented book "Rome Stoops to Conquer": "From an insignificant group of 25,000 adherents, shepherded by 30 poor priests, in 1789, the Catholic church in America has grown to be a congregation of 20,000,000 led by 30,000 priests. From being propertyless, she has become a rich institution, whose wealth exceeds two billion dollars. From being a despised and scattered flock, she has become the most perfectly organized body in the world, enjoying immense influence and power." In an article in the American Spectator (January, 1936) entitled The Finances of the Catholic Church, Ferdinand Lundberg furnished detailed and illuminating corroboration of Barrett's statements. Quoting from the New York State banking records and "selecting items at random from the portfolio of the church's investments," he presented a half-page list of the corporations in which the church has invested its funds—Pure Oil, Commonwealth Edison, Goodyear Tire and Rubber, Baltimore and Ohio, and so on. The list is a directory of the industrial United States.

Many commentators have mistakenly appraised religion in terms of individual piety, the attendance records at church services, and the like. They have failed to realize that religion is an institution and that it must be studied in terms of its influence as such. Among religious institutions the Roman Catholic church is the richest, the most solidly organized, the most cohesive. The strength of its organization gives it a position in our society which no other church possesses and makes it potentially a threat to progressive forces despite the fact that piety in American life is on the decline, that many individual Catholics disregard the church's doctrines on birth control, and that many of the enrolled twenty million Catholics do not partake of the sacrament regularly. Also, its organization is strictly authoritarian and anti-democratic.

These facts are interesting, particularly at a time when Mother Church has again come forth as the Church Militant, flying the banner of Catholic Action. The center of its offensive under the leadership of the Pope is, and must be, America. America is the citadel of world capitalism. Christendom is one of the spiritual bodyguards of world capitalism. Protestant Christianity was, of course, a reflex of the rise of world capitalism. It furnished the religious ethics which served as part of the rationalized explanation of the aims and ideals of the rising middle class. The connection between the rise of capitalism and the Reformation is close. In due time Mother Church swung into line. Part and parcel of medievalism, dependent for her strength upon her land holdings in the Middle Ages, she shifted her emphasis and adapted herself to the new capitalist world economy. Today the church remains the rock of Christianity, even though it does not possess the sweeping power which it once held, even though a Hitler does not come crawling to Canossa. It is only logical that Roman Catholicism should seek to conquer in America.

The death of capitalism will be the death of Mother Church. She will then be divorced from Caesar, and forced to practice her platitude of rendering unto Caesar his due, and giving unto God His due. The church will become a purely religious organization. Its power will be founded on prayer, superstition, and its ability to sell the promised joys of the kingdom of heaven. Its economic basis will be shattered. And no institution whose economic base has crumbled can survive as a social force.

Rome has lost other countries. It is now faced with the loss of Spain. Whoever wins in Spain, the church will emerge with lessened power. Fascism will reduce it to the position of a subsidiary ally. In order to retain its position, it must conquer America to compensate for its losses in other parts of the globe. Today a considerable proportion of the income of the church comes from this country. If the annual American contribution to Peter's pence were subtracted from the income of the Vatican, that income would be shrunk indeed.

For financial and other reasons the Roman Catholic church does not prefer fascism despite its alliance with Mussolini. Monarchism, Bonapartism, or capitalistic democracy is better suited to its intentions. Fascism is an expensive venture for the church, just as it is for capitalism. Fascism is a desperate attempt on the part of capitalism to save itself by hiring political Capones. These gangsters must be paid. Capitalists have to fork over some of that payment. If the church wants to survive, it also must contribute. Before Mussolini signed a concordat with the Vatican, the Black Shirts destroyed and outlawed Don Sturzo's Catholic Party, and they attacked the Catholic labor organizations as viciously as they attacked the Socialist trade unions. Even after the concordat, official attacks upon Catholic Action brought forth a papal encyclical in which the Pope complained of attacks on the youth of Catholic Action and protested repeatedly that Catholic Action was non-political. The experience of the Catholic church in fascist Germany is similar. Thus the church repeats its own history. It opposed the rise of capitalism and the bourgeoisie. It aligned itself with the aristocracy in the period of the bourgeois revolutions, and even down into the nineteenth century the papacy was anti-democratic. We are now entering a period of new wars and revolutions. The defense against revolution is fascism. If that defense is successful there follows a new distribution of power, wealth, and executive control, in which Rome does not propose but must accept terms. In order to survive, Rome must compromise and pay. For that reason the church does not prefer fascism.

In America there is no strong likelihood of fascism in the immediate future. American capitalism has not yet been forced to draw upon its reserves. The American working class has not yet become a direct revolutionary threat to capitalism. The American form of government as an instrument of capitalist state power has not yet broken down. Now is the strategic time for Rome to offset its losses in Europe by gains in the United States—before fascism unleashes all those vile and obnoxious anti-Catholic prejudices which are smoldering in the Bible belt.

Circus Politics in Washington State

BY MARY MCCARTHY

THERE are forty-seven states in the Union, and the Soviet of Washington." This rueful epigram is with some authority attributed to Postmaster Farley. With the state of Washington securely tucked under his campaign belt Mr. Farley can afford to unbend and be funny about it. Today it seems sure that Washington will go for Roosevelt on November 3, will, in fact, go the whole Democratic hog, as it did in 1932. William Randolph Hearst, who, whatever his faults, is doubtless a seasoned political observer, has tacitly admitted this fact. He has made no effort to reopen his Landon propaganda organ, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, closed down in August by the Newspaper Guild strike; and he has thereby in effect renounced the Pacific Northwest and all its works.

The state of Washington is in ferment; it is wild, comic, theatrical, dishonest, disorganized, hopeful; but it is not revolutionary. Washington, it is true, has a tradition of radicalism in labor; but it has at the same time a tradition of corruption in political office. It gave America its most successful general strike; but it also pushed into the national limelight such fantastic public figures as Ole Hanson and Hi Gill, former mayors of Seattle. Its most distinguishing political characteristic has always been its sheer eccentricity. In the past this eccentricity was sporadic; it is now general. A smart promoter could now put the entire state under a tent, charge admission, and get it. Today a dozen sideshows, all nominally Democratic, are operating at once and at cross-purposes; a hundred Democratic barkers are peddling their own specially bottled political patent medicines. The state is alive, but it is not yet able to speak coherently.

The present Democratic regime, which has broken all state records for political oddity, came into power in 1932. Up to that time the state had been considered normally Republican, and no one was more surprised than the Democrats themselves when the major part of the ticket was swept into office with Mr. Roosevelt. So little was the victory anticipated, in fact, that three of the candidates elected to the legislature were, when informed of their triumph, discovered to be in trouble with the police for "statutory offenses." One of these was actually in jail for the rape of a twelve-year-old girl. A former orchestra leader, who had once run for mayor of Seattle on the platform of "A hostess on every street car" became lieutenant governor. A village lawyer who had not practiced law for twenty years was instated as attorney-general.

A general sense that the lid was off pervaded the state. The legislature was crammed with machine politicians and irresponsible ignoramuses. The minutes of the legislature are minutes of brawling, drunkenness, and disorder. Misappropriation of funds has been so common that the average voter has come to regard the honest office-holder as one who turns what graft he garners from his office over to the party, while the dishonest one keeps it for himself. Federal money, as it poured into the state for the WPA, was used, in effect, to swell the party's campaign fund. In Seattle it is generally believed that a WPA worker who showed up on his project wearing a Landon sunflower would be beaten within an inch of his life.

It might be thought that on November 3 an indignant electorate would sweep these incompetents from office. For a number of reasons they will do nothing of the sort. In the first place, the "honest" Democratic politicians have during four years built up a highly effective, well-greased, semi-benevolent machine. In the second place, Washingtonians are not disturbed by idiosyncrasy or graft in high places. Perhaps Washingtonians are still close enough in time to the frontier to retain the pioneer's respect for enterprise and cunning; at any rate, they find political chicanery more entertaining than reprehensible; while a politician who is not something of a "card" stands little chance of success.

The third reason for the strength of the Democratic Party is of more serious political significance. While the Republicans have aligned themselves decisively with the forces of reaction, the Democrats have appropriated the verbalizations, at least, of the social unrest which is simmering throughout the state. In the governorship race, which is the hottest in the state, former Governor Roland H. Hartley, Republican, wealthy timberman from Everett, is campaigning on a platform of "If I was in Olympia I would smash the P.-I. strike"; but Governor Clarence D. Martin, Democrat, who refused to call out troops to break the strike, is standing on his record. Most of the Democratic candidates have at one time or another played around with EPIC or the utopians or the technocrats or, most recently, with the Townsendites and the Commonwealth Federation. The Republicans, on the other hand, get their only organizational support from the Washington Industrial Council, a group of industrialists who have raised a "war chest" of $15,000,000 to break union labor in Seattle. The Democratic vote comes to a great extent from organized labor in the cities of the coast and from the organized lumberjacks of the logging camps of the tall timber, while the Republican vote comes from the conservative, prosperous small farmers in the eastern part of the state.

The Democratic Party has proved itself infinitely shrewder, more realistic, more adaptable than the Republican, which, in this state at least, is about to commit political hara-kiri for its ideals. As cooperatives have sprung up and prospered, as EPIC and the Townsend plan have gained adherents, as organized labor has tightened its hold on the waterfront and the cities, the followers of Franklin Roosevelt have moved warily toward the left. Postmaster Farley need yet, however, have no fears, for the insincerity of these politicians is almost unquestionable. Mayor Dore of Seattle, who wavered noticeably over the Newspaper Guild strike, put the whole thing rather succinctly when he said of the strike: "Four or five days I didn't know where I was at, down at the bottom or on the top. But I know now that my political future is made."

The Democratic politicians can, in their enthusiasm for following trends, occasionally overstep themselves. When the last Democratic state convention allowed itself to be captured by the Commonwealth Federation, the step was premature. The Commonwealth Federation, an organization of technocrats, liberals, and Socialists, claiming a membership of 30,000 in the state, put forward a program demanding a system of production for use, which the convention indorsed. The Old Guard Democrats were forced to take a back seat, and Howard Costigan, young Commonwealth leader, a mural painter, was the tactician of the day. The solid lower middle class was frightened by the Federation, and labor was covertly contemptuous of its crackpot leanings. The primary on September 8 became the test of the strength of the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth lost out, on the whole, to the more conservative wing of the Democratic Party. While the primary fight lasted, however, the state was on fire. Neither Senator Bone nor Senator Schwollenbach came home to partake of things political; neither Senator was ever quoted during the campaign.

The interest in the primary centered in the contest for the gubernatorial nomination. Governor Martin was opposed by a fascinating political phenomenon, John C. Stevenson, mystery man. Stevenson, a big, bland, smooth, bald-headed man with a radio voice that sets old ladies a-weeping, was six years ago elected county commissioner for King County. His origins were at that time unknown, and they remain so. When he first appeared to take his seat as commissioner his citizenship was challenged. It was believed that he was a Canadian or even that he was a native of one of the Mediterranean countries. At the hearing he attested his citizenship, though he kept his birthplace secret, and declared that he had enlisted in the Canadian air service during the war and won a commission there. He refused to give the name under which he had served on the ground that it might incriminate him to do so. He was undoubtedly at one time a flier, and today he owns a $20,000 jet-black monoplane in which he soars over the Cascade foothills every time a posse goes out to round up a criminal suspect. He is a rich man. How he got his money has been a matter of speculation in and out of King County.

Several years ago he was indicted in Kings County, New York, under the name of John P. Stockman, for fraud in connection with a fake stock sale. He admitted that he was the Stockman wanted, but Governor Martin refused extradition, and eventually the charges were dropped. It is said that he got his start on the Coast as a sidewalk barker for the Painless Parker dentistry chain. Today he still talks, on the air, for Painless Parker, at a salary of $1,000 a week. He is undoubtedly the most colorful public character who has ever blossomed in the state, a Robin Hood who robs the rich to give to the poor, takes his own cut, and makes no bones about it. He pays political debts, and even his political enemies are his friends.

His defeat in the primaries was the most serious blow that liberal and labor groups have lately sustained, for it looked at first as if Stevenson would be able to unite the semi-radical workers of the cities with the back-country elements with which they have been traditionally at war. He was, on the one hand, the Commonwealth Federation's candidate, and at the same time he offered a one-hundred-dollar pension plan to the old folks, tax-free homes, and better electrical-distribution service for farms. He was beaten, however, partly by the farm people, who distrusted his new-fangled Commonwealth affiliation, and partly by the Republicans, who were allowed this year for the first time to vote in the Democratic primaries. Governor Martin, a conservative banker and wheat miller, ran about 40,000 votes ahead of Stevenson. Stevenson is temporarily out of politics, for his term as commissioner ends in January and he cannot be reelected. It is thought, however, that he will cut himself off from the Commonwealth, which at the last moment abandoned him by announcing a sticker ticket of its own for November. He will keep some of the Commonwealth principles, will consolidate his alliance with labor in the person of Dave Beck, Seattle labor czar, and with the machine in the person of Mayor Dore, and will make a determined effort to regain the confidence of his old constituents in the rural districts. He is still the most important man in the state and his political future is perhaps just beginning.

An ally of Stevenson's, Warren G. Magnuson, King County prosecutor, won by a large majority the Democratic race for Zioncheck's seat in Congress. Next to Stevenson Magnuson is Washington's most promising political figure. In the primary he got the Scandinavian vote, the Teamsters' Union vote, and the Commonwealth Federation vote. He himself used to carry ice, and still holds a Teamsters' Union card. He is a small, handsome man, under thirty-five, popular with women. He is a smart politician; he has the right affiliations; and he will probably be noticed in Congress.

Oddly enough, Vic Meyers, the band-leading lieutenant governor, was the most popular candidate in the primaries. He received the greatest number of votes, 100,000, ever given in recent years to a man running for nomination. He made a leisurely campaign, going into remote Indian reservations and playing tom-toms until he discovered that the Indians were not voting, playing the saxophone at Suquamish, sleeping in a bathtub full of warm water. He is well liked because he is lieutenant governor, and therefore never in a tight spot, and because he mastered Roberts's "Rules of Order" and ran capably one of the wildest legislatures in the history of government. He makes no promises, caters to no crowd, simply runs on his name. He was opposed by twenty-five or more candidates, all of whom fell miserably by the wayside.

With the primary showing the Democrats polling three and one-half times the Republican vote, the political tautness of the state is already relaxing. The local wiseacres have lost interest in the November election; they are now watching labor. Within the protective shell of the Democratic machine a vital new labor movement is developing. A battle for labor dominance is in the offing, and under a relatively stable, relatively sympathetic political regime it can be fought without fear. Labor for fifteen years or more has been ridden by an inferiority complex; it is only now beginning to measure its own strength. Since the débâcle of the general strike and the smashing of the I.W.W., the working class has felt itself insecure. For lack of anything better, it has accepted as its newspaper the Seattle Star, a Scripps League sheet supporting Landon for President. Regarding them as the least of possible evils, it has given its political support to a set of scoundrelly Democrats. Its one sincere political friend was Zioncheck, still idolized by the Seattle masses, which to this day believe that his final, tragic insanity was a myth created by the capitalist press.

The union leadership has been far from disinterested. Dave Beck has been used by the capitalists as a bogey man to frighten voters, but like the Democratic machine men with whom he is privately friendly, Beck will usually play ball. He has been denounced by the capitalists as a racketeer, and his attitudes, income, and appurtenances do not altogether belie the charge. Last year he paid taxes on an income of $39,000. Of this, he got $12,000 as the vice-president of the Teamsters' Union and their local international organizer, $5,700 as president of the local Teamsters' affiliates; the rest he attributes to some highly profitable "brewing interests." He owns several armored cars and rides about in them, guarded. Though he controls but 3 per cent of the Seattle Central Labor Council, his prestige and influence have been enormous. He has had a hand in the conduct and settlement of virtually every important strike in Seattle in recent years. Within the last few months, however, his hold on labor has been weakening. As he has grown increasingly conservative and therefore increasingly unreliable, a group of liberal unions—the Maritime Federation, the Metal Trades Council, the Printing Trades Council—and the rank-and-file of his own teamsters have begun to chafe under his dominance. Since the radical Maritime Federation is numerically far and away the most powerful unit in the Central Labor Council, and since the weaker unions look more and more to this solid, enlightened group for guidance, it seems certain that Dave Beck and all the old-line leadership must eventually go. If Seattle is to have another labor czar he will be a rank-and-file leader, a new Harry Bridges.

How the Democratic politicians will react to this shift in the labor movement is a question. There are indications that Stevenson stands ready to throw in his lot with the rank and file. Labor, however, has already commenced to take a different attitude toward the time-servers in office. The P.-I. strike has demonstrated to labor its own strength. Through years of sell-outs, the working class has learned to distrust the politicians; during the next four years it must learn to exact service from them or reject them.

The Future of Social Security

BY ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

II

THE illusions of the Social Security Act are due to the fact that its sponsors confused social insurance with private insurance. The enacted provisions totally disregard the world-wide experience with social insurance. Although social insurance is employed by practically all industrial countries—whether capitalist, communist, fascist, monarchic, or democratic—its essential aims remain a mystery in the United States to this day. Without bothering to find out what it was about, American business leaders for years maligned every program of social insurance. Even our universities displayed no interest in the subject. Old-age insurance was hardly discussed in this country. Outside of an inadequate study by the writer in 1926, no investigation was ever made and not a single significant article was published on the subject prior to the formulation of the present program by the Committee on Economic Security. The voluminous literature on unemployment insurance is still chaotic. The simple aim of unemployment insurance—to protect unemployed workers—continues to be confused with industrial stabilization and with diverse panaceas and cure-alls for the total abolition of unemployment.

The framers of the Social Security Act found it difficult to cope with the prevailing confusion. President Roosevelt intrusted the elaboration of the program to a committee composed of the busiest members of his Cabinet. Only one of the experts, with the committee but a short time, was identified with social insurance. In the few months given them the galaxy of economists and governmental administrators could not be expected to grasp the fundamentals of such a complex subject.

The act was based on the principles of private insurance because to this day there has been in the United States no understanding of the fundamental differences between the social-insurance device for meeting collective social problems and the scheme of private insurance to meet individual problems. Social insurance seeks not only the widest distribution of the risk but the widest distribution of the costs in order to extend its protective possibilities. Unlike private insurance, which seeks to compensate a single person for a single risk, social insurance aims at the collective protection of workers against economic hazards. For this reason it does not matter in social insurance whether the persons bearing the risk pay the contributions themselves; what matters is that those who suffer most should receive the greatest protection. A social-insurance fund is solvent even if part or all of its funds come from general taxation. The emphasis here is on protection rather than on the possibilities of the actuarial premiums. Whereas in private insurance, where all funds come solely from premiums, the benefits must be determined by the premiums, the benefits in social insurance are weighted by governmental social policy rather than by the calculations of the actuary.

Because social insurance seeks social protection, it endeavors to establish a degree of economic balance in the national economy by preventing mass purchasing power from falling below a set minimum base. This is achieved by guaranteeing an income to those who, through no fault of their own, cannot earn it, by means of governmental financial help derived from progressive taxation. The purchasing power of the masses is augmented by a more equitable distribution of the national income. In order to meet the immediate problem of destitution, the government must finance these programs to the extent of its ability. Such programs are considered "social insurance" and not relief whenever the law guarantees the allowances and assures their payment. The stricter mechanism familiar to private insurance is used only to the extent that the government can relieve itself of its future burden without endangering the economic structure.

This concept of social insurance is no longer a matter of theory. It is the only form which has proved successful abroad. Even under a limited program of this nature Great Britain is emerging from the depression on a sounder basis than any other country. The British index of unemployment throughout the prolonged depression never declined halfway to the level reached in the United States. Industrial production for the home market was hardly affected because workers' purchasing power was buttressed by social-insurance income. The number of unemployed has been reduced by more than one-third during the past three years. Wages were maintained at a practically even level throughout the years of depression, while the cost-of-living index declined considerably, thus definitely raising the standard of British workers.

No such conception of social insurance prevails in the United States. The social phase of social insurance is disregarded here. The role of progressive taxation for social security is not comprehended. Thinking only in terms of private insurance and the building of reserves in good times for rainy days, Americans insist that "industry must pay for the ills it causes" and that workers must secure protection only through their own and their employers' contributions. This complete misconception accounts for the inequities and lack of realism of the Social Security Act. The Cabinet committee itself in its report to the President said that "a program of economic security for the nation that does not include those now unemployed cannot possibly be complete." But instead of facing the issue squarely by meeting this problem with governmental aid through the social-insurance program, the committee merely left the entire army of the present unemployed to the mercies of Mr. Hopkins's variegated experimentation. The same fallacious reasoning accounts for the act's ignoring of the problem of the unemployed subsequent to the short benefit period and for its perilous old-age insurance system.

However, the Social Security Act is already on the statute books. Its passage commits the United States to governmental action. The desirability and necessity of social security are recognized. The act does establish federal responsibility for social welfare even though the government largely evades its financial responsibility. But the envisioned objectives cannot be achieved by illusory methods. The deficiencies of the act must be eliminated so that the United States, like other industrial nations, may profit from a constructive social-insurance program.

Fortunately, the mistakes embodied in the old-age-insurance plan can be easily repaired. No part of this plan comes into operation before 1937. Annuities are not to be paid before 1942, and the immediate taxes are set on a small scale. Congress can still correct the errors, and if the Supreme Court sustains this national plan, a genuine achievement in social progress will be attained.

A summary of the deficiencies of the plan indicates the necessary remedies. The defects of the annuity plan arise from the New Deal attempt, contrary to all experience, to establish a self-sustaining fund in the shortest possible time in order to escape governmental responsibility for a generation of aged not previously provided for. It is this ambition which fosters the high premium rates, the huge reserves with their inherent dangers, and the inadequacy of the annuities. But the government cannot recklessly shift to the younger workers the community's responsibility for the older groups, who even with their employers are unable to make sufficient contributions for an adequate annuity at sixty-five. The government must provide for these groups either through an adequate non-contributory pension system or by adding sufficient sums to the insurance annuities to assure a decent competence. To do this, the act must be changed along the following lines:

1. The contribution rates should be reduced from the ultimate 6 per cent of wages reached in the next twelve years to an ultimate maximum of 3 or 4 per cent of wages by both employers and employees, to be attained in the next twenty or thirty years. This will eliminate the dangers of overburdening industry and accumulating large reserves. The present pay-roll tax of 1 per cent can be retained. The increase in the rates should be made to occur, however, every five years, as suggested by the President's Committee on Economic Security, or preferably every ten years as in England. The exact figures can be determined actuarially on the basis of sound social policy.

2. To provide for persons who will reach sixty-five in the next ten to fifteen years, before substantial annuities can be built up, the government may limit itself to grants-in-aid to all needy aged. The present federal pension subsidy should be increased, adequate standards for the states set up, and residence qualifications reduced to meet the problem of migratory workers. The government may further help during this intermediate period by returning part or all of their contributions to those who have been in the insurance system for at least five years. If these sums are not considered part of the assets of applicants for non-contributory pensions, a larger income is assured to those who made contributions.

3. The government may follow the British system by granting adequate flat annuities of, say, $40 a month in 1942 or sooner to every insured person and his wife without a means test. The deficit incurred because of grants to those who have not financed their own annuities would be made up by the government from current progressive taxation, as is done in Britain. The contributions may be set in such a manner that only those joining the fund at the age of twenty or twenty-five will accumulate, by their own and their employers' contributions, an adequate competence. This governmental contribution, gradually reduced, may perhaps be eliminated in half a century.

Greater difficulty is met in attempting to remedy the present unemployment-insurance plan, since this part of the act is already functioning and any changes in the federal act have to be incorporated in the fifteen laws already enacted. The need for change, however, is even more urgent here. The necessary amendments are also apparent from the plan's flaws, which are due to the fact that the federal government attempts to avoid its responsibility to the unemployed in the future through the insurance system, even though for the past several years it has been spending and must continue to spend billions of dollars in expensive and ineffective relief. The necessary changes in this part of the act can be made by facing the problem realistically. They are as follows:

1. A national system of unemployment insurance may create great constitutional and administrative difficulties. The enactment and administration of unemployment-insurance laws may therefore be left to the states. A truly effective stimulus for states to enact such laws must be provided, however. This can best be accomplished by granting to the states federal subsidies covering the full cost of the unemployment benefits, upon condition that definite minimum standards are incorporated in the state laws. A state which enacts an acceptable law would be subsidized to the full amount of the pay-roll tax raised in that state. In addition, whenever these funds prove insufficient for the stipulated benefit period, the federal government would supplement them from progressive taxation. The duplicating tax and pay-roll records would thus be eliminated by the retention of only the one general federal tax on employers, augmented perhaps by a small levy on workers, which is justified on many grounds. Such a plan would not only involve fewer constitutional difficulties but assure an adequate and uniform system of unemployment insurance throughout the country and provide an effective method of meeting the needs of the great majority of unemployed.

2. The benefit period must be extended to at least twenty-six weeks. This is now impossible in most states because, although contributions are uniform in all the states, the percentage of unemployment varies sharply from state to state. Only contributions by the federal government can level out the differences. This wider program would not entail much additional cost to the federal government since there would be a corresponding reduction in our present expenditures on WPA and PWA.

3. The revised plan must, as in Great Britain, also provide for supplementary benefits, at least to those in need, after the stipulated regular benefit period. Unemployment relief must be integrated with unemployment insurance, and our whole relief system must be recast. The problem of unemployment cannot be attacked on an emergency basis. Only incorrigible optimists believe that the return of prosperity will abolish the need for further unemployment relief. The question of relief for the unemployed is a national problem which cannot be relegated to the individual states. It is impossible to provide constructive work-relief for all the millions of unemployed for many years to come. Constructive public works can take care of a certain portion of the unemployed. On these normal wages should be paid. Useless work represents pure waste of public funds. The present WPA is not only doing incalculable harm to American wage scales but in turning its workers over to regular governmental departments is helping to conceal the costs of public administration. The claims of psychological benefits to workers on work-relief are grossly exaggerated. Handling a shovel does not add to the dignity of a skilled worker.

When granted on a dignified and assured basis, adequate direct relief is not degrading. It is its present uncertainty and the stigma attached to it which embitter the recipients. That public schools are supported by taxpayers as a whole does not make people hesitate to send their children to them. When unemployment is of short duration systematic relief is not harmful, since the worker feels on a vacation. For those who are unemployed for a long period more vitalizing programs than made work are essential for morale. Under any conditions, work-relief is extremely expensive, and for a given cost many more unemployed could be sustained on dignified relief. It is the high cost of work-relief which causes the federal government to consign millions of unemployed to the states for whatever insufficient help they can render. Direct unemployment relief could be made dignified and certain through a comprehensive system of public employment exchanges where the unemployed would register for work and employers would be encouraged to register their vacancies. The genuinely unemployed would be entitled to certain relief merely by evidencing their willingness to work; the slackers would be effectively eliminated. This system would also make possible the acceptance of temporary jobs, now shunned by persons on relief because of the difficulty of getting back on the relief rolls.

Despite its glittering title the Social Security Act does not establish security. Its most important provisions are pregnant with grave dangers. Since the American people are definitely committed to social security, political or personal considerations must not be permitted to thwart their urgent needs and desires. The good already won must not be lost. A constructive plan of social insurance can provide a measure of security for the workers of America. To delay the necessary corrective action is to court disaster and shatter the hopes of a long-suffering people.

Danzig Under the Terror

BY HENRY C. WOLFE

EVENTS in the so-called Free City of Danzig appear to be moving toward a climax. Violent Nazi persecution of the helpless opposition proceeds in the guise of a crusade against bolshevism. The League of Nations "promotes" its Commissioner in Danzig to a post in Geneva, thereby removing the one man from the outside who has courageously opposed the march of Hitlerism into the Free City. The League Council, recognizing the crisis, invites Poland "to seek means for putting an end to the obstruction offered by the Danzig government to the High Commissioner," and to report at the Council's January meeting. Geneva's sudden occupation with the Danzig problem, though encouraging, may have come too late.

Danzig's position as an independent state is based on Articles 100-108 of the Treaty of Versailles and on the Danzig-Polish agreements. The original plan was to provide Poland with an outlet to the sea. The mouth of the Vistula was to be neutral territory. Were Danzig to become part of the Reich, it would have practically no economic hinterland and would rapidly sink to the economic status of Stettin or Lubeck.

But it is not the economic welfare of the Free City that interests the Nazis. They are consumed with the desire to destroy the hated democratic opposition and remove the constant threat to Hitler's prestige that will continue as long as the city is nominally independent. In spite of a violent drive directed and financed from Berlin, the Nazis polled barely 59 per cent of the vote in the election last year. The opposition maintains that a free plebiscite would show the Nazis to be a minority in Danzig. Such a showing would have a devastating effect on National Socialist prestige throughout Europe. At all costs Hitler must prevent such a development. The surest method is to smash the opposition.

On the evening of June 12 a group of German Nationalists—conservative members of the opposition—were holding a meeting in the St. Joseph Haus, a Catholic restaurant. Hundreds of Nazi storm troopers suddenly appeared on the scene, and a riot ensued in which several persons were killed. Two days later Hitler's personal representative, Herr Forster, made the statement that within three weeks the opposition parties would be suppressed.

The Poles were suddenly alarmed. The aftermath of that Nazi riot was an invitation sent from Warsaw to Paris for General Gamelin, French Chief of Staff, to visit the Polish military leader, General Rydz-Smigly, in August. The first week of September found Rydz-Smigly in France, visiting officials, watching military maneuvers, strengthening the Franco-Polish alliance, and arranging for a French credit for Polish purchase of armaments. This undoubtedly came as a shock to Berlin, just as it came as a surprise to other capitals. To counteract the effects of the diplomatic defeat, Hitler whipped up the Communist scare at the Nürnberg congress.

Unhappily Poland's rebuke to Germany does not solve the problems of the Danzig opposition. Nothing less than energetic action by the League and Poland can check the Nazi terror which grips the Free City. That the Nazis have little respect for Geneva was demonstrated by Herr Greiser's sensational gesture at a League session last July. Consequently, Sean Lester of Ireland, the League's Commissioner in Danzig, has held one of the most discouraging jobs in the world. Not only has he had to put up with continual Nazi abuse, but the utter lack of power to enforce his decisions has made his position at once futile and anomalous. A strong stand by the League might protect Danzig's citizens from the Nazi terror. If the League powers mean business, they can count on Polish support, because Warsaw is now thoroughly awake to the danger of Nazi aggression. The Poles realize that if the Reich seizes Danzig, Berlin's next move will be against Pomorze (the Corridor).

In the meantime Nazi pressure against the opposition continues. Citizens are taken into "protective custody," which means that they disappear into a Nazi jail. Freedom of the press has ceased to exist in Danzig. No publication can legally appear that criticizes National Socialism. On the other hand, the Free City is flooded with propaganda from the Reich; the notorious Julius Streicher's anti-Semitic Stürmer is pushed for sale by the Nazis, and one sees its slogan, "Die Juden sind Unser Unglück," posted on houses and windows everywhere in Danzig. During August an anti-Jewish boycott was started with the blessing of the Free City's Supreme Court. Danzig's Jewish citizens had protested against a poster displayed in the municipal health-insurance office urging people not to patronize Jewish merchants. The court, which is dominated by the Nazis, rejected the protest on the surprising ground that the boycott is part of the National Socialist Party's anti-Semitic program.

The hopelessness of the opposition's cause is recognized nowhere more clearly than in Danzig itself. One can but marvel at the moral courage of men who continue the struggle against such odds. They know only too well that a sudden shift of the European political winds could place them at the mercy of their Nazi enemies. They know that Berlin hopes Poland will become so engrossed in a quarrel with Czecho-Slovakia or in internal problems that Warsaw will have to turn its back on Danzig. They know they are opposing a ruthless dictatorship and the most powerful military machine in the world. Yet they carry on. As Lord Robert Cecil said not long ago, the Danzig situation is a "symptom of war."

A Farmer Candidate

BY JAMES RORTY

ON THE platform George Nelson, Socialist candidate for Vice-President in this election, took a hitch in his pants, adjusted his steel-rimmed spectacles, peered a little apprehensively at his metropolitan audience, and began: "Brothers and Sisters."

That's the way the radical farmers do it in the dairy states, just before they stop a foreclosure or regretfully spill some milk, and that's the way Nelson does it, no matter what audience he is talking to. The Socialist Throttlebottom is no actor—he can only be himself. But, in the language of Broadway, the performance is a wow. Seldom has the American electorate been treated to a performance of such simple, earnest, grass-roots authenticity. He has been a surprise even to his party coworkers. Appearing on the same platform with Norman Thomas, one of the most experienced and accomplished orators in American public life, Nelson has come close to stealing the show more than once—much to his own embarrassment.

The worn phrases of Karl Marx come suddenly to life again when uttered by this Wisconsin farmer with the big hands and feet, the tall, lean-muscled body toughened by a half-century of hard manual work, and the soft, patient voice, burred with a strong Danish accent. He "gentles" his audiences the way he would soothe a fractious colt, and then tells them, quite uncompromisingly and a little sadly, all that he thinks and believes about the problems of the American farmer and of the nation as a whole.

Nelson was born in the panic year of '73 in a log shack built in the clearing his father, a Danish immigrant, had hacked out of the virgin hardwood forest, using an ax he made himself in a Chicago machine-shop. That ax, a gun, a hoe, a cookstove, and four chairs constituted the total assets of this pioneer family when they settled in Polk County in 1869. It was seven years after that before they had even a plow or a horse to drag it. Meanwhile they scratched the soil around the stumps, fished, hunted, and befriended their few neighbors—the Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, Irish, and Germans who were fighting the forest with equally primitive tools and laying the foundations of the future state of Wisconsin.

Hard necessity made mutual help the first law of the frontier. But to this necessity were joined the cultural patterns which these Scandinavian pioneers brought from the motherland. Before Nelson's father left Denmark, the folk schools were already laying the foundations of the Danish cooperative system. Hence it was natural that the Nelsons—there were seven children in the family—should take a leading part in the establishment of Polk County's first cooperative. It consisted of a log cabin in West Denmark and a home-made churn. For paid employees there were a woman butter-maker and a man to collect the cream.

Beside butter, the Polk County pioneers had one other cash crop, without which they could scarcely have survived. It was children. Almost as soon as he was big enough to wield a pitchfork, Nelson remembers going south in the harvest season to work in the wheat fields. If the crop was good, the workers got paid. Otherwise not. His father and brother did the same thing, and in the winter they worked in the logging camps; the girls as they grew up worked in the hotels and restaurants of the growing cities. Never in his memory, says Nelson, has Polk County agriculture been really self-supporting. All the pioneer families had to export labor. Always they hoped that times would get better, that as the reward of their heart-breaking labor they would some day be able to stay on the farm and get a living out of the soil. The storekeeper, they noticed, made a go of it; his standard of living rose much faster than theirs. Something was wrong. Would consumer cooperation cure it?

"No," says Nelson, himself a devout cooperator and one of the leaders of the cooperative movement in the Lake States. "A cooperative movement built alongside of and within the capitalist system is not enough. What's the sense of being cooperators 364 days of the year, and then, on the 365th day, going to the polls and voting, as Democrats or Republicans, for the fellows that skin us? Cooperation is a good crutch to limp with, but we'll never be able to stand on our two feet until the farmers and workers cooperatize the whole system and build socialism. That's what cooperation means if you think it through."

How soon that will be Nelson doesn't know. He is a patient man, and takes the arduous labor of the campaign as just another of the tough chores he has been doing all his life. In his teens and twenties he worked all over the Middle West and West—in the coal and silver mines of Nevada, in the logging camps and lumber mills, even for a period of three years as a placer miner in the Yukon. From that adventure he returned with just enough dust and nuggets to add another block of cutover land to his paternal inheritance of eighty acres and build a house for his bride. Today he has 140 acres of tilled land, 240 acres of pasture, an uncomfortably large mortgage at the bank, and eight children. He isn't a subsistence farmer any more. On paper, at least, he is a substantial landed proprietor. Yet he and his children are in some respects less secure and less hopeful than were his pioneer father and mother when they were so deep in the woods they never heard of the panic of '73.

Nelson has been a cooperator as long as he can remember, and in the early nineties he helped to form the first local of the Socialist Party in Polk County. He has always been a little ahead of his people, yet always close enough to deserve and receive repeated evidence of their respect and confidence. For nine years he was president of the Wisconsin Society of Equity and editor of its journal. Today, in addition to being the Socialist candidate for Vice-President, he is vice-president of the Farm Holiday Association and a director of the Farmers' Union. He is sixty-three years old, hasn't a gray hair in his head, and is as tough as hickory. For nearly half a century he has been a working farmer, a working cooperator, and a working Socialist.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

VISITING the other day in the office of one of the leading Connecticut newspapers I found an amazing difference of opinion among the editorial staff as to whether the Democrats or Republicans will carry that state. Finally the managing editor told me of the conditions in the office. The business department, he said, including the advertising solicitors, clerks, and so on, is unanimously for Landon. The editorial floor he described as "spotty," with both candidates strongly represented, while the top floor, filled with compositors, was unanimously for Roosevelt. I told him that I thought this portrayed the situation throughout the country in a nutshell. Everywhere business men and those who are possessed of considerable means and are naturally conservative are almost unanimously for the Republican candidate. They are not impressed by Mr. Landon and they admit that his speeches are "terrible"; I have yet to hear a word of enthusiasm about him from any Republican. But that makes no difference. They would be voting for William Randolph Hearst if the Republicans had chosen him as their standard bearer. The sentiment among the business men in a large Connecticut city with which I am familiar is such that there is very little exaggeration in the statement made to me by a friend that anybody in that circle who declared that he was going to vote for Roosevelt was considered a fit subject for a commission of inquiry into his sanity. There never was greater unanimity among the heads of corporations, vice-presidents, and general managers, and it extends down even to small independent business men, who sincerely believe that the corporation-surplus tax will mean the end of their businesses within two years.

But on the other hand there is an extraordinary unity of opinion among the workers both in and out of the labor unions. Correspondents who have traveled with the President in this campaign and who traveled with him four years ago are unanimous in saying that the greetings given to the President in the mining areas of West Virginia and Pennsylvania go farther than any they have ever witnessed in enthusiasm and apparently genuine personal devotion. The workers have come to feel that he is their champion, their friend, and that the New Deal, whatever its faults, was meant to help them as no other Administration has ever sought to help them. In this sense we are witnessing the most clear-cut class struggle in our history. The top and the bottom will be solidly arrayed against each other, and as I see it, the only question is whether the middle class will favor Landon in sufficient numbers to outvote labor—that is, if labor stands firm until Election Day. When I remember how labor went back on La Follette in the 1924 campaign and how the New York City organization flopped from La Follette to the Republicans in the last week of the struggle, I confess to having some anxiety as to whether the labor leaders will stand fast until the end of the campaign. I do not believe that the miners and the mass of the workers who turn out for Roosevelt wherever he appears, often without the slightest instigation by the party organization, can be won away from the President, but unfortunately labor leaders can be bought and have been bought, and there can be no question that the Republicans will stop at nothing in spending the $8,000,000 they plan to disburse.

There is also great danger that as usual the Republican employers will stop at nothing to try to frighten or dragoon their workers into voting against Roosevelt. Before me lies a copy of the house organ of a large Connecticut corporation containing pictures of Nazi girls being regimented and drilled and of the fascist pawns of Mussolini being marched about by their officers. Then there is a picture of care-free and happy American men walking along in an irregular group, all smiles and good cheer. The text declares that this election is going to decide whether Americans will be similarly regimented or remain free and happy citizens. It leaves no doubt about where the management stands. This is pretty shortsighted business, because it is going to make any intelligent workman resent the effort to tell him how to vote. And it is not likely that the attempt to win the election by terror will stop at this sort of thing. It never has stopped there in the past. There have been times when the state of Wisconsin has been covered with billboards assuring the voters that if the La Follette ticket should win, the state's factories would fold up or move away. The full-dinner-pail argument which won at least two elections for the Republicans can hardly be worked this year when it is Roosevelt who is filling the dinner pails in larger and larger degree. But we must be prepared in the closing days of the campaign for even more hysterical charges than we have yet had that we are being sold out to the bolsheviks and that the fate of the American Republic is at stake. If we come to Election Day without some sort of Zinoviev letter, of the type that the Conservatives forged to unseat Ramsay MacDonald's Labor Government in England, we shall be lucky.

Fortunately elections are over soon, and whichever side wins we are not yet facing a genuine class struggle. Whether the lines will be more sharply drawn four years from now if a strong Farmer-Labor Party is put in the field remains to be seen. But if the masters of privilege and property find that even with Mr. Roosevelt reelected the Republic survives and their dividends continue, they will again begin to divide along the old party lines.

Gardenia Bill

"PRETEND to be talking very earnestly," said the older reporter, "or it's a cinch he'll sit down and give us a chapter from his unwritten autobiography."

"Who will?" said Tom Sykes.

"That old bore heading in this direction from the free-lunch counter. Name's Broun. He says he used to be a newspaperman. That was back in 1936 and so nobody around here can remember."

The advice had come too late. The old gentleman had found the empty chair and plopped into it. "Hate to drink alone or talk alone," he said. "Blake's isn't what it used to be thirty years ago. People stayed up then and listened to conversation."

"Like what?" asked the older reporter.

"You may well ask," said the old gentleman. "We will not hear their like again—Swope and Woolcott and Quentin Reynolds. In those days it was just one gag after another. You think I talk a good deal."

"I think you talk too much if you're asking an honest opinion," replied the older reporter, whose name was Sam McHenry.

"Well," said the old gentleman, not in the least abashed, "thirty years ago they called me Silent Broun or sometimes Humble Heywood. 'I guess Roy Howard's got your tongue,' they used to say down at the office. Would you like to hear how I cured myself of being so reticent?"

"Not particularly," said Sam McHenry.

"He must have his joke," the old gentleman continued, turning to the less rebellious of the two victims. "I cured myself by finding two attentive listeners just before going to bed every night and telling them one of my famous stories."

"Have a heart, Pop," exclaimed McHenry, "I still have a Sunday theater piece to do tonight."

"Good, you can use this story about Gardenia Bill. I don't even want any credit. Did you ever hear of a musical show called 'Shoot the Works' which was produced before you were born?"

Both young men confessed complete ignorance.

"I guess," said the old man, "it wouldn't have made very much difference if you had been born. Nobody heard about the show anyway. I was in it myself. It didn't run long. I lost $14,000 and met my wife, but I wouldn't call the whole thing disastrous."

"We had a man who could sing. His first name was Bill. The last could have been O'Connor but it escapes me. He sang something about 'Hot moonlight! Hypnotic moonlight!' I used to know it all. Quite a voice! Quite a voice! But at the end of a couple of weeks he came to me and said he was going to quit. You see it was a cooperative show. Whatever money came in we divided up, and if there wasn't any we divided that up, too. The first week Bill got three or four hundred dollars. That wasn't so bad, but the next week a certain number of people had seen the show and were telling others about it, so nobody very much came. Bill only got $75 that week.

"He had a right to resign but there was no way to pay him any more money or get anybody in his place, and so I went home and thought very seriously and finally I called in my secretary and said, 'Send four gardenias to the theater tonight to Bill and inclose some sort of romantic note.' 'Like what?' said my secretary, who wasn't romantic. 'Oh, tell him that you come every night to 'Shoot the Works' just to hear him sing.'

"Thirty years ago actors were susceptible to flattery. At least Bill was. When I came into the theater, he was showing everybody the flowers and the note. 'I think I recognize her,' he said. 'She's a tall, blonde girl and she sits every night in the tenth row.' I hadn't told anybody where the gardenias came from but they laughed at Bill just the same. All of us in the troupe knew that it was most unlikely that anybody should be sitting in the tenth row. It had been days and days since the audience ran back of the fifth row. Still it was possible for us to stagger along in our co-operative way if only we could continue to hold Bill in the cast.

"Saturday was the time he had announced for quitting, and so on Friday I urged my secretary to outdo herself in the fervency of the note which she placed with the flowers. Unfortunately she was not up to the task. I had to write that mash missive myself. I remember I burned it with the end of my cigar to indicate a truly flaming passion.

"Before the curtain went up, Bill came around to the star's dressing-room which I occupied with four other performers. 'Forget about my notice,' he said. 'Money isn't everything. I'm having a good time. I'm going to stick along. The show must go on and all the rest of that bally rot.'

"That's shorter than most your stories," said Sam McHenry grudgingly.

"And that's because I'm not finished yet. I sent the gardenias again on Monday. I wanted to make sure and I told my secretary to inclose a farewell note. 'We can't afford to be sending these flowers,' I said. 'They cost us $3 every night. Say in your note this time that you've got to go away on a brief vacation and that you hope he'll still be there when you get back.'

"Bill remained with us during the entire eleven weeks. He was quite happy and contented. He was waiting for the girl of the gardenias to come back."

"And so the joke was on him," said Tom Sykes.

"Well, not exactly. You see she told him about the trick I was playing. She thought it was mean and so did he, and so they got married. Still, she wasn't a very good secretary."

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

SCHOLARSHIP BY PROXY

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

I HAVE on my desk a series of four mimeographed sheets containing a list of some two hundred American actresses of the past and present. The remainder of each page is occupied by five parallel columns headed "Rank as an Actress," "Popular Appeal," "Beneficial Influence on Theatrical and Dramatic Standards," and so on; and accompanying the whole is a letter from a professor in an Eastern university asking me please to "rank the names under each heading from 1 to 3, using 3 to indicate greatest importance."

If I were to write the "scholar" who makes the request that I shall certainly do nothing of the kind, that my offhand opinion on the subject is of no conceivable value, and that a compilation of a thousand such offhand opinions will be worth not one iota more, he would probably set me down as a nasty, uncooperative curmudgeon. Hence I shall not even bother to write the letter, but it is high time that American universities should halt not only the mania for senseless questionnaires but the whole tendency to permit both professors and so-called "research students" to ask other people to do their work for them. The abuse of the questionnaire has been discussed rather frequently, but no one, so far as I am aware, has publicly protested to the universities themselves against the nuisance and the folly of the lazy student who is apparently permitted to believe that when he has collected five hundred random opinions signed by five hundred miscellaneous "names" he has made a contribution to knowledge and become a scholar worthy to be dignified by a sheepskin which proclaims him Doctor of Philosophy—of all things!

So far as I know, none of the older and more distinguished universities has yet fallen so low, but there is no one in even the humblest of public positions who does not almost weekly receive fantastic requests which betray not only the most debased possible conception of the meaning of research but a plain cheek which it is difficult to comprehend. Very recently, to take a typical example, I was visited by a so-called student from a New York institution of higher learning who asked me, with poised notebook, "my relation to contemporary literature," and then, after I had mumbled something or other, informed me with considerable enthusiasm that a collection of such opinions was to constitute his "thesis," that it would be nice if I would sign his notes, and that perhaps when the collection was complete The Nation would like to buy it for publication. Not very long before, I had received from a Ph.D. candidate in a Middle Western university a request for a list of the most significant modern plays of all countries, accompanied by the charming admission that as he was writing a thesis on the subject, he would like to be told which works it would be most worth his while to read.

I was, I am proud to boast, less appalled by the calm effrontery of the demand, and the apparent assumption that I would be only too glad to spend a few weeks compiling such a list, than I was by the naivete of the mind which could take it for granted that the proper way to investigate the significance of the modern drama was to read only the plays which someone else had decided to be significant. But what is to be expected of students when their professors can write such letters as that which I received a few weeks ago from one of them, which ran as follows?

I have just returned from a five weeks' stay in the Soviet Union, making a study of the press. In the course of things the editor of the monthly Literary Critic asked me to prepare an article on the influence of Maxim Gorki on American writers.

As I know next to nothing about it, I am asking American writers themselves if they have felt this influence, in themselves or in others, and what it has been or may be.

I hope that my approaching you for a few lines on this subject may not be a nuisance, and I think it would be well to add that I am not accepting payment for the job.

Each of these correspondents I answered with a polite note. I see little to be gained by private rudeness even in response to gall of such quintessential strength, but some useful purpose might possibly, I think, be served by asking my correspondents, and more especially the institutions by which they are sponsored, a few simple questions. Precisely what abilities are being demonstrated and what training is being received by the New York student who is popping in and out of offices and studies asking a very miscellaneous group of journalists and writers "their relation to contemporary literature"? What kind of original scholarship is likely to be produced by a student who gets his working bibliography at second hand from a dramatic critic who dashes off a list of plays? And, finally, what business has a college professor to agree to write an article on a subject which, he is ready to admit, he knows "next to nothing about"?

At various times the research conducted in American graduate schools has come in for a good deal of criticism—some of it justified and some of it not. Along with a good deal that is mediocre the accumulated doctoral dissertations issued by Harvard, Columbia, Yale, and some of the lesser institutions include quite a few works of substantial merit and quite a few more which represent sound honest work in the investigation of topics which may be of no particular intrinsic importance but which have served, nevertheless, both to demonstrate the ability of the student and to afford him some training in the methods of research. It is also true that certain purely statistical studies would not be possible without the use of the questionnaire. It is sometimes necessary to count heads, and there are occasions when the count itself is significant. But a compilation of opinions remains merely a compilation of opinions. Scholarship consists in special knowledge, not in the cumulation of ignorances, and there is no possible justification for the sort of thing I have been describing. It is far worse than any of the various varieties of Alexandrianism which tend to infect institutions of learning. It is dishonest, it is ungentlemanly, and worst of all it is plain silly.

BOOKS

Young Man in War Time

SHERSTON'S PROGRESS. By Siegfried Sassoon. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

MR. SASSOON continues here, and possibly concludes, his largely autobiographical chronicle of George Sherston. For those who have read the "Memoirs of a Fox-hunting Man" and the "Memoirs of an Infantry Officer" this book may prove a valuable extension of earlier experiences; for those who, like myself, have not, it must come as a very great disappointment. Its shortcomings are scarcely atoned for by its undeniable honesty, and scarcely annulled because the story has a certain interest it was never intended to have. Quite without meaning to, as it happens, Mr. Sassoon has written a document, almost an exposé, of the eternal Englishman incapable of rising above himself. In Sherston's case there can be no doubt that traditional values won out over an attempted independence of mind.

Second Lieutenant George Sherston went on strike against the war. But his pacifism led him, not before a court-martial, but into a hospital for the "shell-shocked." There a psychiatrist, as clever as he was calm, coupled with plenty of good food and golf, restored Sherston to sanity. He decided finally to return to the front, did so, found the job not too awful, was wounded, and ended up in a rather nobler type of hospital where members of the royal family stopped by his bed to offer forty-five seconds' worth of polite sympathy. At this point the narrative ends, with Sherston as muddled as ever and given to rather vague—and glib—interrogations that may be taken to express his partial dissatisfaction with the universe.

As a transcript of a young man's actual emotions in war time, the book is convincing enough. You must, however, regard the young man as extremely average, with no real self-knowledge and no fixed scale of values. He is anybody who has seen the blood and horror of war, which is a great deal less than we suppose Sherston to have been. Furthermore, seeing that almost twenty years lie between Sherston's experiences and the writing of them down, one looks for a sense of perspective, a revision of values, a growth of understanding that one nowhere encounters. This is what happened to Sherston, and so far as the book is concerned, nothing ever happened afterward.

There is possibly an argument in favor of presenting things simply as they were, of leaving them inclosed within their own time and place, without hindsight, without revaluation; though it is not easy to put it forward here, since the Sherston of today constantly, and pointedly, keeps interjecting himself into the picture. But what is really wrong with the book is the portrait of Sherston as he then was: a man so quickly able to accommodate himself, after one flare of defiance, to prevailing sentiment. It is not that Sherston was either a weak or a cowardly person. It is rather that his rebelliousness was only superimposed on his profoundly English nature. It would be unfair to say that, after coming out against war and all it signified, he traduced his principles; rather he changed his mind, regained the national disease of "seeing things through," saw them through, and ended up pleased that the royal family should stand by his hospital bed and confer its verbal largess. In other words, Sherston rebelled under stress of feeling, then conformed again under stress of feeling; throughout the ordeal he was altogether the victim of his emotions.

This is not enough to create, for me, a provocative book. Set against any of the better narratives of the war by Continental writers, "Sherston's Progress" seems not only confused but confused in an immature and childish way. In Mr. Sassoon's book there is simply no evidence of a thinking mind; there is neither psychological nor philosophical substance. There is only a young man who lets himself in for a bad quarter of an hour and then, not because he lacks courage but because he lacks conviction, falls back into the ranks. His real interests are golf, chasing the fox, reading poetry: is it too cynical to think at times that his real objection to the war is its interfering with these pleasures?

KIT BRANDON. A PORTRAIT. By Sherwood Anderson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

MR. ANDERSON'S new heroine is a poor mountain girl of east Tennessee. Well, she grows up there . . . you would have to have lived there yourself, in Tennessee or North Carolina, or maybe only in the mountains of Virginia, to understand just what kind of a hillside farm her father had . . . he was dark, with white, white teeth . . . Mr. Anderson would describe the farm except that there aren't any words in English that would really serve the purpose . . . gullied fields . . . the TVA may change all that . . . and a lot of laurel . . . there would be smoke rising some days from over behind the laurel, and that would be where Kit's father had his still . . . he was darker than her mother, who was so lazy that Kit didn't have much use for her, but this wasn't exactly because her teeth weren't white too, like his . . . teeth, teeth, rows of them in this modern America of ours . . . and maybe more fathers than we know who would try to do to their daughters what Kit's father tried . . . only tried . . . to do to her one evening when they were through working in the fields and were on the way home along down through the brush . . . only tried . . . for Kit was even then beginning to be a woman, and there is a strange thing about women . . . American women, Turkish women, it doesn't matter where or who . . . they may be easy to put something over on but then again they may not . . . sometimes it looks as if they knew what they wanted and when they wanted it . . . there is something in them, Mr. Anderson will tell you, that cannot be corrupted . . . and yet these very women we are talking about, we men sitting at our typewriters here in modern, oh, maybe too modern America . . . they can be beasts too, can roll in offal . . . and never be changed a particle . . .

The point is that Kit left the farm right then and there . . . it would have been a hillside farm, and she would have had to walk down, down a long way in her thin dress . . . no shoes, either, but then we are to remember what shoes she was to wear later, when she had married Gordon Halsey . . . Gordon was tight with her himself, but his father left hundreds of dollars with her whenever he made one of those silent visits to the hotel where she sat reading books . . . but now she walked on down until she got to the valleys where the factories are . . . O, South, O, pitiful proud hill people who creep down like this every year to watch the beautiful machines whirring . . . no man can say they aren't beautiful, and certainly you don't, standing there watching the white thread dance . . . but then you creep on in and take your places at the machines, and pretty soon you will have become too much a part of them . . . for the mistake this modern America makes is not realizing that human beings have got to keep some portion of them human after all . . . not a very big portion . . . most of them don't want revolution or anything like that, they want after all very little, just self-respect . . . they don't want to kill . . . but they do want to live . . . like the poor boy who could express his love of horses only by putting on little leather hoofs and being one . . .

The point is that Kit, wanting to live in these years after the war, tried everything . . . tied threads in a cotton mill . . . worked in a shoe factory . . . clerked in a ten-cent store . . . learned how to wear clothes . . . met men . . . and of course here she would have known how to take care of herself . . . which doesn't mean that she didn't sometimes know she wanted to give herself . . . but she kept something back, even after her marriage to Gordon Halsey, the son of the biggest bootlegger in that part, that Southern part, of modern America . . . Gordon Halsey . . . but it was Tom Halsey that counted in her life, after she had got rid of Gordon and drove bootleg cars for Tom all over the United States . . . risking her beautiful head and legs through several winters and summers on all kind of roads . . . modern American roads, there have never been anything like them . . . it was Tom, the silent, powerful pioneer in a new American industry back there in those days after the war, the liquor industry . . . a pioneer somewhat as John Jacob Astor had been long before him, Astor the corrupter of Indians, or a little later the big oil and steel and rail men . . . and then the end of Tom that night there by Kate's house when the government men closed in on him and his own son killed him . . . Kit, though, jumping into one of the government cars and speeding off until she was finally clear of everything and ready to settle down into the less lonely life, the more fruitful life, now at the beginning of which it seems Mr. Anderson has made her acquaintance . . . he having been through all this merely the magazine or newspaperman who got her story and put it in a book . . .

How he tells it is his own business . . . he has written twenty-one books before this one about Kit Brandon . . . and let us not forget Tom Halsey . . . so there is no doubt that he could explain his greater and greater liking year in and year out for a way of writing that is more like the way a baby reaches for something than the way a man writes when he has something to say or maybe a story to tell . . . or then again maybe a person to really and honestly create . . . none of which things has been done in this book of Kit Brandon.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Indispensable Montaigne

THE ESSAYS OF MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE. Translated and Edited by Jacob Zeitlin. Volume III. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE third and final volume of Jacob Zeitlin's translation and edition of the Essays of Montaigne has now appeared, and the end crowns the work. Editor, designer, and publisher may congratulate themselves—Professor Zeitlin upon completing a major achievement in American scholarship, Elmer Adler upon clothing it in a noble product of the bookmaker's art, and Mr. Knopf upon doing honor to his own imprint. And every purchaser—there should be many—may congratulate himself upon money well spent.

Zeitlin's translation is smooth and flowing but, unlike its model, the seventeenth-century Cotton, impeccable in its accuracy. It is, however, in his creative editing that Zeitlin outranks, to the best of my knowledge, all of his predecessors, even the French. The text is so arranged that at a glance the reader can distinguish the first edition and its numerous subsequent interpolations, changes, and additions; this is not merely editorial finesse but an essential help in following the career of Montaigne's mind. The notes, many of them miniature discourses, lavish treasures of research and illumination upon the serious reader. Zeitlin has not only ransacked Villey, Armaingaud, and the other leading authorities; but he has retested their research and enlarged upon it. Scarcely a clue is left unpursued or a historical stone unturned; as a result, Montaigne's whole age, so far as it touched his life and work, lies before the student's eyes. No minor help, the index to both the author and his sources is the most complete to date.

Finally, the introduction and prefatory notes—Zeitlin's own essays—rank among the most valuable contributions to the literature on Montaigne. They clarify the logical and chronological order of the great Frenchman's thought; they bring to bear upon it the proper amount of information concerning sources or contemporary influence, so that the reader may better judge what Montaigne meant—and this without lapsing into either pedantry or wind-jamming. And when Zeitlin presents his own views, although they may be occasionally open to dispute, they are something the reader can sink his teeth in.

No lover of Montaigne, no student of his century or of the tradition of liberalism, and no admirer of beautiful books can dispense with these volumes.

SPAIN IN REVOLT. A HISTORY OF THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN IN 1936 AND A STUDY OF ITS SOCIAL, POLITICAL, AND ECONOMIC CAUSES. By Harry Gannes and Theodore Repard. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THERE is a certain school of radical writers who have as little enthusiasm for the stern beauties of fact and as little respect for its dynamics as the textbook writers who teach the mysterious non-sequiturs of elementary-school history—that the American Revolution was caused by dumping tea into Boston Harbor, that the English turned Protestant because Henry VIII wanted another wife, and so on. The radical writers and the textbook historians use a different language and different formulas, but the object in each case is the same. They are both writing, not to reveal, but to conceal.

This is a depressing thing to discover in Harry Gannes,

By HARRY L.
HOPKINS

Federal Emergency Relief Administrator

SPENDING TO SAVE

The Complete Story of Relief

THE most important issue before the country today is the question of unemployment and relief.

In order that the public may understand the essentials of this problem Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of Federal Emergency Relief, Civil Works, and Works Progress, describes the building up of these immense organizations and the work they have accomplished in dealing with the millions of unemployed. The pioneer work which he carried on in new fields—transient relief, distribution of surplus commodities, assistance to self-help groups, the initiation of the submarginal land program, the rehabilitation program for farmers are all fully described, and above all, the development of the practice and philosophy of work relief and public employment for the otherwise unemployed.

In SPENDING TO SAVE Mr. Hopkins replies to the charges of critics on his stewardship with an amazing record of accomplishment. His book gives not only a general review of the history of the federal government in relief but also outlines a plan of action for the future.

international-events columnist on the Daily Worker, and his collaborator, Theodore Repard. To be sure, their book, "Spain in Revolt," is not an isolated case of tailoring history to the party line. Simple honesty has long since become a useless—indeed, a dangerous—virtue among many of the writers whom Farrell recently cannonaded with quotations from Marx, as if the difficulty were theoretical. It isn't. It is entirely a question of revolutionary morals.

The Gannes-Repard book on Spain seems to be written to prove that—as Dimitrov says—fascism as an international or national development is to be stopped by a "Popular Front" combination; that is, by governments resting on alliances between workers and petty bourgeois or bourgeois. The idea is that these alliances represent democracy versus fascism, and that in Spain the Popular Front means strength and progress for the workers because the issue in Spain—as everywhere else, we are told—is democracy versus fascism, or versus feudalism, in other words the making of the bourgeois revolution. Messrs. Gannes and Repard must therefore prove that what Spain needs and wants is the bourgeois-democratic pro-capitalist revolution made in America in 1776. To prove that, they have to show that the Spanish middle class is potentially revolutionary, that the land relations are still feudal, that capitalism is undeveloped and would be a progressive force, that the peasants are benighted and divided from the workers, and that the workers themselves have never heard of jumping from republican revolution into proletarian rule, and merely want what Kerensky wanted in Russia in 1917.

Messrs. Gannes and Repard do prove all this, which is to say they assert it and then draw the desired conclusions. That the social and economic facts, the history of this (Second) Spanish Republic, the behavior of the peasants and workers, the appalling timidities and treacheries of the middle-class officials dispute their "Marxist" analysis at every step does not disturb them in the least. Perhaps they are not even aware of it, though even a casual visit to Spain at any time in the last five years might have helped. At least, it would have taught them how to spell the names of the political and labor leaders they refer to so glibly, and they might even have learned what a syndicalist is, which would be useful since at least half Spain's workers belong to that category. Also they should have looked on the map to see how to write some of the names of the provinces.

Oklahoma Catalogue

CATALOGUE. By George Milburn. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ONLY in a comparative sense may "Catalogue" be described as a novel: it is longer than any of the stories in "Oklahoma Town" and "No More Trumpets," and it has a more unified theme than either of these collections. But from a positive point of view—its scope of character and its narrative technique—it is actually a composition of short stories, a satirical "Winesburg, Ohio," or a prose "Spoon River Anthology," in which the separate themes are drawn together in a common locale and guided by a master symbol. Quite clearly, this very talented story-teller from the Southwest moves more awkwardly in an expansive medium than in the story form of "A Class in Economics."

Mr. Milburn's Winesburg is Conchartee, Oklahoma (population 2,000); the events which disturb this town for the interlude of the tale are clustered around the fall-and-winter editions of the bulky mail-order catalogues mailed semi-annually—and free of charge—by Sears Roebuck and Montgomery Ward. The characters are developed in terms of the influence which the catalogues exercise over their lives—a treatment which results in two-dimensional figures like those projected on a screen, not deep enough for the tragic effects which Mr. Milburn seeks to create at times but superbly adapted to his talent for farce. For Ira Pirtle, gas prop., the catalogue means rubber collars (33F8244) which are set on fire by his Indian rival for the hand of the Widow Holcombe, whose amour is postponed by the failure of her Hair Magic to arrive from the city; for Red Currie the catalogue means sizzle pants; and for the flapper on whom he has his eye it means the flowered step-ins which lead to his committing a murder with 6F475 Xtra Range Shotgun Shells.

The falsity of the serious theme is apparent in the lynching of Sylvester Merrick, Negro, who is the white man's goat for these catalogue coincidences (he is hanged, incidentally, with his mail-order clothesline): the episodic accumulation is not too thick for comedy, but it cannot be converted successfully into pathos. On the other hand, the sketchy outline of a conflict between Postmaster Shannon and Banker Winston on the question of a new sewerage system for the town as against reduced taxes for the property-holders, though it suggests a genuine clash in real life, is dramatically unconvincing precisely because the catalogue implications which the story has trained us to seek are absent. The emphasis on the relevance of personal experience to a catalogue listing has led inevitably to the drawing up of a human catalogue. The artifice is amusing, but it marks no real stride in Mr. Milburn's development.

Christianity and Revolution

CHRISTIANITY CONFRONTS COMMUNISM. By Matthew Spinka. Harper and Brothers. $2.

CHRISTIAN MATERIALISM. By Francis J. McConnell. Friendship Press. $1.25.

CREATIVE SOCIETY. By John Macmurray. Association Press. $1.50.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SOCIAL REVOLUTION. Edited by John Lewis, Karl Polanyi, and Donald K. Kitchin. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THE first of these four books is chaff, the second is a splendid luncheon, the third is a nourishing five-course dinner, and the fourth is a banquet. Dr. Spinka writes as a liberal who has read rather widely on the subject of communism but is essentially unsympathetic toward it and toward the Soviet Union. I doubt that it would be possible to get into print a more inadequate account of the Russian Revolution than he gives us in his first chapter. The next two chapters contain a rather tediously detailed account of what happened to the churches in the revolution. This aspect of the story simply cannot be presented save against the background of the black reaction and hideous superstition of the church under the Czar. And to this background Dr. Spinka pays no attention. He writes almost as if the Russian church deserved sympathetic treatment at the hands of the Communists, and shows hardly a glimmer of appreciation, in these first chapters, of the values in communism. When he comes to his main theme, Christianity Confronts Communism, he constantly contrasts communism with Christianity as it ought to be but nowhere is. And he constantly falls into the error of setting Christianity over against communism, as if we could choose between them. One sentence will perhaps sufficiently reveal his lack of in-

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY PUBLICATION . . .

Closing Comments on the Campaign

As the candidates for the Presidency come before the voters for the last few times, thoughtful progressives raise two questions: Has Landon any chance? What has the campaign done for the left? The Nation answers these important questions in two groups of lively articles which will begin—and end—before Election Day.

The Doubtful States

Most impartial judges agree that anything may happen in a few key states. The chances of either candidate depend, to a great extent, on his success in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois. The Nation will publish a group of articles by expert political observers close to the scene of action to help you understand the situation in these states and to prepare you for the outcome.

Summing Up the Campaign

In the first of two articles, Max Lerner, an editor of The Nation, will analyze the position of President Roosevelt with particular reference to his relation to labor. In the second article, Mr. Lerner will discuss the gains, hopes, and chances of Norman Thomas, Earl Browder and other left-wing leaders.

sight. Referring to the use of force in behalf of the working class he says, "But this does not differ from the moral level of the Czarist regime, which also 'desired the good' of a certain class" (page 186).

Bishop McConnell divides his book of 167 pages into sections on Getting, Spending, and Giving, and writes with the stalwart faith in real Christianity and the absence of illusions in the economic and political realms which we have learned to expect from him. He did not set out to give us a profound essay, but he has achieved a splendid book to put in the hands of Christian laymen. A large part of the section on Giving is devoted to a defense of Christian missions, and I think he has said the best that can be said in behalf of missions. Particularly strong is his plea that people with a sensitive conscience who derive their income from socially hurtful sources or from industries whose practices cannot be ethically defended should devote a large part of their money to "social experimentation." This, he thinks, is for them the solution of their moral dilemma.

You get, I think, to the very heart of Professor Macmurray's book in these sentences:

Christianity is the source of communism, and communism has moved into dialectical opposition to Christianity through the process by which Christianity in its conscious form has been divorced from material realities. A Christianity which withdrew its beliefs from association with the temporal reality of earthly life must inevitably produce out of itself a temporal theory which divorces itself from the eternal and spiritual reality.

Lest someone assert that in using the words "eternal" and "spiritual" the author retreats to essentially meaningless abstractions, let it be said that he gives us, in the chapter on The Eternal and the Temporal, a most stimulating and original interpretation of the meaning of these two concepts—though, to be sure, a thinker as appreciative of communism as Professor Macmurray has a rather difficult time showing that the eternal and spiritual elements are absent from communism in such a degree as to make a real contrast with Christianity possible. "The defect of communism," he says, "is its neglect of that aspect of life which is grounded in the love-impulses." Contrariwise, the defect of our pseudo-Christianity is that it ignores that aspect of life which is grounded in the hunger-motive. Here it is in one great sentence. "The idealism of pseudo-Christianity consists finally in the divorce between hunger and love, through which love becomes an ideal and hunger is left to control and determine action." The chapter on The Religion of Jesus is so full of insight that I should like to have it reprinted in a pamphlet for distribution among Christians and Communists. No foolish attempt is here to disguise the fact that Jesus's attitude toward the wealthy and powerful was one of suspicion and distrust, while his attitude toward the poor and defenseless was one not only of sympathy but of belief in their God-given destiny to be the agents and inheritors of the new Kingdom of God. "Creative Society" is by all odds the most important book on this general subject, written from the Christian standpoint, which has appeared in some time.

Concerning "Christianity and the Social Revolution" Professor Reinhold Niebuhr has said that it is somewhat embarrassing for him to say what ought to be said about it since he is one of the contributors—the only American contributor among seventeen. Well, this reviewer has no hesitation in saying that he rejoices in the richness and scope of the book. Niebuhr was never more incisive than in his chapter on Christian Politics and Communist Religion. Here one discovers, as in the chapter on Jesus by Conrad Noel, Vicar of Thaxted, how it is that a clear thinker can be a conservative Christian in his theology and also a thoroughgoing Marxian. Ivan Levisky writes on Communism and Religion from the point of view of one who fully accepts the orthodox Communist position on religion. But here is no superficial dismissal of religion by one who can claim no real understanding of it. If Christians are to maintain the validity of their religion they will have to understand and meet the arguments of ■ Levisky. This reviewer has read and talked not a little on fascism. After reading Karl Polanyi on The Essence of Fascism he felt that he had hitherto been playing about on the surface of the matter. Fascism, it is made clear, is basically anti-individualist. That is why it is equally opposed to Christianity and to communism, for both of these systems are basically individualist. Here at last we have the miracle of a symposium without one really weak chapter.

DRAMA

Napoleon—His Life and Liver

MY OWN lack of interest in Napoleon Bonaparte is both wide and deep. Probably even "L'Aiglon" is not really as sickly a play as I have always thought it, and just as there are some to whom the most trivial thing is fascinating if it relates to the Emperor, so to me even intrinsically interesting matters seem to lose their importance if they concern this particular great man. I do not rage and roar; denunciations of the butcher of Europe seem to me as jejune as the panegyrics are uncalled for, and my attitude toward detractors and advocates alike can best be summed up in the immortal words of a now otherwise almost forgotten comedian: "I'd rather not hear any more about it."

Obviously, then, I am the worst possible spectator for a play called "St. Helena" (Lyceum Theater)—especially when that play happens, as this particular one does, to confine itself pretty severely to direct presentation without offering a thesis or pointing a moral. It is, I am informed, rigidly accurate, though a fellow-spectator who obviously does not share my aggressive indifference toward the subject did point out between the acts that some sort of refrigerating machine referred to as actually in use probably never reached St. Helena at all. It is also, apparently, completely dispassionate in its presentation of Napoleon's character, and while allowing him a few words about his philanthropic dream of a united Europe, leaves the spectator to decide for himself how deep or how sincere the motive was. Probably the fact that even I was not always bored means that more normal spectators would find the performance moderately absorbing; and I am certain that those who bring their own initial interest with them will be fascinated. The playing of Maurice Evans is good, the staging is excellent, and here, after all, is the demi-god very much as he doubtless was. Yet the chief impression brought away by one of my kidney is merely that the French prisoners and the English jailors were almost equally childish and that the destiny of Europe was in the hands of very trivial people. Napoleon, it seems, died of a liver complaint brought on by lack of exercise he could not take. The English would not let him ride without an Englishman in attendance, and the Emperor thought it infra dig. to canter in such company.

EYES on WISCONSIN!

Only a few days ago the first unemployment insurance benefit check ever issued in the United States was handed to a jobless workman in Madison, and Wisconsin again demonstrated its position of leadership in social and labor legislation.

Only a few days ago, too, farm, labor, and Progressive party leaders met in Madison and outlined plans for the establishing of a great national third party to function actively in the next national campaign.

Thus does Wisconsin play a leading part in legislative and political matters and attract the interested attention of the nation. In 1936 it is more than ever true that the eyes of the nation are on Wisconsin.

Carrying Wisconsin's message of liberalism throughout the nation and making journalistic history in the weekly newspaper field is THE PROGRESSIVE, successor to the old La Follette's monthly magazine, published at Madison, Wis. No paid advertising appears in The Progressive. No advertisers' threats distort or suppress its presentation of the facts.

The Progressive is not limited in scope to Wisconsin. Its field is national, and in it you will find the facts about what is going on in the liberal and labor movements throughout the nation.

From Aristotle on, many better men than I have attempted to analyze the differences between drama and history. One of them certainly is that while history can assume that events must be important and interesting merely because they happened, drama must proceed as though the factual and the imaginary were on precisely the same footing and must create for itself the importance and the interest of whatever it presents. By such a criterion "St. Helena" is history. It does not make Napoleon worth a play; it merely assumes that he is.

"White Horse Inn," the new musical spectacle in the vast Center Theater, obviously owes its international success to the existence of an international common denominator rather than to any unique qualities, and is to be described after the manner of the circus press agent rather than in the vocabulary of criticism. It is Stupendous and it is said to have Cost Three Hundred Thousand Dollars to produce. There are yodlers, Bavarian dancers, vast hordes of native figurants, several prop cows, and a few real goats. The whole thing is as bright and bustling as you can imagine, and the fact that, as is usual in such cases, it all adds up to very little will not prevent it from being a great, if not exactly a Broadway, success.

Thanks to continuously overflowing houses the D'Oyly Carte company has extended its engagement for eight weeks more. "Princess Ida" is now current.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

A FRIEND who had himself played in Chicago jazz bands at one time, and had been very much in that sort of thing but had since drifted out of it, listened one evening with pleasure and discrimination to some of the finest recent records of hot jazz. After these I put on an old record that had been reissued; and now my friend moved his ear up close to the machine, the better to distinguish in the raucous mixture the sound of the cornet he wanted to hear; his face lighted up with recognition and appreciation at various points; and at the end his comment was: "The greatest of them all." The record was "The Jazz Me Blues" by Bix Beiderbecke and other players; and my friend was referring to Beiderbecke.

You will find Beiderbecke spoken of always in similar terms—for example, in Panassié's "Hot Jazz," or in Otis Ferguson's article in the New Republic of July 29 last, which even with its inevitable Fergusonisms is ■■ superb example of critical appreciation. And the terms are justified: a phrase from Beiderbecke's cornet is as beautiful as any phrase can be; it is, in its loveliness and perfection, unique, as a phrase should be; and it is ultimately indescribable. Panassié speaks of it as "full and powerful," but also as "so fine as to be almost transparent"; and there is in fact this extraordinary delicacy in strength. He speaks of phrases that soar; and this, too, is in fact ■■ remarkable and distinguishing quality. Ferguson speaks of "the clear line of that music," of "every phrase as fresh and glistening as creation itself"; and there is in fact this radiance, this simple joyousness. These terms tell us a great deal, but there remains much that eludes words completely and can only be heard. And though one can account for the music up to a certain point, as Ferguson does, by the quality of the person—the "candor, force, personal soundness, good humor"—there have been other people with candor, force, personal soundness, and good humor, and one has still to explain, as always, how these qualities translated themselves in this instance into such musical phrases.

Beiderbecke can be heard on three groups of records. For one thing, Victor has reissued on 25283 and 25354 recordings by the brilliant band of Jean Goldkette, of which Beiderbecke was a member; and in a Bix Beiderbecke Memorial Album nine recordings by Whiteman's band, which he joined later, two by a recording group under Hoagy Carmichael, and one by a group under Beiderbecke himself. Victor labels them "featuring Bix Beiderbecke"; but the fact is that with the one exception he played merely as an unfeatured member of well-known bands—which means that one hears him sometimes for a full chorus, sometimes merely for a phrase, sometimes only in the background with the rest of the brass. But even the phrase detaches itself from its surroundings as something exquisite and perfect; and even playing along with the others in the background he stands out from them, not through any aggressiveness but solely through the distinctive quality of his style.

In addition, a small group of the best players in Goldkette's band, led by Frank Trumbauer, a fine saxophone player, made records, some of which have now been reissued. On Vocalion 3010 are "Way Down Yonder in New Orleans" and "Clarinet Marmalade"; on Brunswick 7703, "I'm Coming, Virginia" and "Singin' the Blues." These do feature Beiderbecke in extended solos, of which the most beautiful and famous is the one in "Singin' the Blues."

And finally Beiderbecke himself led some of the musicians in recordings, of which these have been reissued: on Vocalion 3042 "The Jazz Me Blues" and "At the Jazz Band Ball"; on Vocalion 3149 "Sorry" and "Since My Best Gal Turned Me Down." In these there is a great deal of collective improvisation, with particularly fine solos by Beiderbecke in the first and third.

Columbia has issued Brahms's Second Symphony in the performance of the London Philharmonic under Beecham (five records, $7.50). The companies are now getting an extraordinary amount of an orchestra's performance into the record; and you have to be sure that your phonograph is able to get all of it out again: some of it can be stopped by the pick-up, or by the amplification system, or by the speaker. And from my experience with this Columbia set I have learned that it can be stopped by the needle. After playing each side with a fresh Columbia half-tone needle I was about to report that the sides had been recorded at varying volume levels; but decided to make tests, and discovered that the variation was in the needles. This is something new in these needles which Columbia ought to look into. But after all my tests I still suspect that the symphony was recorded with a reduced number of violins. Otherwise the performance is excellent.

Half-tone steel needles, incidentally, are what I use and recommend. Cactus needles reduce scratch; but you cannot do this without reducing musical sound of the same frequency; and this loss is the explanation of what people call the greater mellowness produced by cactus needles. It takes metal to bring out everything that is in the record; and with that you have to accept scratch. And among metal needles my recommendation is half-tone steel, a fresh needle for each side. Columbia's product having turned out to be variable, I have been advised by an authority to try H. W. Acton, 370 Seventh Avenue, New York.

A Few Remarks About Sibelius

Dear Sirs: B. H. Haggin is another one of those critics who discuss music they've apparently never listened to. When he says that "Lady Be Good" is better than the other Goodman Trio records, he gets away with it only because most of The Nation's readers don't know their jazz from a hole in the ground. I'll send Mr. Haggin a pack of cigarettes if he can find any reliable swing fan (such as Otis Ferguson or Benny Goodman) who'll agree with so high-handed a dismissal of Goodman Trio records like "After You've Gone."

But Haggin's preposterous judgments on modern jazz don't matter so much as do his judgments on modern symphonic music. A couple of months ago he said the real point about Sibelius's symphonies "is that his own material in these works often has the character and feeling of folk-music. . . . Sibelius's ability to work this type of material into large-scale structures has deceived commentators into thinking they were hearing large-scale ideas as well, and to claim for him the constructive mastery of Beethoven. But constructive power is evident and important only in relation to the material on which it operates; and Sibelius simply hasn't the ideas with which to achieve the form-of-content that Beethoven achieves." What does Mr. Haggin think about the finale of Beethoven's "Eroica"? That is certainly a large-scale structure, yet both its main and secondary themes have "the character and feeling of folk-music."

When I wrote to Mr. Haggin, asking him for some examples of folk material in Sibelius's mature symphonies (Numbers 4 to 7), he cited the first theme of the Second Symphony. That's typical of Haggin's method of criticism: he takes an early work of Sibelius like the Second Symphony, the Violin Concerto, or "Night Ride and Sunrise," and attacks these immature works with all the courage of a Governor Landon denouncing waste or praising liberty. It's like disposing of Beethoven by finding flaws in his Battle Symphony or his Minuet in G. Never have I seen in Haggin's column any mention of Sibelius's greatest works—"Tapiola" and the Fourth, Sixth, and Seventh symphonies. He even confessed in his letter to me that he had heard the Sixth Symphony only once! One would never guess it from the knowing air with which he dismisses Sibelius's claims to greatness—an air which implies to his unsuspecting readers that he is thoroughly familiar with Sibelius's music and sees through it all.

MORTON SEIDELMAN,
Secretary, The Sibelius Club
Trenton, N. J., September 28

Dear Sirs: What I say about Sibelius proceeds from readings of the scores of all the symphonies, and from repeated hearings of all but the Sixth, which I have heard only once. And not only did I tell this to Mr. Seidelman the first time he raised the question, but after citing examples of folk-like material from the Second Symphony (which I said I considered representative of Sibelius's matured musical thinking) and the Fifth (which Mr. Seidelman included among the mature symphonies), I referred him to places in the score of the Seventh. This does not prevent Mr. Seidelman from accusing me now of writing without having heard the music and of basing my contentions only on immature works, never on mature ones like the Seventh. That relieves me of any obligation to talk further with Mr. Seidelman.

A Protest

Dear Sirs: I must protest vigorously against the title which you gave to my article in the October 10 Nation. My original title when I left this article with you last spring was The Social Security Act: Reality. When I read proof of the article about a week ago the original title was retained. No one asked my permission to change my original title to the one you carried, Social Security Betrayed. I must make it clear to your readers that I am not responsible for the change in the title.

Journalistic Correction

Dear Sirs: As a "journalist with long experience in power politics," McAlister Coleman, whom you describe as head of the information bureau of the Utility Users' Protection League of New Jersey, has certainly been wasting his time.

In your issue of September 19 Mr.

Coleman discourses upon the Third World Power Conference with the utility baiter's customary inaccuracy. His worth as a reporter may be measured by his comparatively minor error in stating the amount appropriated by Congress for expenses of the conference. Mr. Coleman says it was $25,000. No cub reporter of average ability could have failed to know from official records and the voluminous press releases of the conference that Congress appropriated $75,000.

All by himself, Mr. Coleman discovered that the "private power gang" rushed into the breach with $100,000. The fact is, I am reliably informed, that the industry contributed to the expenses of the conference only in response to urgent importunities by the conference promoters. Anticipating that the meeting would be made a sounding-board for the New Deal power policies and public ownership, many of the utility executives favored non-participation. However, relying upon assurances of the conference managers (New Deal administration officials) that discussion of controversial subjects would be handled objectively and that politics, propaganda, and personalities would be barred, the electric utilities finally agreed to contribute $75,000, matching the government appropriation. The National Electrical Manufacturers' Association kicked in with $25,000.

In a quest for something that could be played up as a near-sensation, some newspaper reporters professed to see in the exit of certain individuals from a bore-some session a "take a walk" movement by utility executives. Your journalistic contributor noted that "several utility men walked out in high dudgeon" in the face of a "blistering attack upon the holding-company regime" by Judge Healy. Since the eminent gentleman's paper had for several days been in the hands of utility men and others interested, it is strange that any utility men should become excited over the reading of a summary.

THE CAMPAIGN LAST WEEK RECALLED THE snake fight in which each combatant heroically swallowed the other. Mr. Vandenberg charged the Administration with shutting him off the air in the now famous "phonograph speech," and Mr. Farley charged Mr. Vandenberg with trying to pull a fast one. The Republicans charged the President's son James with having said that the President would railroad another NRA through, willy-nilly, and the Democrats charged the Republicans with having falsified James's speech. Mr. Hoover accused the President of having juggled the nation's accounts and implied that he ought to go to jail, and Mr. Landon and Mr. Knox accused him of aiming at dictatorship and implied that he ought to be impeached. Mr. Landon started off on an excursion to Los Angeles, determined to get the Townsend vote, and Mr. Roosevelt in a less ambitious mood started for a swing around New England to carry the gospel to the Yankees. Amos Pinchot gave the country another taste of that well-established phenomenon, the tired liberal, quoting H. G. Wells to prove Mr. Roosevelt was a Stalinite; but James Warburg cited Mr. Hull to prove that Mr. Roosevelt is hell-bent for internationalism. Perhaps all these things cancel one another. But the one thing that remains constant is the sustained reception Mr. Roosevelt has been accorded by the plain people wherever he has gone. In terms of the theater he has played to sold-out houses, while wherever Mr. Landon has stopped, his managers have laid an egg. This is not due entirely to the President's cheery manner or his serene self-confidence. It is due, as Arthur Krock has suggested in a comment on the turn-out in Chicago, to the memory that the plain people still have of the days of 1932.

WHAT THREATENS TO BE A SECOND MOONEY case is shaping up in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania. Emerson Jennings of that city and Charles Harris of Scranton have just been convicted of bombing the automobile of Judge W. Alfred Valentine on March 28, 1935. Jennings is a printer who on a number of occasions has had the temerity to write articles criticizing the Luzerne County courts in their conduct of miners' trials. More than that, he was one of seven to sign a petition asking the impeachment of Judge Valentine for serving as "inquisitor, judge, jury, and committing magistrate" in a miners' case. Impeachment proceedings were going on at the time of the bombing. Through the machinations of one Thomas Lynott (under the alias of McHale), who had formerly been ■ private detective in the employ of the Lackawanna Railroad, Jennings was arrested in August, 1935, charged with the bombing. "McHale," who was one of the witnesses against Jennings, had served as a county detective on the case for some months at $15 a day; his total pay, according to records in the controller's office, was $2,200, including $345 for unitemized "expenses." Various extraordinary methods for obtaining evidence—among others, some highly dubious dictaphone records—were brought to light during the trial, but the high light of the case was the refusal of District Attorney Leon Schwartz to try it, because, he said, the evidence was insufficient. He recommended that the case be nolle prossed, but this recommendation was refused by the court, and former District Attorney Thomas M. Lewis was appointed special prosecutor. Mr. Schwartz's refusal to prosecute was as courageous as it was unprecedented. Arthur Garfield Hays, defense attorney, has moved for a new trial for Jennings and Harris. The case, therefore, is not closed and deserves to be studied in detail by all defenders of civil rights.

THE REBEL ADVANCE ON MADRID HAS reached the point of siege. With the last remaining rail link with the outside world dominated by insurgent artillery, the loyalists are literally fighting with their backs to the wall. Although President Azaña is reported to be in Barcelona arranging for a shift of the capital, it is useless to pretend that the fall of Madrid will not be serious. As long as the government maintained control of the three largest cities in the country—Barcelona, Madrid, and Valencia—it had the potential resources from which to weld an army capable of suppressing the rebellion. The rebel forces are ridiculously small, only a few tens of thousands of real fighting men, and they are reported to be seriously handicapped for lack of ammunition. Their strength has lain almost exclusively in the air, where their modern German and Italian planes have overwhelmed the slower craft belonging to the government air service, and—as Louis Fischer points out elsewhere in this issue—in the superior discipline of their trained Moors and Foreign Legion. Time has worked for the rebels in the sense that it has enabled them to put down popular uprisings in the rear and move a larger portion of their scanty fighting forces to the front. Moscow is reported to be contemplating a dramatic move which may yet save the Spanish government. But if such a move is to save the lives of thousands of liberty-loving inhabitants of Madrid, it will have to come soon.

THE NATION HAS LEARNED ON GOOD authority that a shipment of munitions for the Spanish rebel army recently arrived in Seville on an American vessel. As far as we can learn the shipment was made without the knowledge or permission of the State Department. A false bill of lading had been drawn up in which this particular portion of the cargo was described as "musical instruments," which meant that the State Department was probably not even informed that a shipment was destined for Spain. At the same time, however, the department is known to have placed insuperable obstacles in the way of exporters who have sought to exercise their legal right to sell munitions to the Spanish government. In creating these obstacles—we cannot discover an instance in which permission has been formally refused—the department has acted in a wholly arbitrary and illegal manner. No official ban has been issued against munitions shipments to the Spanish government, and none can be issued under existing law. The United States is not a party to the European non-intervention pact; the Neutrality Act passed at the last session of Congress is wholly inapplicable to civil warfare. Because of its distance from the European scene the United States is in a better position than any of the European democracies to aid its sister republic without international complications. We can scarcely believe that the Administration would continue its present policy if it saw that it was thereby allying America with Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany as an accomplice in the destruction of Spanish liberty.

STOP PRESS: GERALD SMITH HAS DECIDED what party he will lead. It seems that he wanted the Union Party only "as a forum." Now he's going to be a Nationalist. He claims to have collected $1,500,000 from four hundred financial leaders for an anti-red front. It took more than that, Gerald, to put Hitler across.

IN BEHALF OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND the Welsh nation three men, a pastor and two teachers, recently burned down several buildings at the new Royal Air Force bombing school at Pwllheli on the coast of Wales. They have just been tried "for malicious destruction of the King's property," and despite their unqualified acknowledgment of the act the trial ended in a disagreement. The case will come up again at the next assizes, but meanwhile the exploit is being celebrated in enthusiastic local demonstrations. The burning of the bombing school was itself a patriotic demonstration. The men are prominent members of the Nationalist Party, which aims to set up in the British Commonwealth a cooperative Welsh state complete with a parliament, language, and culture of its own. The Welsh Nationalists look upon the bombing school almost as an armed invasion of their territory. It introduces a large body of English-speaking mechanics and soldiers who are bound to modify if not destroy the language and customs of the locality. It constitutes an affront to the religious pacifism of the Welsh people and establishes a base for military operations which in the case of war must expose the neighborhood to immediate danger of attack. And it is considered a physical blot on the lovely Welsh seashore. The three Nationalists testified that after numerous futile protests against the presence of the school they adopted "the only method" left to them "by a government which insults the Welsh nation." The incident represents a clash of nationalisms, large and small, and indicates some possible sources of obstruction to the vast British rearmament program.

MRS. SIMPSON AND THE KING OF ENGLAND can no longer treat their relationship as their private concern and no one else's business. By his own volition the King has brought it openly to the notice of his subjects, though had he wished it so, he could easily have kept the matter from public attention. Other kings have done so, including his own father and grandfather. But Edward is different and lives in different times. In the first place, he did not want to be king but could not face the consequences of abdication to the already loosening bonds of empire. As a result he undertook the job in a defiant attitude, determined to sacrifice no part of his personal freedom. Secondly, he has fitted himself to the temper of the times, his great popularity being largely due to his having been always a democratic prince. These combined factors have made it possible for many Britishers to consider the heretofore unimaginable eventuality of the King's marriage to Mrs. Simpson. With everything against her—twice divorced, a commoner, and moreover a foreign one—there would seem to be only a slim chance of this happening while Edward remains king. The remote possibility that he might still abdicate is reflected in Lloyd's refusal to insure against postponement of the coronation. But the very fact that there is speculation on the possibility of a marriage is bound to affect the position of the monarchy. Is the democratic tide strong enough to make the situation enhance the King's popularity, or will the essential conservatism and middle-class respectability of the British swing them to an unfavorable reaction? The only raison d'être of the British Crown is its function as a symbol of national and imperial unity. In the turbulence of the times, what effect will the King's action have on that function of the Crown?

IN AN ALARMING FRONT-PAGE STORY THE New York Times on October 14 published the charges of two textile manufacturers that "hundreds of Communist labor agitators" had been rioting at textile trimming plants near Madison Square, that the police had refused to protect the plants and the workers, and that twenty-five workers had been abducted to Irving Plaza and forced to listen to a lecture on communism. The innocent reader was left to surmise what the riots were about or why the alleged "Communists" had inspired these sudden and ominous events. Actually, as any reporter might easily have discovered, the "Communists" were striking members of Local 2440, affiliate of the Joint Council of Knitgoods Workers and the United Textile Workers. They were demanding not a Soviet overturn but decent working conditions. On the morning that the Times story appeared, a meeting at strike headquarters at Irving Plaza was invaded by detectives of the Red Squad—without warrants. They questioned those present in a vain effort to discover one of the "abducted" workers. On the following day the New York County grand jury, acting on testimony of Julius Steinberg and Louis Hornick, the two manufacturers, ordered that informations be filed against four members of Local 2440 for conspiracy, coercion, and violence in restraint of trade. This sequence of red scare, illegal raid, and serious indictments on the word of the employers against whom the strike is directed sounds like a tale out of sunny California. It is primarily another chapter in the drive against the knitgoods workers' union, which is making a militant fight against sweat shops, runaway employers, and other evils in the industry. It seems also to be the first red herring drawn by Tammany across Mayor LaGuardia's path to reelection.

THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE IS A conservative newspaper, dignified, well-edited, and lively. The liberal reader may feel that Walter Lippmann has gone over to the enemy with altogether too much gusto, or that Dorothy Thompson's sympathies lie too far to the right to be consistent with her experience in Hitler's Germany. As for Mark Sullivan, he is almost an appealing figure as he stands roundly in the ranks of red-baiters much more vicious than himself, still striking out at Tugwell with his trusty cutlass. Even a "red" would scarcely accuse these writers of being worse than conservative or reactionary. There is, however, one burned-out star in the Herald Tribune's galaxy which should be replaced before it short-circuits the whole string. We refer to George E. Sokolsky. On October 19 Mr. Sokolsky wrote an article on the American Labor Party. Maintaining his old pretense of being an "expert" on labor and radicalism (some of his best friends are radicals!), he cooked up a mess of misrepresentation, labor-, Jew-, and alien-baiting which Sokolsky himself has seldom surpassed. We feel that the Herald Tribune, aside from soiling its pages, is keeping apart two minds that run as one. Isn't it possible that Mr. Sokolsky could be auctioned off to William Randolph Hearst? He long ago reached the stage of journalistic ripeness which usually precedes that fall.

*

THE NATION'S POETRY AWARD IS WON THIS year by Wallace Stevens for his poem, The Men That Are Falling, which appears elsewhere in this issue. Previous recipients of the award, which was instituted in 1921 and discontinued in 1927 until this year, have included Stephen Vincent Benét, James Rorty, Thomas Hornsby Ferrill, and Babette Deutsch. Many of the country's leading poets were represented among the 1,800 manuscripts from which the editors of The Nation chose the 1936 prize winner. Of the poems submitted, the overwhelming majority were concerned with contemporary social conflicts either at home or abroad, and ran a gamut of poetic forms from the quatrain to the book-sized epic. Mr. Stevens was born in 1879 in Reading, Pennsylvania, attended Harvard, and has for many years been a practicing lawyer in Hartford, Connecticut. He is known as the author of "Harmonium," a distinguished first volume published in 1923, and of "Ideas of Order," published in a limited edition by the Alcestis Press and reissued by Knopf; a new volume, "Owl's Clover," is to appear soon. Mr. Stevens's output has been small. It is perhaps a corollary that his scrupulous regard for craftsmanship is equaled by few poets writing today.

Europe's Wheel Comes Full Circle

BELGIUM'S return to its pre-war policy of neutrality carries an importance far beyond its immediate effect on Europe's precarious balance of power. From a military point of view it is possible to claim—as Augur does in the New York Times—that the situation is little changed. Belgium is merely to follow the example of its powerful neighbors and embark on a program of rearmament. This, it is said, will enable France to stop worrying about aiding Brussels and to concentrate on its Rhineland defenses. For France can rest assured that a German attack on a neutral Belgium will bring Britain to its aid today just as it did in 1914.

But this is just another way of saying that the European cycle is complete. The world has returned to 1914, not only in political alignments but, what is infinitely more dangerous, in the temper and character of its political thinking. Belgium's return to neutrality symbolizes the final collapse of the post-war attempts to build an effective mechanism for enforcing peace and seals the fate of a new Locarno based on the principles of collective security. It is even uncertain whether Belgium will continue to accept its responsibilities under the League Covenant. This is not to imply that Belgium has deliberately set out to wreck the collective system. Belgium has simply recognized that the collapse of collective security leaves it in a most vulnerable position. Its obligations line it up against Germany in any general war, yet it has no assurance that the French and British will be able to stop Germany as they did in the last war.

It is difficult to say how much influence Germany has had in driving Belgium to this decision. Rumor has it that both Hitler and Mussolini brought pressure on Leopold and the Belgian government. But however the result was achieved, it cannot be denied that the action of Brussels constitutes a major political triumph for world fascism. For the past three years Hitler has formed his foreign policy with a view to destroying the principle of collective security, knowing that this principle precluded the waging of a successful war of conquest. The success of Nazi strategy may be gauged by the tremendous strides which Hitler has made within the past year. Twelve months ago Germany was rearming, but was virtually isolated diplomatically. Since then it has (1) remilitarized the Rhineland without reprisal; (2) added tremendously to its military power by extending the term of conscription and strengthening its air force; (3) concluded a peace pact with Austria resulting in much closer relations with Mussolini; (4) made such progress in the Balkans that it is probable that both Rumania and Yugoslavia would support the Reich today against France, their former protector; (5) by supporting Spanish fascism created the possibility of a new ally against democratic France; and (6) succeeded in winning the support of a powerful element in the Conservative Party of Great Britain. The past year has also witnessed the final failure of the League in the Italo-Ethiopian controversy, the abandonment of all talk of an Eastern Locarno, and, as a crowning coup, the defection of Belgium from the bloc of anti-Nazi states. A year ago one could say with confidence that Hitler would not dare start a war. Today he would still risk defeat if his attack were against the West; but who can say that tomorrow conditions will not be entirely in his favor?

The failure of England and France to support the Soviet Union's demand for a blockade of Portugal which would prevent fascist war supplies from reaching the Spanish rebels has also played into the hands of Hitler. Reliable reports from rebel territory indicate that the insurgents are seriously in need of money and munitions, and that the present vigorous drive on Madrid is prompted by belief that its capture will bring German and Italian recognition, with unlimited and "legal" supplies such as are now denied the legitimate government. Great Britain's refusal to aid Spanish democracy against a Nazi-aided fascist rebellion, coupled with its apparent indifference to Belgium's action, strengthens the suspicion that at least part of Baldwin's Cabinet has fallen victim to Hitler's anti-Communist bogey. The recent dissolution of the Colonial League, a Nazi organization which was created for the purpose of agitating for colonies for Germany, indicates that Hitler is willing to make substantial, though temporary, concessions to British opinion.

While the line-up of the powers is almost identical with that in 1914, there is one vital difference. Twenty years ago the various European states had reason to be frightened of German militarism, but the issues were comparatively unimportant. France wanted Alsace-Lorraine; Germany was anxious for a slice of Russia; both wanted new colonies. Today the struggle for territory is as far from being settled as in 1914, but it is overshadowed by a new issue of vastly greater consequence—the development of a well-organized world fascist front. The working class of France, England, and the United States could be unconcerned regarding the outcome of the imperialist struggle for colonies. But it cannot be indifferent to the threat of an international fascism which is primarily directed against its interests.

The President's Oath

IT was a toss-up from the start whether the Constitution and the Supreme Court would be torn down from the starry skies and brought into the campaign as an issue. Mr. Roosevelt had made it clear three months back that he would not press the subject of a constitutional amendment. To do so would have been (so he and his advisers reasoned) a heaven-sent gift to Mr. Hearst and Mr. Landon. There was no telling what artistic heights of distortion the Hearst technique might have achieved with such material. On the other hand the Republicans were torn for some time between their desire to accuse Mr. Roosevelt of all sorts of heinous intentions toward court and Constitution and their fear that a defense of the Supreme Court's knifing of liberal legislation would lose them the labor vote completely.

But now the dams are down. Three times during the past week—at Detroit, at Danville, Illinois, and on his way to Los Angeles—Mr. Landon has accused the President of aiming at a dictatorship, asked him whether he intends to overthrow the Constitution and change our form of government, and defended the Supreme Court decisions as the real cause of the return to prosperity. Another speech on the Constitution is scheduled for delivery in California. It is clear that Mr. Landon has now given up any hope he may have had of splitting the liberal and labor vote. He has definitely decided that his best chance lies in strengthening his hold on the conservatives by defending the court, and throwing a scare into the man on the street by picturing the President as weaving dictatorial plots.

Bared of all rhetoric the charges against Mr. Roosevelt sum up to this—that he has violated his oath of office. This is a serious charge and one not to be dismissed lightly, especially when made by a man like Mr. Landon, who is generally credited with being sincere and honest. What has Mr. Roosevelt done to lay himself open to the charge of having violated this oath? Anyone admitted to the cavernous confidences of the campaign-whisperers will be told that if Mr. Roosevelt is reelected he will insist on having a third term, and if he fails of reelection this November he will refuse to yield up his office, call out the army, and barricade himself in the East Room. Mr. Landon in one of his speeches traced the sequence of steps by which European dictatorships have been set up, and accused Mr. Roosevelt of having already taken the most important of these steps. The usual charge is that he has put through legislation in defiance of the Constitution and has been prevented only by the Supreme Court from gathering all power to himself; that after election he intends to reintroduce the same legislation; that if he can get his way in no other fashion he intends to "pack" the court or press for a constitutional amendment.

What are the actual facts? Mr. Roosevelt's acts in Washington no more amount to dictatorship than Mr. Landon's acts in Topeka. Mr. Jackson's article in this issue shows decisively that Mr. Landon is no more adept at running the gauntlet of judicial review than is Mr. Roosevelt. The truth is that with a Supreme Court standing over you the business of legislation is always a precarious experiment, and the task of making it constitutional is a matter of guesswork. As for his attitude toward the Constitution and the Supreme Court, the President has followed the lead of constitutional scholars. Their view is that the living Constitution is not something rigid and fixed but what the court by its interpretation makes it. They add that the court has considerable latitude for decision and precedent enough to supply both the majority and minority opinions. Mr. Roosevelt's view has gone no farther. His "horse-and-buggy" statement was an expression of regret that the court should have chosen to narrow and freeze the power of Congress to put some order into the economic chaos.

Our own quarrel with Mr. Roosevelt is that he got frightened at the hue and cry raised by the professional patrioteers and the Liberty League lawyers, and that he allowed them to stampede him into silence. No one in this country has a monopoly of respect for the Constitution. The progressive and labor groups have so much respect for the Constitution that they wish to preserve it as it was intended—as an instrument for achieving the common welfare. They believe that the Constitution as it stands is an adequate instrument, if only the Supreme Court judges will not go out of their way to distort it as the court majority has done during the last fifteen incredible months. Mr. Roosevelt will be doing exactly what every President before him has done if he fills the vacancies that might arise in the court with judges whose outlook is sympathetic to his own. Even if Congress should decide to appoint new judges, there would be nothing unconstitutional in such an act—Congress has several times in the past exercised its right to regulate the number of judges. And our own belief is that if Mr. Roosevelt, in the event of his reelection, does not press hard for a constitutional amendment to give Congress the explicit power to enact a program of economic control, he will be untrue to his supporters. He will find himself powerless to perform adequately the duties of his office and thereby to fulfil his oath.

The real meaning of the Republican attack is directed beyond President Roosevelt to the 1940 campaign. What the Republicans are saying is that no one can campaign on a program for a planned economy of any sort without violating the Presidential oath of office. We may as well get this statement clear now. The charge will be made again in 1940 if a strong labor candidate is in the field, and it will be made with much more violence. If there is any doubt now whether planning for the common welfare is constitutional, that doubt must be removed in the next four years either by the Supreme Court or by the people through an amendment.

How Wrong Is the Digest Poll?

THE seventh report of the Literary Digest's Presidential poll shows Governor Landon leading in thirty-two of the forty-eight states, which would enable him to sweep the Electoral College by 370 to 161. This contrasts with the October 17 survey of the American Institute of Public Opinion, which indicates that President Roosevelt will carry thirty-five states and will have 390 electoral votes against Landon's 141. Obviously one or the other of these indicators of public opinion is seriously in error. The Institute of Public Opinion's poll is frankly based on comparatively few samples and therefore cannot be taken as too authoritative. It is particularly weak in that it does not adequately reach the small towns and country areas. The present report of the Digest poll, on the contrary, includes more than 1,800,000 votes, so that as far as numbers are concerned it is an extremely generous sample. It does not, however, by the Digest's own admission, present a proportionate vote from the great industrial centers—New York, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and Cleveland, where Roosevelt's strength is the greatest. Moreover, its bias is indicated by the fact that more than 52 per cent of the voters thus far registering their preferences voted Republican in 1932, whereas Hoover only obtained 41 per cent of the vote in that election. Yet because it indicates both the 1932 and 1936 vote, it offers the raw material for as careful a prognostication as it is possible to make at this time.

It is generally conceded that President Roosevelt will carry the twelve Southern states by substantial majorities. The Digest also gives him three border states—Maryland, Oklahoma, and New Mexico—and Utah. All these states have at least a 57 per cent Roosevelt vote in the Institute of Public Opinion poll, and the poll of the Baltimore Sun gives Maryland to the President by nearly two to one. These sixteen states give Roosevelt 161 certain electoral votes. In addition there are eight other states—Arizona, California, Delaware, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota, Oregon, and Nevada—with 48 electoral votes, that are clearly in the Democratic column if the shift in votes for the electorate as a whole follows the pattern indicated in the Digest poll. Thus in California 76.9 per cent of the persons who voted for Roosevelt in 1932 indicate that they will vote for him this year, while 18.8 of those who voted for Hoover have shifted to the President. Applying these percentages to the total vote in 1932, it appears that the state is safe for Roosevelt by approximately 200,000. In Delaware the shift has worked in the opposite direction. The number of Republicans voting for Roosevelt is sufficiently greater than the number of Democrats voting for Landon to overcome the slight Republican majority of 1932.

Governor Landon is reasonably sure of all the New England states, except possibly Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, in addition to Kansas, South Dakota, and Wyoming. But these nine states have only 57 electoral votes, two less than the total obtained by Hoover in 1932. The remaining fifteen states are doubtful, although the Digest poll would place each of them in the Republican column by a small majority. This raises the question of how typical a sample the Digest has succeeded in obtaining. The fact that most of the voters reached by its poll in these states voted Republican in 1932 suggests that the selection is biased in the direction of the upper income levels. If the percentage of Republican votes in each state is compared with the percentage of Republican votes which the same group cast in 1932, it will be found that in most instances the Republicans have gained, but in a number of states the margin of increase is insufficient to wipe out the tremendous majorities by which Roosevelt was elected in 1932. In Nebraska, for example, the Digest poll shows 61 per cent of the voters favoring Landon. But in 1932, 52 per cent of these same individuals voted for Hoover. Thus we have a 9 per cent shift toward the Republican column. But 64 per cent of all Nebraskans voted for Roosevelt in 1932. A loss of 9 per cent would leave Nebraska in the Roosevelt column by a ratio of 55 to 45. By a similar computation, five other states—Minnesota, Colorado, Idaho, Wisconsin, and Washington—appear definitely to belong to Roosevelt. All these states are shown in the Roosevelt column in the Institute of Public Opinion poll. Together with the "certain" states they would give Mr. Roosevelt 268 electoral votes, or two more than necessary for election.

Landon appears to have a slight edge in three important states—New Jersey, Ohio and Pennsylvania—although the failure to include the urban vote may easily change the situation. The contest in the remaining six states—New York, Iowa, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and West Virginia—is too close to make prediction profitable. If the President wins any three of these states, he will have more than 300 electoral votes. Landon can win only by sweeping all six and obtaining at least one additional state from the Democratic column. If you throw six pennies in the air, all may land "heads." But the chance of its happening is just 1 in 64.

Landon Is Losing the Middle West

Aboard Landon's Sunflower Special, October 16

WHEN Landon boards a train, leaves Topeka, and carries his cause in person to the country, things go from bad to worse. Roosevelt fan- ciers, accordingly, need feel no dismay that Landon is about to dash out to California and campaign through Pacific Coast territory that Roosevelt has ignored, considering it indubitably safe for Democracy. Landon's fourth and semi-final campaign tour, which is about to end as this is written, has been an incredible performance, full of blunders and productive of nothing but evidence that the G. O. P. still is in a state of widespread demoralization and that the Republican nominee is totally lacking in ability to stir mass enthusiasm.

The tour has covered four pivotal states that Landon must carry if he is to have any chance at all of capturing the Presidency, and two of them unquestionably are now in worse shape so far as his candidacy is concerned than they were before he visited them. Those two are Ohio and Michigan. In the other two—Illinois and Indiana—his prospects have not been visibly improved by his visit. After watching Landon's performance in these four states and talking to the Republican leaders in them, I would not give a nickel for Landon's chances of carrying any one of them, and if their total of 88 electoral votes goes to Roosevelt atop the 105 votes he will get from the solid South and those he is certain to get from the West, Landon will go down to defeat on November 3 in a Democratic landslide of 1932 dimensions.

It should be remembered that the purpose of a campaign tour is to whip up enthusiasm chiefly among party workers so that, drawing confidence from the sight of large crowds cheering their candidate, they will redouble their efforts to get out the vote. If the crowds and the enthusiasm are not in evidence, the ward-healers and precinct runners lose heart and the machine languishes. There is only one other stimulus that will keep the machine running—money, and it is now apparent that there is not going to be much of that in the Landon camp. Members of the Landon entourage aboard the train already are speculating on the size of the campaign deficit, and the professional technicians among them are worrying openly about whether their salaries will be paid; meanwhile, at Chicago, Chairman Hamilton publicly and querulously admits that contributions have fallen off sharply at the campaign's most critical stage. There is even reason to believe that Landon's hobnobbing with Henry Ford and his Detroit speech praising the automobile magnates for having fought the NRA were desperate bids for funds regardless of the immediate cost in votes.

The financial trend within the G. O. P.—a trend exactly the opposite of that in the Roosevelt camp, whose coffers just recently have begun to fill with consoling contributions from industrialists—perhaps accounts for the absence during this semi-final Landon tour of any sign that the G. O. P. machine is operating with its old-time efficiency. That machine in the past has functioned with marvelous precision in producing crowds and fanfare. In their mechanics Republican campaign tours compared to Democratic have been like the Ringling Brothers' circus compared to a traveling medicine show. This year the situation is reversed. In the past, for example, the Republican command never would have taken its Presidential candidate out to an open-air meeting with the temperature down to forty and oil stoves required on the rostrum to keep the nominee from getting cold feet. Nor would it have placed the nominee, as also happened at Detroit, out behind second base and two hundred feet from any member of his audience. These things are not so insignificant as they may seem to the untutored observer, for they indicate a degree of inefficiency in the Republican machine presaging an equal inefficiency in the essentially mechanical task of producing votes for Landon in the polling booths on November 3. It is no wonder that after his Detroit speech Landon, according to participants, stormed and ranted, cursing the Republican high command at Chicago and vowing henceforth to run his own campaign. The first evidence of that decision was his determination to visit California, after he had been advised by Hamilton and the rest that the Pacific Coast was lost.

As for that other requisite stimulus to party workers, enthusiastic crowds, they also have been lacking on this tour. The crowds that Landon has drawn along the route, compared with the Roosevelt crowds in the same territory, have everywhere been small and apathetic. Such enthusiasm as they have shown has disappeared before Landon was halfway through his speeches; this is true of his major addresses, and it is even more true of his rear-platform speeches. If, listening to him on the radio, you think he is a poor and fumbling speaker, you should hear him in those speeches which are not broadcast. When he speaks to a nation-wide radio audience he plainly is keyed up for a supreme effort. Seldom is he able to maintain the pitch even throughout those speeches, and when he is making a simple, rear-platform appearance he does not even try. It requires only a glance at the faces of his audiences to see that he depresses them. In some cases he does more than that; the audiences for his rear-platform appearances have been made up in large part of school children, and often some group of kids has detached itself from the crowd in the middle of Landon's remarks and run off shouting, "Aw, that guy stutters!" Unlike Roosevelt's cross-country progress, which draws crowds to every wayside crossing even where no stop is scheduled, Landon's touring brings him crowds only at obvious points where spontaneity is not necessary. At Fort Wayne, where his train laid over for twenty minutes, no crowd at all appeared.

Another significant difference between the Landon and Roosevelt campaigns is that on this semi-final tour Landon has been booed at every stop except in Indiana. The booing has not been violent, for American political crowds are lamentably polite, but it has been done with unmistakable gusto and scorn. It makes no difference that a large part of the booing has been done by kids in the crowd, for they doubtless reflect in their conduct on these occasions the political views of their parents. Rain destroyed all chance of judging crowd response at Chicago, where Roosevelt, arriving in fair weather a few days later, was uproariously cheered by mobs that reached from building line to street-car track. At Akron, where Landon was whirled from the station to an armory packed with 3,000 job-hungry party workers, there were no crowds on the downtown streets through which he passed, and many of the shoppers on the sidewalks did not spare the candidate a glance. Here as at other points on the tour curbside bystanders seemed to have difficulty in identifying Landon among the occupants of the open car in which he rode. Average Alf is just so incurably average in appearance that he is hard to pick out even in a small group; some of the reporters who have been traveling with him since the beginning of the campaign still have difficulty in spotting him on occasion, and one of his chief supporters among them tells of having overlooked Alf at three paces during a reception at Topeka. Among his fellow-Kansans Landon is as indistinguishable as a wren among old leaves, and that may account for his low visibility while on tour, for he carries a bevy of Kansans with him.

Standing beside Republican machine leaders at Cincinnati, Landon elected to praise the town for having got rid of machine politics by adopting a non-partisan, city-manager form of government and to pay a tribute to one of his "brain trusters," Charles P. Taft, Jr., a leader in the fight to maintain Cincinnati's present form of government against the attacks of the Republican machine. The machine leaders promptly protested to Taft, who in turn hastened to suggest to Landon that he drop the subject. He attempted to make amends in a formal speech a few minutes later by avowing his preference for machine politicians against "lily-handed" citizens who "boast they take no interest in politics." It was in that same speech that he followed up his praise for non-partisan government by championing the two-party system and expressing horror over the fact that Roosevelt had formed an alliance with the Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota and let the Democratic Party there go hang. Landon later explained to friends that he had made his opening tribute to Taft and the Cincinnati government because he happened to remember that Theodore Roosevelt with good effect had paid a similar tribute to Judge Ben Lindsey when his campaign took him into Denver.

Landon planned to denounce at Akron the Roosevelt Administration's friendship for labor as fraudulent and to support his contention with certain quotations from Norman Thomas. Before the final draft of his speech was completed, the Thomas quotations were dropped, and when he stepped to the rostrum he deliberately cut all other references to labor and social security from his prepared speech. In fact, while sitting on the platform just before he spoke, he told the reporters of the cuts he planned; the warning, however, came too late, and the early afternoon editions of papers all over the country carried words about labor that Landon never spoke. It was at Toledo that he finally got around to making his labor speech, and there, speaking in mid-morning, he delivered it to an audience made up almost entirely of housewives, who seemed bewildered by his theme.

Among other misfortunes he suffered on the tour was the presence of Ogden L. Mills, who joined him at Columbus and left him at Cleveland, and of Walter Brown, Hoover's Postmaster General and patronage dispenser, who joined at Cleveland and left at Toledo. Mills kept himself out of sight as much as possible. Brown, however, did no hiding and even put up a fight for the right to introduce Landon at Toledo.

At Detroit stupid management caused the Landon parade from station to hotel to be routed through an industrial slum area where the crowds were distinctly inhospitable. It was later reported by Michigan Republican leaders who rode with the nominee that the crowds had booed him so lustily that he had squirmed and kept angrily demanding to know who had authorized a parade for him. Just as the parade reached the downtown section, he ordered his car to circle the band at the head of the procession and rush him without further delay to his hotel. It may be, of course, that he was merely in a hurry to greet the Fords, who were waiting there for him in the company of Harry Bennett, the chief of the Ford secret-police system. However, the next day when local Republicans adjured him to leave the train at Flint to address a meeting uptown, Landon sharply informed his associates that he was not going to get off the train again in Michigan.

He left behind him in both Ohio and Michigan a trail of deserters. Republican leaders in both states told reporters without any urging that they proposed thenceforth to cut loose from Landon and sail their own boats. They said they had chances of being elected if they could capture a substantial number of Democratic and independent votes and they did not intend risking defeat for themselves by taking up the cudgels for Landon and, perforce, against Roosevelt. They counted themselves stronger than Landon in both states. Of the four states visited on this tour the one which looked best for Landon was Indiana; the Republican machine there appeared more alert and efficient than did its counterparts in Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan. All the newspaper polls being taken in Ohio except one give the state to Roosevelt. There are no comparable indicators in Michigan, but the majority of political writers there laugh at Landon's chances. In Illinois it is conceded that Roosevelt will carry Chicago by a huge plurality, and in the central part of the state, where the Republicans must poll an even bigger vote if Landon is to win, all signs indicate a fifty-fifty split.

On Madrid's Front Line

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Madrid, October 8

MADRID is preparing for siege. The rebels will certainly try, in the near future, to cut the railway which connects Madrid with its important food sources in Valencia. Already the streets of the capital are full of queues. There is a shortage of sugar, butter, milk, and meat. I just passed a long line of women waiting for horse flesh. A siege of Madrid, in such circumstances, would be a grave matter.

The Spanish civil war, however, will go on even if the government loses Madrid. A defeat in this area, damaging though it would be, might indeed release that burst of energy and determination which the Spanish revolution has thus far lacked. The fall of Madrid could in part be balanced by victories in Asturias and Andalusia. In any case Catalonia and the east will remain closed to the rebels for many months. There, as well as in other regions, the government could dig itself in, reorganize its forces, and prepare for a new phase of the civil war.

This is the spirit which prevails in Madrid even in these days of depression. The revolution cannot lose, is the general sentiment. For history has written the death sentence of the classes which follow in the wake of the insurgent generals. "History," to be sure, seems a poor weapon against tri-motor bombers and fierce foreign legionaries. But in this instance "history" signifies the incapacity of the former rulers of this country to continue to rule it. If the government succumbs, the people will fight on because they must. The struggle may take years.

What the Spanish government needs most desperately at this moment is a well-trained army. Millions of people staunchly support the anti-fascist cause. But the government's armed resources consist of some Assault Guards, a few Civil Guards, and many thousands of voluntary militiamen who are untrained, inexperienced, undisciplined, and badly officered. They melt away under fire. On September 24 I went up to an attack on the Alcazar, the Toledo citadel. While I waited in the large, square, and still beautiful, though partially ruined, patio of the hospital of Santa Cruz, government cannon shells whistled overhead every minute and burst in the Alcazar. This was the artillery preparation for the attack. At the entrance of Santa Cruz stood a sixty-ton tank equipped with one cannon and three machine-guns, ready to ascend into the fortress. The driver told me he would start at 5 p.m. At exactly 5 p.m. the artillery bombardment ceased. Four hundred men were sent up through byways. But the attack did not begin until forty minutes later, when the brave Alcazar defenders had had time to recover from the cannon barrage. I sat on a ledge of steel which stuck out from the tank while it lumbered up the hairpin bends of the road in the huge Alcazar gardens. Then I sought better cover, together with the men, behind the stone walls of the terraces. Everything seemed to be going well. Suddenly a man rushed down the road with blood streaming from behind his ear. He was immediately followed by another whose trouser leg reddened as he ran. At that moment something hit the earth nearby with a low thud; a fountain of white smoke rose into the air. Three men who had crouched there were wounded. They ran down toward Santa Cruz. One, with many thin trickles of blood flowing from under his hat over his face, stopped in front of me and yelled with a hoarse voice, "Arriba, arriba," upward, upward. Groups of soldiers were descending in panic. Officers drew their revolvers, jumped from one group to the other, and threatened to shoot anyone who retreated. A man, held under the arms by two others, was being brought down. He had become hysterical and uttered almost inhuman cries.

Silence intervened. The atmosphere relaxed. An officer lit a cigarette and smiled to reassure the men. I left my cover and joined him in the middle of the road. Just then the three men with whom I had stood at the stone wall disappeared in a cloud of black smoke. When it dissipated they were on the ground, bleeding. The enemy was firing from a mortar; the shells fell perpendicularly and rather noiselessly. I helped pick up one of the wounded and carry him to the first-aid station in Santa Cruz. He asked us to open his belt. Over his heart the wet red patch grew bigger and bigger. He groaned and talked, and then opened his mouth and said nothing. The immense patio where three physicians were functioning was furnished with one faint electric bulb, though it was an inside room and might have been well lighted. Stretcher bearers were begging the doctors to attend to their wounded. The man I had carried moaned for water. There was none available. Part of his knee had been shot away, and a piece of steel had cut into a rib. The others, fifteen in all, were only superficially wounded. When I had entered the Red Cross station it was becoming dark. Soon Santa Cruz filled with the attackers, who had retired, and before another quarter of an hour the tank returned. This was the end of an assault which was completely wasted because it was badly managed. Four mortar bombs, fired by skilled officers in the Alcazar, had routed a battalion.

Military experts, foreign and Spanish, agree that the Alcazar, key to the whole central front, which now includes Madrid, might have been captured, its desperate defenders and thick walls notwithstanding, by 1,000 good soldiers. The government tried to find them and could not. A Madrid daily said on September 29 that 5,000 disciplined fighters could win the war for the government. Certainly they could check the enemy. The government has not got them. On September 25 I went to the Talavera front and then, across country, to Toledo. At Olias del Rey, a village ten kilometers from Toledo, the highway was full of deserting militia. Why were they abandoning Toledo? Enemy bombers, they replied, had dropped three bombs on the city. Before I could get their full story, three mammoth German planes, Henkels, circled over us. I lay down behind an olive tree in a V-shaped depression between two knolls. It is certainly no pleasant sensation to be in the possible field of a military aeroplane's activity. Experienced soldiers, however, remain unmoved; they do not flee in panic. The next day, after firing a few cannon shells into Toledo, the insurgent generals were practically assured of its mastery.

On April 16 last, on leaving Spain, I wrote that the right reactionaries were "depressed, frightened, and disorganized. Their only hope at the moment is a violent coup d'état with the aid of the army and/or the Guardia Civil. This scheme is a measure of their helplessness." I referred to their social and political helplessness. Lacking the support of the nation, they resorted to a military insurrection whose backbone is Moors, the mercenaries of the Foreign Legion, and foreign fascist aviators. Some 95 per cent of the officers and the bulk of the soldiers of the Spanish army chose the rebel side when the revolt broke in Morocco on July 17.

The need of an army, then, is the Spanish revolution's most urgent problem. This is civil war, and wars are fought and won by armies. What the legal government needs is a breathing-space in which to train its many enthusiastic, devoted followers. Will it get this breathing-space?

This, in some measure, is a question of cannon and aeroplanes. The government has too few of either. The insurgents, it is expertly estimated, have about 10,000 men on the Talavera-Toledo front. Only half of these could be available for a march on Madrid or its communications. Twenty bombers could hold them back. Often it seems as if fifty aeroplanes could assure victory to the revolution in a very short time. The course of the civil war may be determined, at this stage, by several score of aeroplanes. The government has plenty of gold and pilots. Because of the so-called neutrality regulations it cannot buy enough machines. Several days ago I interviewed Vincent Patriarcha, a twenty-three-year-old Italian fascist flier with an American past who is now held prisoner here. He was flying over Talavera on September 13 in his Italian Fiat, which can do 230 miles an hour. Government aeroplanes appeared. He shot down two. Then Felix Iturbe, a third loyal Spanish aviator, realizing that his slow machine was no match for the fast Italian, catapulted himself into the Fiat and smashed it. The Italian came down in his parachute and was arrested. Iturbe was killed. The wing of his plane imprisoned him in his cockpit so that he could not jump out. Patriarcha told me he came from Genoa in a squadron of five machines. He saw twenty-four Italian Fiats and Savoy's in Seville. There are more in Seville. There are German aeroplanes too. At the Madrid airport the other day I played with the machine-gun levers and gun turrets of the giant Junkers which had strayed on its flight to Seville and been taken here. A child could have known it was an undisguised military machine.

To win, the government must have aeroplanes and other equipment. At Olias del Rey the day before yesterday government artillery shelled Bargas, three miles away. I asked the militia why they did not follow with an attack. They said, "The Moors have machine-guns, we have only rifles." For the present, therefore, the military position dwarfs all others. The alignment of anti-fascist political forces is not altogether stable, and further reverses in the field may upset the balance. Chaos and defeat may follow. Immediate help from the outside can prevent a débâcle. Meanwhile, this city is preparing for siege.

The struggle now racking Spain actually commenced in April, 1931, when the monarchy fell. The pillars of the monarchy—the unenlightened church, the unprogressive landed classes, and the caste army—survived it. During his first long tenure of office (October, 1931, to September, 1933) Prime Minister Manuel Azaña improved the conditions of farm labor, expropriated some of the grandes' estates, and settled approximately 10,000 peasants on the land. He retired unnecessary army officers on full pay. But even the mild reforms he so cautiously introduced both frightened and angered the bourgeoisie. In September, 1933, Azaña was replaced by a right coalition. It wiped out his innovations, reduced wages, and applied a terror which is still remembered vividly.

The measure of the popular unrest that ensued was the violent Asturias revolt in October, 1934, and the simultaneous abortive rising in Catalonia. Passions flamed high; blood flowed profusely. The reactionaries lacked a policy, and the masses ultimately sought salvation in unity. On February 16, 1936, the Popular Front ousted the right from office. This second Azaña government had to be more radical in respect to the land and the church. Yet it still did not touch the army. When I asked Azaña on April 4, 1936, why he did not purge the army, he said, "I see no danger from it." Then he added with a laugh, "And if I did I would not say so." He knew I knew and I knew he knew that there was a danger. All Madrid talked about it. If 200 superior officers of the army had been arrested six months ago in one unexpected swoop, Spain might have been spared the 80,000 men and women, who, it is roughly estimated, have died in the last ten weeks of civil war. Azaña, however, pure-minded intellectual that he is, preferred partial action to drastic action. His land reform alarmed the landlords without seriously weakening them. His delicate transfer of some generals from Madrid to distant posts warned them of possible events to come and told them to prepare for revolt. The coincidence of the semi-feudal class's fear for its property with the militarists' fear for their positions as protectors of the classes from which they spring explains the present rising against constituted authority. Pedants may split hairs about the legality of the situation; the reality is that the landlords, generals, fascists, and their allies are making a last effort to curb the popular revolution which started when Alfonso was driven out. It is a revolution against widespread poverty, for human rights, for progress.

Roosevelt and His Fellow-Travelers

BY MAX LERNER

DESPITE hosannas and battle cries the Presidential campaign is, I am convinced, something less than Armageddon. Despite the antics of Messrs. Farley and Hamilton it is something more than a sordid scramble for political jobs. But between Armageddon and the fleshpots there is room for various appraisals of what the campaign thus far sums up to. What have we learned about it?

First, that a campaign can be dirty without ceasing to be somewhat dull. This is due, no doubt, to the clumsiness with which the Republicans and their fascist allies have handled their propaganda tools. Smearing Roosevelt with communism, atheism, and Spanish atrocities is well enough as a technique, but it requires at least a modicum of intelligence. Second, that prosperity talks, and can make its voice heard even amid the campaign din. Third, that the prowess of newspapers and campaign funds has been overrated. Mr. Roosevelt has gained strength despite an almost perfect Fourth Estate batting score against him and despite what seemed like inexhaustible Republican coffers. Fourth, that class counts for more than section in American life. Granted all of Mr. Roosevelt's advantages and his masterful campaign, with its feinting, parrying, and thrusting, the fact remains that he could get nowhere if the common people were not united behind him. As a figure Mr. Roosevelt dominates the whole campaign, but the division of forces is not to be seen in personal terms: it comes closer to being a class division than in any election since Jackson's. Only the farm vote and that of the lower middle class are seriously split. Fifth, that party lines are now more unstable than at any time since the Civil War, as witness the striking shifts of alignment in all the camps. Al Smith is right. There are things that transcend party.

The new phenomenon is the fellow-traveler. The term has a Russian background and means someone who does not accept all your aims but has enough in common with you to accompany you in a comradely fashion part of the way. In this campaign both Mr. Landon and Mr. Roosevelt have acquired fellow-travelers. Mr. Landon fears to link arms openly with them, but there they are unmistakably seeking to help him on his difficult trek to the White House—Coughlin, Townsend, Gerald Smith, Al Smith, the du Ponts, Hearst, and Lemke. Mr. Roosevelt's fellow-travelers are the forces of progressive labor, organized nationally as Labor's Non-Partisan League and in crucial New York taking the form of the American Labor Party. The desperate union of Tories and fascists was to be expected. The massing of labor almost solidly behind a liberal Democrat deserves closer analysis.

Just what does it mean? Campaign or no campaign, we all know that we are living today on the thin edge of history. The fate of workers and progressives in the fascist countries has roused American workers from their traditional lethargy in politics. It has led the more militant of them to abandon their former "plague on both your houses" attitude and come out for Roosevelt. The argument from the right, voiced by Mr. Knox and Mr. Hutcheson, that this will lead labor into slavery is too absurd to be discussed. But the case from the left against Roosevelt's progressive supporters is clean-cut and cogent.

They are told that men have been lured by phrases before; that this sort of chasing after a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow has been the bitter and continuous experience of progressives, and invariably the glitter has turned out to be not that of gold but of the steel bayonets of the National Guard; that the worker should have learned from past experience with war hysteria how not to plump for the pretty phrase, how to keep his head, how to feel for the ribbed structure of actuality under the skin of rhetoric; that Roosevelt's class roots are not those of the worker but of the aristocrat, and his historic function is to bolster capitalism with the minimum concession to its victims; that the outlook for the future is not much better than the record of the past; that Mr. Roosevelt has so little tenacity of purpose that a program is for him a work of art meticulously carved in butter; that when the inevitable disillusionment comes under Roosevelt it will let the workers down harder than otherwise, because it will be a disillusionment with their own action as well; that it means a sapping of the workers' energies and a false education for them to make a hero of a leader who cannot solve their problems.

There is considerable force in this argument. How do the Roosevelt progressives answer it?

The American progressive workers have learned that doctrinaire radicalism is ineffective without a mass base no matter how valid may be its position; and that it has made little or no progress in winning a mass base in America. They have learned also from European experience that while the radical parties were refining their theory and quarreling among themselves, the fascists stole a march on them and captured power. If I understand them, they are determined that this shall not happen here. There is, of course, an equal determination to the same effect on the part of the Socialists and Communists. That is why there is less liberal-baiting among the radicals and less radical-baiting among the liberals. That is why, also, the emphasis has shifted from contempt for the bourgeois-democratic state to a defense of democratic processes. But more is involved than a change in language. We are witnessing a drastic shift in orientation.

Perhaps I can best express that shift in summary fashion by saying that the new attitude is gradualist, nationalist, and thoroughly convinced of labor's ultimate political strength. Its gradualism is the sort that wants socialization of industry, but wants also to make reasonably sure of every step along the road to that goal. The premise is that you cannot get from a to c without passing through b. The premise is also that you must work with what material you have at hand. And that material happens to be the American people as the end-product of the complex course of American history. It is not so much with Mr. Roosevelt that progressives like Lewis and Hillman are working: it is rather with the masses of American labor, who find themselves in 1936 no farther advanced than to accept and applaud the New Deal's sympathy for trade unionism and collective bargaining.

The progressive temper is today hard-bitten and coldly instrumental. For labor the choice between Roosevelt and Landon is a choice between a chance on the one hand to organize its forces over the next four years and on the other hand the certainty that it will be kept from it. The progressives have their eye not on 1936 but on 1940. There is much they can learn, of course, in 1936: they can set up a skeleton organization of their own, as the American Labor Party is doing in New York; they can learn the low-down on politics all the way from the city ward to the national capital. But unless labor has its own political party in 1940 it cannot meet the increasing fascist threat. Obviously there can be no such political organization in 1940 unless labor builds a far more extensive economic base than it has at present in the A. F. of L. That base can be built only by a rapid and energetic campaign of organizing the mass-production industries. That will be at best a difficult task, even under Mr. Roosevelt—and Miss Perkins. Under Mr. Landon and Bill Hutcheson it would be impossible. Attempts to achieve it would meet with unrestrained violence from the employers, treachery from the Labor Department, and the use of the military by the government. The overshadowing need over the next four years is for an open state of civil liberties, without which no progress of any sort can be made toward organizing the workers and their allies.

That, I take it, is why a large majority of the progressive intellectuals and almost the whole of labor are for Mr. Roosevelt. They are not shutting their eyes to his shortcomings. They do not lack a historical perspective from which to view him. They will not count on his generosity or humanitarianism but only on the fact that his own fate, like theirs, depends on avoiding fascism, consolidating the control of industry, and keeping an open state of civil liberties. They are pouring their energy and money into his campaign now, and working shoulder to shoulder with Democratic politicians who represent the worst aspects of capitalism and of whom they will eventually have to sweep the polity clean. But it is characteristic of American labor now that it feels sufficiently strong and confident of the future to take the risks involved.

[This is the first of two articles analyzing the dilemma of the American progressive. The second will appear next week.]

Will New York Go for Roosevelt?

BY CARL RANDAU

New York, October 20

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT will carry New York. The Empire State's forty-seven electoral votes will go to him as something of a bonus, for he could win without them. Governor Landon, on the other hand, has never had a chance unless he might somehow corral New York. The Republicans will go on calling New York a "doubtful" state until November 3, in order to keep up their courage and to keep the campaign contributions flowing in. If they once admitted that Roosevelt had an edge on his home state's large block of votes, their campaign would collapse, for the big campaign contributors, mostly from New York or with close New York connections, have a canny objection to throwing cash on the ash heap. There has been no sound reason at any time during the present campaign for listing New York among the doubtful states. Since the completion of New York City's registration, which showed an increase of 500,000 over 1932, no one but Roosevelt-hating dowagers and Republican contribution collectors have had any reason to keep up the pretense.

The city's vote will determine the result in the state, and there is every likelihood that the President will pile up a city lead of more than 1,000,000 votes. He had a city lead of 871,000 over Hoover in 1932 against an upstate Hoover lead of 275,000, which gave him the state by almost 600,000. Landon's upstate lead, as indicated by several polls, may be a little larger than Hoover's, but he will be lucky if he can cut the Roosevelt state lead to 500,000. Registration in the state this year for the first time exceeds 6,000,000. The gains have been heavier in New York City than upstate, and upstate they have been heaviest in the cities—cities which have shown an increasing Democratic drift for fifteen years.

The Republicans realized some time ago that they were in a tough spot. Since it was not possible to have all Democrats deported before the election, they did the next best thing. They tried to frighten the voters by telling them Roosevelt was a Communist. The red scare is now in full bloom, but it has produced more laughter than fear and more resentment than belief. Hearst started the drive by playing up Browder's declaration that the big issue was the defeat of Landon, but he distorted his quotations and was quickly overtaken. Hamilton rushed to the rescue by shouting that Roosevelt, via Dubinsky, was helping to kill Catholics in Spain. He had just as bad luck as Hearst, because the Catholics to whom he was appealing in this country are literate and have read, even in the Hearst papers, that the most effective slaughtering of Catholics in Spain is being done by Moors, the historic enemies of Rome. Roosevelt took the rather unnecessary step of denying that he was a Communist, and the Communists made it unanimous.

Al Smith hasn't called Roosevelt a Communist yet, and he has rather concentrated his fire on the questionably important fact that the President didn't ask him how to run things, but the man whom Smith is credited with having put across as the Republican candidate for governor wasted no time in jumping into the middle of the red scare. This man, for many years a respected Supreme Court Justice in Westchester County, William F. Bleakley, hadn't got around to such unimportant questions as what he would do about running the state government when he told an audience at Monticello that the President, "by his attacks on the Constitution and his publicly stated disfavor with the Supreme Court, has weakened these bulwarks against communism." Judge Bleakley's concern with the national Administration rather than with the local campaign is typical of the entire Republican strategy, which relies heavily on the development of the issue of communism. And it's a hard job to convince a New York audience that Governor Lehman, ex-Wall Street banker, has any well-defined left leanings.

Bleakley's selection as the Republican candidate has many interesting angles, not the least interesting being the fact, that his nomination was paid for in part by Al Smith's speeches for the Republicans. His strength as a Catholic and Smith's speeches have been rather overshadowed by mid-campaign revelations concerning his banking entanglements. It has been shown, for instance, that when the Westchester Trust Company was taken over by the State Superintendent of Banks on February 3, 1934, Judge Bleakley was responsible for loans aggregating $116,981. Of these, $38,417 were personal loans; $41,379 were loans of which he was single indorser; and $37,085 were loans of which he was joint indorser with a man who later died. He did not refrain, despite these debts, from sitting as presiding justice in a grand-jury inquiry into the bank or from giving advice to a jury which exonerated the bank officers of the charges against them. He also sat as judge in the case of a widow who brought suit to recover funds from the bank, and then put aside the jury's verdict favoring the widow. Reports in Democratic circles are that Bleakley owed Westchester banks about $300,000 at the time of the crash.

Even before these discoveries Bleakley was regarded as just another Republican also-ran, and Al Smith's pro-Republican speeches had been recognized as worth less than the price paid for them. His Carnegie Hall address proved to be almost as great a boomerang as his Liberty League speech. It did give the Republicans a chance to attain a new high in ridiculous campaign claims. They announced that Smith would bring 3,000,000 Democrats with him to the Republican fold. Newspaper surveys indicate that the only persons convinced by Smith were already lined up for Landon, while Democrats generally speak of him as a traitor. His attempt to swing votes away from Roosevelt is likely to be one of the biggest flops of a campaign replete with flops. Al Smith's attacks on Roosevelt will not convince the millions who have obtained jobs through the WPA or the revival of business activity that the New Deal has been a complete failure. Smith, despite the fact he was once the state's most popular man, has utterly lost his hold on the masses.

Some politicians argue that Smith, as a leading Catholic layman, will be able to wean many Catholic votes from Roosevelt, but there are indications that in this election far more attention will be paid to economic than to religious issues. The Gallup poll recently showed that Roosevelt is supported by four out of five Catholics, and that of all religious sects the Catholics have the least inclination to vote for Landon. As a dry, and as governor of a dry state, Landon had plenty to overcome to win favor with New York's Catholics even if it had not been rumored that he had sympathetic leanings toward the Ku Klux Klan. It was in part to offset the harm done by such reports that Landon showed an interest in the selection of New York's gubernatorial candidate—an interest that was enough to give great impetus to the Bleakley pre-convention drive. But in putting up a Catholic candidate for governor the Republicans sacrificed some support among the bitterly anti-Catholic upstate farmers, and so for every Democrat the Republicans may entice away by means of the religious issue they may well lose a vote to the Democrats in the rural communities. Furthermore, Governor Lehman stands well with the Catholics, partly because he exonerated District Attorney Geoghan of Brooklyn of misfeasance charges.

Geoghan is a good Catholic and popular with the Brooklyn Irish. If the Geoghan followers vote for Lehman, they are also likely to vote for Roosevelt, despite Al Smith, Bleakley, and even the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin. Coughlin's influence in New York State is small. His National Union for Social Justice has had difficulties in getting groups to organize into clubs except in the outlying sections of New York City and in some rural communities. When Coughlin recently made his only personal appearance of the campaign in New York City, he chose to speak in the borough which he thought the center of his strength—Brooklyn. Despite extensive ballyhoo, Ebbets Field, scene of the gathering was only half filled. Coughlin's candidate, Lemke, hadn't made a dent on the New York electorate when the priest offered to support the Republican ticket, only to have his offer indignantly rejected.

Far more important than the Union Party's activities is the role being played by union labor. At the recent convention of the State Federation of Labor at Syracuse Roosevelt and Lehman were indorsed unanimously—an action without precedent in this state. The American Labor Party, the New York branch of Labor's Non-Partisan League, is actively campaigning for Roosevelt and Lehman and is more interested in getting voters to cast their Roosevelt-Lehman ballots under the Labor Party insignia than in electing any candidates of its own. Unfortunately for its own future, it is a party almost without candidates. Those who are sincerely interested in developing a strong Farmer-Labor Party for 1940 question the tactics of this concentration on the Roosevelt-Lehman campaign, but there is no doubt that this course will enhance the majority by which the Democrats carry the state.

Republicans who have expected Roosevelt to be defeated partly through the normal reaction of election swings would do well to reflect on the long tenure of office enjoyed by Jefferson's party once he managed to overcome the Tories and the Federalists in 1800. Since the days of Jefferson and Jackson no President has frankly relied on popular support and uncompromisingly placed human rights above property rights. Any party, whether it be headed by Roosevelt or another, which emphasizes human rights may well find itself as secure as the party of Jefferson and his successors, which "held the reins of government, with scarcely a contest and without a single defeat, for forty years."

There are indications that the voters, despite newspaper and high-priest advice, want political leaders who genuinely represent them, or at least make an effort to carry out their wishes. Because Roosevelt has managed to convince most voters that he has their interests at heart, it is wholly possible not only that he will be the first Democrat to win New York's electoral vote in two successive popular elections, but that he will break his own record for a total national electoral vote.

Is Landon Constitutional?

BY ROBERT H. JACKSON

THE constitutional issue, which threatened at the beginning of the campaign to be of major importance, was for a time evidently recognized as a hot potato by both sides and was generally ignored. In his last few speeches, however, Governor Landon has again, perhaps rashly, brought the issue into the limelight. Particularly in his Detroit speech on October 13 the Republican candidate devoted most of his remarks to criticism of what he called President Roosevelt's usurpation of legislative power, and of his readiness to ignore or to defy the power of the courts.

When on July 23 a voice from Topeka proposed to "restore" our government to a "constitutional basis," we accepted it as a proper statement of the purpose of any law-abiding citizen. The voice also called attention to the Presidential oath "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States" and said that the oath carried the obligation to "so use the executive power that it will fulfil the purposes for which it was delegated." This was still obvious and safe. But the candidate continued, "It is with a full understanding of the meaning of this oath that I accept this nomination." This was a clear challenge to an investigation of his understanding of constitutional principles, which was the last thing that he should have started.

In Kansas the executive power as exercised by Governor Landon has been in conflict with the judicial power just as the national executive power has clashed with the judicial, and with the same results. The executive and legislative branches of government in Kansas have been prevented from carrying out major policies by their failure to comply with requirements which the judicial department considered more important than the policy involved. The judges killed the policy to vindicate the constitutional principle that they felt had been violated.

Governor Landon was first elected for a two-year term which began on January 9, 1933. He was reelected in the landslide of November, 1934, which produced the oversized New Deal majority in Congress. That might indicate that he was not out of step with the New Deal sentiment then prevailing. His second term began January 14, 1935, and his tenure of office therefore roughly coincides with President Roosevelt's. The two men have faced similar problems; both have had rough treatment from the legalists.

Topeka did not chide Washington; it attended the New Deal ceremonials with supplications and anthems of praise. At the oil conference called by Secretary Ickes on March 27, 1933, Governor Landon is reported by the New York Times to have declared that he wanted to "enlist for the duration of the war in this campaign of President Roosevelt's to get America on its feet"; and he added that "even the iron hand of a dictator is better than paralysis." Of course Mr. Roosevelt's better judgment recognized such radical, if well-intended, counsel as the panic of scared men. He tried to follow the traditional American way, relying on the Supreme Court, as he was justified in doing by its earlier decisions, to take a reasonably broad view of emergency power.

Executives must have a policy for the future; judges are occupied only with precedents from the past. The policy of an executive is shaped solely by the result which he wants to accomplish. The judges have again and again said that they are concerned not with results but with a law that is above results. Can Mr. Landon escape this conflict between legalism and statesmanship? The answer is that as Governor of Kansas he has not been able to.

It is not my purpose in this study to uphold or to attack any of Governor Landon's laws which the courts have struck down. It is my purpose merely to read the court reports and to assay his claim that he knows how to get along with the courts and how to get his program into constitutional shape. Let us look first at certain emergency legislation which reflects Governor Landon's financial policy. I would not detract from Mr. Landon's reputation as a frugal Governor, but his frugality appears to have been fortified by an early decision of the Kansas Supreme Court which brought him summarily back to the Kansas constitution, from which he had wandered, and restrained any disposition he might otherwise have developed to become lavish. On November 23, 1933, Governor Landon approved a measure authorizing the Kansas Commission of Forestry, Fish, and Game to borrow $200,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make certain public improvements and defray extraordinary expenses. The state Supreme Court held the law unconstitutional. In condemning the Landon borrowing policy the court recited various constitutional provisions and said: "These provisions make it clear that from the foundation of the state the mandate of the constitution has prescribed a fiscal policy of 'pay as you go' so far as current expenses of state government are concerned." The court cited extreme measures taken by the state of Kansas in times past in maintaining a traditional financial conservatism. Governor Landon's financial policy was adjudged to be contrary to this safe and sane policy. Thus the Governor of Kansas was saved from an early disposition to go in debt. The court's decision leaves an impression that his reputation for sound finance may be somewhat synthetic.

That unauthorized power has been delegated to the President has been asserted with much sound and fury. It is argued that in order to take the government out of hands that would accept unauthorized power and to avoid the danger of a dictatorship, the Governor of Kansas should become President of the United States. In his Detroit speech on October 13 Mr. Landon said: "... when the independence of the courts is destroyed, the rights and liberties of the people are gone. The people are then at the mercy of the Executive. The Executive is all powerful." It is somewhat startling therefore to find that in a unanimous decision of the Kansas Supreme Court Governor Landon was himself accused of exercising unauthorized legislative power. A law passed and approved by Governor Landon in 1933 authorized the Governor of Kansas to extend for a period not exceeding six months a preexisting moratorium given by the legislature on mortgages if in the Governor's judgment the necessity therefor still existed. The Governor proclaimed an extension, but the Supreme Court on January 6, 1935, said: "We conclude that what the Governor was delegated to do, and did attempt to do, was legislative in character and that such delegation of legislative power was entirely unauthorized under our separately constitutioned functions of government, and was therefore unconstitutional, void, and inoperative."

But the mortgage-foreclosure situation was acute, and the failure of relief because the Governor exceeded his powers did not end the problem. The Governor and legislators tried again. On February 28, 1935, Governor Landon approved a measure which extended the time of redemption from mortgage-foreclosure judgments, applying to judgments already rendered as well as to future judgments. The court rendered a decision on December 7, 1935, setting aside this act as unconstitutional. The majority of the court thought that Governor Landon and the legislature had made an assault upon the court's power; the judicial power was perhaps being "flaunted," to borrow from the vocabulary of the Cleveland platform builders. The dissenting opinion was by Justice Harvey, who seems to play in Kansas the role that Justices Stone, Cardozo, and Brandeis play in Washington. Justice Harvey came to the aid of the mortgage-redemption statute and flayed the majority of his court, saying: "Neither can I give my consent to the view, which appears to dominate the opinion as written, that judicial action is so much superior to legislative action. Just as sometimes happens with persons who occupy other governmental units, those of the court occasionally acquire an exaggerated opinion of their own authority or power."

"Vested rights" is a symbol to which the judiciary has shown almost Oriental devotion. It is rarely held, however, that a public group or body has any vested rights, and it is still more rare for an Executive to invade the vested rights of a public group. However, on March 24, 1933, Governor Landon approved a statute authorizing the county to charge back to various taxing districts their prorated share of taxing-district funds, lost in a bank failure when a depository had been closed several years before. This statute was challenged and held unconstitutional by the court as being "retrospective in its application, and therefore the vested rights of the defendants are invaded and infringed."

Citizens of Wyandotte County, in which Kansas City is located, had complained to the Attorney General and the Governor that the criminal laws were not being enforced. Legislation approved by the Governor provided for a special grand jury and a special prosecutor. The law also provided that the compensation of the special prosecutor should be paid in whole or in part from costs taxed against persons convicted on indictments found by such grand jury. This provision applied to no other county of the state. The penalty against persons convicted on indictments found by this particular grand jury would therefore be greater than the penalties against the same persons for the same offenses would have been had these persons been indicted by a regular grand jury and prosecuted by the regular county prosecutor. The court held that this provision was "a plain denial to convicted persons in Wyandotte County of the equal protection of the law afforded to all others in their situation within this state and guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment." And what was more serious, the majority of the court went on to affirm that "this manifest constitutional infirmity" vitiated the whole statute. Thus the constitutional blunder in the statute signed by Governor Landon cost Wyandotte County its special law-enforcement machinery.

One of the rocks upon which some of the New Deal legislation split was the time-honored judicial doctrine prohibiting delegation of power. An act duly approved by the Governor of Kansas on February 8, 1935, authorizes county commissioners to devise methods to stop soil drifting—specifically to order lands subject to erosion "to be cultivated, plowed, furrowed, sowed, planted, handled, or cared for." If the farmer didn't do as he was told, the commissioners were authorized to name an individual to "go upon all such lands for such purpose and to assess reasonable charges for such service against the land in controversy." The law also required the board to prescribe rules which must be complied with by the farmer. The court held this to be a "clear delegation of legislative power and of power to legislate on a matter which is not local and which is forbidden by the constitution"; and it prohibited the county commissioners from acting upon the ground that they had been trying to prevent soil erosion without lawful authority. Thus ended another costly lesson in constitutional law. The Kansas farmer found that the courts held his problem to be local when the federal government attempted to solve it, and not local when the state attempted to do so.

In reviewing this record of laws struck down by the Kansas Supreme Court I am not concerned with the motives or the statecraft of Governor Landon. When legislation reaches the courts, neither good motives nor sound policy saves it. The strange parallel in the experiences of these two Executives in attempting to make economic, financial, and general-welfare policies meet the requirements of the courts does pose a serious question as to whether the legalists are not intruding technical and obstructive rules of legal philosophy where they do not belong. Both the Kansas record of Governor Landon and the speeches that he has made during the campaign indicate clearly that he has nothing to contribute to the solution of this problem.

The Pope Needs America

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

II

THE instrument with which the church hopes to conquer America is Catholic Action. The present Pope has defined it as follows: "Catholic Action is nothing else than the apostolate of the laity under the leadership of the bishops." Michael Williams in "The Catholic Church in Action" states that "primarily, Catholic Action . . . may be described as both the intensification and the more highly organized collective direction of the apostolic mission of the church to the world, built upon the 'participation of the laity in the apostolate of the hierarchy.'" E. Boyd Barrett defines it thus:

Catholic Action is best described as the new phase of Catholicism. . . . In theory, Catholic Action is the work and service of lay Catholics in the cause of religion, under the guidance of the bishops; In practice it is the Catholic group fighting their way to control America. . . . In medieval times the church gained supremacy in various countries through her influence over nobles and soldiers. Today she aims at the old supremacy by mass action of her organized subjects and by systematic penetration of various groupings.

Barrett's description of Catholic Action is a satisfactory one if we apply two corrections. In his reference to medieval times he neglects to indicate the economic basis of the church's supremacy, namely, its vast land holdings. Secondly, he speaks of the aim of the Catholic church—to regain its quondam supremacy—as if this aim were achievable in the present era. The church cannot turn back the clock of history, the late Gilbert K. Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc to the contrary notwithstanding. It can only defend itself by becoming a staunch ally of capitalism, whether the latter takes the form of bourgeois democracy or fascism.

In America, then, Catholic Action is working systematically to permeate the life of all Catholics. Christ instructed his apostles to go forth and teach all nations. The Catholic laity is ostensibly organized for a crusade to intensify Catholicism, to further the spiritual and material aims of the church. For this purpose the church has its Knights of Columbus, Holy Name societies, Catholic alumni organizations, Catholic Youth clubs, Newman clubs in the universities, guilds for doctors, writers, actors, and nurses. It has a powerful formal and informal apparatus of education, and it even fights bitterly to force the appropriation of public funds for the assistance of private—read Catholic—institutions. Through such papers as the Catholic Worker, which offers saints and radical phrases to the proletariat, it bids for stronger support from the worker. Its journals now reflect plans for the conversion of the Negro, whom it has long neglected, in order to neutralize his radical and revolutionary potentialities. The church commands a fighting press, manned by militant mediocrities of the type of Michael Williams and Father Talbott, S.J. It has organized the Legion of Decency with ten million members—and this organization is able to dictate to supine producers in Hollywood what the American public, including its millions of non-Catholics, shall see in motion-picture theaters. It lobbies against child-labor laws on the theory that such laws would give the state control over the child, who according to the will of God and natural law belongs to the Deity, the parent, and the parish priest. It attacks the dissemination of birth-control information. In some of its organs, notably America, we occasionally find expressions of anti-Semitism which might well have emanated from Nazi Germany. Likewise the Catholic press conducts a consistent and continuous red-baiting campaign, which is supplemented with speeches by prominent Catholic laymen and clergymen. This theme dominated the recent convention of the Holy Name Society in New York City. The alumni of Notre Dame University are now planning to add bolshevik hunts to college cheer-leading as an occupation for adults who have never fully grown up. Meanwhile the church demands of President Roosevelt that he interfere in the internal affairs of Mexico. In a recent issue of America one Thomas S. Hunter writes:

The Mexican issue is not a Catholic issue, it is not a politico-religious issue; it is a fundamental issue in which our own essential liberties are involved. If freemen, irrespective of creed and color, fail to respond to Rome's appeal, Mexico will perish, and we who have stood by impassive and watched her agony, will we escape?

Here is an open call for intervention. But where was Rome's appeal to "freemen" to halt Mussolini's invasion of Christian Ethiopia? What effective policies did Rome introduce to achieve liberty and social justice in Spain? What did the church ever do to alleviate the abject poverty and complete illiteracy of the Mexican peons?

Since this is the formal role which Mother Church is playing and seeking to play in America today, it is pertinent to summarize her apologetics. I have already suggested the biblical justification of Catholic Action, the command to the apostles to go forth and teach all men and all nations. Further, the church contends that since the disruption of the feudal and medieval era materialism has been growing in the world. Today neo-paganism has gained such a foothold that it threatens civilization unless the spiritual forces of Christendom, guided by the firm hand of the Pope and led by the church, organize to stem the tide. Today the world suffers grievously from the heresy of materialism, which generates a false science. This causes class war, irreverence for authority and order, and immorality. And further, materialism as a heresy has become organized in the movement known as communism, which operates from Moscow, the red Rome. Communism persecutes religion and gloats over the murder of priests and nuns. It promotes atheism and class war; it threatens to destroy liberty and disrupt the family. Coeval with its threat to the family is its attack on private property. Private property is an institution justified by natural law. Its defense was framed in the writings of Saint Thomas Aquinas. Evil does not flow from the institution of private property or from the profit system which is constructed upon it, but is the result of the failure of those who own private property to make the right use of it. Thus the solution of the economic problems of the world is not socialism, which places the ownership of the means of production in the hands of the proletarian state. Rather, it lies in the employer's acceptance of a moral obligation to give his employees a just and fair wage.

In America the church now insists that it accepts democracy and asserts that the Constitution of the United States must be defended. And who is to be its defender? That 100 per cent American institution, the Roman Catholic church, whose Pope lives in the Vatican and is always Italian and whose College of Cardinals is also preponderantly Italian. The entire structure of the church is anti-democratic. Its theology is dogmatic. It permits no error, no deviation in conduct, and it carries its dogmatic control to the extent of maintaining a papal Index of Books. The church insists that it accepts the principle of the separation of church and state. The Dogma of Papal Infallibility, which was log-rolled into acceptance in the last century over the arguments and protests of the more intelligent Catholics, gives the Pope final authority on matters of faith and morals, and it holds that on such matters the Pope cannot err when he speaks ex cathedra. The only catch is the fact that faith and morals manage to become intermingled with political and economic questions. While the church professes belief in the separation of church and state and in liberty of conscience, it insidiously attempts to eat up the state and organize conscience within the framework of an unrelenting set of dogmas. The democratic pretensions of the church are a front and a heresy. They will be used as long as they are needed, and when they become cumbersome, they will be Jesuitically refined, refashioned, and placed on file in the Vatican until they are again needed.

In its appeal to proletarians, many of whom are nominally or actually its religious subjects, the church is beginning to assume pseudo-radicalism. Up to now Father Coughlin has served well on this front. His doctrines of social justice are indubitably modeled upon the famous encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII and Pius XI. However, Father Coughlin is an out-and-out, acknowledged fascist, and in his paper, Social Justice, he is even now beginning to speak favorably of the new Germany. A Catholic priest as a fascist leader in a preponderantly Protestant country is too much for the Vatican. But Father Coughlin has expressed the ideas and sentiments of the famous "red paragraphs" of the encyclicals issued by the present Pontiff. To quote Pius XI, "The immense number of propertyless wage-earners on the one hand and the superabundant riches of the fortunate few on the other are an unanswerable argument that earthly goods so abundantly produced in this age of industrialism are far from rightly distributed and equitably shared among various classes of men." Hence there is a need of social justice. The laborer must be worthy of his hire. The rich must not abuse their gifts and goods. "Every effort must be made that at least in the future a just share only of the fruits of production be permitted to accumulate in the hands of the wealthy and that an ample sufficiency be supplied to the workingman . . . Entirely false is the principle widely propagated today that the worth of labor and therefore the equitable return to be made for it should equal the worth of its net result. Thus the right to the full product of his toil is claimed for the wage-earner. How erroneous this is appears from what we have written above concerning capital and labor." This last is obviously an attack on Marxism.

As Adam Smith has said, there is a lot of ruin in any system. There remains a lot of ruin in American capitalism. There remains a lot of ruin in world capitalism. The policy of the Catholic church is to intrench itself in that ruin. In a world on fire the policy of the church is to ally itself both with God and with those who have economic power. The church must retain its income from America. And it must remain on good terms with American capitalism. The Holy System of Profits and the Holy Ghost are lining up side by side to save what privileges they can in an era of worldwide decay.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT's appointment of three members of the new Maritime Commission has for the moment stopped severe criticism of him by the shipping men who are eager to get their feet into the Treasury trough and receive their share of the subsidies which the commission is to ladle out. They cannot understand why he has waited so long, since Congress adjourned, to pour the money into their pockets; all of them are, of course, bitterly critical of the Administration's relief expenditures, its pampering of the workless, and its boondoggling. Just as soon as the government makes payments of sufficient size, our shipyards will become beehives of activity; new ships will be laid down, and every available old one will be driven as fast as possible over the seven seas. At last a great national maritime awakening! At last the sleeping American giant is aroused to reconquer his rightful heritage—leadership on the sea!

All of which means simply that Uncle Sam has been stuck again and now, with the taxpayers' money, is to keep on their feet an industry and a trade which cannot support themselves unaided because they are without adequate experience and ability, and because the economic need and opportunity are not there. With our world trade still only a fraction of what it was, we are to build a lot of new ships for which, save in the Atlantic trade, there are no demands and no cargoes; so the Treasury is to meet all the deficits and the owners are to take all the profits, if and when. Long a Republican proposal, beaten in Congress by Democrats and independent Republicans year after year, this unprecedented departure in government policy was put through by the President and a Congress which hardly debated the measure. Never before have tonnage subsidies been even considered. The reasons they have been decided on now are, first, the army and navy demand for a reserve of transports for the next war—although we have renounced war and the President assures us that all our arming is merely to defend our territory and our coasts; second, national pride in showing the flag everywhere; third, a false belief that if we don't have our own carriers we are at the mercy of foreigners and are regularly mulcted—which our past history wholly belies; fourth, a desire to get away from the scandalous and disgraceful mail-subsidy system under which we paid in one case something like $300,000 to send four pounds of mail to Europe; fifth, the desire to keep the shipyards at work and the ships' crews busy.

So we are entering a world merchant-marine race as vicious as the naval race and equally productive of bad feeling among the nations. The competition is no longer among individuals, a matter of private initiative and enterprise, but among governments. The new Russian merchant fleet is government-owned, and the German fleet is sustained and directed, at a heavy loss, by the Hitler government. Mussolini pours out funds for new and old Italian ships. France builds and succors its Normandie and keeps the chief companies alive by meeting their deficits, however great. And finally the British government, long bitterly opposed to any government aid, now subsidizes tramps on a small scale, builds the Queen Mary and plans her sister ship, and will soon, if it listens to the shipowners, bar all foreign ships from trade between one British or colonial port and another, just as we permit no foreign ship to carry passengers or cargo from San Francisco to New York. Which government has the largest surplus to meet the deficits? That is the chief question. It is needless to add that our great capitalists who damn the Roosevelt Administration for its interference in private business have only praise when it holds the bag for our shipowners. That, they say, is the proper function of any government—to keep its hands off when the masters of capital are earning big profits and to make up the deficits by tariffs and direct doles or loans.

I am not at all sure that in the years to come this yielding to the outright subsidy grabbers will not be pointed to as one of the most wasteful and disgraceful acts of the New Deal. It is creating more vested interests, more businesses with the government as a sleeping partner—keeping its eyes closed to nepotism, waste, inefficiency, and corruption but always meeting the deficits. This is no mere borrowing of fears. This is actually what has happened every time the government has gone into the subsidy business—witness the Pacific Mail Steamship Company scandals of the last century and the aviation scandals which drew Mr. Roosevelt's fire early in his rule. Thanks to government aid, while pilots were inadequately paid for risking their lives, the "bankers, brokers, promoters, and politicians," as Senator Black put it after his investigation, "were allotting among themselves the taxpayers' money" and making fortunes, besides receiving in some cases salaries of $200,000 a year.

Of the new appointees on the commission, one is a rear admiral of the navy and the other a rear admiral of the Coast Guard. The permanent chairman has not yet been selected. Everything will depend upon him and his associates—whether the system will be efficiently administered, whether the operators will be held up to the mark, whether the seamen will get a square deal, and whether they will be deprived of the right to strike, as the operators think they are deprived by the act. The President would do well to pick a man as upstanding, forceful, and well-equipped as Senator Couzens of Michigan, unfortunately now defeated for reelection.

The Men That Are Falling

BY WALLACE STEVENS

(Nation Prize Poem)

God and all angels sing the world to sleep,
Now that the moon is rising in the heat

And crickets are loud again in the grass. The moon
Burns in the mind on lost remembrances.

He lies down and the night wind blows upon him here.
The bells grow longer. This is not sleep. This is desire.

Ah! Yes, desire . . . this leaning on his bed,
This leaning on his elbows on his bed,

Staring, at midnight, at the pillow that is black
In the catastrophic room . . . beyond despair,

Like an intenser instinct. What is it he desires?
But this he cannot know, the man that thinks,

Yet life itself, the fulfilment of desire
In the grinding ric-rac, staring steadily

At a head upon the pillow in the dark,
More than sudarium, speaking the speech

Of absolutes, bodiless, a head
Thick-lipped from riot and rebellious cries,

The head of one of the men that are falling, placed Upon the pillow to repose and speak,

Speak and say the immaculate syllables
That he spoke only by doing what he did.

God and all angels, this was his desire,
Whose head lies blurring here, for this he died.

Taste of the blood upon his martyred lips,
O pensioners, O demagogues and pay-men!

This death was his belief though death is a stone.
This man loved earth, not heaven, enough to die.

The night wind blows upon the dreamer, bent
Over words that are life's voluble utterance.

Collapse of Time

BY JOHN PEALE BISHOP

(Special Mention)

Mills closed, doors shut, windows empty
Except for stones; mills closed, doors shut, dispelling
Wanderers, some or none to hear
Gnaw of machines again.

Ducks flew in vain to the drained marshes. Crows Crossed, drought cropped, a starved and lowing pasture.
Here greed was changed to devastation,
At last to a fixed conceit of fear.

Climate changed: cut woods, loosed floods
Ravaged the valleys; distant storms
Accumulated dust in tall cities.
The ancient cupola'd capitol topped

By a silent elevation of steel girders,
Minium-painted giddiness, from which all men
Were gone; all work stopped; the noonday sun
Was dusk'd to red by dust-clouds.

Streets rose, strikers rioted. Was one who sat
Transcolored by his own failure, though starving
White and whole with rage, under
The air-pawing horses of descending

Law, a long age of disinherited terror before
The clubbed skull rolled in torment. Brute
Hoof-beats clattered about the empty square.
Corpses sprouted from dead clothes on pavement stones.

The contemplation of all action waits
On opinion. We are governed in our own despite
But by our own disorder. Dissemblers
Deceive us with our own words.

Time does not lack for instruments of torture.
Interpreters attain hysteria. Men are voices.
The lately spat-on, become our tyrants,
Punish both the faults of the blood

And blood running. Our new Caesar is crowned
By old newspapers. Look closely! You will see
His oppressive scepter has been rolled
From a revolutionary manifesto.

THE CREATIVE MUDDLE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN A fit of irritation Mike Gold once denounced W. S. Gilbert as little better than a fascist ahead of his time. He may have been thinking of the anti-egalitarian sentiments expressed in "The Gondoliers" or perhaps of the irony implicit in the picture of a democratic navy as it is presented in "Pinafore." But in either event he was, in a way, paying the librettist a compliment which he did not deserve, for the truth of the matter is that Gilbert hadn't the slightest idea what he was, and that, in all probability, he would have ceased to write with such sprightly perverseness if he had ever been able to find out.

It is true that he was, in politics, a nominal Conservative, but that appears to have been chiefly because he happened to be a member of a Conservative club, and it is hard to imagine how the various references to the hereditary aristocracy in "Iolanthe," for example, could have gone down any better at the Carleton than the passages to which Mr. Gold objects would have gone down at the Reform Club. Unable to make up his own mind, Gilbert was constantly in that state of mild irritation which is a priceless boon to the professional satirist. Personally he would have been unpopular in any society, and he continually hit his audience in unexpected places because he was continually getting hit himself in exactly the same ones.

Fortunately, moreover, it was not only on the subject of politics that he was completely muddled. His attitude toward questions affecting morals and manners was equally confused, and consequently he was driven to the refuge of wit, no matter what subject he chose to treat. Consider, for example, a fact recently pointed out—namely, that the rhyme he most frequently employed (fifteen times) was the rhyme of "beauty" with "duty." Here is material for a psychoanalytical field day that would not be wholly without justification. The sense of the antithesis and the inability to escape from the horns of the dilemma it presents were responsible not only for Gilbert the man, who could neither stop flirting nor be guilty of an indecorum, but also for Gilbert the humorist, who continually satirized Victorianism without for one moment ceasing to be a Victorian. He was not so pure as his collaborator, Sir Arthur, who solemnly expressed the opinion that one of the greatest glories of music was the (alleged) fact that it was incapable of suggesting an impropriety. If he had been, then he could hardly have been witty about the flesh. But he was never more than witty because it was only when impropriety was subtly veiled in wit that he would consent to be improper at all.

What a pity that he had no consistent point of view! So at least a thousand earnest souls have exclaimed when they seemed to discover in his nonsense a reformer manqué. If only the sturdy republicanism of "When Britain really ruled the waves" were not nullified by the Tory perversity of "There lived a king so I've been told"; or if the promising misogyny of a dozen songs and situations were not taken back in an equal number of languishing Victorian ditties. But a Gilbert sufficiently integrated to be downright would in all probability have been a Gilbert who had no need to express himself through the ambiguities of wit. He might possibly have done more good, but I doubt whether his paradoxes would still be drawing crowded houses.

Bernard Shaw, I suspect, owes almost as much to those inconsistencies which become increasingly obvious and which are increasingly charged against him. Even Mark Twain—Van Wyck Brooks notwithstanding—seems to me to have been forced into being funny largely because he too was so imperfectly integrated a person, and before I can wish that he had been freer and better educated I should like to consider very seriously such a mot as the well-known "Wagner is not so bad as he sounds." Had Mr. Clemens been a thoroughgoing philistine he would never have made a dutiful pilgrimage to Bayreuth in the first place. Had he been an ideally sensitive and ideally cultivated gentleman he would probably have written an essay in defense of Wagner—of which there are already in existence a sufficient number for all practical purposes. But because he didn't know well enough where he stood to commit himself unequivocally he evolved a pleasant quip which is safely open at both ends.

Someone, I don't know who, once defined wit as "the kiss given to common sense behind the back of respectability." Its charm lies in the quickness, the unexpectedness, the ambiguity, and the impropriety of the smack as well as in the adroitness of the technique with which the occasion is snatched. The bold rake is not funny at it, and neither is the sex-reformer who dutifully busses the maid before his wife and assembled guests just to prove that freer manners are desirable for society. It must be done by someone who isn't sure whether he ought to do it or not, and Gilbert was in the perfectly delightful position of not knowing whether conformity or unconventionality was his lawful spouse. Fearfully he seized every occasion to kiss each behind the back of the other, and no matter which one he happened to be wooing at the moment he was always careful to explain to the spectators that he was only fooling, after all.

The result may have been a certain dissatisfaction with himself. He was apparently serious in the belief that his sentimental plays were much the best of his work, and once, toward the end of his life, when someone asked him if he were not proud to have made a fortune out of his brains, he replied that the fortune had been made not out of his brains but out of the folly of the British public. The fact remains, nevertheless, that it is not the business of a

The People, Yes

It is a joke book, but every one of the jokes is more than a joke. It shows that the people, even where they do not read, have a traditional wisdom as profound as that of the books, comprised in sayings and anecdotes. It is, perhaps, really a novel with several million heroes set off against an equal number of fools and nondescripts. It is an inquiry around the question of who and what were the people meant by Lincoln in his phrases—"of the people, by the people, for the people." $2.50

THE JURY

HUGHES MEARNS

THIS WEEK there opens simultaneously in over two hundred and fifty places throughout the country — in museums, colleges, art centers, private schools, libraries and other institutions — the first public exhibit sponsored by Living American Art.

These nationwide exhibits mark the inauguration of an enterprise, which holds the most fascinating possibilities in the practical encouragement of American Art.

What Living American Art Is

Living American Art is an organization designed to carry out two purposes: First, to provide a means by which adequate and continuous economic support may be supplied to artists through the sale of reproductions of their work. Second, to give an opportunity to art-lovers, no matter how modest their means, to see and become thoroughly familiar with the most significant painting being done by American artists today; and more than this, if they please—to live in their own homes with those which appeal most deeply to them; to own them in large-sized reproductions indistinguishable in color and line from the original.

How This Plan Is Carried Out

Almost every American artist — far approached (and when the plan proves its practicability it is confidently believed there will not be a single exception) during the past year has been submitting his best work to a small jury of distinguished artists and art critics, assisted by an Advisory Board of museum directors, educators and others.

The jury, every three months, will select twelve paintings from those which have been submitted. The original paintings are sent abroad, to Vienna, to a small plant where color-collotype reproduction processes, under Max Jaffe, have now been perfected to a degree not comparable anywhere else in the world. The paintings are reproduced in facsimiles 18 x 22 inches in size. The work is done with the most extreme care; for instance, with the first twelve paintings now exhibited, work has been going forward in Vienna for the past eight months.

The complete set of each twelve pictures — to be exhibited simultaneously in museums, art centers, colleges, schools, libraries and other institutions throughout the country. There will be four such exhibitions throughout the year. Thus, continuously and nationally, all those who are interested in modern art will be able to view and to become familiar with the choicest work being done by American artists.

Five Dollars For Each Picture

More important than this, when they so please they will henceforth be able to own the best examples of modern American art—to enjoy their favored pictures in their own homes. Unframed, the pictures will be sold for $5.00 each.

This fine reproduction of modern paintings means that now it will be possible for every sensitive art-lover to acquire his own collection of the choicest American paintings. In no respect, other than that of monetary value, need his collection be inferior to that of the wealthiest collector of the best American paintings.

Originals, naturally, will continue to have that monetary value which derives from rarity. But no greater æsthetic values. For these color-collotype reproductions are absolutely faithful in color and line to the original.

Only 1000 Of Each At Present Available

Only one thousand copies of each painting have been ordered and are now available. This is especially mentioned with those in mind who may wish to acquire at once one of these paintings for his own home or for use as a Christmas gift, forehanded — that may now seem.

Incidentally, aside from the inherent value of the pictures, there is little question that an additional "collectors' value" will accrue to those at present being exhibited, like that of the first edition of a rare book,—since this is the first presentation sponsored by Living American Art.

The City Culture

A WORLD I NEVER MADE. By James T. Farrell. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

STUDS LONIGAN was tough and lived most of his life in the streets of Chicago. Danny O'Neill is sensitive and seven, just beginning to go to school in "A World I Never Made," which takes him from August of his first school year to Christmas. He is not sensitive in the manner of Studs, appealing, defiant, and ashamed, but in the manner, say, of David Copperfield and other bewildered children in fiction. If Danny is more intimately studied than most such children it is because Mr. Farrell goes with so much candor into a whole range of seven-year-old feelings, speculations, inquiries, discoveries which are common to experience but rare in novels. Most such children are seven in their novels for a chapter or so. Danny is seven for five hundred pages.

His world, naturally, is his family. He does not live with his father and mother and his half-dozen small brothers and sisters, but with his aunt and uncle and grandmother. This gives Mr. Farrell a chance to show the family as two levels: the parents barely able to feed their children, the aunt and uncle decidedly better off. The individual members of the family are sharply distinguished. Danny's mother Liz, an annual mother too shiftless to wash her face, yet has specific touches of spunk and hypocrisy. His father Jim, the most moving character in the book, now wishes he had stayed longer in school, knows he is swamped with children, and yet doggedly hopes and expects that they will have an easier life than his. Uncle Al O'Flaherty, shoe salesman, thinks he likes to read, conscientiously enlarges his vocabulary, and is sure business will be better next year. Aunt Louise, who works in a hotel, is dragging out a violent, unsatisfying affair with a married man, drinking gin for consolation. The grandmother might almost still be living in a smoky hut in Ireland. But all of them have an unmistakable family resemblance—something hard to define in actual families and harder to communicate to the characters of a novel. Whether they look alike or not, the O'Neills and O'Flahertys feel alike. The same intonations, the same sentimentalisms, the same habits of furious quarreling and sudden making up. You would know they were a family by their quarrels. Only close relatives could go through them and ever forgive.

With historical irony Uncle Al says at the end: "Just think, in twenty years from now, 1931, say, why, everybody in America who's worth his salt ought to be rich by then." This irony is one of the few touches of commentary in the book. The characters seldom think or talk about matters larger than their immediate concerns. Business, sport, sex are their topics, with moral platitudes for all of them. They live by settled custom, even when they violate it. Nobody really questions it. As Mr. Farrell tells their story, they move as by instinct through the experiences of these months. They have con-sciences which, without always keeping them from what they know is misbehavior, continually haunt them. Their consciences make up nearly as much of the story as their acts. This helps to give to "A World I Never Made" that habitual tenderness which is quite as characteristic of Mr. Farrell's novels as their toughness. Easily multiplying endless incidents to show his characters in action, he sees them, feels through them, and thinks around them. He has an extraordinarily capacious mind which holds the persons and events of a novel as if they were, somehow, in solution, to be poured out in a full stream in which his own share as narrator may be lost sight of. You forget that you are seeing this life through the eyes of a selecting novelist. It seems merely to be there before you.

A point I have not seen made about Mr. Farrell is that he is, among novelists, the truest historian of the American city culture. The part of Chicago he writes of is a self-centered Irish community and is of course Catholic. But it might be any of the poorer parts of any large American city. It is intensely urban. Its people do not go to the country and, at least in this novel, seem not to know that the country exists. City streets are enough for them, with a few vacant lots for boys to play in. They have from their churches a sense of tradition in religion, from their schools a little knowledge of American history. They read little besides the newspapers. The men get exact information about sports from the papers, the women about fashions. For the rest, they read miscellaneous news items as so much gossip and get muddled ideas about current happenings. In their own quarter of the city they live as parochially as the people of any peasant village. But the city is after all close around them, setting its examples. Those who prosper dress smartly, by city standards, though they may not speak grammatically. The wits of all of them are sharpened and quickened by the city tempo, the city pressure and variety. They would seem fox-like if they were not so gregarious, with a working uniformity in their habits and opinions. In other words, they have a city culture.

American fiction has neglected this city culture, though with the rise of city populations it becomes increasingly important. When novelists want to represent communities they go to the country, to New England, the Old South, the Middle West. They go to the cities for exceptional materials, like gangsterism, wealth, fashion, the arts. Many novels as have been written about New York, the overwhelming majority of them deal with spectacular matters, and not ten of any merit with those ordinary parts of the city which are more or less like small towns or villages. And this is equally true of other cities. Mr. Farrell seems to me to go beyond any other American novelist in his knowledge of the common life of an American city and his understanding of the city culture.

Making of a Communist

AN AMERICAN TESTAMENT. By Joseph Freeman. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

WHAT Mr. Freeman has set down here, in a bulging narrative of ideas and personalities and events, lacks much that belongs to the art of writing at its best: order, discipline, proportion. It rolls out and over, and against such a devouring tide the author himself is helpless. But it contains much that any record seeking to be an interpretation, one might almost say an initiation, must contain. Here are perspective and point of view; here is what Bagehot called an experiencing nature; here, finally, is ardor without fanaticism. Mr. Freeman has used a lot of space to say things in, and used some of it wastefully; but one closes the book chiefly remembering that Mr. Freeman has had a lot to say.

What he has said above all is How I Came to Be a Communist. To do this soundly, and also honestly, he had to throw himself back into the past, to relive all the experiences that helped shape his decision, to revive all the emotions, all the thought processes, all the shadings of doubt and belief that shuttled him about as well as carried him forward. And he has done this, with what seems to me a capacity for getting at the truth that it would be difficult to overpraise. More, he has treated his theme from several angles, each of them indispensable—from the subjective angle, from the philosophic, finally from what might be called the historical, by which I mean the nature of American and European social life in the decade following the war. This is very definitely the story of a man in relation to his times.

If—and I think it is true—Joseph Freeman came in the end to communism as an intellectual, he also grew into it through a class-conscious upbringing which conditioned but did not distort his view of life. Not that it was the idea of self-interest which fetched him: I doubt whether his development owed much to his being a poor immigrant's son who may not always have had enough to eat. But it owed a very great deal to his growing up in a working-class neighborhood, to his being fed radicalism, when still a child, by the older brother of a playmate, to his lapping up the old Masses in adolescence. All this was an early and vital lesson, something to recur to mind even after one outgrew it by virtue of a bourgeois education and a conversion to bourgeois manners: it was distinctly something to recur to mind after the disillusioning lesson of the war.

For an earnest fledgling studying at Columbia, the lesson of the war was to be had from the academic cant that enveloped him, from the writers whom he trusted turning renegades, from the explosion of the Wilsonian myth, which he had partly accepted. And as Freeman grew older, there were other lessons. There was the sour-smelling memory of Greenwich Village bohemianism, the blank page of a newspaperman's drifting life in Paris, the delirious pulse of the auto-intoxicated 1920's. Freeman took the measure of all this, simultaneously watching American labor, with its strikes, its setbacks, its efforts to unionize; simultaneously becoming acquainted with American radicals and American writers of every complexion and color. His Communist leanings increased, crystallized.

The climax of his experiences was a year in the Soviet Union. He met almost everybody; he studied almost everything. There is no attempt in these pages to subdue his admiration for all that he temporarily became part of; but still less is there any attempt to conceal the things that were wrong in the picture, to justify the mistakes, to interpret disingenuously the shortcomings. Nor, I should say, is there any attempt to generalize: he, Freeman, knew what he wanted and found it.

Soviet Russia did not make a Communist of him; rather it left him certain of his communism. The decision had really been made earlier. The decision, indeed, had been implicit in most of his previous reactions to experience. "An American Testament" is not the story of a man who came belatedly to communism, or came rebelling against his temperament, or came—in the bitterness of dejection—to save his precious soul. The book, to my mind at least, has less to do with the resolution of a conflict than with the completion of, as it were, a career; though it would be misleading to suggest that no conflict existed. For Freeman had to adjust himself in two directions: he had to scrap or transform that part of him which by education was antagonistically bourgeois; and he had to establish a sound relationship between the political thinker in him and the artist. In neither case was the struggle easy, nor perhaps the victory altogether complete; but by and large the fact remains that here was a man naturally fitted for communism.

Though the central theme of this book has carried me far down the page, I must not stop before making clear that here is also a detailed picture of an era in American intellectual life and an autobiography of a writer. In both undertakings Mr. Freeman, whose style is pungently personal, has had much that is interesting to say; and by embarking upon them he has kept the Communist angle of his book from becoming shrill. But the literary side of "An American Testament" has been too indiscriminately thrown up, and at times too indulgently prolonged, to be worth quite all the space it receives. Mr. Freeman's gusto has saved his story from anywhere being a bore, but has failed to save it from seeming trivial at times, and even irrelevant. The book, frankly, is too long, the material too undisciplined. It seems to me that Mr. Freeman had at the outset to choose between describing—in full, of course—his social development and describing his total self. He chose to describe both; and by letting the book carry him wherever memory lighted he has cost himself the powerfully focused, strongly fibered effect that he might have achieved. For the material was there, and the ability to set it down. But it is not often that one can cavil at excess; that may indicate, at least, how interesting and valuable a book Mr. Freeman has written.

Perspicuous Opacity

THE GEOGRAPHICAL HISTORY OF AMERICA, OR THE RELATION OF HUMAN NATURE TO THE HUMAN MIND. By Gertrude Stein. With an Introduction by Thornton Wilder. Random House. $2.50.

GERTRUDE STEIN has a theory that the American has been influenced by the expansiveness of the country and the circumstance that there are great areas of flat land where one sees few birds, flowers, or animals. There are no nightingales, she says, and the eagle is not the characteristic bird it once was; whereas "the mocking-birds . . . have spread . . . and perhaps they will be all over, the national bird of the United States"—one ambiguous significance which she makes unequivocal. We owe very much to Thornton Wilder for giving us the clue to the meanings in the book, since the mind resists a language it is not used to. Realizing the laziness of the ordinary reader Mr. Wilder explains that Miss Stein, as a result of thinking about masterpieces of literature, found that in them the emergences of the Human Mind were dependent upon the geographical situations in which the authors lived—flat land conducing to the ability to escape from identity, hilly land conducing to the specific and the insistent. The Human Mind and Human Nature, as he says, are here "invented terms" of a "private language,"—the Human Mind being selfless and without identity, Human Nature insisting on itself as personality; and "it cost pain to express and think these things." Therefore sadness and tears are mentioned as connected with Human Nature and the exterior trudging we do, as opposed to felicity and the operations of the Human Mind. When an author writes as if he were alone, without thought of an audience, "for an audience never does prove to you that you are you,"

A truly great book!

—Irwin Edman.

Fascinating: " . . . a fascinating STORY of people, ideas, institutions, and history . . . "—Mrs. Robert Minor (Lydia Gibson).

Magnificent: "His magnificent exposition is one of the greatest things I've ever read . . . should be mandatory reading for every American writer who believes that writing is more than amusement, either of self or of others."—Paul de Kruif.

Engrossing: "Not only has Freeman written an engrossing personal narrative of life in New York, but he has succeeded in tracing the evolution of a radical in a way which will explain both the currents of modern thought and the frenzied screams from Mr. Hearst's editorial pages."—Robert Forsythe.

Grand: "It is a grand book and I hope it has the reception it deserves. I read every word with absorption."—Carl Van Doren.

Exciting: " . . . exciting record of the growth of a mind. His story—a poet into revolutionary—will help anyone to understand the processes that are remaking American life and literature."—Granville Hicks.

Moving: "It has the stuff of an important personal narrative—simple, modest, crystal clear, detached, and in many passages, moving and eloquent."—Max Lerner.

Indispensable: "I have had a very exciting time with it. This is, I think, an indispensable book for the understanding of why so many middle-class intellectuals go radical these days. Freeman's narrative proceeds, not only in a most absorbing and readable fashion, but with a sincerity and honesty and, above all, an absence of rancor that is rare in these times."—Corliss Lamont.

Important: "The story of the found generation. It is not only a personal history which is tremendously and generally interesting, but an important and a good book."

it is this which makes a masterpiece. "Anyone who writes anything is talking to themselves," not conversing, "and that is what Shakespeare always has done, he makes them say what he wants said," and is "everlastingly interesting."

Miss Stein likes naturalness. "Nothing I like more," she says, "than when a dog barks in his sleep"; and in giving lectures here, her attitude to pretense was calculated to make those who overanalyze a piece of straight thinking seem like the milliner's assistant in Punch who asks a dull patron, "Would Modom entertain a feather?" She says, "I like to look about me," "I love writing and reading." In looking about her she has detected things; in science, "well they never are right about anything"; excitement "has to do with politics and propaganda and government and being here and there and society"; the electioneering politician "has no personality but a persistence of insistence in a narrow range of ideas" and is not exciting; whereas science is exciting and so is writing. Miss Stein says, "I wish writing need not sound like writing," and sometimes she has made it sound so unlike writing that one does not see at first what is meant. Looking harder, one is abashed not to have understood instantly; as water may not seem transparent to the observer but has a perspicuous opacity in which the fish swims with ease. For example, "There is no doubt of what is a master-piece but is there any doubt what a master-piece is."

To like reading and writing is to like words. The root meaning, as contrasted with the meaning in use, is like the triple painting on projecting lamellae, which—according as one stands in front, at the right, or at the left—shows a different picture: "In China china is not china it is an earthen ware. In China there is no need of China because in china china is china." Definitions are pleasurable, and words can fall sweetly on the ear:

I like a play of so and so.
Loho Leho.
Leho is the name of a Breton.

"Winning is a description of a charming person," and "the thing about numbers that is important is that any of them have a pretty name. . . . Numbers have such pretty names in any language."

It is a feat of writing to make the rhythm of a sentence unmistakable without punctuation: for example, "When they said reading made easy reading without tears and someone sent me such a beautiful copy of that," or "No one knowing me knows me. And I am I I." In a real writer's experimenting there can be an effect of originality as one can achieve a kind of Venetian needlepoint by fitting into each other two pieces of a hackneyed pattern of peasant edging.

"The Geographical History of America" is offered as a detective story—"a detective story of how to write," making use of the political situation in the United States, with allusions to the two Roosevelts and the two Napoleons—and is not propaganda, which is platitude. A detective story is a conundrum, and this one has "content without form" and is "without a beginning and a middle and an end"—Chapter I following Chapter II, and Chapter III following Chapter II. The repeatings and regressions are, as Thornton Wilder says, sometimes for emphasis, sometimes a method of connecting passages, sometimes a musical refrain, sometimes playful. And, one adds, sometimes a little inconsiderate and unaccommodating and in being willing to be so, partake of Human Nature rather than of the Human Mind. And "nobody need be triumphant about that." But the book is a triumph, and all of us, that is to say a great many of us, would do well to read it.

MARIANNE MOORE

The Gentleman of Shalott

TIME AND THE ROCK. PRELUDES TO DEFINITION.

By Conrad Aiken. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THE will to die may generate great poetry, but the continuous pose of dying is boring and morbid. Any poem must resolve some conflict stated or implied. Eliot knew this when in his poems of irresolution he used the dramatic "black-out" at the end of a scene having implied connections with another scene. Poetry, in other words, cannot be a continuous "prelude to definition"; it must, if only for the moment, define. This is just what Mr. Aiken's poetry does not do. It is a continuous prelude—but to what?

Aiken is master of a tired verse music, master too of phrasing suggestive of the flow of a weary mind. He is never shoddy, never technically bad. But he is not an important figure in American poetry. He may be, as has been said, the first poet to discover the Wasteland. Certainly he is one of a number of disillusioned singers who have made much of their disillusionment. But Aiken is a lyric poet. He did not dramatize and impersonalize the Wasteland scenery and consciousness. Eliot did, and Eliot, therefore, became the poet best expressing his own generation. Aiken meantime sang of himself and of his own ennui. Like the Lady of Shalott he wove from pictures in a mirror, looking at himself against a vague background of clouds, moons, and trees. In the mirror he saw himself romantically as one of the lost generation, saw the old dreams of romanticism, strangely dimmed and doubted. He looked at himself and he tied his tie and he sang that man was the greater for his crimes. Through confusion only, he wrote, man was able to know the "angel of his consciousness."

The mirror did not break; reality did not rush in. Aiken, after all these years, is still the gentleman of Shalott. He is a mystic and his absolute is hopelessness. Such an enfeebled stoicism as his takes comfort from beauty, purity, and love, is charmed most by its own poses. Aiken's "man in a world of doom," participator in the crime of God, "the seeker of the self amid the ruins of space," is in truth Byron's man the rebel. But a Byronic rebel must act, and Aiken's romantic despairer cannot act. Nor can he feel, though he, like the aesthetes of the nineties, believes that the high emotional moment only can be seized and felt. Not acting and not feeling, Aiken's protagonist wanders like a ghost in the "large unconscious scenery" of the poet's land.

The vague, melancholy thoughts of this poet affect of course his language. Musical as his lines are, they are almost never incisive or easily remembered. His imagery suggests but does not define and is in constant flux. Just what it suggests it is impossible to state. It is a kind of dream, a flow of consciousness not represented as discontinuous, as in Eliot's dramatic monologues of the mind, but as continuously becoming something else.

Philosophically Mr. Aiken is saying nothing new. He is trying to argue that mind is matter, matter mind. He believes Godhood lies in man himself and that awareness is Godhood if it is only an awareness of hopelessness. He sings of ghostly individualism dreaming while Rome burns. Prelude after prelude in this book is a beautiful but monotonous slow music "with a dying fall," but it does not die. Each of Mr. Aiken's poems seems to suggest another poem. Therefore he writes voluminously, though the same emotional associations and poetic ideas appear in all his poems. He is caught in limbo. If Mr. Aiken's poetry has changed at all, it has moved toward greater vagueness, toward a mysticism wherein the poet finds

The clash of two strong personalities, Calvin and Castellio; the conflict of two eternally warring ideas, Authority and Liberty: this is the subject of the latest volume by Stefan Zweig, greatest living biographer. Readers of Marie Antoinette and Mary Queen of Scotland will find in it the same warmth and depth of character portrayal that marked these two great works. And every thinking modern will find in this exciting story implications of burning world-wide significance today comfort in one affirmation—that all is lost. To be the Eternally Lost is a kind of divinity.

Once the theme of complete disillusionment has been sung or stated by a writer, that writer has really nothing more to say. Eliot left his Wasteland for religion; others have left it for revolution. But for Aiken the Wasteland is a pretty place; it is his mirrored world where he may see dim delights, not too dark despairs, and mirages of man's supposed greatness. Preludes to dying, without dying, are this poet's sweetest music.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Testament of Von Bernstorff

MEMOIRS OF COUNT BERNSTORFF. Random House. $3.50.

IN THIS volume Count Bernstorff reviews his entire life. He tells of his eight years' service in the German artillery and of his extraordinarily rapid rise in the diplomatic service—he jumped from consul-general in Egypt to ambassador in Washington—and describes again his fateful years in the United States, of which he had already written at length in his "My Three Years in America." Beyond doubt he is in a far happier position to discuss his service in Washington than he was in 1920, when he published his earlier book. There doubtless are some Americans who will go to their graves believing that Count Bernstorff wears horns and a tail, but the unbiased student of events will agree with Colonel House that Count Bernstorff was "the one man in Germany who occupied a great office during the war who had an understanding of the situation not only during the war but later, during the trying period of reconstruction."

Though it is not possible to give Count Bernstorff an entirely clean bill of health so far as the underhand and entirely improper and illegal acts of the German emissaries in the United States are concerned, Colonel House was quite correct in writing to him in 1926: "If Germany had followed your counsel a different story might be written today." Three times Bernstorff prevented the outbreak of war between the United States and Germany. He really loved this country, was never so happy as when here, and he knew what our coming in would mean. Being a democrat, he earnestly desired a peace in accord with Wilson's famous proposals of January 22, 1917 ("no victors and no vanquished"). He was correctly called "pro-American" in Berlin, for he was utterly opposed to almost all the policies of Berlin from 1914 on.

The Count's bitter disappointment when the peace negotiations of 1916-17 fell through, when Wilson delayed too long the offer of mediation locked in his desk, and when the idiots in the Berlin government finally refused it after more of their double-dealing, is set forth again in this volume. The failure to make peace then certainly gave us the Treaty of Versailles, Hitler, the new and worse Germany, the other dictatorships, and all the other evils flowing out of the peace which the victors wrote.

Perhaps the most interesting portion of this book is the Count's considered judgment of Woodrow Wilson which he wrote down nineteen years after his return to his Fatherland—he refrained from judging the President in his earlier book. Here it is in part:

The man who wanted to be Arbiter Mundi was shattered by the magnitude of his task. Like Moses on Mount Pisgah, Wilson saw the Promised Land, but he did not reach it. The world applauded his purpose over much, and then passed too harsh a judgment on his want of power to carry it out. . . . His obstinate dogmatism and his inclination for solitary work made him little suited to foreign politics. Internal questions can be solved by a theorist from his writing table, if he has gone into them with proper care, but foreign affairs can only be mastered in actual practice. Eloquent orations can sway a nation and convince a parliament, but they are of little use when the interests and the armed might of foreign powers are vigorously engaged.

The Count vigorously defends Wilson from the charge that he betrayed Germany at Versailles and stresses the fact that Germany was responsible for our coming into the war by its failure to accept the services Wilson offered. And he adds that "without Wilson's intervention the great powers at Versailles would have deprived us of the Rhine and the Saar. And if the Saar territory is German today we owe that entirely to Wilson." He lays Wilson's physical breakdown to the struggle for a compromise with the French.

As for the Germany of today, the Count feels that "the best that we can hope for our poor Fatherland is a democratic monarchy." He who worked so hard for the modernization and democratization of Germany after the war feels that "all such hopes have been engulfed by dictatorship, which admits of no development." Speaking of a visit to an orthodox monastery in Finland, "where the monks themselves provided for all their own needs," he remarks bitterly, "From what I hear today, I gather that Hitler and Schacht would like to reduce the German people to a similar level." He thinks the end of the revolution of November, 1918, "is by no means yet." Again he writes that a German "policy that is not guided by moral considerations will find no mercy before the tribunal of world history, though it may achieve a passing success." It is very much to the Count's credit that he makes it clear that he is absolutely opposed to anti-Semitism. He says: "I have always detested anti-Semitism, not merely because in the course of a long life I have had many loyal and trusted Jewish friends, but because as a politician I see in anti-Semitism a weakness and one that I have always regarded as involving the sin against the holy spirit of politics."

Finally, it must be added that this worth-while volume contains many letters of genuine historical worth; some written by Bernstorff himself, others written to him after his return to Germany and during his service as ambassador at Constantinople by Count Monts, Bülow, Bussche, Haniel von Haimhausen, Von Jagow, Prince Max of Baden, and others. Unfortunately the book is not as well translated as it should be, the phrasing being often stilted and Teutonic. There are also some inexcusable errors. Thus, Wilson's January 22, 1917, speech is dated January 1; a letter of Count Monts of 1922 is dated 1912; Ernst Hanfstaengl becomes Hanfsstaengel in one place and Hanfstaengel in another.

WHEN Calvin went to Geneva in 1536 in the same month that Erasmus died, two ideologies were preparing to dispute control of the civilized world, as two others prepare today. The future leader of Protestant Europe was born in 1509, eight years before Luther nailed his theses to the door at Wittenberg. Although educated at the orthodox college of Montaigu, together with Loyola and Servetus, who also were to figure in the great impending struggle, Calvin espoused Protestant views and was obliged to flee from France

LET A NATION-WIDE CONSUMER ORGANIZATION ADVISE YOU which brands are best buys

... ELECTRIC SHAVERS

How do electric shavers compare with ordinary safety razors in the closeness of the shave, in freedom from irritation, in the time consumed in shaving, and in other important factors? For a comparison based on actual tests read the report on electric razors in the current (October) issue of Consumers Union Reports, monthly publication of Consumers Union of United States. Of three nationally-advertised makes, including Schick and Packard, only one is rated as a "Best Buy"—the others as "Not Acceptable." (Note—this report is not included in the $1 limited edition.)

... MEN'S SHIRTS

Will unadvertised shirts selling at less than $1 wear as well as widely-advertised $2 brands? How do they compare on such points as shrinkage, color-fastness, and ability to withstand laundering? These and similar questions are answered in a report on men's shirts based on wear and laundry tests and on fabrics and construction. In terms of brand names, ten brands of shirts are rated as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Also rated are nine brands of work shirts. Included in these ratings are such brands as Arrow, Van Heusen, CD, Montgomery Ward, Sears Roebuck, and Sweet-Orr.

... HOW TO BUY AND USE FUEL

"Stick to stove coal and avoid trouble . . . buy #2 oil, #4 is too heavy for your type of burner," say many fuel dealers in response to queries about the most suitable types or grades of fuel. What do heating engineers say? How To Buy Fuel in this issue will tell you how to buy anthracite or bituminous coal, coke, or fuel oil—will show you how, by careful selection of coal and by skillful firing, you may be able to cut your fuel bill 20% to 25%.

... GINS, BRANDIES, CORDIALS

The second of three reports on liquors—the first of which dealt with whiskies, the third of which will deal with wines—this report rates 43 brands of gins, brandies, rums and cordials. Among these brands are Gordon's, Hildick's Hennessy's, Gilbey's, Milshire, Fleischmann's, Anchor, Martell's, Laird's, Old Mill, Charley's, and Rum Carioca.

... TOOTHPASTES and POWDERS

Based on chemical and physical analyses and on investigations by unbiased authorities, a report in this issue tells which dentifrices are safe; which are injurious; whether powders or pastes are better, and what scientific bases there are for the claims made by dentifrice manufacturers. Fifty brands of dentifrices, including such widely-exploited brands as Pepsodent, Squibb's, Forhan's, Iodent, Ipana, Colgate and Dr. Lyon's, are rated.

Also rated in this issue—on the basis of tests by unbiased specialists—are many brands of canned peas and apricots and other products. The labor conditions under which many of these products are made are also described.

COMING IN NOVEMBER...

The November issue of Consumers Union Reports will report on radios, vacuum cleaners, wines, fountain pens and other products.

CAPRE TAX BULLETIN

(CAPITAL-RELIEF-TAX)

Increasing Frequency of Depressions

Industrial depressions were not frequent in the United States while frontier land was cheap and the volume of taxation was light. But as the tax burden became heavier, and all unused land on the frontier and elsewhere was taken up into speculative holdings, grave economic changes occurred.

Self-Bankruptcy of System

Under the new conditions, which came to prevail, widespread bankruptcy is frequent and automatic. The most outstanding element in this picture is "frozen paper" based on inflated ground values. Ground rents and the purchase cost of land are a mounting charge on industry as a whole; and until these costs are deflated, no revival of business takes place. But renewed industrial activity leads to re-inflation of ground values in city and country, followed by a new deflation.

Vanishing Frontiers of America and Britain

Seven million (7,000,000) acres of unused land in Britain were "appropriated" by the aristocracy, through Parliamentary Acts, between 1700 and 1850. In the meanwhile, British ground rents increased one thousand (1000) per cent.

A like process took place in the United States, where western frontier territory and all unused land in the nation was absorbed into speculative holdings by the beginning of the present century (1900).

Labor, Capital Exploited

Wholesale grabbing of land by the British aristocracy drove small farmers and field hands off the soil into the industrial towns, where the resulting over-supply of labor led to competition for work, thus holding wages down.

British capital, in city and country, alike, had to pay ground rent and taxes prior to wages; and under these conditions, the purchasing power of the masses remained below the point where British labor could buy the equivalent of its toil and keep British industry in motion. Hence, as ground monopoly solidified, and the tax burden became heavier, British capital entered upon active search for outside markets.

Economic Problem and Marxism

The "Communist Manifesto" of Karl Marx appeared in 1848; and his volume

"Capital," written in London, was published in 1867. British industry was now completely gripped in the economic vise of ground monopoly and taxation.

The chief dogma of Marx was that Labor is exploited through private ownership of productive capital; and the main plank in his platform was the well known demand for public, or collective, or common ownership of "the machinery of production and distribution."

A correlative Marxian dogma was that the modern Parliamentary State represents the triumph of the capitalistic class, the "bourgeoisie," over the landed nobility.

Ground Monopoly Seen Too Late by Marx

Stimulated by the "Communist Manifesto" and the first edition of "Capital," the socialist-communist movement rapidly acquired form and momentum on the basis of the dogmas mentioned above.

But in the meanwhile the author of "Capital" continued to investigate economic problems; and after his death, a new edition of "Capital" was published, with appended matter left by Marx under the significant heading "The Expropriation by which the Country Folk were Divorced from the Land."

This new section about land monopoly, however, was put into the book too late to become an organic part of "Capital." And, in fact, Marx never understood the double pressure exerted upon productive industry by ground rent and the fiscal power of the State. His posthumous emphasis upon land grabbing, therefore, has never caught up with his early dogma about the monopoly of capital.

Modern State a Compromise Between Land and Capital

The standard pattern of the modern legislative State originated in Britain during the period when land-grabbing reached its climax (1700-1850). The ground lords reluctantly admitted the bourgeoisie to parliamentary power on condition that the mounting fiscal burdens of England and Scotland be laid upon capital and its products, instead of upon the value of land in city and country. The exempted rental values therefore became an increasing liability upon industry, over and above taxes.

Hence, the modern parliamentary State does not represent the victory of the bourgeoisie over the landed nobility, as Marx claimed. But on the contrary, the modern State is a compromise between the social prestige of Land and the economic energy of Capital.

Confusion and Readjustment

Today's confusion will persist as long as the world-wide economic issue is pictured as a mere conflict between "Labor and Capital," or between "Communism and Fascism."

But the stream of current history is gradually shifting its course. Marxist elements find themselves under constraint, for the time being, to act with bourgeois progressives against the menace of complete reaction. And in the meanwhile the compromise between Land and Capital, which, in Britain, paved the way toward the modern parliamentary State, is in process of reversal: The British constitution is amended so as to abolish the tax-veto of the House of Lords (the citadel of ground monopoly), thus concentrating governmental power in the House of Commons; and it is only the presence of a "rentier" majority in the Commons that prevents, for the time being, the inevitable transfer of tax burdens from productive capital to ground values, improved and vacant, in city and country. The tax issue, now looming throughout the world, is not simply a revenue question; it is the problem of the fiscal power of the State as an instrument of social change.

to Switzerland. He stopped at Basel, a favorite refuge for persecuted scholars and theologians, and from this safe point surveyed the situation. The walls of Catholic supremacy and infallibility had been breached, but those who remained within the walls were still one church and indivisible, whereas their assailants, the Protestants, were divided into numerous sects. He determined to unify the Protestant sects, to crystallize their doctrine, and at the age of twenty-five wrote and published one of the most influential books the world has known, his "Institutio Religionis Christianae," "the most important deed of the Reformation after Luther's translation of the Bible. . . . Luther, the inspirer, set the stone of the Reformation rolling. Calvin, the organizer, stopped the movement before it broke into a thousand fragments."

From the publication of this book Calvin was accepted as the leader of the Reformation, and in the following year he was invited to Geneva by the Town Council on the suggestion of Farel, a preacher whose fanatical devotion had succeeded in getting the Catholic religion banished from the city. Farel, of whom Erasmus said, "never in my life had I seen so presumptuous and shameless a creature," had been able to rouse the people to overthrow the old order, but was unable to organize a new and called in Calvin—who promptly submitted to the Town Council a catechism of twenty-one articles which defined Protestant belief and formulated the laws of the state. He persuaded the council to require all burghers to accept this confession under oath. The slightest deviation in belief was punishable by banishment from the communion. No one could sell to the burgher thus banished, or buy from him, or speak to him. Calvin, in brief, became supreme dictator of the city. After a taste of his rule the council rebelled and banished him, but as during his absence the Catholics took heart and tried to reestablish their church, the council soon begged him to return, and from then until his death he endeavored with iron rule to make Geneva a city of God and a model for the Protestant world. The most trifling deviations of thought and conduct were savagely punished, and finally Miguel Servetus, a Spanish scholar, was roasted to death over a slow fire because he questioned the Trinity. Zweig is at his best in his account of the cold fury with which Calvin hounded the Spaniard to his terrible death.

With the murder of Servetus, Castellio, a lecturer at the University of Basel, perceived the slaughter that would ensue if the Reformation started to match the burnings of the Inquisition, and published, under the name of Martinus Bellius, "De Haereticis," a manifesto on behalf of toleration, following it later by another polemic, "De Arte Dubitandi." He would have paid for this temerity at the stake, if, worn out by Calvin's persecution, he had not had the luck to die first. Mr. Zweig gives a scholarly, moving, and extremely pertinent account of the great tragic drama played out by the man of iron and the man of light.

The Reformation had arisen on the heels of the Renaissance, that awakening of the individual mind after centuries of confinement in dogma. Calvin put the mind in chains again. "Future generations will wonder why, after so splendid a dawn, we are forced back into Cimmerian darkness," Castellio cried in his vain effort to prevent a hundred years of religious wars and persecution. Although Mr. Zweig never expressly defines the modern instance, it is obviously always in his mind, as he traces the rise and course of dictatorship, that we stand today in the same place as Castellio—between two rival theocracies which punish heresy with death.

The Poet in Prose

THE BURNING CACTUS. By Stephen Spender. Random House. $2.

THE WIND BLOWS OVER. By Walter de la Mare. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE five pieces collected in "The Burning Cactus" point the way backward from the order of Spender's lyric poems into the chaos out of which they emerge. If one elects to regard them merely as the prose exercises of a poet on leave of absence from his medium, they may be disposed of briefly. The poet's disciplines have a way of becoming the story-teller's indulgences, and it is clear that Spender, in common with most poets who turn to fiction, has taken the tools of his craft along with his sensibilities. He has given small evidence here of any taste for the blunter implements of the story-teller's trade. He prefers instead to liken the singing of nightingales to white-satin streamers, to note of one of his characters that "his dark clothes were a creeping fog encroaching on the fading tan of his sportsmanship," to enlist symbol wherever possible to do the work of statement out of sheer impatience with the labors of exposition. His methods fail by reason of their obliquity—and they are oblique everywhere the story-teller would be most likely to insist on hard outlines. Only one of the five stories, The Cousins, succeeds in conveying its information and achieving its effect; in the end The Burning Cactus, The Dead Island, and Two Deaths dissolve in their own images.

Whatever importance "The Burning Cactus" can claim, derives from the fact that it defines for us Spender's world in a way that we have not so far been permitted to see it in his poems. It becomes the principal function of these stories to measure, out of their failure, the censorship that Spender as a lyric poet has been compelled to exercise to escape the bankruptcy that engulfs him as an individual. The world of "The Burning Cactus" is a world of "the ever-drunks, the drug addicts, the people with sexual lives as complex as logarithm problems," lacking direction or identity, lost in the mazes of their sensibilities and contemplating the pageant of their ego; the themes fly apart in a barrage of random impacts and responses; and the language idles between prose and poetry in a fruitless effort to surmount the confusion it is reporting. It is by these very faults of craft, however, that Spender makes clear his unmistakable authority as a poet. His poems, rooted in the same unhealth and disorder, speak another language. It is their achievement to have pared away the decay that has submerged these stories and given to the burning cactus the odor, as well as the symbol, of death.

Characteristically, "The Wind Blows Over" begins in the dream world of delirium and ends among the tombstones of a parochial burial ground in the last "daylight steadily draining out of the church and dusk seeping in." Between lies a twilight milieu of fancy, horror, whimsy, and the macabre which is De la Mare's by right of faith and possession. Even when these stories do not actually traffic in bona fide wraiths, as in The Revenant, which concerns a visitation by the ghost of Edgar Allan Poe, or in magical sigils, as in The Talisman, concerned with an enchanted watch with a single hand "telling no hours, no minutes, no seconds even; only Time," they nevertheless carry within them a quality of dream and wonder whose magic is the more palpable for being engrafted upon commonplace situations. Few writers since Katharine Mansfield have sustained as saturnine a quietness in the narration of horror as the child's soliloquy, In the Forest, or carried forward the bold juxtaposition of pathos and hysteria of Physic. Among those engaged in the craft of fiction today, De la Mare has come closest to creating for himself a genre of the contemporary fairy tale in which fantasy wears the dress of our own day without affectation or seeming intent. Again, it is the poet who informs the story-teller; unlike Spender, however, De la Mare has not so far permitted his readers to discover where the one begins and the other leaves off.

BEN BELITT

A Lawrence Budget

PHOENIX. THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF D. H. LAWRENCE. Edited and with an Introduction by Edward D. McDonald. The Viking Press. $3.75.

THIS bulky volume of 852 pages is probably the last full book by Lawrence that we shall have. It is widely miscellaneous, with travel sketches, book reviews, and imaginative pieces, as well as essays on ethics, painting, religion, education, and other subjects which caught Lawrence's bright attention. At first it seems a disordered book, but it is really organic, owing to skilful, unobtrusive editing and the fact that Lawrence in his way followed a consistent line of thought. The many who have not read him may find parts of this volume difficult, yet there is enough of general interest and enough of Lawrence at his best and almost best to make this an influential book.

"Phoenix" is chiefly representative of what must be called Lawrence's philosophic side. Much of this is unfortunately lost in a mysticism that could be valid only to Lawrence himself. This is sometimes excusable in poetry (consider Blake as well as Lawrence) but not in the province of logic. It frequently hampers the effectiveness of Lawrence's message, as in the previously unpublished Education of the People: despite its analytic and destructive values the essay is weak positively because its solutions come from too deep in this personalized mysticism. But the philosophic side of Lawrence also has an easier aspect—common sense. A great deal of Lawrence's utterance that has been taken as prophetic is little more than his common wisdom. Consider Pornography and Obscenity, which is reprinted here; it is brilliantly penetrating in detail, yet its central argument against the suppression of sex in literature has usually been axiomatic to the citizen of the world. Its greatest value is in the expression: like most of the writing in this volume it makes the kind of reading that keeps your mind awake.

The largest section of the book, Art and Literature, contains prefaces and reviews. Lawrence's criticisms are biased but they go deep, turning up undiscovered bits of brilliance or grimly reporting hidden flaws. As early as the appearance of "In Our Time" he could admit Hemingway's gifts but with amazing clarity could also see him eventually becoming "a sort of tramp, endlessly moving on for the sake of moving away from where he is. . . . He wants just to lounge around and maintain a healthy state of nothingness inside himself, and a negation to everything outside himself." Sometimes the statements seem far-fetched, as when Lawrence is "certain that some of Shakespeare's father-murder complex, some of Hamlet's horror of his mother, of his uncle, of all old men came from the feeling that fathers may transmit syphilis, or syphilis consequences, to children." But in the main his probing seems as accurate as it is keen; it is interesting to read his estimates of such differentiated authors as Mann, Rozanov, Van Vechten, Verga, Dos Passos, Corvo, and others, and see him picking out the good and the bad; you couldn't fool him in these matters. This section has the longest single piece in the book, a Study of Thomas Hardy. While this is really more about Lawrence than about Hardy, it nevertheless tells a good deal about the older writer, from a fresh line of approach, and about literature itself.

The principal value of Lawrence is poetic. He is a poet in the larger as well as in the expressional sense. This doesn't mean that he was a craftsman in verse or that he wrote "poetic" prose; it means above all that his writing had a third dimension where, as he would put it, things were "quick." "Phoenix" gives enough of this phase of Lawrence to be fairly representative of him. Most of his writing has a running fire of poetry through it, and this is found most effectively where it is most pure. Since this is a volume of prose it can be explained that Lawrence wrote some of the greatest prose in English and some of it is in this book. To select a specimen—you can find rich things at random—there is the description of Mercury Hill above the Black Forest, the tourists huddling together when a storm comes up; then, when storm-darkness begins to settle, "suddenly the lightning dances white on the floor, dances and shakes upon the ground, up and down, and lights up the white striding of a man, lights him up only to the hips, white and naked and striding, with fire on his heels. He seems to be hurrying, this fiery man whose upper half is invisible, and at his naked heels white little flames seem to flutter." This Blakean figure, coming out of a previously "realistic" description, is typical of Lawrence's power to create and project an image, and incidentally it includes some Laurentian symbols. The best single piece in the book is the unfinished novel The Flying Fish, contrasting "the fatal greater day" of the dark races with "the fussy, busy lesser day of the white people." This fragment is one of the most important keys to Lawrence and one of the finest things he ever wrote. Like The Man Who Died (not reprinted in this collection), it was leading English literature into another domain. And like that story it gives a hint of what Lawrence might have done if he had lived.

The Sadness of Mr. Hindus

MOSCOW SKIES. By Maurice Hindus. Random House. $2.75.

MAURICE HINDUS is well known for his articles, his travel books, his lectures on the new Russia. It should not surprise us that in his first novel he has chosen Soviet Moscow as the locale, or that Bernard Blackman, an American journalist, is the hero. Further preparation for what the book contains is written in a brief foreword. Mr. Hindus confesses that the setting of this novel is the critical period of 1929 to 1930, which followed the NEP, and warns us candidly: "To me it will always remain one of the saddest and most heroic periods of the revolution." I report that Mr. Hindus has sustained his sadness for over six hundred closely printed pages and that he has succeeded in writing one of the most oppressive first novels I have ever read.

Some further hint about the character of this curious document may be given by listing the chapter titles: Beginnings, Confusion, Love, Dismay, Tribulation, Trial, and, last, Reconciliation. Mr. Blackman, as we see at once, has a difficult road before him. As the son of Russian immigrants in America he inherits a revolutionary tradition; the new Russia offers hope for the satisfaction of his curiosity concerning an actual revolution. Throughout the book Mr. Hindus is extremely vague about the source of his hero's American experiences, which are always referred to as arising from "a prairie country," very

The SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE

By DR. HELENA B. WRIGHT

M.B.B.S.

Practicing Gynecologist in London

Over 60,000 Copies Sold

"MANY married couples . . . lack the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex-act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex-act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed."

"I have a high opinion of Dr. Helena Wright's SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE. There is probably no better small manual in simple language for married people." —HAVELOCK ELLIS

"Dr. Wright, from a scientific attitude and a wide practical experience of such cases, has written a valuable and a greatly needed book. She writes without sentimentality or evasion, of the sex organs and the sex act. She explains the difficulties of sex intercourse during the honeymoon and after; gives actual and explicit information about the sensations of the sex act, the behavior of each partner in mutual stimulation, and of the climax, exhilaration and relaxation which should be found in it. She describes the variety and the perfection which may be aimed at in the art of love-making . . . a most valuable and greatly needed book."

—The Journal (England)

"This book contains very detailed information about the ways in which the physical intimacies of married life may be successfully and happily managed. It is addressed to those about to be married in the hope that it may save them from mistakes and sufferings which have darkened married life for thousands of couples."

—From the Introduction by Rev. A. Herbert Gray, D.D.

"THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE certainly represents a free, frank, simple exposition of the details of the technique for facilitating sexual harmony. Doctor Wright has written with dignity, honesty and authority. Her experience as a gynecologist, a missionary and a mother finds expression in her understanding of vital human relationships. . . . Thoughtful physicians will have numerous occasions to recommend this volume to those who desire intelligent guidance."

—American Medicine.

"We have no hesitation in saying that the book is by far the frankest and yet most refined of any written on the subject of the sex factor in marriage."

—SHERWOOD EDDY, in The World Tomorrow.

different, of course, from the kind of life he has chosen to live in Soviet Moscow. As Mr. Blackman arrives in Moscow, the great Soviet machine is having engine trouble; things are going wrong everywhere: old liberal leaders are deposed by Bolsheviks, the GPU is active, and the factory schedules are notoriously inefficient. Mr. Blackman consoles himself by falling in love with the wife of a Soviet official, and the lady reciprocates his melancholy affections. And quite as Mr. Hindus warned us in his foreword, the affair in exhaustive—and insignificant—detail is very, very sad.

Had Mr. Hindus condensed his book into a series of short sketches (I found his description of the Soviet cotton mill interesting), had he been less pretentious in giving us the full display of Mr. Blackman's loves, trials, and tribulations, we could have had a view of Moscow unobstructed. And best of all, he would have avoided writing a heavily worded, unprepossessing novel. Evidently Mr. Blackman went to Moscow to discover heaven, and found to his discomfort a Five-Year Plan. While I am willing to admit that in 1930 Moscow skies may have been gray, I believe that this particular adventure should have been called "The Journal of a Disappointed Man."

HORACE GREGORY

Under the Swastika

DEATH OF A MAN. By Kay Boyle. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

KAY BOYLE'S new novel develops as far as it can go the theme of a short story in "The White Horses of Vienna." In both cases a young Austrian doctor works secretly to further the cause of Hitler in the southern mountains, and in both cases there is the attempt on the part of Miss Boyle to hypnotize the reader into a state of what may be called mystical fascism. The icy art for which she is celebrated warms up as best it may to a contemporary and a social subject matter. So topical is she here, indeed, that many of her pages would be unintelligible to one not conversant with the foreign news. Hitler is never referred to except at two or three removes; he is "A," or he is the man with the lock of dark hair falling across his forehead, or he is the northern god whose voice comes with a miraculous deep sweetness over the radio at 7 p.m., but he is never called Hitler. So with Dollfuss and the Socialist massacre and the fascist putsch; these are fundamental in the narrative without ever emerging fully into the glare of direct statement. Always conspicuous for the detachment of her method, Miss Boyle now flings herself headlong into the stream of passing life and produces a "significant" novel.

The result, curiously enough, is a book very much like her previous books; for the gods of the North have proved after all to be her kind of material. Miss Boyle's special delight is the sort of human being concerning whom it is relevant to write like this: "He looked very clean in his white starched blouse with his black hair cleanly clipped in his neck, and the nails on his fingers a clear strong ivory white. . . . His spine was bent like a finger and he wore a little saddle of black silky hair across his skull. Around the seam of his perfectly lipless mouth and up the jawbone to the ears, the bristles were shaved blue and the rouge on his cheekbones bloomed in great dark concave roses, rakish symbols of dissolution worn with resignation on either side of the long mournful nose. . . . The two ladies [Jewish] smiled humbly, eagerly at him, the delicate black silk hairs of their moustaches just visible at the corners of their mouths. . . . Toni, with his good hat on and his town jacket and one leg swinging in the white woven stocking that ended just below the gold hairs on his small neat knee. . . ." There always has been and there still is something waxy about her people. They are clean, clever manikins, exquisitely carved out of perishable paste and decorated with doll's hair—hairs, rather, for each little bristle has its purpose and its place, and each of them is there to intensify our sense that the creature upon whose neck or chin or knee it is glued has nothing inside of him worth looking for. They are as empty as Easter eggs, and as incapable of getting up and walking off under their own power. There is to be sure an accompanying style which gives the illusion of incessant movement in Miss Boyle's world; but one hears it at last as the music-box which it is, tinkling expertly and monotonously while the little figures stare.

Not that Miss Boyle is without interest in emotions and convictions, and not that in the present case she fails to labor so that we too shall be moved. But the most she has ever been able to put into her creatures is a series of spiritual antics—little freezings and burnings which depend for their success with us not so much upon their rightness as upon her rhetoric. So here, where the dummy gods and the stuffed brown shirts of fascism furnish her so congenial a background. All that she can fill her doctor-hero with is a perfumed and airy diatribe against human reason. "Believe me it is not necessary to think, only to follow and believe. It is not necessary to reason, only to feel the blood moving and to know . . . even while the mind is shed as cowardice is shed, disdained like caution, the mind cast off and even the reason for it cast aside and the direction of the body not lost but weaving magically, like a trumpet call unwinding through the flesh, the destination not even questioned, residing as it does in every instant, every breath that's taken, NOW." Upon the success of such passages depends the success of the book as a whole; and their success, as I have said, depends upon the conviction which they carry. The brilliance of the landscape and the ability shown by Miss Boyle in the handling of certain plastic details are really irrelevant to this central question, my own answer to which is, I suppose, already clear enough.

MARK VAN DOREN

Life and Work of Stravinsky

STRAVINSKY: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Simon and Schuster. $3.

STRAVINSKY, Edited and Designed by Merle Armitage. G. Schirmer. $5.

THERE are facts in Stravinsky's autobiography, but not all the pertinent facts; there are penetrating observations, but also this statement about Beethoven: "It is in the quality of his musical material and not in the nature of his ideas that his true greatness lies." This statement is incorrect. In his use of his medium Beethoven certainly is one of the greatest of artists; but the detail of substance and form in the first movement of the Ninth Symphony represents the working out of an "idea"—that is, an attitude, a personal vision or awareness of life; and it is as the embodiment of such ideas—or, in other words, by the way it performs its function as art—that Beethoven's music acquires its unique greatness and importance.

Stravinsky makes the statement about Beethoven because he does not want his own music to be judged by its ideas. In composing he sets out not to express ideas but merely to establish order and discipline in a purely sonorous scheme (these are his terms). Nevertheless, his music, no less than Beethoven's, represents the working out of an idea, of a personal attitude; only that Stravinsky's attitude is one that leads him, in writing prose, to state feeling itself with precisely calculated emotionlessness, and, in writing music, merely to establish an order and discipline in purely sonorous schemes. In other words, the triviality, the sterility, the ugliness of his more recent music represent the poverty of his spirit; the progression of his works records the process of its impoverishment, and he must deny the importance of riches.

Now the factual record, as I have said, is not complete. Stravinsky chronicles the composition of one sonorous scheme after another as though each were in line with the others; and it is not until almost the last page of the book that he even mentions the change in idiom that has alienated the great mass of his listeners ("I believe that there was seldom any real communion of spirit between us"). True, there has been reference to charges of sacrilege occasioned by his treatment of Pergolesi's music in "Pulcinella"; but he has not informed us of the factual basis for the accusations—has not told us that he, who has "always been sincerely opposed to the rearrangement by anyone other than the author himself of work already created," had introduced jazz glissandos into Pergolesi.

These factual omissions are important, for jazz glissandos in Pergolesi arouse a suspicion that Stravinsky's works have not arisen entirely from an austere preoccupation with order and discipline in sonorous schemes. And there is in fact a background for the changes in idiom and style—which he has omitted with studied sobriety, but which Constant Lambert has supplied with equally studied brilliancy in his "Music Ho!" This background, according to Lambert, was Diaghilev's attempt to hold the interest of fashionable Paris by creating a vogue for mere vogue with a series of maneuvers in which Stravinsky collaborated and for which he even supplied a formulation of principle: "Toute réaction est vraie." Among other things there were ballets in the post-war scrapbook taste—with settings, choreography, and music of different periods; with music that itself displayed a mixture of styles in melody, harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration—the jazz glissando in "Pulcinella," observes Lambert, being like the photograph of a Negro with a cocktail shaker pasted on an Alma Tadema reproduction. And even Stravinsky's austere neo-classicism was the last of his reactions for reaction's sake—the sensationalist's final sensation.

Merle Armitage's book, with its articles by Cocteau, Komroff, Satie, Vuillermoz, its reproductions of Picasso, Kandinsky, Merida, Elise, is part of the background Lambert has described.

A full elucidation of the grounds of dissatisfaction the reviewer cannot undertake, but he can sketch the main headings which would guide such a statement. Santayana has accepted as the groundwork of his moral vision of the world

THE STONES AWAKE

By CARLETON BEALS

Is there really a place for—

INTELLIGENCE IN POLITICS

By Max Ascoli

Professor of Political Philosophy, Graduate Faculty, New School for Social Research

HERE is the concrete working of democracy in the United States described with pitiless realism. The author's problem has been to discover to what extent democracy may be compatible with intellectual activities; whether the development of modern politics has not got entirely out of intelligent control or whether an adjustment is still possible between intelligence, conscious of social responsibility, and political reality.

This book is of particular interest at a time when there is much discussion of the role that intellectuals, experts or brain-trusters may play in checking the chaos of modern political societies, and because of its basic analysis of the place of intelligence in modern politics. $2.50 traditional notions which he has not sought technically to validate and which do not square with the facts of experience as discovered by the modern mind. He says in a most eloquent passage that he has put his hand into the hand of Mother Nature and asked her to tell him a story. Either Mother Nature spared his feelings or he fell asleep before the story was half told. For how else can we account for that missionary zeal which characterized the first half of his life in favor of "happiness" and of an "ultimate good"? And what, in the bosom of Mother Nature, is that ideal "harmony," envisaged for all his protestations to the contrary as static, of which he speaks so mellifluously? And who were those Greeks from whom he says he learned these notions?

Nor is the latter phase of his work better grounded. He has claimed that the "Realms of Being" have been reared upon discoveries arrived at only after criticism was allowed to do its worst and the mind was cleansed of all pretended knowledge. But of course it is not difficult to show that the criticism to which he submitted all his beliefs was not radical enough, because it never led him to challenge the categories with which the inquiry was conducted. For are not the "Realms of Being" at which he arrives and the essences on which his pure spirituality loves to dwell possible only to a half-hearted naturalist who never successfully rid himself of the "malicious psychology" he was taught during his undergraduate years?

But if this is true, how can we account for the reputation he enjoys? Let us first remember that his appeal has chiefly been, as he himself is not unwilling to concede ("Soliloquies," pages 255 and 257), to ladies and to idealistic youngsters of the well-to-do who are seduced by his dream of the Life of Reason because they know so little of life itself. And secondly let us not attribute his reputation to the wrong causes. He has written on religion and on art with unusual sanity—but in religion that sanity was made possible by his failure to grasp the full implications of Spinoza's distinction between the divine and the ceremonial laws. He has written superb prose and some excellent sonnets; he has also written keen criticism with the suavest malice and the most abrasive irony; and he has coined aphorisms which have already become part of our common literary heritage. Last year he published a novel the unvarnished cynicism of which does not seem to have disturbed its hundred thousand readers. In "Skepticism and Animal Faith" he has shown what absurd conclusions one can rigidly draw from bad assumptions. And lastly, in "The Life of Reason," though of course not meaning to, he has shown how intolerable life would be if its values did not spring from the irrational womb of nature but were generated in the sterilized mind of a hedonistic philosopher who, finding Heraclitus and Nietzsche unintelligible, dreams under the shadow of a romantic ikon of Plato of "happiness" and of an "ultimate good."

These are the contributions which have earned Santayana a reputation. Other gifts may give him a place in history. Before long the new fascist barbarians may have divided the West among themselves. And to the sensitive intellect who shall live in that future tragic twilight of a dying epoch Santayana may be the new Boethius, offering a lyrical Consolation of Philosophy in the English tongue.

Mr. Edman has succeeded in the introductory essay in giving a very complete if flattering exposition of Santayana's thought. With the selections the reviewer would not quarrel, though he would add one or two pieces, particularly the more mordant passages from "Egotism in German Philosophy" and the defense of himself in "Soliloquies" to which allusion was made above.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Idea of a University

THE HIGHER LEARNING IN AMERICA. By Robert Hutchins. Yale University Press. $2.

PRESIDENT HUTCHINS, who doesn't like confusion, finds higher learning in America confused. The love of money makes maitres d'hôtel of professors; a misconception of democracy fills our universities with dolts and renders the curriculum responsive to public opinion; alumni bite the hand that nourished them intellectually; trustees and regents, exercising their legal rights, rule educationally as well as financially; and an erroneous notion of progress induces the belief that everything is getting better every day in every way. The result is gay campus life, good football, courses in radio broadcasting, students who are correct about their collars, red-baiting and complacency. In that chaos the aims of a unified university, the pursuit of significant truth for its own sake, the development of the intellectual virtues, and the preservation of a common stock of fundamental ideas are lost. A narrow vocationalism reduces the professions to trades; a narrow specialization produces isolation; a narrow empiricism results in an anti-intellectualism which negates the function of a university.

To end this confusion President Hutchins proposes a sound general education in a college which starts at the present junior year in high school and ends with the present sophomore year in college; and a university consisting of three faculties concerned with the fundamental problems of metaphysics, natural science, and social science. Clustered about his university would be research and technical institutes with staffs of their own, only those research and technical professors who are also studying the fundamental problems of the three faculties holding university appointments. Techniques and professions lacking either unity or intellectual content would be excluded from the institutes. In such an institution all students would acquire a unified education, and professors and students, working together disinterestedly, would "know what truths to pursue and why."

Mr. Hutchins's dilemma comes when he attempts to give values to the mathematical symbols of his formula. Method is put to one side in the secure faith that, given the perfect content, educational technique can be trusted to devise means of introducing it to the mind of man. Time, however, cannot be disregarded, and its limitation forces a rigorous selection of material. Quite appropriately Mr. Hutchins declares that the student is incapable of making his own selection; quite inappropriately he assumes that professors who disagree radically are equally incapable. Their disagreement may render impossible the building of a common stock of ideas, but it is basic to genuine intellectual progress.

The dilemma is resolved by a fundamentally unsound oversimplification of our intellectual heritage and the mind of man. That the former is confined to what was created out of the rib of Aristotle is irrelevant. The point is that it is confined, and a small segment of world culture is naively called a unified whole. The mind is assumed to be a tabula rasa on which can be written not only ideas but intellectual habits which will guide all future thinking. The psychology on which that assumption is based has been disproved experimentally as well as by common experience. Each of us knows at least one brilliant mathematician or logician who is a babe in arms when he applies his trained intellect to concrete subject matter. Logic may be essential to science but logicians are not.

It is Mr. Hutchins's faith in university education that leads him into error. It makes him believe that the decline of the present-day church is caused by the decline of theological schools and that a sound general education may change the character of our civilization. And it makes him forget that four or even six years on a university campus are introductory, not terminal in learning. All that an educator should hope to accomplish in the college and university years is to make his students conscious of their ignorance and still profoundly and irreverently curious. And that cannot be done by a worship of history, no matter how great that history may be. The past has relatively little to teach the present. Rather it is through the present that we learn of the past.

CALLING WESTERN UNION. By Genevieve Taggard.
Harper and Brothers. $2.

Consistently pure poets are the products of careful censorship. This is not a book of pure poems but the unexpurgated utterances of a prophetic poet. Here, for example, are: a confused cry of disgust (Night Letter to Walt Whitman), a flower-disdaining sneer (Not for Philosophy), a wishful vision (At Last the Women Are Moving), a celebration of poetic power (Definition of Song), slack, rambling prophecy (On Planting a Small Lilac), irony and pity in grand poetry (Try Tropic), a good cry (A Middle-aged, Middle-class Woman), an incoherent cry (Adding Up America), some philosophy (Eye of the Beholder), sharp and kindly wit (Community), and a mellow song rung out on one of the oldest bells of poetry (Everyday Alchemy). It is the bit of prose in the Note to Book III, however, which is to my mind perhaps the best poem and the best prophecy in the volume, for it suggests that Marx, who was certainly a prophet, was no poet, because if he were he would have said his say as simply as this.

THE WORKS OF JOHN MILTON. Volume XI and XVII.
Columbia University Press. Eighteen Volumes. $105.

In sight of harbor, the Columbia Milton has struck a rock. Nothing hinted trouble and Peter Ramus himself is not uninteresting. He had been dead exactly a hundred years when Milton printed the epitome of his system now Englished in Volume XI of the Columbia Milton. The book, its editor observes, "has never before been translated," but it is a long time since I have seen a translation of a Latin book so ill made. The translator had undoubtedly a hard task. "The words of Milton," he says, "cannot always easily be rendered into the English of the present." For parts of his vocabulary, accordingly, he has resorted to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; fishing out such pearls of diction as "consentany," "dissentany," "consectary," "proegumenic." All this I could have tolerated, though hardly, if his translation had been even moderately accurate. But it is not. The following, from the Preface, must suffice as a specimen: "Hence Pole comments correctly on Plato's 'Gorgias'" (pages 13, 2). Who, I asked myself, is Pole? Can he be the great cardinal? But what Milton's Latin has is: "Plato's Polus rightly remarks, in the 'Gorgias.'" I did not know who Pole was. Mr. Gilbert does not know who Polus is; and he does not know, either in this sentence or at pages 49, 6, the meaning of the Latin word apud. The number of very common Latin words of which he does not know the meaning is, I may notice in passing, surprising: For example, he renders both quamquam and quamvis by "since" (pages 29, 25; p. 51, 19); quoniam by "although" (pages 71, 4), tantummodo by "commonly" (pages 33, 18), quid quod by "because" (pages 57, 15), voluntas by "pleasure" (pages 147, 25). By the text of Milton's Latin which he offers, Mr. Gilbert must be accounted no better as an editor than as a translator. On page 4 per pendenda appears, absurdly, for perpendenda (and Mr. Gilbert's translation suggests that he sees nothing the matter with per pendenda). Ramus was accused on one occasion of inviting his pupils to discuss passages of St. Augustine which were "dangerous" (lubricos locos). They were dangerous to faith. But Mr. Gilbert, misunderstanding the word lubricos, speaks of Ramus as "setting forth to his hearers obscene passages of St. Augustine" (page 505). What between not stopping to think and thinking too curiously, Mr. Gilbert is almost absurdly unlucky. This is indeed an unlucky volume, quite unworthy, I feel, of its noble companions.

H. W. GARROD

SEVEN RED SUNDAYS. By Ramón J. Sender. Translated from the Spanish by Sir Peter Chalmers Mitchell. Liveright Publishing Corporation. $2.50.

"My book sometimes appears confused and loosely wrought," admits Sender in his preface; but "if the reader is of those who can see and grasp he will admit that my method is logical, because chaos has its own logic." Perhaps. But aesthetically as well as logically it would seem that social chaos should be simulated rather than reproduced. Sender, however, chooses to tell his story of a general strike in Madrid in the person of five protagonists, first one and then another, alternately, with no transition, no explanation of who is writing what, or when, or why. He also includes a chapter written by the moon—the bourgeoise Lady Moon, no less—who acts as a sort of floodlight for the police who fight the strike by night. As a result he so muddies the realities of anarcho-syndicalism that even after 439 pages one is still without a decent understanding of the issues here in question. Nevertheless, in the weirdly emotional, intuitive story of the journalist Samar and of Amparo, the daughter of the colonel opposing the strikers, he so clarifies the character of the Spanish revolutionary that he compensates, in part, for his book's confusions, and achieves a degree of that "human truth of the most generous kind" at which he avowedly aims.

LEIGH WHITE

DEFENDER OF DEMOCRACY: MASARYK OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA. By Emil Ludwig. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

There can be no doubt: this is not Emil Ludwig's magnum opus. All his biographical works from Goethe and Napoleon to Schliemann and Hindenburg were more impressive, and even his conversations with Mussolini gave perhaps more food for thought. Why are we now somewhat disappointed? The reason may be found in the fact that Masaryk himself is an admirable writer whose memoirs belong to the outstanding books on contemporary history; and, moreover, Karel Capek told the story of the former President's life only a year ago. Nevertheless, Ludwig's work is worth reading. Not only will students of foreign affairs appreciate the lucidity and keenness of Masaryk's remarks in these discussions with one of the world's foremost journalists, but also young people should enjoy the book as an easy introduction to the life of a remarkable man. This is really excellent reading for undergraduates (but not merely for them!) who want to know something about the one great representative of the democratic ideal on the European continent. With the exception of the first chapter, the whole book is based on conversations held at the castle of Lany. Masaryk himself revised—and expanded—the text.

FOR some reason or other Guthrie McClintic's production of "Hamlet" (Empire Theater) is set in the middle of the seventeenth century. Unimportant as the fact may at first sight seem, it is a symbol of all that is unsatisfactory and bitterly disappointing in the long-awaited interpretation of John Gielgud. "Hamlet" is a Gothic play, not a courtly one. Remove from its atmosphere all sense of the importance of the unseen world, of things "undreamed of in your philosophy," and you reduce it to the level of sentimental melodrama. Yet the manners and the costumes of the period here chosen are the very essence of complacent worldliness, and every effort seems to have been made to fit "Hamlet" to them. Not only Mr. Gielgud's performance but every detail of the production is calculated to minimize the atmosphere of wonder which must surround the play if it is to mean anything at all. Perhaps the intention was to produce a "Hamlet" which suggests no mystery and arouses no awe, but it is difficult to understand why anyone who saw no more in the play than Mr. McClintic seems to have seen should want to produce it at all.

Unfortunately, Mr. Gielgud, who comes to us with the applause of all England ringing in his ears, appears to have no conception of his part subtler than the director's conception of the play as a whole. He has a mellifluous voice and a graceful, almost femininely graceful, manner; but he will be chiefly remembered, I think, as the only actor who ever undertook to play Hamlet "like Niobe all tears," as not so much the "melancholy Dane" as the "weepy" one. He is harassed, all but hysterical, and, I suppose I may grant, "appealing." But that is not all or even the most important part of Hamlet, not the part which has enabled him to capture the imagination as no other character of fiction ever has. Hamlet is, above all else, a thinker and an ironist. He never ceases to consider things curiously, and he dominates every scene by the force of his personality. That is, perhaps, one of the sources of his weakness, one of the reasons why he can never quite escape the tendency to play when he has resolved to act. But it is also his strength, the reason why he is succeeding at one thing while he is failing at another, the reason why he is perhaps the first, as he is certainly the greatest, representative in all literature of the man whom we respect and admire and love not for what he does but for what he is. Yet of all this Mr. Gielgud seems not to have conceived the slightest suspicion. Hamlet's intellect and Hamlet's irony are hardly suggested. He has not even the antic disposition, for he is merely a dejected young man who finally works himself up to a hysterical blood-letting.

All this would not be quite so distressing as it is if Shakespeare's play did not so implacably refuse to submit to any such cavalier treatment. The situations and the speeches out of which neither Mr. Gielgud nor Mr. McClintic make sense do, nevertheless, continually obstruct the play they are trying to produce, and since they have not even had the courage to throw away what they cannot use, long passages of superb poetry remain to get in their way. The famous soliloquy has so little relation to the character Mr. Gielgud is portraying that he can only treat it as a set piece which tradition unfortunately compels him to interrupt his part to speak, and certain other of the characters are even more visibly embarrassed by passages which appear as tiresome excrescences upon meaningless parts. Certainly Arthur Byron is, or is made to be, the worst Polonius ever seen on any stage because, though the lines finally compel him to recognize that he is playing a comic part, the play is half over before an uninstructed spectator would suppose that Polonius had any character at all. He speaks his first speech, supposed to give the key to his character, as though he were ashamed to be compelled to get off such a rigmarole; he mutters under his breath one of the funniest harangues in literature—"Brevity is the soul of wit," and so on; and unfortunately all this is typical of the way in which nearly every member of the cast is led to treat some of the best lines ever given a player as though they were an imposition upon an actor's patience. Honorable exceptions are Barry Kelley, an excellent first grave-digger, and Judith Anderson, a superbly sultry queen, but neither can, unfortunately, materially alter the unfortunate effect of the whole.

Perhaps the production is, in the most superficial sense of the term, "theatrically effective." It does, that is to say, move briskly except when some great or subtle passage gets in the way of briskness, but anyone who knew the play only from this performance might well wonder why it had fascinated men's minds for three hundred years. Doubtless the mystery, or rather the complexity, of both the play and the central character can be interpreted in various ways, but neither can be treated as though there were no mystery or no complexity there. If what we have is not "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out, it is at least "Hamlet" with three-fourths of him missing. In my time I have seen various mediocre productions of the drama; I have never before seen one which so nearly succeeded in making it seem a shallow play.

No wonder that year after year this combination outsells nearly all others! Aside from the obvious saving of 27%, consider the reputation of both magazines: America's most popular progressive weekly and its most distinguished monthly.

As a reader of The Nation you know you would not suffer the inconvenience of being without it. The Nation discloses the facts behind the news and interprets them from the progressive point of view. It scrutinizes every public development to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. It helps you understand thoroughly the headlines of today and prepares you for those of tomorrow.

Scheduled for winter publication is a series of the utmost importance on the leading personalities who shape American opinion through the new forms of mass persuasion . . . the radio commentators, the daily columnists, the Washington correspondents, newspaper publishers and others. A group of highly informative articles on the Soviet Union by Sidney Webb, Henry Shapiro, and Louis Fischer will appear soon, also.

Harper's Magazine, the perfect monthly complement to The Nation, not only offers its readers factual information and critical interpretation of our headlong modern times, it also frequently predicts events before they happen. Nine times this year, in as many months, Harpers actually predicted important happenings which were later front page news stories!

An absorbing article by Aldous Huxley on "Propaganda" heads an exciting list of features scheduled for early publication in Harpers which includes "Money and Banking in Russia" by Richard Hellman, "Why Things Grow Old" by Roy Helton, "Machines and Individuals" by Peter Van Dresser, and "The Nature of Telepathy" by Ernest Hunter Wright.

Subscriptions to this popular combination, as well as those combinations listed in the box, may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. But to make certain you do not overlook these bargains, order at once on the form below!

FILMS

The Broken Bowl

THOSE who saw "Craig's Wife" as a play are certain to remember the exciting moment when Craig asserted his independence of the terrible woman who presided over his house by dashing a china something-or-other to the floor and shattering it into as many pieces as the gesture did his marriage. Now the play has become a film (Columbia), and the difference between the two can best be measured by a description of what happened at the Music Hall the other night when John Boles dropped the ornament. Six thousand people laughed. I do not remember any laughter at the play, and in fact I am sure that that audience held its breath; for everything so far had tended to produce in the spectator a conviction that Mrs. Craig was genuinely terrible, and one literally could not tell what might follow the iconoclasm. The trouble is perhaps John Boles, who is too much the handsome dummy for us to care whether he asserts himself or not. But more likely it is Rosalind Russell, who as Craig's wife does a very attractive piece of acting in the wrong key. She permits us almost to love and pity her; nice emotions, but destructive of the main point, which should be that she deserves everything she gets.

Ruth Chatterton meets a similar challenge with greater wisdom in "Dodsworth" (United Artists), where to be sure she is excellently supported by Walter Huston in the title role and where the demand is not so clear for a woman with whom we shall be unable to sympathize. Mrs. Dodsworth does, however, grow less and less lovely as the film unwinds; and her willingness in the last scene to look wholly shifty and defeated has much to do with the fact that "Dodsworth" is in general a success. Both films are worth seeing if only as evidences that plays can after all be translated to the screen—provided the translators remember that a great deal of care needs to be exercised lest the momentum of the original leak out through the immense spaces between the stars.

"Nine Days a Queen" (Gaumont-British) has for its subject matter the six years of English history between the death of Henry VIII and the accession of Mary, and has for its heroine Lady Jane Grey, who for nine days was queen after the death of her cousin, Edward VI. The story then is of how two children, Edward and Jane, are played with against their innocent wills by the wolves at court—Warwick, Seymour, and Somerset—and of how the pale face of Mary looks in at last and puts an end to all this. If the accuracy of the film is not a fault—lending perhaps a little coldness to what in more reckless hands could easily have grown overheated—then it has no fault. It is serious and convincing, and intelligently respectful of its material; one of the best historical films, indeed, among the many now to be seen; and without question superior to "Mary of Scotland."

"Millions of Us," the American labor film which started at the Filmarte, has moved to the Cameo and seems there to be entirely at home judging by the applause which greets it nightly. The Filmarte should have hung on to it in spite of the hisses, for it is not only good as a labor document, it is good as a film, and points the way to still better ones of its kind.

"The Human Adventure" (Plaza Theater) takes a flying trip over the chief excavations of the Oriental Institute between Egypt and Persia, and can be heartily recommended.

Letters to the Editors

Dorothy Thompson and Taxes

Dear Sirs: Your editorial in the September 12 Nation was altogether too generous to Dorothy Thompson. Her whole exposition was based on ignorance of the provisions of the Revenue Act imposing the undistributed-profits tax.

Her problem is this: a corporation has made $500,000 profit. Out of this it has to pay $10,000 state tax—obviously no concern of the federal government—and the federal income tax of $73,000. The latter is, of course, the old federal corporation-income tax, which has been in force for many years and is not the one which Mr. Landon considered "cock-eyed." The amount of the profits remaining is therefore $416,500. Out of this the corporation desires to repay $135,000 to a bank and to set up $175,000 as working capital. Now Miss Thompson claims that if the corporation were to repay the $135,000 and retain the $175,000 as working capital it would subject itself to an undistributed-profits tax in the sum of $94,500. Apparently you concede that claim. As a matter of fact, however, and under the official Treasury regulations, nothing of the kind will take place. The corporation may make the indicated disposition of its profits and may retain $106,500 as additional reserves, without resorting to trickery or going contrary to the letter or the spirit of the law.

All the corporation has to do is to declare the entire $416,500 as a dividend, payable, however, not in cash but in the corporation's stock. The only restriction is that the stockholders must receive a stock dividend in a class of stock different from that which they hold. In other words, preferred stockholders must get a common-stock dividend and common stockholders a preferred-stock dividend. The corporation therefore issues new stock in the amount of $416,500, retains the $416,500 in cash, pays the bank, increases its working capital, and increases its reserve. No undivided-profits tax becomes due. None is paid.

Sometimes, however, such an increase of the outstanding capital stock by the payment of a stock dividend is undesirable. In such a case the corporation may pay the $416,500 in the form of a bond dividend. It issues debenture bonds at whatever rate of interest it may deem fit, with interest and principal repayable exclusively out of future profits, and not repayable if no future profits are earned. As these bonds are not a burden on any of the assets of the corporation, they do not interfere with its credit standing. If one wants to be particularly careful, one may even expressly state in the bonds that the bond-holders, in their claims, shall come after all other creditors of the corporation.

Each of these two variants is extremely simple and, as I say, absolutely legal and proper.

New York, September 15

Dear Sirs: The Reply to Dorothy Thompson in your issue of September 12 has just been brought to my attention. Since my firm is the one to which she refers, I trust you will permit me to explain our situation further.

You are right in your correction of the tax. An error in transcription made a difference of about $7,000.

First as to the size of the business: Earnings of the size we are enjoying (?) this year come at the most in only two or three years out of ten. There are other years in which the losses are equally great, particularly if we try to keep our men employed. As a matter of record, we have not been able over the full period of the business cycle to distribute earnings of over 5 per cent on net worth, and this would not warrant a capitalization of one-fifth of that suggested.

The company chooses to pay its debts and to return to full employment. There seems to be some question in your mind as to whether we should make this choice. Such doubt can only be due to inexperience in business and a consequent lack of comprehension of the simple elements of the situation.

Debts must be paid this year and next when earnings are available. An industry of our type cannot budget on a yearly basis. For one period of the business cycle it receives more than it pays out. For another period—and it has been a long one—it must pay out more than it receives. It cannot exist unless it repays its borrowings and lays in a new reserve, nor is there any other time to do this than now.

It is only ignorance of business principles that suggests new capitalization for making good these recurring losses, whether the new capital is to come from

The Modern THINKER MUST speak another language

THE world is growing smaller! Scientific miracles of land and air bring the ends of the earth closer together every day.

present stockholders or from the security markets. Do you really suggest that we capitalize these recurring losses and attempt to pay dividends on the pyramided structure? Of course we might capitalize these losses—just this once—on the theory that "it ain't goin' to rain no more." Many august voices sang this song in 1929. We didn't believe them then, and our employees are glad we didn't.

Finally there is this question of "a new investment of $175,000," which is your term for describing our addition to working capital. This is by no means "new investment." It is repairing a depletion which must be repaired before we can return to full employment. When one goes from, say, 25 per cent capacity to 100 per cent capacity, it is a prerequisite to such expansion that we carry correspondingly more raw materials, more work-in-process—with its accumulated costs in labor, overhead, and material—more finished goods unshipped, and more goods shipped and in the customers' hands but unpaid for. These expenditures must be made months before the increased returns come in. To get thus up to full employment cost us $175,000. Do you really believe that stockholders should be penalized for providing this new employment?

ASTONISHED MANUFACTURER
Vermont, September 23

[Astonished Manufacturer dodges the issue of the desirability of collecting taxes on what is indubitably income for the stockholders. Is there any sound "business" reason, apart from the desirability of avoiding taxation, why the additional working capital should not come from additional capitalization, whether by a stock dividend or otherwise? Does the aggrieved manufacturer mean to suggest that he does not expect to get a return on the $175,000 of stockholders' money reinvested in the company?—EDITORS THE NATION.]

An Apology

[Under date of August 8 The Nation published a review of "Practical Aspects of Psychoanalysis" by Dr. Lawrence S. Kubie. Thereafter Dr. Kubie addressed to us in connection with this review a letter which was not intended for publication but which, by an inadvertence, was published without permission and in deleted form in our issue of September 12. The Nation regrets this inadvertence. The incident was particularly regrettable, since it concerned a review which has been the subject of sharp criticism.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Shape of Things

NO FEATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN has been so thoroughly dishonest and contemptible as the recently exposed practice of inserting notices in workers' pay envelopes warning them of wage deductions under the Social Security Act. In attempting to arouse working-class opposition to a law which is patently to labor's advantage the Republicans have not hesitated at inconsistency or misrepresentation, and have even indulged in a little outright lying. Contrary to the implication of these notices, the Social Security Act is not a partisan measure but passed Congress with the active support of both Republicans and Democrats. The deduction from the workers' pay may be indefensible from the standpoint of true social security, but it was imposed as a concession to the very elements that are now suddenly rushing to the defense of the workers. The maximum tax is incorrectly stated as being 4 per cent instead of 3 per cent, and there is more than an implication that the government might go back on its promise to return the wage deductions, with interest, to the employees as old-age annuities. Lies are notoriously hard to combat, especially in the heat of an election campaign. But President Roosevelt could effectively take the wind out of the Republican sails by announcing in his next radio broadcast that he will recommend a revision of the law removing the tax from the workers and placing it entirely on the employers, where it properly belongs.

WE HOPE THE LA FOLLETTE COMMITTEE investigating the violation of civil liberties is equipped with a thumb-tack artist. If it is, let him hang up a map and stick in a tack at those points where Earl Browder, the duly nominated candidate of a legal political party, has been forcibly prevented from speaking. At those points it will be discovered that violation of the Bill of Rights is nothing unusual; the American Legion will be found to be riding high, with the local authorities, the press, and the leading employers generally lending aid. This alliance may be, for the present, loose and half invisible; it may seem like a local phenomenon. But it is probably linked, loosely still, with similar alliances all over the country. Certainly the "direct" methods of Tampa and Terre Haute are all too similar; and if the local boys are not already in touch with each other and with some higher power such as the American Liberty League, they can be "coordinated" quickly when the time is ripe. To expose and break and keep broken the threads of a web which is as yet weak but definitely fascist in pattern is one of the important functions of democratic government. Government agencies might well turn their attention from the deportation of refugees from European fascism to the clipping of fascist wings at home.

THE DEATH OF SENATOR COUZENS OF Michigan, just after his defeat for reelection, ends the career of one of the most courageous, useful, and honest members of the Senate. The amazing romance of his career—a fortune of $30,000,000 acquired as a result of his investment of $1,000 in Henry Ford's car and his subsequent organization and brilliant management of the Ford Motor Company—never threw him off his balance or gave him an inflated idea of his own importance. He refused to be bound by narrow party ties. Indeed, he told the electors last summer that the reelection of President Roosevelt was the most important matter confronting the nation, and that the outcome of his own candidacy for the Senate was "neither important to the nation nor me." His long experience in the affairs of a large corporation made it possible for him to meet on equal terms the business men who appeared before Congress, notably when he was chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. They could pull no wool over his eyes, nor baffle him by any intricate points they raised. The Michigan Democrats who backed him last spring characterized him as "one who cannot understand the fight of the Republican Party for the almighty dollar and its disregard for human rights." A great fighter, Senator Couzens never hesitated to oppose rich men and the big business interests. He will be remembered for the fight he waged against Secretary Mellon and the tax favors which he charged Mr. Mellon with granting to the big corporations. Throughout his term of office he fought for increasing the income-tax rates in the higher income groups. Without being a progressive himself, he was often of the greatest value to the progressive bloc in Congress.

THE ARREST OF THE BELGIAN REXIST LEADER, Leon Degrelle, may indicate a general tightening by democratic governments in the treatment of fascist violence. Franco, Mosley, Degrelle, Doriot are the present luminaries in the fascist heaven. Spurred by Hitler's success, they are adopting new tactics. They are all loud-mouthed men, but lung power has not been enough. For years Mosley, for example, has ranted to little effect. But now, responsive to the advice of Goebbels, he has carried his message and his thugs into the Jewish-populated East End of London, where his provocations can lead only to riots and pogroms. Sir John Simon, the British Home Secretary, evidently means to follow a hands-off policy, which is exactly what the fascists are counting on. But the immense protest from every source shows that the English people have a more realistic view. Roughly it runs as follows: Let the fascists talk so long as it is only talk. But let there be no uniforms permitted as badges of a private army. And as soon as a speech or a demonstration shows clearly that its consequence will be to incite to riot and violence, let the law come down with all its force. This is the method that is now being used with success in Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. It is a method and a problem that Americans may have to face in the not distant future.

WHILE THE UNITED STATES CONCERNS ITSELF with the outpourings of political aspirants and their supporters, in person, in the press, on the air, all irresponsibly charging fascism and communism and the betrayal of democracy, the reality behind these tags dominates the diplomatic war that all Europe is engaged in as well as the desperate physical war in Spain. In this week's Nation Europe's realities are drawn into focus in three articles that taken together form a picture of progress toward chaos. Louis Fischer, from the dangerous vantage-point of Madrid, describes the eager hope of Soviet help that lifts the hearts of the desperate defenders of Spain's—and perhaps Europe's—democracy. Meanwhile, Russian efforts are checkmated at London, and French sympathies are drowned in the fears and vacillations of the Blum government, which Robert Dell on another page exposes as a helpless appendage to the British Foreign Office. In England labor's efforts in behalf of European democracy are similarly diluted. Harold Laski analyzes the fateful divisions and the naive credulity which combine to emasculate the attempts of British labor to direct or modify the government's policy. When the pieces are put together, the resulting picture of Europe is about as somber as a landscape could be.

DESPITE BLUM'S NON-INTERVENTION FIASCO, the French Popular Front government enters on its second six months with moderately favorable prospects. The Radical Socialist Congress at Biarritz voted unanimously to support Blum on condition that the stay-in strikes be suppressed and the budget balanced. While neither of these objectives will be easy to attain, Blum has promised that his budget will be "sound" and not create a huge deficit. On the left, the Communists are dissatisfied both with the government's policy of neutrality in the Spanish conflict and with the recent prohibition of Communist meetings, but have indicated no intention of abandoning their support of the Popular Front. Economic factors should work increasingly in the government's favor. Devaluation not only promises to stimulate general business activity but has made possible the belated introduction of the forty-hour week and other reforms which were voted last June. The government's greatest strength, however, lies not so much in anything it has accomplished as in the certainty that its downfall would bring chaos in France. Armed with this weapon Blum could, if he chose, make a real beginning toward introducing the Socialist commonwealth to which he professes allegiance.

THE SUSPICION THAT GOVERNOR LANDON has a very inadequate conception of foreign affairs was fully confirmed in his Indianapolis speech, the first that he has given on the vital issues that will preoccupy the President during the next four years. That he should be against the League and World Court is not surprising, considering that he is a protege of Hearst's. Instead of collective security, he assures us that we may rely on goodwill, mediation, arbitration, and preparedness to pull us through the next four years and make this country an "oasis of peace" in a war-ridden world. However, lest he be mistaken for a pacifist, he opposes any specific pledge not to go to war, and utters a tacit warning against any country violating our neutral rights as Germany did in 1917. As a final touch of irony Mr. Landon, who has been touring the country denouncing the Hull reciprocal agreements, pleads for a "lowering of trade barriers and the reestablishment of healthy economic conditions." As against the contention that peace and recovery can only be assured if the United States is willing to modify its imperialistic aims, Mr. Landon merely denies that we have any such interests.

THE MAN ON THE STREET CANNOT AFFORD to buy paintings. Ordinarily he cannot even buy prints at from $20 up. We have already commented on the admirable work being done by the WPA art projects in creating an art by and for the many. The problem has now been approached by the artists themselves from the side of distribution. The American Artists Group has lately announced the sale of a group of etchings, lithographs, and woodcuts at $2.75 each. The prints are unsigned and the number printed from one plate is unlimited. An attempt to popularize painting is being made by Living American Art, Incorporated, which four times a year will offer exhibitions of twelve paintings reproduced by the collotype process, almost indistinguishable, it is said, from the original. Some 250 exhibitions of the first twelve reproductions are being shown simultaneously in various American cities. Among the artists in the two groups are Jean Charlot, Asa Cheffetz, Howard Cook, Adolf Dehn, Mabel Dwight, Wanda Gag, William Gropper, Yasuo Kuniyoshi, John Sloan, Louis Bouche, Peggy Bacon, George Grosz, and Reginald Marsh. The collotype reproductions are for sale at $5 each and are available to libraries and schools as loan exhibits. The artists will receive royalties on the sale of these pictures. This is an encouraging sign that the fences in the art market which have kept artists isolated from their larger public and therefore impoverished are being broken down. There will soon be no reason why good pictures should not be common, even in modest households, as good books.

IN GREAT BRITAIN THIS MONTH COMPANIES of men are marching along many roads converging on London. They are the unemployed from the distressed and derelict areas, where dribbles of relief have kept them hanging by their fingernails to the subsistence level, where they have gone without work and suffered the rigors of the means test long enough. Now they are carrying their case direct to the government at Westminster. The Jarrow marchers from the north of England, whom Mr. Laski mentions on another page, started 200 strong on October 5, after attending special services in the church and being blessed by the bishop. They were accompanied on the first ten miles of their way by the mayor and the alderman and on the whole journey by Miss Ellen Wilkinson, Jarrow's M.P. At the same time 400 are marching from Scotland and 500 from South Wales, welcomed along their way by town officials with offers of food and lodging. The ineptitude of the government in handling relief has just been emphasized by the resignation of Malcolm Stewart, Commissioner for Special Areas, who could no longer put up with the entirely inadequate measures he was allowed to take. Yet the first thing the Cabinet did on Baldwin's return was to declare that the marches were "altogether undesirable" and could have no "constitutional influence on policy," and that the Ministers would receive no deputations. While the Cabinet was thus drawing aside its skirts, the King announced his intention of making a personal tour of inspection of the distressed areas in South Wales. What can be said of a government that takes even less responsibility than its supposed "figurehead"?

THE VANGUARD PRESS "HAS THE HONOR TO announce" the publication of James T. Farrell's new novel, "A World I Never Made." But not in the New York Times. According to a statement issued by the publishers on October 23, the Times has refused to advertise Mr. Farrell's book because the novel is "too frank." The issue is not one of censorship. An advertisement may be refused for any adequate reason. One can only quarrel, in the present case, with the adequacy of the Times's reasons. As its own reviewer pointed out on the same day the publishers' announcement was made, the book "is a broad human scene, peopled by characters unmistakably human and deplorably true to life." It is the case of "Ulysses" over again, a book which was certainly "frank" but not—and the highest courts finally so declared—in any sense of the word salacious. Mr. Farrell's high seriousness has never been questioned. More than that, he is an author whose performance has equaled his intent. His "Studs Lonigan" trilogy can stand comparison with Dreiser's best work. And to make the parallel complete, one need only recall that "Sister Carrie," which has been duly advertised more than once in our best journals, was refused publication for many years because it was thought to be improper and degrading. What the Times is said to object to is Mr. Farrell's "language." His characters talk the language of the streets; his small boy talks and thinks in the words that a small boy knows. But the offense, if there is any, lies not in the words themselves but in the poverty and ignorance out of which they rise. When our censors of bad language protest against these also, we shall be able to accept their censorship of words with better grace.

Address to the Candidates

GENTLEMEN: We have been listening to addresses from you during the entire campaign. Now on the eve of the election, when we know that you will have nothing to say that you have not already said over and over, we want you to listen to an address from us. Hitherto it is you who have done the talking. Now it is we who are about to speak—we, the people of the United States, gathered in the greatest assembly world history has known—the assembly of 45,000,000 men and women about to vote at the polls.

But before we let our ballots speak for us, there are certain preliminary things we want to make clear. One is that there are not many countries left on this unhappy globe in which gentlemen like yourselves are so tolerated or given so wide a scope for showing yourselves foolish and wise, and in which the final word is left with people like ourselves. For that fact both you and we should be thankful—thankful for a democracy, however imperfect, in which the candidates speak but the ballot talks.

Then we want it made clear that we are not as dull-witted as some commentators have implied. We have looked you over at your rear-platform appearances, crowded around you at mass-meetings from one end of the continent to the other, applauded you when you were intrepid and glowed when you were benign, heard you praise our cities, our climate, our state houses, our governors, our wisdom, and ourselves, dialed on and off as your voices came over the radio, listened to your sound trucks, read your publicity handouts—and we think we have your measure. You are in so many ways like ourselves—small and big by turns, decisive and weak. Only this brief moment has given you what added stature you have. It will not be long before most of you are forgotten men, merged with the middle-class and labor and capitalist ranks from which you have come.

We have not been wholly taken in. These newspaper scare headlines about Moscow and Mr. Roosevelt have left most of us cold, even when several of your number (including Mr. Thomas) have repeated the charge. The fact that most of the press has thundered away on one side has served only to undermine what faith we may have had in the truthfulness and detachment of newspaper owners. Our votes are of course influenced by words, and words can be wooed with money, but today on the eve of election it seems clear that our votes cannot be bought by campaign funds or frightened by the last-minute pay-envelope lies from our employers.

We do not claim too much for ourselves. There are some—mainly literary men and philosophers—who put a halo around us. They do it out of their deep and abiding need for belief, and so they reach for depths of wisdom in the folk-mind. But there is no mystical wisdom in us. Sometimes we can be stupid and blind, as we were at Terre Haute when we threw eggs at one of you—Mr.

Browder—in order that we might not have to face his words, and again at Tampa when we overturned the platform on which he was speaking. Usually we are overzealous in our allegiances, and even where popular devotion has some sort of a genuine base, as with Mr. Roosevelt, we allow it to become a sort of shining hero-worship. Our only wisdom is that our political sense is finally rooted in our jobs and our daily lives. On the whole we have come to understand that the forces that mold our jobs and livelihoods are national forces and must be dealt with in national terms.

Listen, candidates. We have been mulling over your speeches. Some of you have told us a lot of things that aren't so. What is it we want from whichever of you is elected? We want a chance to apply our energy and skill and devotion to our jobs—and we want an economic setup in which we can have jobs to apply ourselves to. We want a measure of security in our lives, so that we and our families won't have to face the blankness of a future without hope. We want peace: at least, we don't want our decisions about war and peace made by munitions manufacturers and war profiteers and sticklers for the freedom of the seas. These are for us the issues behind the issues of the campaign. And when we hear all your talk of prosperity or bureaucracy, when we hear Mr. Landon shout about the American way and Mr. Roosevelt assert his fidelity to the profit system, when we hear Mr. Roosevelt talk about being a "good neighbor" and Mr. Landon display his ignorance on foreign affairs, we try to translate it all into the simple terms we understand—jobs, security, peace.

What lies ahead of us and you—after we have spoken at the polls—we don't know. One thing we do know is that this election will be only a stage in America's search for a way of order and security in a world of crisis and chaos. There will be other elections and other candidates and other programs before we end our search. For the present let us say our adieus. And let us add that to have known you all and to have listened to your speeches and promises and warnings, while it has been an exhausting experience, has not been entirely without profit.

The Soviets Accept a Challenge

IN CONCLUDING a general understanding with Italy, Hitler has scored the most important of a long series of diplomatic successes. Eighteen months ago when Germany first announced its plan for rearmament, Mussolini was so apprehensive about the Nazi military program that he entered unreservedly into the Stresa front. At that time informed observers were practically unanimous in saying that personal jealousy between the two dictators and rivalry over Austria precluded any possible agreement between them. Ethiopia, Spain, and the growing strength of the Soviet Union have altered the picture. The differences over Austria were patched up last summer, and the present agreement covers the recognition of Italy's conquest of Ethiopia, as well as the Locarno pact, the League, Central Europe, and Spanish policy. The two fascist powers are united in their opposition to collective security and to any form of international agreement which would hinder their common expansionist plans. Whether the understanding goes as far as a military alliance must be left for conjecture, but since both countries think of diplomacy largely in terms of bayonets it may be assumed that military cooperation has not been ignored.

The secret of fascist success in the field of diplomacy has been absurdly simple. Mussolini learned many years ago that the democratic countries would swallow almost any indignity that did not affect them too directly rather than run the risk of war. Hitler has not been slow in mastering the same technique. The method has its dangers, but they are minimized by the fact that the fascist leaders, by virtue of their command over the agencies which determine public opinion, are capable of making the most astonishing reversals of policy on a moment's notice. In the face of Mussolini's and Hitler's growing boldness the leaders of the democratic countries have crawled farther and farther into their shells. This was evident in the Ethiopian crisis, but it has been even more glaring in the controversy over Spain. Without question, M. Blum would like to have come to the assistance of the Spanish Popular Front government. But since, with Germany and Italy already aiding the rebels, such action was obviously dangerous, he turned to a general non-intervention pact. Nothing could have played more completely into the hands of the fascist powers. Having had no compunctions about aiding the rebels in defiance of international law, they had none in evading the non-intervention agreement. Blum had merely succeeded in signing the death warrant of democracy in Spain.

At this point we have the somewhat incongruous phenomenon of the Soviet government—long an uncompromising foe of capitalist democracy—coming to the rescue of the Spanish republic when all its sister democracies had thrown it to the foe. The Soviet statement before the London Non-Intervention Committee that it does not consider itself "bound by the non-intervention agreement to any greater extent than the remaining participants" still leaves the way open to collective action. But it is a clear-cut declaration of Russia's intention to aid the government of Spain against fascist intervention. Already the Soviets have dispatched a number of shipments of sorely needed food and clothing, accompanied—according to the British—by motor lorries, airplanes, and munitions of war. The British charges may or may not be correct, but it is significant that all the alleged Soviet shipments occurred after the Russian note pointing to German and Italian violations and threatening to withdraw from the non-intervention agreement.

It is difficult to see how the Soviet Union, single-handed, can turn the tide of the Spanish war. Geographically, the Soviets are under a tremendous handicap as compared with Italy or Germany. The Baltic ports, which are nearest the chief industrial centers, will soon be closed for the winter. Russia has no navy to use in beating off attacks on its ships. The fascist countries have an added advantage in that they have already put huge quantities of supplies in the hands of the rebels. But if the Soviet Union should destroy the neutrality pact so that England and France could furnish munitions to the government, it would have achieved its purpose. Because of its geographic situation France is in a position to render almost unlimited assistance, and shipments of arms might well be supported by more direct aid on the part of working-class and anti-fascist groups who fear that victory for the Spanish reactionaries would be a signal for a fascist coup at home. The Soviet Union may not be able to jolt Blum sufficiently to cause him to abandon his non-intervention policy, and it may have acted too late to save Madrid from the Moors. But at least it acted when all the supposed friends of democracy were supine.

Sacred Cows in New Haven

IN 1917 Professor James McKeen Cattell was fired (let us not be too nice in these matters even though we are moving in the upper intellectual circles) from Columbia University for activities connected with our entrance into the World War. This action cost Columbia another of its most eminent professors, because Charles A. Beard resigned in protest. It remains to be seen whether Yale University will lose any of its staff as a result of its failure to reappoint Jerome Davis, associate professor in the Divinity School. For Professor Davis's case promises to equal that of Professor Cattell in its importance for professors who dare to twist the tails of a university's sacred cows.

When questioned on the Davis case, President Angell declared that the question of academic freedom was in no sense involved. It was purely a financial matter; even Yale has suffered from a reduction of the life stream of a modern university—hard cash. "Mr. Davis," President Angell's statement for the press added, "has always been accorded full freedom of speech and action both in the classroom and outside. Neither the action of the board of permanent officers of the Divinity School nor that of the corporation is based upon dissent from his views."

In the light of this unequivocal statement a brief review of the case is in order. Mr. Davis came to Yale as assistant professor in 1923, with assurances that his academic future was bright. In 1925 Dean Charles R. Brown wrote him that he had every reason to hope for promotion to a full professorship at the end of a three-year term. But it was not until 1930 that the Yale Corporation, on the unanimous recommendation of the Divinity School, promoted him to the rank of associate professor. Since then Mr. Davis's further promotion has been coming up periodically, with a good deal of acrimonious argument in between. The Yale Corporation has opposed it for some time; the President has not favored it; and a year ago the Divinity School itself refused to recommend more than reappointment at the same rank.

Things evidently had been happening to bring about this change of heart. On October 13, 1925, President Angell, in a conversation reported by Mr. Davis, "mentioned the public censure and possible dismissal which would result if extensive protests continued as a result of outside speeches." On December 28, 1925, the President chided him in a letter for "your apparently unqualified acceptance of the sort of material which Mr. Fay and Mr. Barnes [Sidney B. Fay and Harry Elmer Barnes] have been publishing on the responsibility for the war." On December 30, 1926, Howell Cheney, a member of the Yale Corporation, wrote to Dean Weigle of the Divinity School that "New Haven men are particularly exercised by Professor Davis's efforts to unionize the non-union factories and employees in New Haven." In November, 1927, President Angell received a letter from E. M. Roberts, president of Chase Roberts and Company of Long Island City, asking: "Do you think that a man who associates with and believes in Anarchist, Bolshevik, and Communist (different names but all mean anarchy) is a fit person to teach in Yale College?" (Mr. Roberts may represent the Yale point of view in politics; it is to be hoped that his is not typical of the Yale epistolary style.) Late in 1935 an outraged mother who preferred not to sign her name complained to Mr. Angell: "Jerome Davis turned my son against his God, his home—Father and Mother. Shame on Yale, paying traitors to ruin Americans!"

It is quite likely that every college president receives letters of this sort. But the best of them keep a wastebasket handy. President Angell, for some reason or other, let them get under his skin. Incident followed incident. But the denouement which Mr. Davis had been expecting for five years was at hand. Last January a committee of which Mr. Davis was chairman invited Senator Gerald P. Nye to speak at Yale. Senator Nye had just charged the late Woodrow Wilson with falsehood in connection with his testimony on the secret treaties. This, to a number of Yale alumni, was lèse majesté of an unforgivable sort. President Angell not only insisted that the lecture be canceled but wrote a letter—on January 15—to Dean Weigle which riddles his denial that academic freedom had anything to do with Mr. Davis's dismissal. "Here is another little piece of sand in the gear box," he wrote, "which comes to me from one of our outraged alumni, in Reading, Pennsylvania. I must say that I think Jerome is becoming an increasing nuisance and my patience is inevitably wearing rather thin."

Jerome Davis has been well known for many years as a speaker and writer in liberal causes. He championed the recognition of Soviet Russia long before such championship became respectable. He has been active in urging—although not, as charged, in organizing—trade-union activity. He has published many volumes which have received the critical approval of his professional peers. His students protest that he is a stimulating teacher, one who "fills an invaluable place on the campus." But the President of Yale University found him a nuisance. And as a result he was fired.

Portrait of a Nation

ALL tales from Indiana of Lazy Jeff and old Squirelly—those less well-known brothers of Paul Bunyan—pueblos in New Mexico, the Georgia barn that saw the birth of Eli Whitney's cotton gin, the New York sky line, logging in Wisconsin, tobacco-curing in South Carolina, gold-panning in Colorado, the legend of the origin of Uncle Sam, a white Colonial church in Connecticut—these and a vast collection of kindred material in text and pictures make up a portrait of a country in the WPA's "American Guide."

As the major undertaking of the Federal Writers' Project, the "Guide" was planned first of all to give work to unemployed writers, secondly to create a project on which their previous experience and training would not be wasted, and lastly to produce not an ephemeral boondoggle but something of intrinsic value. The scheme involves a description for each locality of its history, legend, people, topography, means of livelihood, architecture, and whatever other indigenous peculiarities go to make a living portrait. While there will be individual guides for each state, a condensed version for the country as a whole will be published this winter in six volumes representing six geographical divisions. A preliminary exhibition showing excerpts from the text and examples of the illustrations is now on view at the New York Public Library.

The stuff of America is in this exhibit, from our clipper-ship and covered-wagon past to our gasoline-station present. One gets an armchair view of the country from the photographs, some of which—the sand dunes of Death Valley in California, navy planes flying in double-V formation against the clouds, a wrought-iron gate in a Delaware churchyard—are superb. Particularly those by a WPA worker named Highton are as good as any photography, excluding portraiture, being done by Americans today. Although the text suffers from occasional baedekerisms, it retrieves itself nobly at other times. The nameless author of the chapter on Nebraska has the touch of a genuine historian as he projects himself back into pioneer days and feels the shock of an icy gale when a shack door blows open in the bitter wintertime. And a refreshing irreverence, rare in guidebooks, actually makes good reading of a description of MacMonnies's statue of Civic Virtue in City Hall Park.

Some 6,000 people have been at work on the "American Guide"—reporters, photographers, magazine writers, map-makers. When the project found them, one had been sleeping in subways for a week, one had taken his hat from an ashcan, one had had nothing to eat for three days and fainted when he received his first salary check. These men are now being given work, as nearly as possible fitted to their training, that keeps them employed from twenty-four to thirty-nine hours a week and pays a weekly wage of from $21 to $30. They have produced in the "Guide" a further proof that, whatever else has been the record of the Roosevelt Administration, the four arts projects are something in which it can take unqualified pride.

Will Moscow Save Madrid?

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Madrid, October 25, by Cable

ANXIETY over Madrid's fate mingles with the widespread conviction that the tide will soon be turning in the government's favor. Optimists believe that the rebels can be prevented from approaching the gates of the capital until the big offensive starts which will roll them back and force them to seek refuge in Portugal and Morocco. Pessimists contend that Madrid may fall, but that anti-fascists advancing from Valencia could soon retake Madrid and continue the struggle against General Franco. Since the protests of the Soviet Union to the Non-Intervention Committee, few non-fascists are ready to contemplate the failure of the government's cause.

If Madrid does not fall within ten days, the menace is probably ended. This week is the most critical period. Military experts maintain that the rebel column advancing along the Toledo road has the best chance to come within gunshot of Madrid streets. However, this column is said to number no more than 3,000, mostly Moors and foreign legionaries whose excellent equipment gives great driving power. They possess many machine-guns, mortars, field guns, and cavalry, and Italian caterpillar tanks capable of forty miles an hour. They are supported by airplanes, whereas the untrained government troops have only army rifles and cannon. The Loyalists have been without airplane support for the last fortnight, which is the chief reason for the enemy's advance. The fast tanks are also a formidable factor, although they achieve more by frightening than by destroying. Such a force might reach Madrid but could not take it. It would be annihilated in house-to-house fighting. Therefore unless Madrid succumbs to complete panic, there is no reason to suppose that the city is lost.

Since morale is the determining factor, it is important that the last five days have witnessed a recrudescence of the early élan which not only is unspoiled but has perhaps been enhanced by the appearance last Friday of four giant foreign airplanes which raked suburban streets with machine-guns, killing a child and four adults. Five days ago a thousand Andalusian volunteers carrying their own rifles arrived in Madrid in autobuses and asked to be sent to the front. On Friday eighteen hundred teachers mobilized by their trade unions paraded the streets. They still wore mufti, but their marching showed the effect of military training and their enthusiasm was keen. Other trade unions are also mobilizing their members for war, putting women in their places. An hour after Friday's third airplane visit long contingents of fresh soldiers defiled through the avenues. The Communist "fifth regiment," which is really an army twenty-five thousand strong, has been able to retain part of its politically skilled soldiery in Madrid for the emergency. Valencia has sent troops to Barcelona for munitions.

The republic's new foreign legion—composed mostly of French, but also of Italians, Germans, and Poles who are motivated by political hopes and not merely by the promise of adventure or loot—is mostly concentrated in the eastern provinces. This constitutes a valuable reserve. As I write, on Sunday evening, I hear drums beating and men marching to the front. Yet no danger, however frightful, can rob Madrid of its gay Sunday mood. Crowds are promenading in the clear warm sunshine; cafes are overflowing. Even the two rebel airplanes which flew over the center of town fifty minutes ago failed to dampen the spirits of the inhabitants. Judging by previous performances the rebels, if they became masters of Madrid, will slaughter tens of thousands of persons. But even the probable victims wore a carefree air. The Spaniard is a natural optimist; a blue spot in the sky dissipates all clouds for him. This time the spot looks large, for if the Loyalists' hopes are warranted, Spain is indeed guaranteed against militarist-fascist domination. Should the salvation of the republic be achieved quickly, the European repercussions might be small, but a protracted struggle would invite further Italian-German assistance to the rebels, in which case the possibilities are too terrible to contemplate.

The recent dictum of Foreign Minister Del Vayo, "The bloody battlefields of Spain are actually the battlefields of the next world war," was intended as a poetic prophecy, but the second phase may follow so soon that his words will become an immediate reality. On the other hand, Stalin's important political acts are always characterized by prudence and circumspection. Somebody had to call Hitler's and Mussolini's bluff if the world is to be relieved of the chicanery of their deeds and diplomacy. Victory for the Spanish rebels would not only so strengthen the fascist camps as to make inevitable a world war of territorial aggrandizement, plus the extinction of liberty everywhere; it would give carte blanche to the fascists to defy international law and the national interests of European countries. It would be Blum's political death warrant and would provide serious damage to the interests of the British Empire. That neither Blum nor the British bourgeoisie is capable of adopting a policy reflecting these certainties is a criterion of the impotence of the forces hitherto regarded as potentially anti-fascist. The Soviet Union, therefore, is compelled to seize the initiative and point the way. It is possible that Stalin is rescuing the British Empire; it is possible that he is saving Blum and the French Popular Front from themselves. Victory for the Spanish government would be the first fascist setback in Europe for years. It would check fascist arrogance and be a signal triumph for world peace.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Farley Captures Labor

Washington, October 25

THE dullest Presidential campaign of the post-war years will be near its end when these words are read, and the polls will be yawning to receive the millions of votes that will give Franklin D. Roosevelt an even more overwhelming mandate to power than he received in 1932, unless all the factors that have created political victories in the past prove meaningless this year. At the moment Landon looks like an odds-on bet in only two states, Maine and Vermont, and worth even-money backing in less than half a dozen others, including his own Kansas. Even Hearst has given up the battle. Early this past week Hearst sent a confidential "rush" wire to all his editors ordering them thenceforth to play down political news and be strictly impartial; the word "Landon" immediately became something of a rarity on front pages of Hearst papers, whose reporters until this week had been estopped from writing anything that suggested even indirectly the possibility of Roosevelt's reelection.

More important than the indications of a Roosevelt victory are the indications that the Democrats will retain all their Senate seats and possibly add one or two more, and that the Republicans at best cannot hope to capture more than fifty new House seats. The signs also point toward the Democrats retaining a majority of the governorships, and this, together with retention of their Congressional majorities, should leave them strongly entrenched against the Republican drive for power in the elections of 1938.

It has been a disappointing campaign in many respects but in none more so than in the failure to provide the third-party movement with the headway that had been expected. Labor's Non-Partisan League, which started out as the most promising step toward a farmer-labor party that this country has seen, winds up the campaign as a mere adjunct of the Democratic National Committee, and the Progressive National Committee emerges, in turn, as a mere adjunct of Labor's Non-Partisan League. Neither group has dared to seek commitments from Roosevelt in keeping with its aims, and neither has dared to insist upon a clarification of campaign issues. As Norman Thomas has said, both groups have put themselves in the position of praying: "Please don't tell us, Mr. Roosevelt, what you will do if reelected, for then we might not be able to vote for you so happily; leave us hope at least." The Progressive Committee's function has been little more than that of a lecture bureau, providing dignified and high-toned speakers for billings that the Democratic National Committee itself is unwilling or unable to fill. It has been just as much a false-front organization as the Liberty League or the Sentinels of the Republic.

Labor's Non-Partisan League, on the other hand, unquestionably has been a power in the campaign. Its efficient, high-speed operations have silenced and impressed the veteran political writers who at the outset jeered at the league and its theory that labor's vote could be organized and delivered. These writers come back to Washington from forays into the sticks jabbering, as if they had seen miracles, of evidence of the league machinery reaching down into wards and precincts in workman-like fashion and shouldering out the Democratic or Republican machines there. They also report that the league is fulfilling its promise to spend between $500,000 and $1,000,000 in its campaign. But it has been a campaign simply to reelect Roosevelt, and most of the league's founders who embarked upon that campaign as a first strategic step toward the formation of a third party have in the interim lost their heads and become hysterically orthodox supporters of the status quo. To hear them cursing Norman Thomas with the violence of a Streicher cursing the Jews is to lose all faith in their ability to return the league to the path on which it started. They are now justifying their position and expenditures in the campaign on the ground that Roosevelt has saved their unions a lot of money. They tell you how many millions it cost their treasuries in strike benefits under the Old Deal to get shorter hours, how it cost them nothing to get still shorter hours under the NRA, and how in this campaign they are simply repaying Roosevelt for favors done in the past and asking nothing for the future. Their position is on a par with that of bankers, brokers, and industrialists except that in the case of the business men campaign contributions are usually liens upon the future rather than payment for the past.

And what has the league gained? Can it actually be said to have demonstrated the political solidarity of labor? There remains a large doubt as to the league's ability to do for a genuine labor candidate what it has done for Roosevelt. It has run with the tide. It has championed a candidate who might have won without its help. Risking all for Roosevelt, it has not had the courage to test its strength by entering the Congressional jousts in truly non-partisan support of labor candidates, Republican, Democratic, Progressive, Independent, Socialist, Farmer-Labor, or Communist. The result is that, outside New York, it will be impossible to gauge the league's strength by the returns. Even in New York, where a league offshoot, the American Labor Party, will have a place on the ballot, it will be difficult to estimate the part that labor's vote has played in the campaign, for the American Labor Party has backed away from its early promise to enter its own Congressional and local candidates and offers to the electorate a ticket bearing the names of only Roosevelt and Lehman. It will be impossible to say that this or that Congressional candidate was elected because labor wanted him and was voting in its own interest rather than in that of the party of Joe Robinson, Pat Harrison, Bilbo, Carter Glass, Curley, Copeland, Frank Hague, Pat Nash, Farley, Cummings, and Roosevelt. And why didn't the American Labor Party fill out its ticket and buck the major-party candidates in the Congressional districts of New York? Because it owed allegiance not to labor but to Roosevelt, and Roosevelt, doubting labor's political strength, preferred the support of the old-line machines, which might have been antagonized if his supporters in the American Labor Party had invaded their domains.

For the men and women who this year have deserted more progressive and radical causes to back Roosevelt as a necessary preventive of fascist reaction in this country, it must be a little disconcerting to discover Roosevelt's gang supporting the fascists in Spain. That is precisely what they are doing in distributing, under the imprimatur of the Democratic National Committee, thousands of copies of a recent radio address by the Reverend John A. Ryan. Father Ryan's speech was mainly a denunciation of Coughlin and a defense of the New Dealers against the charge that they are Communists, but in it he advocated the overthrow of the constitutional government of Spain. I seem to recall that about a year ago Mr. Roosevelt sent a thunderous note to Moscow merely because a citizen of the United States—not of the U. S. S. R.—had seemed to advocate the overthrow of our government in a speech before the Comintern. In the present instance he has not, so far as can be learned, even sent a note of protest to Jim Farley. The American Friends of Spanish Democracy, under the chairmanship of Bishop Robert L. Paddock of New York, have just served upon both Roosevelt and Farley a demand that they disavow and repudiate Father Ryan's attack on the Spanish government and his expression of "unhesitating" preference for Italian fascism as against Russian communism. Various labor leaders supporting Roosevelt, including John L. Lewis, and a number of high Administration officials sought to have these passages cut from Father Ryan's address before it was delivered. They succeeded only in getting Father Ryan to change his preference from fascism in general to Italian fascism, barring Hitlerite fascism because of its anti-Semitism. Their second attempt, made after the speech had been delivered, succeeded only in getting Father Ryan to amplify his remarks for the reprints with an expression of opposition to totalitarian states in general. Incidentally, the speech itself, with its "Thank God, they [the Spanish fascists] now seem likely to be successful," was delivered under the auspices of the Good Neighbor League, set up with the financial aid of the Democratic National Committee to enlist for President Roosevelt the support of clergymen, educators, social workers, and pacifists.

Pennsylvania Hits the Roosevelt Trail

BY JESSE LAVENTHOL

Harrisburg, October 26

NOT since 1856, when Pennsylvania cast its electoral votes for James Buchanan, a native son, has the majority of its citizens supported a Democratic Presidential nominee. In that span of eighty years, marked simultaneously by the expansion of industry and the rise to political power of an industrial and financial oligarchy, the Pennsylvania record of straight Republicanism in national elections has been broken only once. Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 led Woodrow Wilson and William Howard Taft, although he polled a minority of the total votes cast.

Today the keystone of the G. O. P. arch, its mortar eroded by the election of a Democratic Governor and United States Senator two years ago, is on the verge of being torn loose. The temptations—and the risks—of political prophecy are normally great, particularly with regard to Pennsylvania, where skulduggery at the ballot-box has been for years a notorious and highly developed art. However, careful analysis of the registration and voting trends of recent years, the writer's personal knowledge of local situations and his contacts with voters who are not politicians, assays of public estimates and private admissions of leaders on both sides, all weighed together with the results of so-called straw polls, justify the conclusion that President Roosevelt will carry Pennsylvania.

Not the least of the psychological elements contributing to the miraculous metamorphosis of Penn's Commonwealth is the conviction of the voter today that, at long last, he is somebody. Never has he been so wooed, cajoled, flattered. It is all delightfully intoxicating to one who in the not far distant past was accustomed to being almost completely ignored. In the days of unquestioned Republican dominance the Pennsylvania voter was solicited only at primary time. During Presidential campaigns he was virtually disregarded; Republicans took him for granted, and Democrats thought to notice him would be a waste of time. Today Pennsylvania voters have been visited by Messrs. Landon, Hoover, Coughlin, Smith—and Knox, several times—on behalf of the G. O. P. The Kansan, who formally opened his campaign in the West Middlesex village where he was born, will stop off at Philadelphia on his final tour. Mr. Roosevelt accepted the nomination at Philadelphia, made triumphal tours through the anthracite counties in the northeast and the neighborhood of Johnstown in the west as part of his "non-political" flood-control survey, and delivered an important campaign address at Pittsburgh. He too will probably return to Pennsylvania before election. In the interim Governor George H. Earle, first Democratic Executive in more than forty years, is burning up the hustings at the head of an army of state leaders, federal Cabinet members, diplomatic officials, and outside Senators and Congressmen, pleading the New Deal cause.

The largest number of citizens in the state's history, approximately 4,900,000, have registered to vote. Complete official figures probably will not be available before Election Day, but returns from forty-seven of the sixty-seven counties indicate that the division of the total will approximate: Republicans, 2,750,000; Democrats, 1,900,000; with the remainder distributed among non-partisans and a half-dozen minor parties. For the Democrats this is an all-time peak, an increase of more than 1,000,000 since 1928 and 1932, of a half-million since 1934, when Governor Earle and Senator Guffey were elected, and of 200,000 over last year's local-election registration. For the Republicans their estimated total represents a loss of 100,000 since 1928, of 150,000 since 1932. It is an increase of about 125,000 since the fateful state election of two years ago and of slightly less than 120,000 over last year's figures. Obviously, the novelty of a strong minority challenging the supremacy of a party long in power has dispelled the lassitude of many citizens. This reawakening of the electorate proves that in the past their lack of interest was the meat upon which the Quay, Penrose, and Vare machines fed.

In this unprecedented roll of eligible voters the Republican registration lead has been cut from 2,000,000 in 1928 and 1932 and 1,200,000 in 1934 to about 650,000. In 1932, in spite of the imposing Republican predominance, Herbert Hoover's plurality over Roosevelt was only 157,592; in 1934 Earle beat former Attorney General William A. Schnader, the G. O. P. nominee, by 66,000. The Republicans contend that four years ago their showing was good in view of the tremendous anti-Hoover vote in the country generally; and that Earle two years later rode with Guffey the crest of a New Deal wave said to be now receding. On the other hand, Democratic partisans point to a constantly rising total of open adherents and maintain that if their cause were on the down-grade those persons who have heretofore been voting Democratic while registering Republican would hesitate to switch party labels.

As the total enrolment has increased, the Democratic vote has increased and the Republican vote has diminished. This is doubtless partly due to the fact, established by straw polls, that the bulk of young men and women just attaining their majority are supporting the New Deal. Census authorities estimate that about 750,000 have reached voting age in Pennsylvania since 1932. Of course, not all of these have registered, and if they had they would not account for the entire increase. There is the item of state patronage, of which there is a vast amount with more than 18,000 state employees, and there is federal patronage, which Senator Guffey as a practical politician does not overlook.

The abnormal disparity between party registration and the percentage of registration actually polled is being reduced as the voters tend to enrol under the banner of their true allegiance. Democratic candidates, garnering support in the opposition ranks, received votes 23 per cent, 50 per cent, and 5 per cent in excess of their party registration in 1928, 1932, and 1934 respectively. A vital question this year is whether or not this reserve has been liquidated. Republicans assert that registration today represents the true relative strength of the parties. In addition they charge that many WPA workers have been coerced into switching to the Democrats, and they hope that this alleged pressure has created a resentment among relief-project workers that will cause them to vote Republican. Democrats with equal assurance point to evidences of influence exercised by private employers to keep many workers unwillingly enlisted under the G. O. P. standard and count on an indefinite but apparently substantial number of these workers voting for Roosevelt.

Hot inter-party local fights in 1931 carried Republican enrolment to a record height of 2,963,738. The decline thereafter was steady to the lowest point of 2,624,386 in 1934, when the party lost control of the state government. Last year's slight upturn was the first in four years. Now another gradual advance has occurred. That a party out of power, with nothing in the way of patronage to offer its followers, should gain adherents is a matter that bears watching. The resurgence, if such the increase denotes, is not strong enough, however, to betoken more than a stimulated organizational activity that cannot bear fruit before the 1938 elections.

The indications are that Roosevelt will have a minimum net lead of 150,000 votes in the twenty-three counties west of the Alleghenies, most of it supplied in Pittsburgh and the five surrounding counties by the miners and the mill workers of that thickly populated bituminous and steel region. That lead will be increased in the anthracite fields and still further in a half-dozen traditionally Democratic eastern counties, which will emphasize their party loyalty more strongly than ever this year. The Republicans must offset this advantage, if they are to win, in the central rural counties, outside the Philadelphia line. The prospects are anything but bright that the G. O. P. can do it this year with the Democrats making inroads in those very counties in which their foes must make their best showing.

The President will lead the Democratic ticket, of course; the fate of many candidates will hinge on whether he wins a sweeping victory or runs a close race with Landon. The state legislature has been racked during the last two years by struggles between a Democratic House and a Republican Senate. Liberal social and labor measures passed by the lower branch under administration sponsorship have been killed as fast as they reached the Senate. Control of the latter body is almost certain to pass to the Democrats for the first time in a half-century since the hold-over half comprises sixteen Democrats and nine Republicans; the G. O. P., therefore, is concentrating on the lower house.

Congressional contests in the districts now represented by Dennis J. Driscoll and Patrick J. Boland are attracting national interest. Driscoll is the object of an open campaign of vengeance by the utilities, which are seeking his scalp because of his exposé of their use of fake telegrams in the battle against the Holding Company Act. Senator Hugo Black, chairman of the committee which investigated the Hopson lobby, and Representative Sam Rayburn of Texas, co-sponsor of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, are aiding Driscoll's campaign. Boland is a special target of Father Coughlin, whom he denounced on the floor of Congress during the feud between the priest and Representative O'Connor. Coughlin's invasion of Boland's district in the hard-coal region was followed by President Roosevelt's visit, during which he gave the Congressman the benefit of a public ride in the Presidential automobile.

Pennsylvania's Senate has long been notorious as a slaughter-house for progressive legislation. The election of the incumbent Governor was in part a protest against this record. But even in the last two sessions, minimum-wage, maximum-hour, railroad full-crew, and miners'-certificate bills have been ruthlessly killed. Measures to revamp an outmoded workmen's-compensation law so as to extend its benefits to victims of occupational diseases, to ban the hiring of deputy sheriffs by private companies, and to revise the state's archaic constitution have all met their end in this chamber. To top off the record the Senate majority killed the administration's bill qualifying the state to participate in the unemployment-insurance phase of the federal Social Security Act and setting up a co-ordinate state system out of taxes to be credited against the 1 per cent federal levy. As a result, no benefits will accrue to Pennsylvania workers from the proceeds of the $23,000,000 in taxes which must be paid anyway.

The Pennsylvania branch of Labor's Non-Partisan League, headed by Patrick T. Fagan, western district president of the United Mine Workers, is organized down to the last voting precinct in every one of the urban, industrialized counties. Its energetic campaign was one of the main factors in the increased Democratic enrolment. John A. Phillips, president of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, is resident vice-chairman at the Capitol. The largest unions participating in the drive for Roosevelt are the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and the American Federation of Full-Fashioned Hosiery Workers. The Railroad brotherhoods have indorsed Roosevelt and are active in his behalf.

But after all, the weightiest Roosevelt argument is recovery, and it is the one which his opponents find it most difficult to gainsay. Federal and state reports show 3,064,000 wage-earners at work in Pennsylvania industries in September as against 2,342,000 in March, 1933, a reemployment record of 722,000 in the three-and-a-half-year interval. Relief rolls are shorter today than at any other time since the Pennsylvania Emergency Relief Board was established in September, 1932. This is due to rising private employment and a shift of employables to the WPA, which has more than 240,000 on its rolls and has expended $195,000,000. Federal agencies, including the WPA, have expended approximately $700,000,000 in Pennsylvania since 1932. These comprise all the emergency units such as the FERA, whose bounties to the state ceased last December, the CCC, with more than a score of camps in the state forests, the HOLC, the AAA, the NYA, the FHA, the RFC, and so on. Their expenditures have contributed indirectly to a huge rise in purchasing power, which is reflected in increased industrial activity and profits.

British Labor and World Crisis

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, October 13

I

TO SEE the Labor Party's conference at Edinburgh in proper perspective it is essential to remember the circumstances in which it was held. It was the first conference since the last general election in which the progress of the party toward power was definitely disappointing. It was the first conference, also, since the party had learned, from the Hoare-Laval conversations, what comes of an even conditional support for the National Government. It met after Nürnberg had shown decisively the will to war that is the foundation of Hitler's policy. It met while the fascist rebels in Spain, openly helped by Hitler and Mussolini, were multiplying successes against the Spanish workers, whom a policy of non-intervention, mainly due to Great Britain, had deprived of the arms to which they had a legal right. It met with the knowledge that the relentless pressure of Japanese imperialism on China had entered upon a new phase of insolent attack. It met, also, when the future of the League of Nations was obviously dark even to the most ardent of its supporters.

Domestically, the situation was grave. Nothing had been done for the distressed areas. The tragedies of the means test were to be continued by the new Regulations. The greatest living authority on unemployment statistics—Sir William Beveridge—had just warned the country that a new depression was approaching. An Education Act had just been placed on the statute-book which every authority in the country had combined to denounce as evasive trickery. The armaments program had meant a boom on the Stock Exchange; but all over Great Britain, while wealth accumulated, men were decaying.

Such an atmosphere called for certain obvious things. (1) A clear lead was required. It was vital not merely for this country but for the whole world to know where the Labor Party stood on the vital issues of the day. (2) The maximum unity in the working-class movement was required. At this time of all times a movement so united that it could take the offensive was essential. (3) Realism was required. The mind of the conference should have been directed not to the possible result of a general election three or four years hence but to the immediate shadow of war and fascism which now bestrides the world.

II

No one can say that these requirements were met at Edinburgh. The rearmament resolution was a muddled compromise. It meant one thing to Mr. Dalton, who moved it in a speech which seemed to imply full support for the government's program combined with contempt for its members. Mr. Morrison interpreted the resolution quite differently. Mr. Bevin protested against Mr. Morrison's interpretation. Both Mr. Lansbury and Lord Arnold pleaded for absolute pacifism; the latter seemed to speak as if Lord Beaverbrook were the one sane guide on international policy in a mad world. Lord Strabolgi explained that the National Government must be allowed to rearm now since a subsequent Labor government might need arms if and when it was in office; what this government would do with the arms before that time he did not think fit to inquire. No one, at the end, knew what the resolution meant. In a speech intended to bring clarity from confusion Mr. Atlee seemed to conclude that its meaning would later be decided by the parliamentary party when the House of Commons met.

The position on Spain was less muddled in result, though it showed weakness and hesitation. On Monday, despite bitter protests from the delegates, the block votes of the trade unions secured a big majority for non-intervention. On Wednesday the delegates heard from two Spanish comrades what non-intervention in fact meant. Mr. Atlee and Mr. Greenwood were then dispatched to London to consult with Mr. Chamberlain. As a result, the conference agreed on Friday that if the non-intervention agreement was found to be either ineffective or violated, the Spanish government should be given back its right to purchase arms. It should be said that all the evidence which produced the new decision on Friday was available to the conference when it took its first decision.

Three-quarters of the conference voted against the admission of the Communist Party to the ranks of Labor. The debate was farcical, and not even honestly so. It was deliberately closed by the executive, after some half-dozen speeches, on the pretext that the Spanish delegates must be heard. The arguments used for exclusion were pitiful. They were (1) that Communists are hypocritical in applying for application; (2) that they are too unimportant to risk alienating other parts of the electorate; (3) that, if admitted, they will swamp the party conferences; (4) that they believe in dictatorship and not in democracy as the Labor Party does; (5) that they are dominated by Moscow. A word on these arguments is desirable. On the first, Mr. Lawther reported the experience of the Miners' Federation in an exactly opposite sense; and many other organizations would speak—as they have resolved—in the same way. In any case, proof of the Communists' sincerity depends upon an attempt to work with them. The second and third arguments cancel each other; if the Communist Party is so unimportant, how could it dominate the party? The fourth argument is a mere blind. The issue is deliberately framed so as to mislead. No Communist, to my knowledge, believes in dictatorship for its own sake. He argues that the capitalist class will overthrow democracy rather than accept socialism, and that a proletarian dictatorship will prove the necessary vehicle of capitalist defeat. The fifth objection seems to me more solidly grounded. I think the Communist Party's affiliation with the Third International is a definite stumbling-block unless the party agrees that, after admission to the Labor Party, it will accept the latter's decisions in preference to any made at Moscow. But I should myself hope that such an agreement would end the present divisions of the international working class and lead to the creation of that world united front that is now an urgent matter.

Closely related to the refusal to admit the Communists was the decision to reorganize the League of Youth. This was done to remove from the latter body certain members who, seemingly, were dissatisfied with executive policy and dared to criticize it emphatically. This was represented as disloyalty, and the officials will, accordingly, be able to produce a tame league responsive only to what the executive sees fit to indorse. This decision seems to me a disastrous one.

There is one other debate to which reference must be made—that on the distressed areas. Three resolutions directed attention to their special problems, and grim pictures were drawn of their citizens. The growth of malnutrition, the increase in maternal morbidity and tuberculosis were emphasized. But there was no response to the one concrete suggestion made—that the party should put all its weight behind the marchers from Jarrow. What moves the government is not investigation—we have had that almost to the point of nausea—but such a depth of public feeling that they become convinced that defeat is the consequence of inaction. I cannot discover in the conference resolutions one principle, one method, which will cause this government a moment's discomfort. Only profound national agitation can be effective in Whitehall; as I read the debate in Edinburgh, I could not but feel that this was an art the Labor Party had lost.

III

The leadership at Edinburgh was fumbling and incompetent. There was no sense of direction. There was no clarity of purpose. There was no message to the country which would convey a sense that a change in the constitution of the government would alter the perspective of affairs. Over it all there reigned a timidity grimly like that which proved the downfall of the two Labor governments. There was, above all, a lack of realism before the great events that confront us. For surely the experience of the post-war years has made certain propositions unmistakably clear. They are:

1. Capitalism and democracy are no longer compatible with each other. They are engaged in a death struggle. And the main factor in the defeat of democracy is a divided working class. Where this exists, capitalism is always in a position to take the offensive. Where it does so, it is able to establish a dictatorship which can only be overthrown by revolutionary means.

What is the answer of the leaders of the Labor Party to this view? That we are not like the Germans? That was what the Germans said of Italian fascism. That a Labor victory at the polls would be a safeguard against capitalist attack? But, with the present temper of our leadership, what is the prospect of victory at the next election? And even if we won, are not the constitutional problems involved so delicate and dangerous as to risk all the fruits of victory? More, after Spain is it not clear that no reliance can be placed upon a governing class to accept the consequences of its defeat? Is there, in fact, any way to victory except a policy which, built upon a united Labor movement, meets the capitalist challenge with a full recognition of all it may involve?

The alternative is the acceptance of the theory of the "community consciousness" upon which MacDonald acted when he was Labor Prime Minister. It is a theory which involves cooperation with, instead of a break from, capitalism. It means an emphasis upon social reform—where this is financially feasible—to the exclusion of any Socialist measures which capitalism is unprepared to accept. And from it there emerges the certainty of another 1931.

2. The contradictions of capitalism mean imperialist war. This is plainly implicit in the policy of the fascist powers. It is futile to think that we can keep out of such a war. The only way to prevent it is by an alliance with those powers which have no interest in aggression and a warning to the fascist powers that any attempt on their part to change frontiers by force will be met with force on our part in concert with our allies. A British pact with France and Soviet Russia, which would be open to other powers similarly prepared to resist aggression, justifies rearmament against the menace of fascism. No other policy can justify it; for it is clear from the Sino-Japanese struggle and the Italo-Ethiopian conflict that the National Government is not prepared to take any action which may endanger the stability of the fascist powers.

3. To maintain the doctrine of non-intervention in Spain is indefensible. It is being violated every day by Germany, Italy, and Portugal. Its result is simply to reinforce the authority of fascism by persuading fascist nations that they can intrigue for the overthrow of any constitutional government so long as they threaten war. The Labor Party ought to be clear that our own fate, as well as that of France, is being decided on the battlefield of Spain. The victory of General Franco will bring a world war a long step nearer. His defeat will renew the prestige of constitutional government all over the world. The only way to bring about his defeat is to allow the Spanish government its right in international law to purchase arms. The denial of that right means surrender to the most dangerous maneuver the fascist powers have yet invented. For it is to allow them to finance and organize civil war in order to extend their empire over Western civilization.

This, let me add, is the only policy of collective security which has now any meaning. It is in full accord with the principles of the League. It recognizes—what is the fact—that the principles of the League have now no meaning for the fascist powers. It emphasizes that aggression on their part will not take place against an isolated opponent but against the most highly equipped alliance that can be arrayed against them. Once they understand this, they will hesitate; and once they hesitate, the initiative in international policy will pass to the powers which have no interest in aggression. That will be the beginning of the end of fascism. It is therefore the duty of the Labor Party deliberately to inform the country that since fascism and peace are no longer compatible ideas, these are the principles upon which it is prepared to defend peace. And it is its duty to make it plain to the National Government that on any other principles its rearmament program will meet with unrelenting opposition from the forces of Labor.

IV

For anyone who realizes how vital is the time factor in the present juncture of affairs, Edinburgh is inevitably a disheartening experience. But the lesson from it is the need to redouble our efforts for unity and not to slacken them. There is plenty of evidence to show that the decisions made there are far from representing either the ideas or the mood of the rank and file. We must use the next twelve months to reshape the Labor Party into a fighting instrument of the working-class movement. But to do this, we must induce the party to adopt consciously a social philosophy which recognizes the nature of the battle in which we are engaged. Until the movement has such a philosophy it can adopt neither the strategy nor the tactics required by the situation. Its present drift arises precisely because such a social philosophy is absent. The leaders of the Labor Party think of themselves as an opposition which can inherit the mantle of office from the government in precisely the same way as the Conservatives used to inherit it from the Liberals. They forget that the classic form of representative government only worked in this country because Conservatives and Liberals alike accepted the private ownership of the means of production as the postulate upon which all their fundamental policies were built. The Labor Party rejects that postulate. Its accession to power would therefore raise problems for those who believe in capitalism different in kind from those to which we have been accustomed in the years since 1689. Either the Labor Party must adapt its technique to the faith it is supposed to hold or it must reveal itself for what it otherwise is—a revised form of the Liberal Party which wants larger social reforms in the periods of upward trend in the trade cycle. If it decides to be the latter, it is then clear that Socialists have no place in its membership. For socialism is a method of action as well as an ultimate goal; and its method of action is built upon the recognition that the historic mission of the working class is to capture the state and so end the private ownership of the means of production. The whole technique of socialism as a living philosophy flows from that pivotal insight. The lesson of Edinburgh is, I suggest, that we must either convert the Labor Party to its acceptance or, through new instruments, find the way to that goal which is now alone capable of giving mankind the peace and plenty which science has made the rightful heritage of our generation.

Europe's Fate and the French Front

By ROBERT DELL

Geneva, October 17

AS I LEFT last May the memorable congress of the French Socialist Party at which Léon Blum's consent to form the government of the People's Front was approved, I confess that I was deeply moved. For thirty years—ever since I settled in Paris—I had followed the fortunes of the party and watched it gradually increasing in numbers and influence, and for several years I had been a member of it, and now at last it was taking office for the first time, not indeed in a Socialist government but as part of a coalition of all the forces of the left. The enthusiasm of that congress was infectious. In a remarkable speech free from rhetoric or demagoguery Blum had clearly exposed the situation. He had warned his fellow-Socialists not to expect too much from a government which would not be a Socialist government and would take office to carry out a program common to all the parties forming the People's Front, which was not and could not be a Socialist program. It was, he said, an experiment—a first and a last experiment. They were going to see whether it was possible to do anything in a capitalist society, since they were not yet in a position to destroy capitalism. If the experiment failed, he would come back and tell them so and it would be for them to draw the conclusions.

At the end of the speech, sober and intellectual as it was, the delegates rose to their feet and, with clenched fists raised, sang the International with an enthusiasm that brought tears to the eyes of some of us. As I walked away from the hall in which the congress was held with my old Communist friend, Charles Rappoport, we asked each other whether the experiment was likely to succeed. In every European country where the Socialist Party had been in office it had failed. Would the French Socialist Party stand the test? We both felt that there was reason to hope that it would. Now, less than five months later, the failure of the government of the People's Front is patent, and the People's Front itself is in danger of disruption. Perhaps it would have been different if the government had been a coalition of Socialists and Communists only. It is impossible to say, but it is certain that one of the causes of the failure is that from the first Léon Blum has had the Radical millstone round his neck. But for that, one can hardly believe that he would have damped down the extraordinary wave of revolutionary feeling that swept over France. That movement was not revolutionary in its aims, but its spirit and methods were revolutionary. It was, so to speak, a dress rehearsal, and it was above all a symptom of the change in the temper of the French people. Last winter France appeared to be under the domination of fear. In June the fear of Hitler had gone and the French people had recovered their self-respect and their courage. The revolutionary spirit in France has never been pacifist.

It is in the domain of foreign policy that the failure of the government of the People's Front has been most conspicuous and disastrous. So far as foreign policy is concerned, it is the weakest and most incapable government that France has had since the war. Its foreign policy has followed the general lines of that of Laval, with all the worst elements in Laval's policy accentuated. And whereas Laval at least knew what he was doing, it is only too evident that the present French government do not know what they are doing or where they are being led. The British Foreign Office has them completely in tow, and the real Foreign Minister of France is Sir Robert Vansittart, who has discovered that when persuasion fails he can always get his way by bullying. The weakness of the French government has been particularly evident during the recent Assembly of the League of Nations in Geneva. So much so that even members of the British delegation would have preferred at least a little more show of independence on the part of their victims. It is not pleasant for the British government to be saddled with all the responsibility for what is supposed to be a joint policy, nor is it to the interest of Great Britain that France should cease to count as a factor in European politics, as is actually the case. I deeply regret to have to say this, for I have known both Blum and Delbos for years, and for Blum, in particular, my feeling is one of affection.

No doubt the present French government came into a difficult heritage. The British policy of buying off gangster governments by concessions culminated in the capitulation to Hitler when he violated the Treaty of Locarno on March 7 and the capitulation to Mussolini in the Abyssinian affair. The blunder made by the Sarraut Cabinet in not mobilizing on March 7—it is now known that a French mobilization would have led to the immediate withdrawal of the German troops from the demilitarized zone—has had irrevocable consequences, but these also might have been averted. It may safely be said that had the present French government adopted from the first a firm policy towards Germany, France would not have lost Belgium and would not now be in danger of losing all her other Continental friends and allies. At the time of the Hoare-Laval plan (which was really the Vansittart plan) a representative of an Eastern European state allied to France—not Soviet Russia—said: "This plan suggests that England and France are afraid of Hitler and Mussolini. If that be so, we shall have to reconsider our position, for Germany and Italy will become the dominant powers on the Continent." The government that he represented is now reconsidering its position, and it is not the only one that is doing so.

After the visit of Léon Blum and Yvon Delbos to London in July, visitors to the Foreign Office were told, "We have never had to do with French ministers so easy to deal with." In London Blum and Delbos made the grievous mistake of agreeing to overlook Hitler's insulting refusal to reply to the British questions and of accepting the "Locarno" conference, although Hitler had made it plain that he would accept no settlement with France unless the Franco-Soviet pact were denounced. In my opinion, the "Locarno" conference is a trap laid for France by the British Foreign Office. When the conference meets, if it ever does meet, England, Germany, and Italy will join in bringing pressure on France to abandon the Franco-Soviet pact and give Hitler a free hand in Central and Eastern Europe—which is Sir Robert Vansittart's policy—and if the French refuse, they will be denounced as the obstacle to a Western agreement and a danger to peace. As Delbos, under the influence of the British Foreign Office and certain permanent officials of the Quai d'Orsay, in particular M. Massigli, has been won over to the Vansittart policy and has become definitely anti-Soviet, Blum will stand alone.

It was during the visit to London that the British government proposed the policy of "non-intervention" in Spain—that is, the policy of intervention against the Spanish government. Delbos was won over to it at once, but Blum was strongly opposed to it. Soon afterward the British Ambassador in Paris informed Blum that if Germany attacked France because the Spanish government obtained war material from France, the British government would not consider it an "unprovoked attack" within the meaning of the Treaty of Locarno and therefore would not go to the aid of France. Even this did not shake Blum, who must have recognized that the British government was bluffing. Apart from the extreme improbability of a German attack on France on such a pretext, the British government would always go to the aid of France in the event of a German invasion because it will never tolerate Germany at Calais. Between August 2 and August 8, however, the leading Radical members of the French Cabinet, including Delbos, Daladier, and Chautemps, threatened to resign unless France at once put an embargo on the export of arms and war material to Spain without even waiting for other countries to take the same course. Blum then yielded. Evidently he was in an extremely difficult position, for the resignation of the Radical ministers would probably have brought down the government. He appears to have thought that this would be a greater evil than the Spanish embargo. I cannot think that he was right. Apart from any considerations of loyalty and international solidarity, it cannot be doubted that we are faced with a new form of aggression. Instead of attacking Republican Spain from without, Hitler and Mussolini have adopted the method of attacking it from within by supporting insurrection and civil war. If they succeed in Spain, they will apply the same method in other countries, one after the other. Before long the British government may be joining with Germany and Italy in a "non-intervention" agreement concerning France, or Belgium, or some other country. Blum might perhaps have accepted the Radical resignations, filled the places of the resigning ministers, and if he failed to get a majority in the Chamber, asked the consent of the Senate to a dissolution. Failing that consent, it might have been necessary to resort to unconstitutional methods, but it is at least possible that he could have detached enough Radicals from their party to keep a majority in the Chamber, especially if he had revealed the facts about the British pressure. It is time that such things were made public.

Flushed with their success in the matter of the Rhineland, the British forced the French to agree to the unconditional suppression of sanctions against Italy. Both the French and the Soviet governments had insisted that sanctions should be suppressed only on certain conditions, but the French had not the courage to stand out against British pressure and the Soviet government could not risk a breach with France. For that reason it agreed later, most unwillingly, to "non-intervention" in Spain. Next the British government imposed on the French the maneuver to exclude the Abyssinian delegation from the League Assembly on a legal technicality. The successful resistance, led by Litvinov, to the Anglo-French maneuver was the one redeeming feature of the most barren and discreditable Assembly in the history of the League. In this matter Eden played the clever game of keeping in the background and making the innocent Delbos do the dirty work. In a speech a few days ago Eden said that in the matter of Spain the British government had followed the "French initiative."

The French government had announced their intention of asking that the Commission for European Union should be convened in September during the session of the Assembly. The commission, which consists of all the European members of the League, would no doubt have discussed the question of a European pact of mutual assistance. For this reason the British government strongly objected to a meeting of the commission and once more the French gave way. The reason given by the British for preventing the Assembly from dealing with any question of importance was that any action by the Assembly might annoy Hitler and compromise the success of the "Locarno" conference. The French government do not appear to have recognized that this means that the British desire an arrangement of some sort with Hitler at all costs and are prepared, if necessary, to throw over the Covenant and the principles of the League to get it.

The situation is black indeed, and it may be too late to save it. I am inclined to think, however, that it could be saved if France had a government with a policy of its own, which refused to make any further concessions to Hitler or Mussolini and set about forming a combination of mutual defense against German aggression with or without England. There is little or no prospect of such a government. In my opinion, the greater part of the European continent will in about three years be either Communist or else under German domination, and the chances at present are two to one in favor of fascism and Hitler, thanks to the egoism and duplicity of the British government and the gullibility and helplessness of the government of the People's Front in France.

The General Staff Takes Charge

BY EDWARD ROBBIN

Redondo, Cal., October 15

MR. ARAM is a meticulously dressed, bald-headed, middle-aged man with a pince-nez. He is a prominent San José attorney whose clients have usually been prosperous farmers. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and he wears on his watch chain what appears to be the emblem of some high Masonic order. In short, Mr. Aram is a respected citizen in his community.

A month ago Mr. Aram received a telephone call from the California Federation of Labor. Would he represent certain strikers who had been arrested in Salinas on vagrancy charges? After some hesitation Mr. Aram said he would. He had never handled a labor case before.

When he arrived in Salinas he told the strike committee he was going to the City Hall to meet the chief of police and the sheriff. "The City Hall?" There were smiles. "If you want to see the chief of police and the sheriff you'll find them on the sixth floor of the Jeffery Hotel."

On the sixth floor of the Jeffery Hotel Mr. Aram found what I found there three weeks later. The chief of police was in one office, the inspector of the State Highway Patrol in the next. The third office was the office of the Growers' and Shippers' Association, and next to that was the office of the "Coordinating Committee," headquarters of Colonel H. R. Sanborn, editor of a little red-baiting paper called the American Citizen and recently in strike-breaking service in Seattle. (He had registered at the hotel five days before the strike under the name of Winters.)

Mr. Aram was present at the famous interview in which Colonel Sanborn announced to the press that he was in Salinas as "Coordinator of Law Enforcement Agencies," and explained that the agencies "coordinated" were the Police Department, the Sheriff's Office, and the State Highway Patrol of the three counties of San Benito, Santa Cruz, and Monterey. This Napoleonic gesture, however, was too much even for Salinas. The next day the San Francisco Chronicle, a conservative paper, printed an article headed "Sanborn's Statement to the Press—But Who Is Sanborn?" The Colonel quietly left Salinas three days later, to be supplanted by Chet Moore, whom the Chronicle later described as dictator of Salinas, but who knows how to keep his mouth shut. Chet Moore won his laurels in the San Joaquin strike.

What may be found today on the sixth floor of the Jeffery Hotel in Salinas, California, is perhaps the first open alliance in America of industry and government to crush civil rights. This is the definition of fascism. For twenty-nine days it has existed in an American city and evoked no real protests from the liberals of America. For twenty-nine days a "general staff" has openly ruled and terrorized the city.

On September 16 the Mayor of Salinas proclaimed the compulsory conscription for riot service of every able-bodied male in the county, including strikers. His proclamation read:

I command all able-bodied male citizens of Monterey County between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to report to my office to assist me in overcoming the resistance and to put down riot, and to assist me seizing, arresting, and confining the persons resisting, their aiders, and abettors.

What was the "resistance" for which Salinas mobilized every able-bodied male? All assembly of three or more persons on the streets of the city had already been forbidden. A United Press dispatch published on the following day stated:

Not a picket was in sight. They were not to be found at their union headquarters, at the Central Labor Temple, or on downtown streets and about packing plants. Police believed they were in their homes nursing their wounds after being driven through the city with tear and sulphur gas, beaten with clubs, and finally driven from their union hall by a terrific blast of tear and nauseating gas.

I met in Salinas an attorney by the name of George Pollock. He knows personally the shippers and growers of Salinas, belongs to their clubs, takes part in civic affairs. He served overseas in the war and is an officer of the American Legion. When he refused to serve in the strike-breakers' compulsory draft, his friends called him a "slacker," his bank credit tightened.

One lettuce shipper, the Tracy-Waldron Company, agreed to sign with the union. Almost immediately it found it could not buy ice even as far south as Los Angeles. Tracy-Waldron has since rejoined the united front with the other shippers.

There is no strike in Salinas. It is a lockout. The union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, has made no demand for increased wages or different working conditions. A day before the termination of their contract the employers posted a notice refusing collective bargaining. The notice announced that anyone who returned to work on the next day accepted the open-shop contract.

The Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association of Los Angeles has openly raised a large sum of money and a corps of strike-breakers for use in labor disputes. Some of the smaller manufacturers have had to post a $5,000 bond with the association, contracting not to bargain independently with unions. The nucleus of the vigilantes in Salinas is the Citizens' Association, organized six months before the strike in military fashion in corps and squads headed by officers. A similar Citizens' Association has been organized in every county in California.

A few days ago Mr. Aram sent the following telegram to William Green:

Sinclair Lewis should be informed it did happen here. It was directed from outside of Monterey County. It embraces all city departments. City police and state highway patrol are directed by a civilian committee acting as the provisional head of a dictatorship.

Issues and Men

"BUT, my dear," said the Republican woman leader, who was entertaining unawares a Democratic wolf at her heavily laden lunch table, when that wolf had remarked she had yet to hear a Republican say a good word for Governor Landon and his campaigning, "you must not let that trouble you at all. The thing to do is not to think about Governor Landon, but to think how much you hate Franklin Roosevelt." This actual happening is characteristic of the Republican campaign. It has had nothing constructive to offer, and it has received no aid from the weakest candidate the Republicans ever put up for the highest office. We have had no sane and rational discussion of the principles of government or of the social and economic problems which confront not only the American Republic but the whole world. There has been no debate on the critical state of foreign affairs, no genuine discussion of whether the Constitution should or should not be modernized, no locking of horns on the exact relationship of the federal government to the juggernauts of business, or on what should be the status of labor in a modern state, or on what is the proper solution of our tariff follies. In other words, we have had no education in fundamental principles and far-reaching policies, but only hate, hysteria, bitterness, denunciations, counter-denunciations, and the false assertions by Republicans that our lives and liberties are in jeopardy. Mr. Roosevelt himself has given us scarcely a constructive thought, certainly not an intimation of what his program will be if he is reelected.

What the Roosevelt haters do not realize is that if their candidate should be chosen they might easily find themselves within a short time hating Landon almost as ardently as they hate Roosevelt. They would be the first to find him little, inadequate, and unsatisfactory—unless he wholly played their game, licked their boots, and filled their purses to overflowing. They do not realize the chance they are taking of giving us a man in the White House who would be utterly unequal to a serious international situation, such as the outbreak of war in the Orient. They would be bound to be angry with him because as President he could not undo 75 per cent of the Roosevelt New Deal—the New Deal he praised so unqualifiedly in 1933-34—if he would. He could not disavow the principles of the NRA—the abolition of child labor, the right of collective bargaining, the fixing of hours of labor and minimum wages, and the abolition of unfair and unethical trade practices. He could not reduce taxes rapidly or balance the budget at once, and he certainly could not get the needed moneys for the relief of the unemployed "out of the hides" of those who have exploited relief for their own or for political ends, as he said he would. At all times the Governor's thinking has betrayed a lack of grasp, a failure to think things through, an absence of logic and depth, a smallness of stature which are nothing less than appalling as one tries to visualize him in the White House in this crisis of our and the world's history.

So the feeling that this campaign has all been shadow boxing, grossly artificial and apart from the realities of life, has stolen over me again and again. Have we not been marking time—precious time that ought to be utilized to the last second to clarify our national thinking, to put our national house in order, to speed up and reinvigorate the processes of democracy, and so to gird it to meet the approaching struggle with the forces of fascism and communism which seek to destroy it? It may well be that the absurd Republican slogan of "Life, Liberty, and Landon" may four years hence turn out to be apropos instead of ridiculous—without the Landon, of course. It may be that the 1940 campaign will mark a real showdown on the issue of who shall be the masters of America. Mr. Wilson in 1912 said the masters of America were "the captains of industry"—shall it be they or the plain people to whom he in his "New Freedom" days wished to return the country? A realization that the battle of 1936 dates back to 1908 and 1912 in historical continuity has been as lacking as any deep and constructive thinking.

I am not thinking merely that there may be a strong farmer-labor party in 1940 with the slogan of "Production for Use" and not profit, or that the Republicans will enter 1940 stripped of their incredibly anachronistic assumption that they, the defenders of reaction, special privileges, and great government-created riches, have suddenly become the champions of freedom and of liberty. What is coming is a vital struggle to preserve our institutions and our freedom from the very beneficiaries of our economic system who now portray themselves as the champions of liberty. Mr. Roosevelt has moved haltingly and inconsistently in the right direction, creating ideas which will carry farther than he has any thought they may. But he has not clarified the issues; he has not gone about saying: It matters not now what my mistakes, or the errors I admit. This is not the time to discuss whether I have gone too far here or not far enough there. This is the time to challenge the selfishness, the aggrandizement, the faithlessness of the controllers of great capital and the defenders of trusts and monopolies. This is the time to chart our course with all possible detail. This is the time to show the world not only that we are the masters of our own souls and destinies, but that we are prepared to bring democracy back to its original aims and ideals in America and to prove that it can easily surpass in its wisdom, its justice, its equality, its power for righteousness, and its humanity any system of dictatorship ever devised on earth.

Roosevelt Shows Up the Press

IF Franklin Delano Roosevelt fails of election, every political reporter in America is a dunderhead, and I for one will seek the top of some tall cliff. And yet even if such an unfortunate thing comes to pass, the following statement will remain true. F. D. Roosevelt is the greatest politician this country has ever produced. His fifth cousin was a tyro in comparison and Alfred E. Smith a lisping lad.

Consider some of the factors with which the President has been compelled to contend from the beginning of the campaign. One of the principal handicaps has been absence of newspaper support. At least 85 per cent of the American press has been against Roosevelt, and it has actually been difficult for him to get a break even in the news columns. Two of the toughest spots have been Chicago and New England. The Chicago Times, which was a comparatively obscure tabloid until the present campaign, is the only Democratic paper in that city, and in New England the Republican line is practically unbroken save for a single Worcester paper. There must have been pressure from the early days of the campaign. Advisers said, "Mr. President, you'll have to come yourself and come soon or Massachusetts is lost."

The President's timing was more shrewd. He let the newspaper publishers have more rope. They proceeded to commit sins of inconceivable stupidity. Before Colonel Knox received the nomination for the Vice-Presidency, many critics praised him for his editorial acumen in printing a piece by O'Brien, the columnist of the Chicago Daily News, in which Mr. O'Brien said that while his boss was a good newspaperman he would make a poor executive for the nation. But later Knox proceeded to show that he wasn't a very good newspaperman. His obvious role should have been to lean over backward in the news and editorial columns of his own paper. After all, the Daily News will still be appearing long after Colonel Knox's candidacy for the Vice-Presidency has been forgotten. But the campaign showed that the Colonel likes a joke on the next fellow better than one on himself.

Westbrook Pegler's column "Fair Enough" is the joint property of the Chicago Daily News and the Scripps-Howard papers. Lately it has been left out of the Daily News on several occasions. These were mostly on the afternoons when Peg had been speculating on the difficulty of finding Republicans dumb enough to bet on Landon and Knox. And every time a Pegler column was omitted, the Chicago Times, the enterprising tabloid, would pick it up and advertise "the Pegler column which Colonel Knox did not care to print."

Still more embarrassing was the slight blunder committed by Colonel McCormick's paper, the Chicago Tribune. President Roosevelt had finally called his shot late in the campaign. "Now, I will go to Chicago," he had said. The part of good common journalistic sense would have been for the hostile press of Chicago to pretend to be good sportsmen and all that sort of thing. Colonels McCormick and Knox should have put on their uniforms and William Randolph Hearst his morning coat and proceeded to the station to welcome Roosevelt. They could readily have said, "We do not like his taxes, but he is still our President." They might have spread in eight-column headlines "Welcome President Roosevelt," and then when his little time was up they could have returned to the stuff about communism and the raw deal and the rest of the rot.

Somebody in the Birdie McCormick shop outsmarted himself. The chief exhibit on the first page of the Tribune showed a man sweeping up a lot of discarded Roosevelt buttons from the streets of Chicago. It was a bright young man from the Times who discovered that the sweeper in question had been paid twenty-five cents out of the McCormick largess to pose for the picture and that the buttons had been supplied from two paper bags borne by the Chicago Tribune representative. This was one of the chief factors in the booing of the press which took place that night as the President's parade swept through the city.

Out of their own physical images, out of rubbing elbows together, out of seeing their own mightiness, the people of Chicago learned that their newspapers were liars and panderers to petty propaganda. It was not true—that they could see with their own eyes—that Landon was sweeping the country like a prairie fire and that the voters of America were up in arms against the New Deal. And after taking his trip to Chicago and to Detroit, Franklin Delano Roosevelt invaded New England and went to places where his own lieutenants had expressed no hope. The genius of Roosevelt as a politician is that he can come much closer to predicting the size of the crowd in Waterbury than the local committeeman is capable of doing.

Naturally there were those who told him not to venture near Boston because he would challenge comparison with the Smith meeting of 1928 and bring Al's name even more definitely into the picture. Roosevelt took the rap and the risk. The biggest crowd any political meeting in America has ever known turned out for him. And this throng of more than a hundred thousand had not met up an alley but in the center of Boston Common. The thing had happened. It was palpable and not to be denied. Franklin Delano Roosevelt had gone over the heads of the headlines and back to the people.

Of course, some of it must be luck. The break he gets on weather suggests black magic. But was it luck, I wonder, or the inspiration of pure genius which so fixed things that Roosevelt came into Cambridge at dusk and was booed by Harvard snips after the workers of Massachusetts to the extent of a million had cheered him? That was a break.

Athenian Death

BY ROBERT PENN WARREN

Born proud and fitful, hot and cold,
Suspicious as a king who sees
In every face unfaith unfold—
Born thus, bred in these qualities,
No wonder, turning, he again
Would turn to seek a steadfast lodgment
For love that was not peace, nor pain,
But a confusion past assuagement.

His was the equinoctial heart
Wherein untutored weathers veer
And random violences start:
Blank paroxysms of the year.
Or his the heart that knows no north,
Unpoled, pole-hungering, and spun
In aimless gyre, and little worth
To mark the sure direction.

His eyes pursued the flight of birds
Or read the horizon's hieroglyph;
Grudging as coin, his flattened words
Were paid for innocence, or if,
Unbound as grain, his kindness fell,
The ravening crow, his afterthought,
Revised the yearning furrow well;
And flattery rancor then unwrought.

He is not dead, for dying still,
Each day undoes the death fordone;
Nor living, for his unfed will
Refrains the sustenance of sun.
Young Lucifer! who daily falls
From glimmering pinnacles of light
And daily in the heart's four walls
Erects a hell in heaven's despite.

No traitor he! our brother yet,
So packed of truth and perfidy,
Of rage and charm, that we may get
Thus magnified and perfectly
Our image glassed in grander grace—
Bright parable of paradox.
And thus the passion of his face
Our secret secretly unlocks.

Under the starred and foreign sky,
After the spears made their carouse
And flame played only fitfully,
Timandra crept from out the house

To seek the wild one steel had tamed,
And weeping, held upon her knees
His head, whom men had always named
The clever Alcibiades.

Mr. Bates's Bible

THE BIBLE DESIGNED TO BE READ AS LIVING LITERATURE. The Old and New Testaments in the King James Version. Arranged and Edited by Ernest Sutherland Bates. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

READING through the Bible from end to end, Mr. Bates has blue-penciled the passages that seemed to him readable or otherwise interesting from a literary point of view. He reprints them in ordinary book form in a beautiful large clear type and with a dignified page, arranging, among other things, to make the poetic elements in the famous anthology of Hebrew literature visible to the eye. He comes home with some 1,200 pages of "living" material, which he introduces by rapid, concise, and immensely suggestive digests of the results achieved by Biblical criticism during these last generations. The result is a Bible that people who have acquired some historical perspective will truly enjoy. Bible lovers will find their favorite passages, stories, poems, more easily here than in the usual editions of the complete Bible. Mr. Bates's featuring and headlining also call attention to many bits which I, for one, had never noticed before as specially beautiful or interesting.

This is not God's Bible. It belongs to Mr. Bates. On that score one wishes that Mr. Bates had given us more of himself. I miss, for instance, at the ends of his introductions, some indication of the literary fortune of this or that passage, which Mr. Bates, as one of the best-read literary historians who ever lived, could have given us out of his head. Deuteronomy is one of my favorite books, and I have read it many times, but not till the Blessing of Joseph was printed in just this way did I notice that the Praises of the Creatures of St. Francis was a paraphrase of it. Throwing out the prophets bodily as setting the worst literary and intellectual examples imaginable, with no great moral altitudes to compensate, and banishing with them the much overpraised book of Job, there would have been room for enough literary addenda to enhance the literary atmosphere of this Bible, which, at best, can never be the Bible of the pious.

Keeping still to Mr. Bates, who is the protagonist in this edition, leaving Jehovah and the others in very subordinate positions, one must rebuke him for quoting with admiration the inane fatuities of Sir Arthur Quiller Couch on the difficulties of reading the traditional Bible—one thinks of a line of Boileau which I am too polite to quote. Everybody knows that the difficulties people have in ever seeing what the Bible really says is due in the first instance to the cloud that hangs over it as a Holy Book; that historical training is prerequisite to full enjoyment of it as to the enjoyment of any ancient literature; that, at any rate, if the Gospels are "dead" literature when read in the order of Matthew-Mark, they do not become "living" when read in the order Mark-

Matthew; that if the spirited book of Esther is "dead" literature when read as history it does not come to life when it is called, unhistorically, "a tale." Which leads to a second rebuke: Mr. Bates should dust the literary genres out of his head as cobwebs hanging over from his days as a professor. If Job is a "drama," it is, apart from the prologue, a mighty dull show.

All the same, I like Mr. Bates's rearrangement for the very shock it gives one. It lends newness to these often jaded texts that may have become hackneyed by long repetition. The Bible will never be enjoyed till it is read as it is, quite free from those blinders of piety that the average reader is forced by a gigantic social pressure to wear. And one of the most effective ways to achieve that end is to produce a shock that will make readers rational or at least semi-rational. The rearrangement in this edition accomplishes just that.

This is Mr. Bates's Bible. It is not mine, altogether. Mine is a lot gayer. Is it not true that the folklore of all peoples of all ages, when it happens to be good, often if not usually has a definitely comic value? The comic in question is to be sure extrinsic—one sees from the outside a quality which the writer or story-teller is not conscious of himself. I will say nothing of the Pentateuch, which I reread at least once a year for the laughs, among other things, that it gives me—the scene where Moses and Jehovah stack the cards on a willing but stupid Pharaoh, the rage of Moses in breaking the first stone edition of the Decalogue when he tries to fool the Hebrews but finds he has been fooled by them; Moses's arraignment of Jehovah's administration during the depression at Sinai; Moses's marriage, in his dotage, to an Ethiopian and Miriam's attempt to base a coup d'état on the color issue. These for just a few among dozens! Or think of the paean the author of Proverbs raises to "A virtuous woman," for whom he outlines a twenty-four-hour work day while he sits in state among the elders in the market-place. The comic element in the Bible has been brought home even to our pious public in works like "Green Pastures." It has already had its literary consecration in the poems of such geniuses as Belli and Fucini. It is real. Mr. Bates for practical reasons saw fit not to feature it in this Bible. It would have seemed irreverent. But need one be so fussy if one is to knock the pious tradition sky-high by making the ghastly wreckage that the "higher" criticism has wrought as obtrusive and as palpable as it is made in this modernistic Bible?

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

The Poetry of Doom

ABSALOM, ABSALOM! By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50.

MUCH confusion will be saved if one applies to Mr. Faulkner's new book not the usual standards of the realistic novel but whatever standards we are accustomed to apply to lyric poetry of the most subjective sort. All writing is personal, to be sure, and in the last analysis so-called objective fiction represents just as temperamental a view of the facts as the frankest lyric. But in fiction usually there is some line of demarcation between the facts and the writer's vision of them, some pretense of establishing a norm or mean in their presentation. Leaving aside obvious examples of the realistic or documentary, we need only turn to such a work as "Wuthering Heights," which Mr. Faulkner's book helps us recall, to recognize how safely we are removed from the tempestuous center of feeling by the device of a narrator who is a model of sober and balanced vision. Even in James, through his "frames" and his politely colloquial style, and in Proust, through his sustained abstract logic, we are permitted within the work itself something like a normal or social angle on the facts. Nothing so distracting is allowed us by Mr. Faulkner. From first to last we are plunged into the same world, and everything that we see and feel and think is saturated with the special atmosphere of this world. Through neither the form nor the style do we escape from the closed universe of his intensely personal vision. Despite the elaborate orchestration—the story is told through at least a half-dozen voices—the voice that we hear throughout is always the same. Whether it is Miss Rosa Coldfield, frustrated Southern belle of 1866, or Shrevlin McCannon, matter-of-fact Harvard undergraduate of 1910, rhythm and vocabulary are identical; all the characters have fallen under the influence of Mr. Faulkner's later prose style. As for the method of multiple point of view borrowed from James and Conrad, it has not here any real justification. It does not give us those contrasts of perception for which it was invented nor is it actually required for the order. At best it adds a little factitious intensity to a work already sufficiently fraught with intensity of the most genuine sort. The aggravating ventriloquism of method does not disguise the fact that everything in it is the product of the same unrelieved and unrelieving vision of existence.

Through the uniformity of his image-laden and mournfully cadenced style Mr. Faulkner gives most reason for being considered as a poet rather than as a novelist; but there is also the peculiar operation of his imagination. Given a view of living as "one constant and perpetual instant when the arras-veil before what-is-to-be hangs docile and even glad to the lightest naked thrust," he is more concerned with the potentials than with the actualities of experience. Life being a very bad dream in which anything might happen, his imagination posits isolated people, actions, gestures, even speeches, broods upon them until they take the full shape of his vision, and then attempts to relate them in some sort of pattern. The reader will be struck by the recurrence of phrases like "Just imagine," "Conceive only," "Listen," all springing from the passion to make us realize, in the most literal sense, the unique person or event. Young Tom Sutpen turned away from the front door by a Negro butler, Henry throwing the dead body of his sister's fiancée at her feet, old Tom Sutpen killed by a rusty scythe—each of these scenes is something separate, complete, and detachable. Each is a symbol of the same uniform vision. The work is put together not out of a logical sequence of such symbols, for the imagination does not recognize the pattern of logic, but according to order of ascending horror. Even to speak of pattern or order is perhaps inaccurate. It is rather the scale or gamut of all possible human misery and depravity.

Mr. Faulkner's imagination, that is to say, does not operate by filling in some design that has been constructed by the rational mind. It will be disappointing, for example, to try to discover in the career of Thomas Sutpen—who migrated from West Virginia by way of the West Indies to Mississippi, where he acquired a hundred miles of land and built an enormous mansion, only to be defeated in his effort to found a family by the intervention of the Civil War and bad luck with his sons—a demonstration of the social and economic contradictions of the Old South. Nor is it possible to stop at the explanation that his domestic troubles are all traceable to a social attitude that regards miscegenation as a more heinous crime than incest. Undoubtedly these circumstances of history and geography affect the form of the Sutpen saga, but its meaning will be found in a much deeper and broader interpretation of life as a whole. According to this interpretation, everything that has happened could have happened anywhere else in the world. The little drop of Negro blood that runs through Sutpen's destiny becomes no more than the symbolical materialization of that irrational element which exists to thwart the most carefully planned designs of the human will. The ultimate cause of everything is that "sickness somewhere at the prime foundation of this factual scheme," that sickness inherent perhaps in the imagination itself which always sets before it more than it can ever accomplish and enjoy.

It is because of the depth and the scale and the cumulative grandeur with which Mr. Faulkner presents this intuition that his book seems not only the best that he has yet given us but one of the most formidable of our generation. His vision of existence, which is a product of temperament, will be ultimately accepted or rejected according to the temperament of the reader. But to reject the vision is not necessarily to reject the book. T. S. Eliot refers somewhere to the mark of the great poet as the ability to understand and communicate "the essential strength and weakness of the human soul." For most readers Mr. Faulkner will fail of this mark through giving us too much of the weakness and not nearly enough of the strength. Unquestionably, his book will suffer from the limitations of his vision. But there is also no question that it owes most of its astonishing qualities to these same limitations. It possesses the awful impressiveness that comes from exhausting any attitude or vision, however wrong and one-sided, of its last measure of intensity.

WILLIAM TROY

The Age of Animals

AUDUBON. By Constance Rourke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE story of Audubon has been told many times; and rightly so, since Americans in the century to come are likely to be as curious about it as they are about the stories of Washington and Lincoln, of Paul Revere and Daniel Boone. It is already one of the indispensable American myths, being first of all a success story on the grand scale and being in addition a symbol of our national Golden Age. Every author who touches John James Audubon shines with a certain light reflected forward from the time, now a little more than a century ago, when the continent basked in the white man's sunrise and a long-haired French youth could plunge through its forests with nothing but hope and glory in his eyes. The special virtue of Miss Rourke is that as a historian she has studied the sources of that light and knows how to stand where its rays will fall full upon her as she tells the story again. The title of her twelfth chapter is In the Golden Age, and the next to the last sentence of her book says of the light in Audubon's paintings that it is "always clear and cool, as though the world were seen in the early morning." She has written as much about the age as about the man.

This will account for the obvious fact that her narrative is less dramatic than it can legitimately be. She has not felt her hero with the intensity, for instance, which distinguished the recent biography of Audubon by Donald Culross Peattie. Whereas Mr. Peattie made a great deal of drama out of the famous meeting in Louisville between Audubon and his future rival, Alexander Wilson, Miss Rourke contents herself with noting in two pages that the episode occurred; and against Mr. Peattie's exciting account of Lucy's arrival in New Orleans to be once more with the husband for whom she had made so many sacrifices there stand in Miss Rourke's book eight non-committal words: "The family was reunited, and this was happiness." For that matter she has toned down the sacrifices; to the extent at least of itemizing from a bill of sale in 1819 the handsome household goods with which the Audubons lived in Henderson, Kentucky, until their failure there. She can not be said to ignore any important incident in the biography, nor does she tell her story without skill. It is simply that her deepest interest is in the background: in the lingo which Audubon heard along the rivers and learned to use, in the folklore with which as a hunter he was invariably plied, in the songs and dances among whose rhythms he moved, in the tall tales and the practical jokes which he liked as well as anyone. She gives no more space to the meeting with Wilson in Louisville than to the great earthquake of 1811 which sank islands in the Mississippi and created lakes in western Tennessee. She makes the most of every possible encounter with Daniel Boone, because Boone too is background that cannot be slighted. And her portraits of places—New Orleans, Feliciana, Fatland Ford—are painted for their own sakes by one to whom every recoverable portion of early-nineteenth-century America is precious and must be preserved.

Her final triumph, however, is with the fauna of the time. The biographer of David Crockett, the historian of American humor, and the untiring student of our remotest folkways makes herself for the present purpose and for the time being a naturalist, a familiar on their own ground with the birds and quadrupeds of which Audubon's America was so full. It is as if she had decided that no living thing in such a world must be alien to her; and remembered that life for her hero was chiefly a matter of wings, a thunder of feet. Cataracts of birds pour through her pages, and the forest is alive with an army of animals; nor has she forgotten the jungle of flowers from which the painter selected sprays to perch his subjects upon. She has lavished upon the task, too, an exact learning; she does not let it go with a few patches of impressionism. She is always specific, always documented, and always interesting; as when, for example, she watches over Audubon's shoulder a snowy owl along the Ohio shore near Louisville:

Deep cavities or potholes lay among the shoals where fish found the shelter of calm water. Near these the owl was watching. Lying flat on a rock in midstream like a stealthy cat watching for a mouse, his body lengthwise, his head down but turned toward the water, he looked like a soft patch of snow and seemed asleep, but if a fish rose to the surface from the pothole, out went his barbed claw; he carried it away, devoured it, and came back. When one pothole failed to yield fish he slid over to another. He was joined without a rustle of sound by his mate in the pale early darkness. With the first streak of light they were lost like small white clouds in General Clark's woods.

Or as when she looks up with him at "some goshawks trailing a great crowd of swiftly flying pigeons over the Ohio":

Suddenly one of them turned aside to a flock of blackbirds, and the blackbirds swiftly closed together and were like a dusky ball passing through the air. The goshawk claimed four or five of them with ease, squeezed them, dropped them into the river. As the blackbirds reached dense woods they plunged, and the goshawk wheeled and dipped and picked up his prey from the surface of the water.

She has Audubon's own notes to guide her in many a passage of this sort. But it is plain that she has equipped herself to understand the notes, and as far as possible to see what Audubon saw. He saw "the primal natural world as part of our inheritance." She desires that we see it too; and has her desire.

MARK VAN DOREN

On Making War

HOW TO RUN A WAR. By Bruce Winton Knight. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THIS book is not meant for readers of The Nation. It is directed to the Upper Classes, and Mr. Knight makes it very clear that such persons as ministers, university professors, and the like are not included in this group, no matter how much they may delude themselves into thinking that they are. Moreover, with an eye to reaching the truly elite, it is written in a primer-like style which would be scorned by the sophisticated readers of this magazine.

One would suspect that Mr. Knight had read Newton D. Baker's recent article in Foreign Affairs on how we got into the last war and had decided that the whole affair had been bungled badly. Abhorring inefficiency, he has set forth in simplest terms detailed rules not only for getting into war but for killing the greatest number of people, including your own countrymen, as expeditiously as possible. In this respect the book is infinitely superior to Moss's "Military Manual," and should be compulsory reading for all Veterans of Future Wars. A Congressional appropriation for putting the book in the hands of every schoolboy might easily yield a greater loss of life per dollar expended than the millions now wasted on naval vessels which will be obsolete before they are launched.

Although perhaps it is indiscreet to reveal the book's contents to persons who really have nothing to do with starting wars, something of its nature may be garnered from its chapter headings. There are sections on How to Start, How to Intervene, How to Balance Power, How to Get in Somebody Else's War, How to Lie for Your Country, How to Stir Up the Animals, How to Keep Them Mad, The General Principles of Killing, How to Kill Soldiers, How to Fix the Pacifists, How to Practice Internationalism, How to Make the Enemy Pay for It, and How to Compute the Dividends.

Unlike most volumes written exclusively for the Upper Classes, Mr. Knight's book represents a thorough and commendable research job. While there are few facts which have not appeared elsewhere, there is also little of the science of starting, organizing, and preserving war which does not appear in this little volume. If it had been available a few years ago, the Nye committee and the various commissions for Improving the National Defense might have been saved a lot of unnecessary labor.

Not until the final chapter—the author assumes a great deal regarding the sustained literacy of the Upper Classes—is there any intimation that war may not be all milk and honey for its initiators. Then there is a vague suggestion that the final outcome of the war cycle is revolution, an idea which is not likely to appeal too strongly to those who are surest about the many virtues developed by a good international scrap. Yet the chances that this minor handicap will dissuade any enthusiastic member of the Liberty League from pursuing policies that will lead to war are exceedingly slim. The author suggests that there are four ways to stop war: (1) a growth of pacifist sentiment that would frighten the politicians, (2) a strong League of Nations, (3) a more even distribution of wealth, (4) more knowledge regarding the actual character of war—"because men are not by nature fools." But is there any danger that the Men Who Count will espouse any of these four causes?

Possibly the first step toward carrying out the fourth of these suggestions would be for a few of the 125,999,950

Americans who are not members of the select circle to go to the nearest bookstore and steal a few paragraphs from the book when the clerk's back is turned.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

An American Dictionary

A DICTIONARY OF AMERICAN ENGLISH ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES. Edited by Sir William Craigie and James R. Hulbert. PART I, A-BAGGAGE. University of Chicago Press. $4; $75 for 20 parts.

READING page by page the first fascicle of the "Dictionary of American English on Historical Principles," one realizes gradually that the work before him is not only a great achievement in lexicography but one of the most memorable of all American books. Because it will be published in parts over a period of several years and, when completed, will be rather expensive for private purses—at least, if paid for in one fell swoop—there is some danger that it will be relegated to the reference alcoves of public or institutional libraries, there to be consulted occasionally in elucidation of some obscure term or to be studied once in a decade by some stray specialist in Americanisms. That would be a dismal career for a book that ought to be accessible and familiar to every American who desires to come into full possession of his own language and to understand the cultural history of his country.

Strong words about a mere dictionary, and ridiculously inapplicable if Sir William Craigie and his staff had been content to compile a bulkier rival to the several good dictionaries already available. What they have done is something very different. Avoiding so far as possible the duplication of previous work, they have endeavored chiefly to exhibit clearly "those features by which the English of the American colonies and the United States is distinguished from that of England and the rest of the English-speaking world." They have included, however, "not only words or phrases which are clearly or apparently of American origin, or have greater currency here than elsewhere, but also every word denoting something which has a real connection with the development of the country and the history of its people." To gather the materials for their work the editors have conducted an unparalleled ransacking of the national library, not neglecting manuscript diaries and records. Even Mr. Craigie, veteran of two great dictionaries, seems to have been astonished at the mass of evidence that had to be collected and presented, and users of the dictionary will share his wonder. They will share also what must surely be his delight in his accomplishment, for this first fascicle promises that the completed dictionary will illustrate three centuries of linguistic and cultural development with an amplitude and a richness of detail hitherto unrealized. No other dictionary now existing is so continuously readable, so brimful of the life of the nation whose language it registers, or so brilliantly exemplifies the intimate relation of language and society. Consider what compact monographs on American life are the articles in the first instalment on apple, anti, and back, together with their various compounds.

Sir William Craigie and his staff, assisted by a number of volunteer helpers, have been at work on the dictionary for eleven years, and it may take as many more to bring their task to completion. The General Education Board has borne most of the cost of the enterprise, to which the University of Chicago and the American Council of Learned Societies have also contributed substantially. They have thus rendered a lasting service to American culture.

GEORGE GENZMER

Melodramatic Mexico

THE STONES AWAKE: A NOVEL OF MEXICO. By Carleton Beals. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

UNLIKE his first novel, "Black River," in which he told in the guise of fiction the story of Tampico's rape, Carleton Beals's second novel of Mexico lacks the authenticity and the weight of an exposé. It is a novel merely, and in it there are no new facts, no new interpretations to counter-balance Mr. Beals's considerable deficiencies as an artist. Even so, it is a sincere and laborious attempt to retell, in terms of the individuals who have helped to shape it, the history of Mexico from the Maderist revolt to the regime of Lázaro Cárdenas. It is full of revolutionary violence and surface detail. And it is profoundly sympathetic. But more than that one cannot say, for the crudities of its cliché-ridden style crop up with such regularity that one can't remain less than hyper-critical throughout. When such phrases as "ill-gotten money," "hale and hearty," "happy as a bird," "raving mad," fail to suffice him, Mr. Beals lapses into intolerable tropes of his own, like "ham-shaped lips," "lemon-squeezed expression," or cliché-combinations which are even worse.

Behind the slovenly writing, of course, there is a compelling story. But it is compelling only as Mexico's metamorphosis is compelling, and not because of Mr. Beals. One reads on in it, despite his writing, because of his superior knowledge of his subject. In the character of Esperanza Huitrón, the daughter of Indian peons, Beals takes one briefly through the sadistic feudalism that raped, stole, flogged its way to the inevitable uprising of Esperanza's class under the aristocrat-idealist, Francisco Madero. Luis, Esperanza's lover, escapes from the hacienda to join Zapata in the south; her brother José escapes to join Villa in the north. Thus a complex setting is arranged in order that Esperanza can be made to witness the betrayal of the bourgeois revolt, and the venal succession of Huerta, Carranza, Calles, Gil, Rubio, up to the pseudo-socialism under Cárdenas.

The bulk of Esperanza's experience can be found in Beals's own book "Mexican Maze," and the rest of it in the writings of Grüening, Brenner, Gamio, and Tannenbaum. Willy-nilly, Esperanza, illiterate though beautiful india that she is, is made to come in contact with the decadence of Mexican officialdom and the gringo influx, and finally, by means of her life with David Muñoz, a painter, she is brought into the very center of the revolutionary artists' movement led by Siquieros and Orozco. Hardly an exploitable incident in Beals's own life has been overlooked, nor a single historic figure. Only twice is Esperanza's story really credible: once, when after Luis's death she labors in a soap works until a disastrous strike; then, when she returns to Milpa Verde at Popocatepetl's foot to assist her brother in founding a public school against the sabotage of priests and hacendados. Both sequences are carried along, simply and accurately, by the force of their dramatic content. The rest of Esperanza's life, unhappily, is quite unreal, and is held together mainly by Beals's excessive use of the melodramatic crutches of coincidence, hatred, lust, murder, and infidelity.

To be forced to condemn so completely a work of a writer with whose intent one sympathizes wholly is a hapless task; and for this reason one may beg to hazard a single extraneous thesis: that the novel is not the medium for Mr. Beals's synthesis of Mexico's tumult, but that the sketchbook is; and that therefore he should waste no further energy on a medium beyond his ken but return to the hodge-podge impressionistic stuff of "Mexican Maze" and fashion a surface study of life under the Six-Year Plan of President Cárdenas. It is a task that needs doing, and there is no one better equipped to do it than Mr. Beals.

A Great Poet Lost and Regained

THE WORKS OF BEDDOES. Edited by H. W. Donner. Oxford University Press. $5.

THE BROWNING BOX. Edited by H. W. Donner. Oxford University Press. $5.

READERS of anthologies know Beddoes exclusively by his song—"If there were dreams to sell, what would you buy?" Readers of detective stories who have come across Dorothy Sayers's "Have-His-Carcass" know Beddoes rather better. They know at least that he wrote something called "Death's Jest Book," from which she culled the powerful lines prefixed to each of her chapters. Now that H. W. Donner has edited and published the complete "Works of Beddoes," ignorance or casual acquaintance will no longer be excusable for those who pride themselves on a knowledge of the great English poets or take pleasure in reading them. For Donner's work of editing, his life of the poet, and his publication of letters by Browning and others regarding the man and his work leave no doubt that here is an outstanding master of English verse who has been overlooked for a mere century or so.

One of the reasons for that neglect is that Beddoes was much more than a poet, or at least, many other things. In fact, except for some juvenile publications, he never was a professional poet at all. He was a physician like his distinguished father, a resident of Germany, a pamphleteer on behalf of political freedom in Central Europe, an interpreter of German culture to his English friends, a letter-writer of transcendent power, a translator of scientific works, a student and critic of the English drama, and finally a suicide. His finest work was published posthumously and partially in 1850 and 1851, and from that time to the days of Mr. Donner he has been at the mercy of editors who, careless or over-fastidious, have never got round to doing their subject justice.

Yet it does not seem very difficult for the present generation to understand Beddoes or to carve him an ample niche by the side of Byron, Shelley, Schiller, Goethe, Hugo, Pushkin, and Leopardi. He belongs to that company, both by temperament and by achievement, despite the false appearance of fragmentariness that a hasty glance at his work is likely to discover. The conventional attitude has been to call him a belated Elizabethan dramatist and to point to "Death's Jest Book" as a proof that he lacked constructive power, that he was in short a gifted amateur or even a genius manqué. Another way of reading the evidence commends itself as more critical. "Death's Jest Book" is a seemingly shapeless mass, not because it is unfinished, but because it is, as a creation, boundless. A poet with a limited imagination would have polished off his five acts and been done with it. When Beddoes died at the age of forty-six, he had written enough for three plays on the one theme and had still not exhausted his inspiration within the limits of his original conception. It is precisely the process Goethe exemplifies in Faust, with nearly forty years more of meditation and accumulation, and it is one characteristic of the romanticist productive power. It creates by addition rather than by whittling; which does not in the least mean that Beddoes—or Goethe—was not self-critical. The contents of the famous "Browning Box" show the endless pains Beddoes took with his lines, until he achieved what many of the younger

English and American poets are coming to consider one of the notable contributions to English verse forms—the Beddoesian blank verse. Steeped as he was in the Elizabethans, he nevertheless does not echo their music. Milton's, Blake's, and Shelley's are equally distant from his; so that standing alone on his own summit he justifies the appellation of great English poet.

The history of these poems since the death of Beddoes is an involved but exciting tale of mischance and miracle—from their custody in the hands of Beddoes's devoted friend Kelsall to the prudish treatment of Robert Browning (who gave up all interest in Beddoes on learning that he had committed suicide) and thence to the incompetent and patronizing paws of Sir Edmund Gosse, who fastened gratuitously upon the poet the character of homosexual by altering the text of his letters. As usual, the Germans began the work of rehabilitation, Dr. Alwin Feller having as early as 1914 denounced the spurious golden eggs that Sir Edmund was laying in successive partial editions of the poet's remains. Finally, Oxford, Beddoes's Alma Mater, came to the rescue and through Mr. Donner and the University Press has furnished us with the two volumes under review. They supersede all previous editions and lives and invalidate almost all former critical opinions.

One interesting essay, published some years ago by J. A. Ogdon in "Life and Letters" but not mentioned by Mr. Donner, makes a point that deserves notice, for it is likely to arise again and again. Mr. Ogdon drew a parallel between Beddoes, Berlioz, and Poe as romanticist artists fascinated by the theme of love and death. It is of course a plausible analogy, though one should include Heine—and Hardy—but it really carries little weight. Striking as the macabre may be in the work of the three romanticists, it bears only a minor and varying proportion to the rest of their work. To take Beddoes alone, Ogdon's suggestion amounts to mistaking a recurrent mood for a limiting obsession. Beddoes could and did write of smiling nature, of calm contemplation, and of almost all the gentler "normal" feelings. He wrote love lyrics that were not sardonic, and he indited two of the funniest poems in the language—The Oviparous Tailor and The New Cecilia. His letters reveal a balanced variety of moods, and if the penultimate note struck in them was gloomy ("I am food for what I am good for—worms") it was the clear gloom of the stoic who knew himself and the world, though he obviously did not know that the best part of him was only then beginning the long road to earthly immortality.

THE ALCESTIS OF EURIPIDES: AN ENGLISH VERSION. By Dudley Fitts and Robert Fitzgerald. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

Messrs. Fitts and Fitzgerald have put the "Alcestis" into English in such a way as to convey both its poetic and its dramatic qualities. This is a translation in the best sense of the word, namely, a rendering of the "emotional and sensible meanings" of the original, with a necessary but not ruthless disregard of literal accuracy. The sonority of Euripidean Greek could not, of course, be plausibly reproduced throughout in contemporary English; and the young American poets have used free but controlled cadences which, by hinting at the Greek meters, recreate the original more faithfully than the Swinburnean anapests and mock-heroic blank verse so dear to academic translators. The simple dignity of the version is well exemplified in these lines:

My mother was cursed the night she bore me,
And I am faint with envy of all the dead:
How clean they are, who are out of life forever!
They are beautiful, and I would be with them.

One of the richest of ancient works of literature in psychological analysis, the "Alcestis" is a play that should readily appeal to a contemporary audience; and it is matter for rejoicing that it has at last been made available for the modern stage.

THE TROUBLE I'VE SEEN. By Martha Gellhorn, With a Preface by H. G. Wells. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

Miss Gellhorn spent a number of months as an investigator for the Federal Relief Administration. She saw men and women who were the recipients of the government's bounty, or who needed such bounty and could not get it. Her stories are all about people in that lower fringe of society where there is no guaranty of something to eat or a place to sleep, where heaven on earth means simply a job, at any wage so long as it is paid regularly. Except for an occasional lapse into sentimentality, Miss Gellhorn writes soberly of people who are credibly honest and industrious. They not only want to work but they must work to keep themselves sane. Her most successful story is the last, the record of a ten-year-old girl who, given a toothbrush as a prize for orderly work at school, had to have toothpaste to go with it. Ruby wanted roller skates, too, and a can of peaches for her mother, to supplement the three dollars a week for food that the city allowed. Without knowing what she was doing, she followed the oldest profession of women because that was the only way she could get fifty cents. Miss Gellhorn is wise enough not to put her pity for Ruby into words, with the result that the child's tragedy is altogether pitiful and convincing.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

U. S. CAMERA 1936. Edited by T. J. Maloney. William Morrow and Company, $2.90.

This is the second annual issue of a volume modeled in physical form and in intention on the well-known French volume "Photographie." Many of the best-known as well as various less prominent American photographers are represented in well-reproduced plates, and by way of introduction there is an amusing squib on the divagations of the aestheticians of photography. Wisely the editor is committed to no theories and has gathered a riotous collection of pictures varying all the way from the conventional to the merely fantastic. Though solemnly debated for nearly a hundred years now, the question whether or not photography is an art is still really beside the point. The indubitable fact remains that people like pictures, and that photography has given them various kinds produced in no other medium. Just what is left after one has discounted the pretty-pretty on the one hand and the merely astonishing on the other may be still an open question, but the best way to settle it is to let the camera men do whatever they like. At the present moment they are very actively doing it. J. W. K.

THE LAST ENEMY. A STUDY OF YOUTH. By L. A. G. Strong. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Strong has taken the title of his new novel from I Corinthians xv: 26, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." The scene is a boys' school in England and the hero is a young master there—a very young master—whose experiences alternate between the realism of conversations which he overhears at Oxford about the recent war and the rather delicate hallucinations of his private mind, particularly on the subjects of death and survival after death. The novel is better than ordinary, but it would be still better if Mr. Strong had found a way to unify it. There is too much distance between the hardness of the war talk and the softness of the death theme; the first runs off into brutal hysteria and the second into something that sounds like spirit meetings. It is unlikely, however, that the demoralization of Oxford during war time will ever need to be "done" again; or that any reader will forget the Walpurgisnacht in which a dozen drunken students curse everything, including one another. DRAMA

What's Hecuba to Him?

THE production which has been given to "Daughters of Atreus" (Forty-fourth Street Theater) is a good deal less than satisfactory. Upon that point there can hardly be two opinions, and under the circumstances the fact is hardly a cause for surprise. No one knows precisely how such a play should be acted or directed because no one in the contemporary theater has had much opportunity to learn, and it is hardly to be expected that a style, harmonious and complete, should be brought to perfection during a three weeks' rehearsal. The play will never be given the production it really deserves until that time comes—if it ever does—when this particular kind of formalized dignity and this particular sort of more-than-human passion are as genuine a part of our theatrical tradition as realism now is.

The fact remains, nevertheless, that we shall not only do wrong to all concerned but cheat ourselves as well if we fail to realize that here is one of the most extraordinary American plays of a generation. Her heavy accent may mar the otherwise often impressive performance of the German actress Eleonora Mendelssohn, who plays Klytaimnestra; Joanna Roos, as Elektra, may seem somewhat lacking in force during the early scenes, even though she is, I think, very fine indeed in the last one. But that is not the point. The point is that even at its worst the production is not so opaque as to prevent the beauty, the originality, and the power of the play from coming through. Robert Turney, a young and hitherto unknown writer, has achieved a near-miracle: without outwardly spectacular innovations he has retold the whole familiar story from the sacrifice of Iphigeneia to the murder of Klytaimnestra in some fashion which makes it seem both old as time and fresh as the moment in which it is unrolled.

The intention of Mr. Turney's play is exactly opposite to that of "Mourning Becomes Electra." O'Neill, if I understand him aright, undertook the most drastic possible transmutation of the story because he wanted to show, not that Greek culture was still alive, but that we ourselves were capable of giving our own meaning to a series of events which, so far as the mere events themselves are concerned, might take place in any civilization. Mr. Turney, on the other hand, aims at something quite different. He modernizes only to the extent of shifting emphasis somewhat so that more stress is laid upon motive and also slightly more, perhaps, on something which I believe is fully implicit in some of the Greek versions

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they are well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and are apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain to harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D.D.

"FROM a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly." Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is one of "the bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. In THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no one need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, as the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

—namely, the essential conflict between dominant mores which enforced the duty of revenge and a growing sense of the evil of a code which did so. But he departs from tradition no farther for the very reason that his intention is the antithesis of O'Neill's, that instead of setting our culture against the culture of the Greeks, he assumes for the latter a still living vitality. Paraphrasing Hamlet's question, he asks, "What's Electra to us or we to her?" And he answers in a fashion which is somehow convincing, "Almost everything."

Why this should be, how a legend which was already archaic twenty-five hundred years ago when Sophocles and Euripides wrote their versions can be so moving today, I do not know. Perhaps it is because the childhood of Greece is our childhood in a sense more real than we, our understandings blunted by ten thousand fatuous repetitions of the fact, are aware. Perhaps because, for that reason, the emotional conflicts embodied in its legends are fundamental to us and find more satisfactory solutions as well as a clearer expression in them than in any later or more sophisticated story. But whatever the reasons, the fact remains that "Daughters of Atreus" is amazing in two respects.

For one thing it is astonishingly effective both as drama and as theater. The last scene, in which the aging Klytaimnestra, weary of life and weary, above everything else, of the effort to keep herself going on the bloody passion which has been the mainspring of her life, finds herself in this mood suddenly faced with Elektra and Orestes, both full of all that she is done with and ready to begin all over again that tale of woe which she thought lived out, is as moving as any I can remember in the modern theater. The speech in which she implores them to spare her, not for her sake but for theirs, is magnificent in itself but doubly so when it falls, as we know it does, upon the deaf ears of those who can only learn for themselves what Klytaimnestra cannot teach them. Each of the three acts has a climax almost as powerful, and yet I am not sure that this dramatic effectiveness considered merely by itself is as remarkable as the fact, mentioned above, that the whole seems so relevant in meaning and so immediate in its emotional appeal. I should hardly have supposed it possible that so old a tale could be retold with so little obvious reworking and yet again be felt through with such unmistakable freshness. It is seldom that I am moved in the theater as on this occasion I was.

Mr. Turney's chances for a "run" are, I am afraid, dubious at best. No such fears need be felt for Jacques Deval, whose "Tovarich" (Plymouth Theater) is undoubtedly set to repeat its European success. The reasons are obvious, for the little farce about two exiled members of the old Russian nobility who go into domestic service in Paris is staged in Gilbert Miller's best manner. It is also bright, high-spirited, and frequently very amusing, though I must admit that its sentimental passages left me slightly unhappy. "Iron Men" (Longacre Theater) is a slow-moving and all too obvious play about a certain gang of structural steel workers who appear as modern versions of the Three Musketeers. Probably it would never have been produced at all had not Norman Bel Geddes seen the opportunity it afforded him to set a skyscraper a-building upon his stage. Literal reproduction of a scene could hardly go farther, and in the very midst of the depression it might have drawn crowds anxious not to forget what the thing was like. Surely, however, some buildings are going up now, and the spectacle at the Longacre affords little that cannot be observed from a well-chosen position on the curb. Besides, I always thought that excavations drew even larger crowds.

RECORDS

COLUMBIA is re-pressing in a new series and at a higher price foreign records of special distinction, including some originally issued by subscription. The idea is excellent, and so is the beginning: an abbreviated version of Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" sung in French by Alice Raveau, contralto (Orpheus), Germaine Feraldy, soprano (Eurydice), Jany Delille, soprano (Eros and a Happy Spirit), the D'Alexis Vlassoff Russian Choir, with the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris conducted by Henri Tomasi. The performance is not without its occasional flaws, which are heard chiefly in the singing of Mlle Delille, and a phrase or two broken in disturbing fashion by Mlle Raveau; but these do not make Mlle Raveau anything less than a superb artist, or the performance less than a beautiful and moving presentation of the work. Columbia itself, however, deserves a rebuke for issuing a set of this kind with a mere synopsis instead of the complete text in French and English (eight records, $16).

From Columbia, also, comes one of Haydn's most exquisite and delightful quartets, Opus 33, No. 3, played by the Roth String Quartet, whose performance of it when they first came here was something of a sensation. Some of the vitality, the sparkle, the dazzling incandescence which I recall in that performance—particularly in the last movement—has gone out of it; but there remains quartet-playing exemplary in tonal balance and phrasing, and unsurpassed in feeling for the essential style of this music; and that is a great deal (three records, $5).

Victor has re-pressed Mozart's beautiful Piano Concerto in E flat, Köchel No. 482, in the performance of Edwin Fischer with a chamber orchestra under John Barbirolli, the new conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. The playing of the orchestra is excellent in technical finish and musical style; but don't take that as the complete answer to your question about Barbirolli. All it tells us is that he can do well with an orchestra that respects his competence and authority; whether Toscanini's orchestra will do that remains to be heard.

As for Fischer, he can play like a great artist, as he does in the piano's first entrance in the slow movement with a variation on the theme first played by the orchestra; he can also shock one by his bad taste, as he does in the piano's next entrance. This is a second variation on the theme; and such increased movement as Mozart desires he achieves by a bass (lower part) with more notes to each beat; but that he intends the beats to maintain their original pace he indicates not only by an absence of printed directions to the contrary but—and this should be even more significant to an artist—by having the orchestra play the original theme with the piano's variation. I say "more significant" because I would expect an artist to realize that by putting on a sudden burst of speed in the variation he was altering the character of the original theme. There are other lapses of taste on Fischer's part—his sentimentalizing of the concluding section of the movement, of phrases in the first movement; and I take it that the dreadful cadenza is his; or if not, that it represents his choice (four records, $8).

On other Victor single records (each $1.50) are Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, well played by Lhevinne; and two Händel items superbly sung by Marian Anderson; a Te Deum, and "Ch'io mai v: possa lasciar d'amare."

"Are Annuities Safe?"

Dear Sirs: Maxwell S. Stewart's article Are Annuities Safe? in The Nation of September 26 should have been captioned An Alarmist Looks at Life. I am so convinced of the safety of insurance that when you question the stability of insurance, I feel that you are undermining the United States government. Insurance funds are invested in the basic industries of the country.

You mention a return on annuities of 3 per cent to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I am inclined to think that you mean the interest rate the companies pay on dividend accumulations and trust funds. The return on annuities is larger. For example: a single premium of \$1,000 deposited in an annuity will yield a guaranteed return of 22.4 per cent based on age eighty-five, and 7.9 per cent based on age sixty. You mention the fact that money put in an annuity is beyond recall. That is true, but that does not seem like a drawback to me because \$1,000 deposited with the company to give you the generous return of 22.4 per cent for life is not invested with the company temporarily but is an exchange for a guaranteed life income; you should not expect to have the \$1,000 at your command as well as a life income.

As for the companies refusing to make loans in 1933, it was at the request of the government and not because of the diminishing cash reserve. As a matter of fact, the insurance companies have had more cash in the depression years than they know what to do with. They have a tremendous surplus just waiting for the kind of investments that will yield the interest rate they are pledged to pay and more.

The oldest insurance company, the Mutual Life is 102 years old. In the entire history of the business not one mutual company has failed to pay one death claim, one disability claim, or one matured contract.

MARJORIE BERCOVICI

Springfield, Mass., October 16

[This letter was written under the letterhead of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company.]

Dear Sirs: Please accept my thanks for the copy of the article Are Annuities Safe? I have read it very carefully and with great interest, and I want to extend to Mr. Stewart my congratulations on his clear understanding of the matter discussed and on his absolutely correct conclusion.

But on one or two important points Mr. Stewart's information is not in accord with the facts. He says: "... in New York and other states insurance commissions forced them [the companies] for a time to refuse policy loans except in cases of dire necessity." Now the facts of that moratorium are these, as reported by Morgan B. Brainard, president of the Aetna Life, to a meeting of his managers and general agents in the fall of 1933, just as the long six months' default was being lifted: In February, 1933, there was held in New York City a secret meeting of life-insurance executives attended by one or more representative of each life-insurance company in the East, as well as of some from other sections of the country. The subject discussed was the unbearable demand for cash-surrender values and policy loans under which the companies were then staggering, some of them failing. In the course of the meeting, according to Mr. Brainard, a certain life-insurance executive offered a resolution "requesting" the insurance commissioners to save the companies from ruin by declaring a moratorium on policy loans and cash-surrender values; the resolution was immediately seconded by another executive; and on being put to a vote it was adopted with but one dissenting vote.

Mr. Stewart is also mistaken when he states, "Insurance companies are probably fully as strong as the banks." This is not at all true; most of our banks have cleaned house and taken their losses, and continue to do business in the attempt to recoup at a later date. Practically no life-insurance company has done that.

City Planning at Harvard

Dear Sirs: I should be most obliged to you if you would correct an unfortunate impression made by a letter signed by Oscar Sutermeister and published in your issue of October 10.

Mr. Sutermeister refers to the "tragedy and injustice" of discontinuing the School of City Planning at Harvard, which now lies, he tells us, a "burnt offering on the altar of Tercentenary ambitions."

During the academic year 1936-37 no instruction in city planning, except for certain advanced students, will be given at Harvard, since it will be necessary to devote all the funds available for city planning to the completion of researches in this field which at the beginning of the year were already in process. In September, 1937, instruction in city planning will be resumed; and although this instruction will be on a scale substantially reduced from that of recent years, it will nevertheless be unsurpassed in quality or range by the instruction given in any other American university. The School of City Planning has been united with the Schools of Architecture and of Landscape Architecture to form the School of Design. This is an administrative adjustment which will in no way affect the character of the instruction in city planning.

Would It Work?

Dear Sirs: It was a refreshing experience to find the editors of The Nation, the New Republic, and the Herald Tribune in such amicable agreement over the ridiculousness of the President's suggested plan to call a peace conference of the heads of governments. The Nation's alternative to the President's "fantastic" plan, to sit and wait for trouble until it comes, confirms a suspicion I've entertained for a long time concerning the similarity between conservatives and so-called liberals when a bold, unconventional plan to prevent world-wide disaster is presented to their unimaginative minds.

To line up behind the President's peace plan would give a setback to the isolationist spirit triumphant even over the best of our peace societies today. Once the necessity of preventing other peoples' wars, if we ourselves want to stay out, is established it will be comparatively simple to create the essential international political and economic reorganization on which to build a real, all-inclusive, democratic, non-military Federation of Nations. But we sarcastically refuse to support Roosevelt's "fantastic" peaceful attempt to achieve a warless world, leaving it to the militarists to uphold his spending fantastic billions on armed defense.

This convinces me that today's most urgent medical need is a serum with which to inoculate liberals against the fear of being ridiculous. The militarists are immune. Two madmen, Mussolini and Hitler, disregarding the world's laughter, disappointed the learned doctors hoping to kill them with ridicule. Now the whole world trembles at their every new antic.

Difference of Opinion

Dear Sirs: Mr. Adamic's articles on the assassination of King Alexander is reminiscent of the fantastic rumors and persistent misstatements which filled Europe in July, 1914, after the murder of Franz Ferdinand.

In the beginning of his tale Mr. Adamic accurately describes the murder as one of the great mysteries of recent years. Then he proceeds partially to solve it by asserting that French officials "gave the assassin almost direct aid in the commission of his deed." The proof of this sensational charge is a composite array of what even Mr. Adamic admits are rumors, newspaper stories (found in French and Balkan newspapers!), and rhetorical questions answered in a hoarse whisper. He ends the piece by reaffirming his complete ignorance of the solution of the mystery.

Without appearing pedantic, I wish you would bring to Mr. Adamic's attention the news that "the established fact of history that twenty years earlier . . . Franz Ferdinand was given no protection on arriving [in Sarajevo]" is really a rumor; the two leading students of the Sarajevo murder specifically deny the "fact." (See S. B. Fay, "The Origins of the War," Vol. II, Chap. 2; B. E. Schmitt, "The Coming of the War," Vol. I, Chap. 3).

FRANK J. MANHEIM

Schenectady, N. Y., October 12

Dear Sirs: I have read with great interest Mr. Adamic's excellent and well-reasoned article concerning the assassination of Alexander Karageorgevich and believe that you may be interested in the following additional facts.

Shortly after the happenings in Marseilles, a lieutenant and spokesman of Dr. Ante Pavelich, one of the leaders of the movement for Croatia independence now held incommunicado by the Italian police, admitted to me that Pavelich had received substantial sums of money from Count Ciano, the son-in-law of Mussolini, at that time chief of the Italian Propaganda Bureau.

This spokesman of Pavelich told me this in order to show, as he said, the duplicity of the Italians, who first had encouraged the assassination and then right after the event arrested Pavelich. He added that the Italians are holding the release of Pavelich as a permanent threat over the Yugoslavs in case the latter should enter any diplomatic combination directed against Italy.

On Murdering Slogans

Dear Sirs: Heywood Broun expresses doubt, in your issue of September 26, that the Greeks and Romans ever "took popular slogans and placed them on some rack by which they could be stretched wholly out of their natural shape and length." Let him be assured that they did. One example will suffice. In the latter part of the Peloponnesian War the oligarchs raised the cry "Back to the constitution of our fathers" (patria politeia). This slogan was bandied about Athens and apparently took in a great many through its very speciousness and vagueness. It goes without saying, however, that the "ancestral constitution" the oligarchs had in mind bore no more relation to the pre-Solonian constitution than the Chicago Tribune's "freedom of the press" does to the well-known constitutional guaranty; a fact that was clearly demonstrated during the two brief periods in which the oligarchs bullied their way into power.

The Shape of Things

THE ROOSEVELT SWEEP WAS NOT ONLY A Democratic triumph. This is shown by the impressive victories obtained by non-Democratic progressives in all sections of the country. In Nebraska, Senator Norris, running as an independent, has beaten both his Democratic and his Republican opponent. In Idaho, Senator Borah has emerged as victor from one of the bitterest battles of his career. In Minnesota, as we go to press, Congressman Lundeen, Farmer-Labor, is leading by a small margin in the race for the Senate. Wisconsin has sent at least six members of the La Follette Progressive Party to Congress, and has reelected Philip La Follette Governor. Despite the overwhelming Roosevelt sweep in Massachusetts, the notorious Curley has been defeated for the Senate. The one important exception to the general liberal trend was in New York, where Congressman Marcantonio lost to his Democratic opponent by a small margin. In Texas, Maury Maverick, one of the few outstanding progressive Democrats in the House, pulled through in a surprisingly close contest. Kopplemann, foe of the arms manufacturers, won in Connecticut. Less encouraging was the minor-party vote. Although returns are as yet fragmentary, it is apparent that Norman Thomas is running far behind his 1932 vote. New York City gave Thomas approximately 40,000 as compared with 122,000 four years ago. The Communists, on the other hand—despite their alleged support of Roosevelt—polled 32,000 as against 24,000 in 1932. In contrast to the admittedly disappointing showing of the Socialists, the approximately 300,000 votes cast for the new American Labor Party in New York State contain a promise that a new political alignment may be an indirect result of the Roosevelt landslide.

NOW THAT THE CAMPAIGN IS MERCIFULLY concluded, we feel as limp as an old mop left out in the rain. The poor old mop, indeed, has been rained on pretty steadily for four long months. Predictions, promises, accusations, threats, and straw votes have provided a tempest that has blurred our eyes and deafened our ears since June. In our exhausted state we were able to get up statistics only for the month of October. In that time, as reported in the New York Times, Mr. Landon made twenty-three speeches; Mr. Roosevelt made nineteen; Mr. Bleakley beat them all with twenty-nine. In addition there were thirteen by Knox, six by Hamilton, four by Al Smith, four by Father Coughlin, eighteen by Governor Lehman, five by Ickes, three each by Hull and Wallace, and four by the Postmaster General (when he works at it). Mr. Thomas was not reported very often, but it is safe to say he made about three a day. Mr. Browder, as reported in the Times, made one speech and three tries. Add some thirty-five to that for his total. This probably does not cover the field completely, but it gives you the idea. Other statistics, less reliable but equally important, are as follows: The New Deal was mentioned with enthusiasm 78,924 times; with sneers, 85,964. Twenty-seven miles of news film was used to show candidates in various attitudes of hand and hat waving. Just under 900,000 radio tubes blew up and burst. Forty-seven tons of torn-up paper was swept off the streets by 6,799 brooms working on double shift. The debauch is now over. The first plank on The Nation's platform for 1940 will be Shorter, Softer, and Sensibler Campaigns. Pardon us now. We have a date with a Beautyrest.

IN WHITEWASHING ITALY AND PORTUGAL of the charges of violating the neutrality pact, the London Non-Intervention Committee displayed a fine feel for politics and an utter contempt for facts. As Frank L. Kluckhohn, correspondent for the New York Times, pointed out on the following day, one does not need documentary proof that the fascist countries are aiding the rebels. The insurgents have already furnished all the evidence necessary. It is common knowledge that Franco and Mola did not have more than fifteen airplanes between them in the early days of the conflict. Recently the Corunna radio station boasted that 160 planes flew over Madrid in a single mass demonstration. The insurgents had no tanks in the early weeks of the conflict; a number of correspondents have recently described, with the permission of rebel censors, the effectiveness of new Italian whippet tanks. Ammunition for the special type of rifle used by the fascists has recently appeared on the front. None of these supplies could possibly have been produced in the part of Spain now held by the rebels. If the Non-Intervention Committee has no proof that they came through Portugal or Italy, that is in itself the most damning evidence that it is either hopelessly inefficient or blindly partisan.

AS WE GO TO PRESS, THE UNITED STATES IS landlocked by a strike of waterfront and sea-going workers which has virtually tied up American coast shipping and, in New York City, is being extended to transatlantic boats as well. Harry Bridges is the actual leader in San Francisco, and his name is the watchword at every other port. In California the objective of the strike is the holding of gains won in the 1934 walkout; the new demands which the employers have refused to accept, thus precipitating the strike, are the Maritime Federation's answer to the owners' open assertion that they intended to wipe out those gains. They represent a strategic assertion of union strength, not picayune obstacles to a settlement. The solidarity of the West Coast unions is another dramatic answer to the embattled shipowners. In New York the rank-and-file seamen have walked out in sympathy with their West Coast brothers. Beyond that, however, their objective is to take over control of the International Seamen's Union, which has been about as militant as a company union, and to set up an East Coast Maritime Federation to match the Pacific organization. Needless to say, the solidarity, strength, and discipline so far displayed by the unions are bound to inflame the minds of the giant red-baiters that have made California famous. We may expect red scares and atrocity stories and appeals to the government to end the Communist menace. What the government does in this extremely ticklish situation will provide an immediate index to its labor policy for the next four years. Meanwhile the union card is taking on new significance. In New York City no reporter is admitted at strike headquarters unless he can show that he is a member of the Newspaper Guild in good standing. This too is a reflection of the spirit in San Francisco, where, as one sailor put it, they look for the union label even on the hamburgers.

WHEN IT COMES TO ATTACKING THE REGIME in power the French rightist press could take the Herald Tribune, the New York Sun, and the Hearst papers, roll them all into one, start them off at the peak of their preelection frenzy, and still win in a walk. The big Paris papers, Figaro, the Temps, the Jour, and the Action Française, plus the conservative press all over the country, have subjected the Front Populaire government to a brutal campaign of invective which has not stopped at barefaced lying, libel, personal defamation, and even advocacy of violence. Moreover, since the advent of the Blum regime many fly-by-night journals have appeared to breathe poison on the government, their support, it is suspected, being drawn from the ample funds of the German Propaganda Ministry. Reform of the press was one of the pledges of the Blum program which had to wait until after the more pressing problems of labor legislation, nationalization of arms manufacture, reform of the Bank of France, and devaluation had been solved. But now the news has come that at the November session of the chambers Blum will present two measures, one to put an end to personal defamation by tightening the libel laws, and another requiring all papers to publish their sources of revenue. Also welcome is the news that Charles Maurras, leader-writer for the Royalist paper Action Française, who was indicted for incitement to murder at the time of the February riots of 1934, has been sent to prison for eleven months. His bloodthirsty articles calling for the death of 140 deputies who advocated sanctions against Italy led directly to the murderous attack on Blum's life last winter.

THE THUNDER OF MUSSOLINI'S ORATORY ON November 1 sounded around the world, and the reverberations have not yet died out. For Il Duce, ostensibly talking to the people assembled in front of the cathedral in his old home, Milan, in fact addressed fateful words to the governments of Europe. To Italy's weaker neighbors he spoke words of conciliation and promise. To Germany he offered his country's "vast sympathy" and full collaboration in the crusade against communism. To France he administered a rebuke, asserting that Italian friendship, chilled by sanctions, could hardly be restored until France recognized the conquest of Ethiopia. To England he shouted defiance, promising that if Italian interests in the Mediterranean were threatened, the people of Italy would "spring to their feet like one man ready for combat." For the operations of the League of Nations he reserved his deepest contempt. He dismissed as illusions the ideas of collective security and disarmament. He attacked sanctions as an "iniquitous siege against the people of Italy." He sneered at the League itself, declaring, "As far as we are concerned it can perish." Thus in a few words the fascist dictator swept aside the efforts of the great Western powers to establish peace on the status quo, and announced his own "armed peace"—the peace of the dissatisfied nations—to be achieved through increased armaments, the rectification of boundaries, and the war against communism. The line-up was made startlingly clear; and it must be admitted that determination, recklessness, and a fair number of just grievances are ranged on the side of the fascist bloc; while Britain and France are bogged by vacillations and an unwillingness to right, or even recognize, existing wrongs. Mussolini and Hitler are in a strategic position to nourish and harvest Europe's bumper crop of ill-will, and both have announced their intention to do so.

THE EASING OF TENSION BETWEEN CHINA and Japan can have only one explanation. Meeting a strong opposition in China which it hardly expected, Japan has backed down in its extreme demands rather than face the certainty of a Sino-Japanese war. When it is recalled that five Japanese were assassinated within a period of thirty days, and that Japan rushed gunboats and troops to China with every apparent intention of bringing severe pressure, its sudden soft-pedaling is all the more significant. In 1932 Japan did not hesitate to invade Shanghai when five Japanese priests were attacked by a Chinese mob. Although they met determined opposition from the Nineteenth Route Army, the forces under Chiang Kai-shek maintained a scrupulous "neutrality" which enabled Japan to pull through after weeks of bitter fighting. This time, however, the anti-Japanese feeling in China has become so aroused and articulate that Chiang can no longer remain on the sidelines, and Japan is seemingly wise enough to realize that it would have little to gain and much to lose in a protracted war.

OVERHEARD IN A PULLMAN SMOKING CAR the night before election: "If that man Roosevelt turns to the left in the next two years, the United States is going to be another Spain. I know thousands of men, including myself, who would be willing to take up arms against the government in order to stop him."

Will Roosevelt Go Left?

MR. ROOSEVELT'S smashing triumph has left the country dazed and happy. A Roosevelt victory had been expected by most of the political observers, but an electoral vote of more than 500 and a popular majority of about nine million are more than a victory. They are the crushing, unmistakable answer of the American rank and file to all the powers and principalities of reaction, now and to come. It is still hard to believe, but true. And each man in his own heart is happy that he stands massed with millions of his fellows in his desire for a decent living and a decent world.

Whose is the triumph? First of all, President Roosevelt's. In the face of one of the most rancorous campaigns in our history, the election is a tribute at once to his statesmanship and his showmanship. Despite returning prosperity, despite the political advantage of the work-relief rolls, another man in Mr. Roosevelt's place might easily have lost. He might have fallen prey to the opposing newspaper campaign, to the red scare and the atheist scare and the pay-envelope scare, to the huge campaign funds that were loosed against him. It was Mr. Roosevelt's tactics and timing, his talent for exposition, his sustained energy, his unruffled good humor—above all, the remarkable educational job he did in his whole campaign—that were such large factors in his victory. It is a triumph also for labor, which now emerges from this election with greater political prestige than it has ever before had in American history. And it is, finally, a triumph for the good sense of the common man and his capacity to remain unfooled.

Whose is the defeat? Not primarily Mr. Landon's. He was a little man caught in one of the blind alleys of history, forced to defend a losing cause with the rusty weapons of well-worn shibboleths like "Americanism" and "liberty." Two weeks from now he will be the most forgotten of all the forgotten men who have sought the Presidency and have lost. A special niche will have to be carved for him in the realm of American political oblivion. But the great defeat belongs to the men behind him and the interests they stand for. The rich are grieving in America today—the du Ponts, Henry Ford, Alfred E. Smith, the Liberty Leaguers, the big battalions of Wall Street, and their wives, who, organized in various "legions," bestirred themselves against Mr. Roosevelt with a concentrated hatred hitherto unknown. The men of ill-will are grieving—William Randolph Hearst, Paul Block, the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, the Reverend Gerald Smith, and their ilk. The unwary are grieving—and in this category we must place our contemporary the Literary Digest, of hapless straw-vote fame. All these are grieving but their grief is of little importance. For the Landon minority was, like all propertied minorities, vociferous far beyond either its numbers or its place in the community life. And the Roosevelt majority was, like all majorities of the plain people, inarticulate except when it had a chance to greet its candidate and—most important—when it came to the polls.

We take it that the election was not a triumph for the Democratic Party. Never since 1912 have the people so blithely played ducks and drakes with party lines. It was a triumph for three things: for a man, for a point of view, for a direction. The man is Mr. Roosevelt. The point of view is progressive and involves the assumption of increasing government responsibility. The direction is toward the left—that is, toward progress in social legislation, the protection of labor's rights, the curbing of big enterprise.

The American people have, in short, given Mr. Roosevelt a mandate. When they elected him by a landslide in 1932 their vote was mainly a protest against Mr. Hoover and his policies. When they reelected Mr. Roosevelt in 1936, by an even bigger landslide, they placed their stamp of approval not only upon him but upon his policies as well. They have shown that, for all the charges of radicalism hurled at Mr. Roosevelt during the campaign, they want those policies continued and extended. "We have only just begun to fight," repeated Mr. Roosevelt again and again in his Madison Square Garden speech. And the applause may be read in the election returns.

We should like to take Mr. Roosevelt at his word. We should like to believe that this fight of his—against the vested interests, against the holding-companies and the market riggers, against labor spies and company unions and slums—is really only in its initial stage and that the best is yet to come. But we must beware of being over-sanguine. Mr. Roosevelt has had four years of the Presidency, and after four years the will to reform slackens unless it is deeply rooted and massively fortified. Mr. Roosevelt has reason to be a tired man. He is also a sensitive man. He does not like being disliked and being hounded as a traitor to his class. He is, most important of all, limited in his vision by his antecedents, his education, his class roots. Already there is talk of healing the scars of battle, and there will be more of the same talk for the next months. By all means let us have peace. But let us not fling away all the fruits of victory in our desire for the goodwill of all groups.

Will Mr. Roosevelt move left? The past years have taught us that questions like this are answered by three sets of factors. One is the nature of the economic situation and the necessities that flow from it. The second is the men in office and the philosophies they hold. The third is the strength and organization of the workers and their allies. The first two we now know. The third is in the making, and it is the most important of all. Let us assume that Mr. Roosevelt has the will and the energy and the fiber to carry out over the next four years the mandate the people have given him. What remains is that the workers and the farmers and the liberal middle-class groups shall build a framework within which this can be done.

THE second of Max Lerner's two articles on the American progressives has been crowded out of this issue by the pressure of other material. It will appear next week, and will deal with the position of the left groups in the light of the Roosevelt victory.

"Peace" and the C. I. O.

NOW that the election is over, that section of the American labor movement represented by the Committee for Industrial Organization, which has been devoting most of its energies to the cause of Mr. Roosevelt, may be expected to get down to its own business, the organization of steel and the other mass-production industries. At a meeting to be held November 7 in Pittsburgh the members of the C. I. O. and the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee will meet to take stock of the organizing campaign to date and formulate plans for the future. The members of the C. I. O. may also discuss the "peace proposal" put forward by Max Zaritsky of the United Hatters, Cap, and Millinery Workers; they will certainly devote a few words privately, and we hope publicly, to the manner in which this incident has been handled in the columns of the New York Times.

It was about a month ago that a writer on the Times reported sighting a dove of peace hovering over the two armies into which the American labor movement divided when the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor suspended ten of the unions represented in the Committee for Industrial Organization. It all began at a luncheon in honor of Abraham Cahan, editor of the Jewish Daily Forward. Matthew Woll, who with William Green is a reigning favorite of the Socialist Old Guard in New York City as well as a prominent member of the A. F. of L., said that labor must sink its differences in the face of its enemies. In reply, Max Zaritsky of the hatters' union, who is himself a member of the C. I. O., said that he too hoped for unity but saw a necessity for a "reshuffling of cards" in the federation. It was several days later, according to the dove fancier on the Times, whom we shall hereafter call Joseph Shaplen for short, that Mr. Zaritsky pulled the bird of peace out of a hat at the annual convention of the millinery union, clapped it firmly in a cage, and set out to bring A. F. of L. and C. I. O. together in a love feast. Since then Mr. Zaritsky, with the Times reporter at his heels, has been carrying the bird around to the tune of long-winded stories, exclusive to the Times, replete with quotations from Mr. Zaritsky and with rumors gathered in vague "labor circles" of peace, compromise, and dissension in the C. I. O. ranks.

The unfortunate part of it for the Times is that the dove of peace has not alighted yet; moreover, the suspicion is widespread that the dove is a decoy or that the Times, to shift our metaphor, is being used as a second-hand machine-shop for grinding Old Guard axes.

The facts are relatively simple. (1) At the annual convention of the hatters' union David Dubinsky made a speech in which he mentioned the "talk about peace" and stated that he too would be happy to see peace. He said, however, that the only basis for peace was a change in the A. F. of L. policy which would make it possible to organize the mass-production industries on a complete industrial basis. (2) The same convention passed a resolution. It was a long statement in which the executive council was denounced for its attitude toward the unions in the C. I. O., and the C. I. O. was given whole-hearted defense and support. To this statement was appended the "peace proposal," which contained two parts. It called upon the executive council "to permit the organizations affiliated with the Committee for Industrial Organization to be represented in the next convention"; it proposed that pending judgment by the convention the executive council name a subcommittee to meet with a like subcommittee of the C. I. O. "for the purpose of jointly exploring the possibilities of reconciling the existing differences and finding a formula by which the hopes of all workers for the unity of the labor movement and the organization of the workers in the mass-production industries may be realized." The first part of the proposal can have only one meaning: the hatters were asking the executive council to lift the suspension of the ten unions, since that alone would make it possible for them to participate in the Tampa convention this month.

The resolution of the hatters was transmitted to both Green and Lewis. The executive council agreed to the second of the two proposals. It appointed a subcommittee to meet with a committee from the C. I. O. but committed the council to nothing. It ignored the first and crucial recommendation. Mr. Lewis asked for clarification. Then the committee appointed by the A. F. of L., in an obvious bid for separate peace with individual unions which are known to value their A. F. of L. affiliation very highly, wrote a letter to Mr. Zaritsky saying it was willing to meet with any individuals or individuals representing unions affiliated with the C. I. O. To this splitting tactic Mr. Zaritsky replied that action must be collective.

On the basis of this clear-cut situation, however, the Times's New York labor expert built up an elaborate campaign of which the themes were (1) that the C. I. O. was crumbling and begging for peace, and (2) that John Lewis was delaying peace by not accepting terms which would mean the end of the C. I. O. and all it stands for! There is not space for a detailed case history, but a few examples of Times headlines in chronological order will indicate the outlines of the campaign:

A headline on October 5 reported "Peace Overtures Made to the A. F. of L. by C. I. O. Leaders. Dubinsky Says Group Is Ready to Dissolve if Organizing of Steel Workers Is Pressed. Green Hails the Offer." This story related, among other things, that Green's statement had been obtained by telephone from Washington.

On October 7 a Washington dispatch signed by Louis Stark gave rise to very different headlines: "Lewis Denies Move for Peace in A. F. of L. He and Green Differ on Dubinsky's Speech." In this story it was stated that Mr. Lewis looked upon Mr. Dubinsky's statement as a reiteration of the position of the C. I. O., and the dispatch contained the following sentences: "Disagreeing with Mr. Lewis, who quoted Mr. Dubinsky as insisting that the executive council should agree to organization of certain mass-production industries along industrial lines, Mr. Green said it was his understanding that Mr. Dubinsky would abandon the C. I. O. if the A. F. of L. supported an organization campaign in the steel industry. This version, said Mr. Green, was conveyed to him on the telephone by the New York Times from New York [our italics]."

Lewis quoted from a copy of Dubinsky's speech, and his version agreed with that given by Dubinsky himself to Edward Levinson in the New York Post on the day the Times "interpretation" appeared. But the campaign continued, and on October 9 it was reported that "Lewis Joins Peace Move." Lewis was in New York, and his "joining" consisted in a statement that he was ready to enter into negotiations with the executive council, provided the council, then in session, rescinded its suspensions. There followed long accounts of Mr. Zaritsky's movements and opinions, which reached a climax when he went to Washington to see Mr. Lewis. At this point two dispatches from Washington again introduced a note of reality. The first related that "Labor Peace Move Strikes New Snag. Lewis Demands Clarification of Council's Stand on Lifting Suspension." The second recorded a "Move to Split C. I. O. Begun by A. F. of L. New Committee as Its First Step Seeks to Pull Unions Away from Lewis Banner. Letter Sent to Zaritsky. But Hatters Head Insists on Collective Action." After that the New York stories were filled with reproaches of Mr. Lewis. "Lewis Unions Irked by Delay on Peace." "C. I. O. Head Refuses Quick Peace Move."

On October 25 the campaign against the C. I. O. and Mr. Lewis reached a climax in a story headed "C. I. O. Drive Fails, Steel Men Assert. Executives Say Only 4,000 Dues-Paying Members Have Been Signed Up So Far. Split Is Held Imminent. Peace Overtures of Dubinsky and Zaritsky Seen Spurred by Depletion of Funds." Mr. Shaplen has denied being the author of this vicious mélange, but he must take the credit for preparing the way for it, and the story contained all the familiar phrases, including the charge that the "peacemakers" were still "irked."

On October 27 the baiting of Mr. Lewis continued. Although he had arranged for a meeting of the C. I. O. immediately after the election and had come to New York to help carry the state for Roosevelt and not to talk peace, the headline ran "Lewis May Decide Course Here Today. His Reply to A. F. of L. Offer to Talk Peace With C. I. O. Awaited by Colleagues. Four to Meet at Rally. Insurgent Labor Chief's Delay Protested as Unions Fear Ban at Tampa Session."

The four met—and there was also a fifth in the person of Mr. Shaplen of the Times. It is reported that Mr. Lewis at that time complimented Mr. Shaplen on conducting "the greatest one-man propaganda campaign I've ever seen."

It is to be hoped that a formula can be found which will allow the industrial unionists a free hand in the mass-production industries without splitting the labor movement in two; but the October "peace" campaign in the Times was designed to obstruct unity, not to hasten it.

The Times is the most influential journal in America; its leads are followed by all other newspapers. Likewise the Committee for Industrial Organization and the job it has set out to accomplish—the organization of the unorganized—constitute the most important development in recent American history. When, therefore, a reporter on the New York Times is permitted to use its columns to distort and discredit the position of the C. I. O. it becomes a matter of vital public interest; and it becomes necessary to warn readers of the Times that articles on the C. I. O. emanating from New York City are not reliable.

How Real Is Recovery?

WHETHER by good luck or good management President Roosevelt went into the election campaign with economic conditions better, on the whole, than at any time since the end of 1929. The tide of recovery set in so relentlessly in the last few months that the campaign against the New Deal on economic grounds virtually collapsed, forcing the Republicans to fall back on vague and ineffective charges of "dictatorship" and "communism." The fact that the majority of traders in the stock market were strong Landon supporters did not prevent them, on the eve of the election, from bidding stocks to the highest level in more than five years. Many of the directors of the United States Steel Corporation must have been disturbed at the possible political effects of announcing, just a week before the polling, the largest earnings for a three-month period since 1930, together with a projected wage increase. But the facts of the business upturn are too glaring to have been concealed even if it were so desired, and what good business man does not put profits ahead of politics?

Even before the recent favorable announcements by the steel companies, the New York Sun, scarcely a pro-Administration paper, pointed out that the aggregate net earnings of the first 113 industrial companies had increased nearly 47 per cent in the third quarter of 1936 over their earnings in the same period a year ago, while the net profit of the same companies in the first nine months of 1936 was 52 per cent higher than in the corresponding months of 1935. The earnings of the steel companies will push up these various averages materially. Corporation outlay has also increased, though not as rapidly as earnings. Dividends declared in the first nine months of the year totaled $2,521,902,358 as compared with $2,030,929,120 in 1935—an increase of 24 per cent. The indices of business activity, employment, and pay rolls have lagged considerably behind those of profits, but have also shown considerable improvement. In August the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production reached 107, which was higher than the average for any year since the index was established with the exception of 1926, 1928, and 1929. The more current indices of the New York Times and the Annalist indicate that this rate was maintained through September and October. Aided by better business conditions, the revenues of the federal government surpassed a billion dollars in the first quarter of the present fiscal year, making the best first-quarter showing since the depression. Foreign trade, though still seriously depressed, has also shown encouraging gains and has returned to the normal export surplus.

Despite this impressive showing, hints of uncertainty about the future are beginning to find their way into the financial pages. An official of one of the larger automobile companies recently declared that his company wished to be clearer about prospects for 1937 before it committed itself to a further program of expansion. Doubts have been expressed regarding the ability of steel consumption to keep pace with the present rate of production. Retail sales are still running nearly one-third lower, in dollar value, than in 1929, although the price level is not more than 15 per cent below that of seven years ago. In spite of a considerable rise in employment, there are still at least ten million unemployed. The National Industrial Conference Board recently pointed out that while production was within 15 per cent of that of 1929, employment was 19 per cent under the pre-depression level. And this, of course, makes no allowance for the net gain due to the fact that the number of young men and women who have come into the labor market in recent years is much greater than the number withdrawn by death or retirement.

No one will deny that business activity is a direct function of profit-making. Business men will only spend money on expansion when earnings are good and increasing. But the extent to which earnings can rise depends, in the last analysis, on consumer buying power. The fact that a larger and larger proportion of the national income is going into dividends and profits means that the supply of funds which is available for investment is increasing more rapidly than the potential buying power. During the past three and a half years this has been more than offset by the great increase in farm income—partly the result of devaluation—and by government spending. Once started, the upward trend of the cycle has been accelerated by capital expenditures for new equipment and machinery, and even if government expenditures were stopped, the recovery process might extend well into the next year on its own momentum.

Sooner or later, however, the natural forces which have worked toward prosperity will burn themselves out. The normal length of the business cycle in the past has been seven to eight years. Seven years have already passed since the Wall Street débâcle of 1929. The first three and a half years of this period were years of steady economic deterioration; the succeeding three and a half years have witnessed steady improvement. While the upward movement of business normally takes somewhat longer than the decline, the time has arrived when prudent business executives will make a careful appraisal of the situation. Should government spending continue, there need be no early anxiety. Nor need we expect a recession if there is definite evidence—which so far is lacking—of a sharp credit expansion for business purposes. Such a development, once it got under way, would create new purchasing power and push the country well along the road to inflation. But with our millions of unemployed and with world trade at a low ebb, there is even less stability in the Roosevelt boom than in the New Era, concluded under Mr. Hoover in 1929. And more than ever before our national welfare is dependent on an intelligent understanding of economic affairs at Washington.

Madrid Keeps Its Nerve

BY LOUIS FISCHER

By Cable from Madrid

AFTER breakfast today, when I began to write this dispatch, the rattle of the typewriter keys was mixed with the roar of fascist bombers, the ear-piercing whine of alarm sirens, and the strains of the International sung by new recruits marching down the Gran Via. Yesterday foreign airplanes honored us with three visits, Friday with four. The day consists of intervals between bombings. Nobody knows when they will come or where it is best to stay when they do. On Friday I inspected five places where the bombs hit. In Calle Nuncio a bomb killed five women standing in a milk queue and struck the pavement, making a three-inch dent. Then the bullets and shrapnel it contained sprayed the street and passed through an open doorway. A woman was sitting on the stoop with her two-months-old baby. The baby had fallen asleep; it never awoke. The mother's head was blown off; the child's body was crushed back into the mother's body. "And they call themselves Christians," commented a sixty-year-old woman when I climbed to her third-story room, which had just been opened to the sky by a bomb.

Indignation is the general reaction to these repeated bombings of peaceful civilians. "They've lost," my maid declared this morning. "That's why they are frantic." These air raids can have no military object. The government will not lose its nerve or leave the capital. It is a fight to the finish. Perhaps the rebels have lost their nerve. This week loyalist aviators bombed almost all of the important enemy airdromes and inflicted severe damage on planes and hangars without themselves suffering the slightest damage. Was it this startling development which made the fascists so wild with rage that they seek revenge on women and children, or are the Madrid bombings simply a sample of what fascists do when a real war starts? That Italian and German pilots should attack noncombatant Spaniards with bombs and machine-guns without provoking a protest so violent as to force democracies to intervene to protect Spain's progressive republic is a pretty fair gauge of the world's moral caliber these days.

About a hundred persons, the majority of them children, perished as a result of this week's bombings. Madrid answered with hundreds of men volunteering for military service and a multitude of women applying at the nurses' corps. (I stopped here and went out for lunch. While I ate roast lamb—Madrid is not starving; indeed, the food situation has improved recently—the sirens sounded again, the second time today. Guests at forty tables proceeded with their meals as though nothing had happened.)

The outcome of the war will not be determined by these cruelties. It will be decided on the various fronts. It does not take long to get to the front. I left my hotel in Madrid at 3:30 today and reached the second line at four. Here the Communist "Fifty" regiment, which is holding this sector, has fortified a convent by digging three semi-circular trenches around it. While I stood on a hill two mammoth bombers appeared over Parla, twenty-one kilometers from Madrid, and dropped bombs on it which sent smoke up from the mountains. At one o'clock this afternoon two government tanks supported by infantry retook the village of Parla, which the loyalists had evacuated several days ago. The enemy is bombarding it from the air, using cannon shells which burst in full view with mighty booms. Airplanes bomb, circle, then bomb again with complete impunity, for the government apparently has no fighting planes to drive away these giants. They fly at a height of 1,500 meters, where no shots from the earth can reach them. As I watched, fascinated by the violence and power of this murderous performance, three tri-motored Junkers zoomed overhead. I dashed for cover on the slope of the hill, but soon regained my senses. There is no protection from the destruction of these weapons. Fortunately they were not interested in this spot. Madrid was their goal.

The rebels may retake Parla tomorrow; the government may reoccupy Valdemoro tomorrow, and lose it the next day. Opposing forces on this as on all Madrid fronts seem more equal now than they did a week ago. Moreover, the morale and discipline of the loyalists have been noticeably stiffened by the presence of political commissars, by the better work of new staff officers who prefer the front line to the War Ministry, and by the appearance of fast tanks. The moment a tank goes into action soldiers follow it with enthusiastic cries.

Pushing the enemy back village by village, however, is a costly affair in time, materials, and men. Madrid talks of a flanking offensive to cut off the enemy around Madrid and to compel him precipitately to retreat. (In general, Madrid talks about everything. There are no secrets in this war. Amateur strategists in cafes are almost as numerous as fighters at the front.) The government's Foreign Legion, if it can be prepared soon enough, will probably constitute the spearhead of such a movement. This unit consists of Communists and Socialists from various European countries—no Soviet Russians—and much hope is reposed in it. Its friends expect to reinforce it in time with British, Irish, and American contingents. The Foreign Legion will be ably seconded by increasing numbers of Spanish battalions, which are quickly losing their timidity under fire. The same companies which I saw bolt a fortnight ago when a bomber hove into view, now disperse in orderly fashion, lie down, and reassemble when officers give the all-clear signal. At the front a Communist said to me, "See that white wall. We shot a Communist there this morning because he was sowing panic."

Campaign Dirt

Washington, November 2

THE period of emotional let-down that follows a Presidential election is the time to consider the dirty and shameful tactics that were employed to bring about this or that candidate's defeat. Then and then only do they appear in all their truly hideous contours, and then and then only is there a chance that their employers and beneficiaries will be properly shamed by a review of them.

The Presidential campaign that will have ended before these words appear in print has been no dirtier than many of its predecessors, if comparisons are restricted to the kind of mud thrown. The difference, if any, has been in the mud-slingers; in the campaign of 1936 the catapults of obscenity were manned almost entirely by our Best People and Leading Citizens. Even in this respect the 1936 campaign deserves no marked distinction, for it has been generally true that the stratum of our society whose members are most certain that they comprise the gentry has always surpassed in personal vilification the ward-heelers it despises.

In compiling this space-limited Schimpflexikon of the 1936 campaign I shall confine myself to the less-publicized canards and pass over the various attempts, oral and printed, to prove the White House under Roosevelt merely an outpost of the Kremlin, and I shall not dwell on the contemptible frauds perpetrated in pay-envelope slips and posters concerning the Social Security Act, but pause only to point out that the ostensible elite of the nation took the lead in both attacks. For a different but quite obvious reason I shall pass over all the little leaflets attacking the private lives of the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, including especially the pamphlets dealing with Mr. Roosevelt's physical infirmities.

What remains that is printable divides itself into two categories—the anti-Semitic and the anti-Negro. Neither represents an innovation in Presidential campaigns in this country any more than does the line of attack that may be euphemistically described as the medicinal. But it is probable that the anti-Negro and anti-Semitic attacks—and especially the latter—have been used to a greater degree this year than ever before.

The anti-Negro attack, later vociferously exploited by anti-New Deal newspapers in the South, including the Charleston, South Carolina, News-Courier, first broke out into the open at the grass-roots convention at which Gene Talmadge pontificated—with members of the Southern Committee to Uphold the Constitution serving as celebrants, acolytes, and deacons—when insinuatingly captioned photographs of Mrs. Roosevelt in the company of Negroes were circulated. They continued to circulate throughout the Presidential campaign. And who financed the convention at which they received their initial distribution? Why, some of our leading Liberty Leaguers, including the du Ponts, who may have deplored the resultant publicity but seem never to have deplored publicly the use to which their money was put. Thomas F. Cadwalader, a Maryland gentleman and Liberty League leader in the Free State, when cornered by reporters, expressed regret that some of his money had been used to finance a convention utilizing so ugly a propaganda device, but saw no reason why he should resign from the S. C. U. C. or withhold further contributions.

A certain letter was distributed to Democratic women in many parts of the South. It is a long letter, addressed to "My Friends of the Southland," and says in part:

Do you realize the activities of Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt in spreading Communism in your beloved Southland? They are deeply involved in the many Negro organizations such as: The Struggle for Negro Rights, the Scottsboro Case, THE ANGELO HERNDON PETITION COMMITTEE (all advocating equality with whites, even marriage) and Communistic Plans for a Negro Soviet South (The Bible Belt.) Mrs. Roosevelt's picture appears many times at their meetings, or receiving with them, also at the White House. See the Washington issue of "AFRO-AMERICAN" of April 21, 1935, headed "THE FIRST LADY HELPS THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE GET 600 NEW MEMBERS" (The N.A.A.C.P. is cooperating with the Communist Party Organizer.) Secretary of the Interior, Harold Ickes, was the speaker February 26, 1936, at the National Urban League. Blacks and Whites were seated together, about 60% being Negroes . . ."

This letter was mailed from the Stevens Hotel, Chicago, and inclosed with it were a number of leaflets, including one prepared by "American Women Against Communism, Box 296, Grand Central Annex, New York," baring a plot to "carve out of the federal territory a NEGRO REPUBLIC." The letter itself was signed by Mrs. Lowell F. Hobart, an Ohioan and former president-general of the D. A. R.

Here is a fat manila envelope addressed to an official of a national organization, and it is not the first envelope of its kind or contents received during the campaign from the same source. The envelope says the sender is Henry B. Joy, Detroit, Michigan. Mr. Joy, whose wife is a former national officer of the D. A. R., is himself a leading Liberty Leaguer, a former president of the Packard Motor Car Company, and a member of the directorates of the United States Chamber of Commerce and the American Protective Tariff League. The envelope contains five documents, and the fattest among them is an anti-Semitic book let widely used in the campaign. The remaining items in the envelope are (1) a flier put out by the "American Vigilant Intelligence Federation, Chicago," purporting to be a reprint of an article by Kalinin from the first page of the Moscow Daily News, showing pictures of Roosevelt, Kalinin, Bullitt, Troyanovski, and Litvinov under the caption "An Era of Fruitful Cooperation"; (2) another attempt to paint Roosevelt as Stalin's paid understudy put out as "Letter No. 34" by the New York State Economic Council; (3) a flier entitled "Kick the Money Spenders Out of the Temple"; and (4) a pamphlet issued by the American Indian Federation, Washington, entitled "Now Who's Un-American? An Exposé of Communism in the United States Government," consisting chiefly of an attack on the American Civil Liberties Union and Roger Baldwin, who is pictured as in cahoots with Roosevelt.

The pièce de résistance in the collection is the anti-Semitic booklet "Toward Armageddon," published by the Militant Christian Association, Charleston, South Carolina, and composed of editorials by "The Squire of Krum Elbow," which made their initial appearance in the Highland, New York, Post, owned by one of Mr. Roosevelt's neighbors. On the booklet's inside cover other pamphlets are advertised, including "The Jewish Question," offered by Sawyer, 601 Fox Building, Detroit; "Anglo-Saxon Israel," offered by Adam Rutherford, of the same Detroit address; Mrs. Dilling's "The Red Network"; and the output of the now notorious Edmondson Economic Service, New York. From the last-mentioned office have come many other anti-Semitic leaflets widely used in the campaign, including a list of "America's Jewish-Radical Masters," who, we are urged to believe, boss Roosevelt; the list runs to sixty-two names including, in addition to Baruch, Brandeis, Frankfurter, and Albert Einstein, the names of Newton D. Baker ("wife's name was 'Leopold'"); Cordell Hull ("wife's maiden name reported as 'Rosa Witz'"); Senator Wagner ("of Jew-controlled Tammany"); Marriner Eccles, a Mormon; Tom Corcoran, a Boston Irishman; Bill Bullitt, Philadelphia socialite; and A. A. Berle, Jr., son of a Congregational minister and Tufts College professor of Christian theology. The list of anti-Semitic literature used in the campaign against Roosevelt could be lengthened interminably. Any such list must include the Revealer, a Christian News-Journal, published at Wichita, Kansas, by the Reverend Gerald B. Winrod, D.D., and featuring on the first page of its October 15 issue "Roosevelt's Jewish Ancestry," illustrated by a genealogical chart that fails to bear out the article's contention that the President is a descendant of Rosenbergs, Rosenbaums, Rosenblums, Rosenvelts, and Rosenthals. Like the booklet "Toward Armageddon"—which talks of "ritual murders" and does more than hint that Roosevelt had Senators Cutting, Long, and Schall and Governor Ritchie murdered and that Al Smith has shunned the White House for fear of being poisoned there—all these anti-Semitic publications attempt to revive the old Protocols and Elders of Zion canard and show that "a formidable sect" controls the White House so long as Roosevelt is in residence there.

What the Steel Workers Face

BY ROSE M. STEIN

KENNETH KOCH worked for the Weirton Steel Company for fifteen years. During the 1933 unionization drive he was an active officer of the union and was one of the chief witnesses against the company in the famous Weirton Steel suit precipitated by the federal government under the NIRA. Much to his own surprise he was not fired for his activity. This August he was sent as a delegate from his district to a state Democratic convention, and there took an active part against the company stooges who had invaded the Democratic ranks to seek nomination for local offices. Kenneth Koch is young and energetic; he is well liked in the community, and his support of local candidates carries weight. His opposition to company candidates was the last straw and on his return from the convention he was fired. Within a week he was taken on as a paid organizer for the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee.

Plant management was annoyed. As long as Kennie was in the mill he exercised a certain amount of caution in order to hold his job. Now he was free to do his best as an organizer—his worst from the company's point of view. Something had to be done. But getting rid of Kennie was no easy matter. Twice within two weeks he was called on the telephone and told in plain unaccented English: "Mr. Koch, we want to warn you that we are going to wreck your car tonight." But Kennie knows the ways of Weirton. "They want me to shoot at them," he said, "but I won't." Both threats were carried out. The car was parked in front of the house. While Koch and a couple of his friends sat quietly on the dark porch, a yellow coupe known to belong to Weir's private police passed by, and one of its occupants hurled a brick that broke the windows of Kennie's car. Another brick was hurled at the house, striking the screen door. Koch had his car fixed and went on organizing.

One of the jobs of the local organizer is to distribute Steel Labor, official paper of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee. The first time Koch did it he was unmolested. Almost every worker who came along took one. Some of them were in cars and when they stopped they held up traffic. Company police watched from across the street but made no move. It was too good to last, and it was rumored that the next time something would happen to Kennie. As a precaution he asked the county sheriff to protect him, and the sheriff solemnly promised to do so. On September 11, at three in the afternoon, when the shifts change, Kennie and another organizer, Steve Barron, took their stand about a block from the strip-mill gate. Like Koch, Barron had two counts against him. He was an organizer and he was also running for constable on the Democratic ticket. After a quarter of an hour a man known to be a "spotter" came up and took a paper. He then walked to a car parked nearby. After a brief consultation five huskies got out of the car, and the six men moved toward the two organizers. Splitting their ranks, three of them passed behind the two men and three in front of them. Then one, standing directly in front of Koch, opened the paper between them and directed a blow which Koch was just quick enough to duck. As he dodged to the side, two others grabbed his feet, threw him to the pavement, and dragged him about twenty-five feet, kicking him while the leader of the gang croaked, "We'll send him to the hospital this time for sure." A crowd quickly gathered and Koch's three assailants disappeared. Meanwhile the other three had landed a few blows on Barron. He managed to remain on his feet, however, and dashed into a shoemaker's shop, where he grabbed a hammer. By the time he got back to the scene of battle all six had packed into their car and driven away. They merely drove around the block, however, and then came back to the "clock house," where the men punch their time cards.

Barron came off with a black eye and Koch with a bruised leg. There were so many witnesses that the assailants were easily identified. They were arrested and held for the grand jury. But the grand jury was made up of Weirton business men who could find no true bill against the slugging six, one of whom remarked when he heard the jury's decision, "Now we can do it again."

They did. On October 16, in front of the mill hospital, Koch was attacked by twelve men, identified as members of Weir's reorganized spy force and known as the "Hatchet Gang." This attack was in part the basis of the charge of terrorism by Ernest T. Weir brought before the La Follette committee by Philip Murray of the steel-organizing committee.

The union men have had another lesson in Weirton justice. During the campaign they showed their resentment by political independence. It was not safe for a man in Weir's own stronghold to show a sunflower in his lapel. He was not beaten up; his car was not wrecked. He was merely greeted with a chorus of boos so full of contempt that none had the courage to face it.

As the steel organization drive progresses, it becomes increasingly evident that one of the obstacles it must overcome is the sense of betrayal engendered by the failure of the American Federation of Labor to organize and support the half-million steel workers during 1933 and 1934. Section 7-a fanned into flame a long-smoldering revolt against the poverty and misery of the depression years; and the employers, taken by surprise, offered less resistance than at any time since 1892. Before they could collect their wits unionization was in full swing in the steel towns; steel workers were filled with a sense of freedom such as they had never known before and were flocking to the union. It didn't matter who the organizer was. He had only to call a meeting and the hall was filled. Every union gathering took on the air of a revival meeting, with converts rushing down the sawdust trail to get their membership cards. True, many did not pay dues or initiation fees. How could they? Work was scarce and wages were meager. But the spirit was there. Frequently lodges were formed without the knowledge of the union's international office, let alone its aid. By June, 1934, approximately 100,000 workers had signed applications to join the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers.

The mere signing of a card may not constitute bona fide membership or bring dues into the union treasury. It does represent the first important step—a loosening of the iron grip of the steel management. Unfortunately, leaders of the Amalgamated did not see it that way. They counted only dues-paying members. Locals which did not pay promptly were left to get along as best they could. In turn the locals lost interest in the international, and paid dues only for the number of members necessary to retain their charters. But some of the local lodges grew with amazing rapidity. In Weirton, for instance, where labor had never been organized, where union organizers had been convinced of the desirability of leaving town the moment they entered it, where even the 1919 drive had produced no results—the Weirton plant was the only one that worked full force throughout that strike—8,600 out of 10,000 workers joined the union in 1933. In a strike called September 25 of that year the plant was shut down so tight that E. T. Weir himself could not enter without permission from the strike committee. Deputy sheriffs and police were let loose on the scene in full force, but the plant remained shut until the government concocted a settlement which became the first step in the well-known and long-drawn-out litigation. In the process of that litigation the union was so effectively crushed that when the present drive began the lodge did not even have the ten members necessary to keep the charter.

Considerable progress was made in many other localities. In Duquesne, at the Carnegie-Illinois Steel plant, 3,200 out of 4,000 employees signed up. In the whole Pittsburgh area, with the sole exception of Homestead, 50 per cent or more of the steel workers signed. The Youngstown and Gary districts also developed a large union membership. It was to be expected that a union which grew more in protest against misery and depression than because of any conscious understanding of the long-range purposes of organization should be subject to a high mortality rate. But new recruits were constantly added. The organization needed only guidance and clarification. These it did not get. The international officers were either afraid of a large rank-and-file union or too stupid to realize what was happening. When they did appear at meetings they rarely offered constructive advice but concentrated on red-baiting. Leadership was left exclusively in the hands of a few active and sincere rank-and-filers, who were nevertheless confused and inexperienced. They got along fairly well, however, until the companies began to apply the old pressures. Then the union began to lose ground. The entire industry was operating at less than half its capacity, which made possible discrimination and intimidation through the allocation of work. Union men were assigned harder jobs with lower pay or they were given only one or two days of work a week, while non-union men got full time. Then came outright dismissals. At first the companies hesitated to fire officers and acknowledged leaders, but that would clearly be the next step if the organization continued to lose strength.

For most of the rank-and-file leaders the American labor movement began with the passage of the NIRA. They had taken part in strikes, though they had never led one, and they knew it was labor's most effective weapon. Why not make use of it? Thus originated the threat of a steel strike in the summer of 1934. Fortunately the strike never came off. The international leaders sabotaged it, and the rank-and-file leaders had neither the resources nor the experience to carry it through. The companies, on the other hand, were prepared for a first-class war. The record of the Senate Munitions Committee has since disclosed that practically every steel company was an armed camp at the time. But while it was perhaps wise to call off the strike, it was negligence of the first order not to provide a substitute means for building the organization. William Green pleaded eloquently against the strike on two major premises: first, that the government would appoint a steel board "with teeth in it"; second, that the A. F. of L. would undertake to build a strong steel union. The Steel Board was appointed but it was toothless; its jurisdiction was questioned and its decisions ignored. Neither the federation nor the Amalgamated lifted a finger to build the organization or to maintain what organization already existed. The men who had joined were left high and dry. Some lost courage and quit. Those who persevered were dealt with by the companies in a fashion they will not soon forget. They were demoted, fired, evicted, had their mortgages foreclosed. By early 1936 the organization had been practically wiped out, the few surviving lodges driven underground. None of the fired men whose reinstatement was ordered by one or another of the labor boards was taken back. The rank-and-file leaders of 1933-34 were either given good jobs on condition that they would remain "sensible" or they were locked out permanently and forced to seek other means of making a livelihood. Only one survived in the movement and is now an organizer.

These experiences are fresh in the steel worker's mind. The present Amalgamated lodge in Homestead is called "The Spirit of 1892," in memory of the struggle of forty-four years ago. No D. A. R. ever took greater pride in her revolutionary forefathers than does a Homesteader in the father, grandfather, or uncle who took part in the 1892 strike, and the number of participants is increasing as rapidly as the number of those who came over in the Mayflower. But while courage is thus remembered and admired, the fear of reprisal cannot be ignored. It is too close to everyday existence. The public knows of the open warnings issued to steel workers through the press. Foremen, superintendents, and assistant superintendents repeatedly utter individual threats. For the last few months the steel industry has been operating at the highest rate since 1930. For the first time in six years these workers and their families are not confronted with stark poverty and starvation. To join the union openly now is to risk losing one's job and to face starvation again. Admittedly this fear is the greatest single obstacle to the present drive.

On the other hand a surprisingly large number of the workers realize that their position is equally precarious outside the union. The reason is the growth of mechanization. Continuous-process mills are springing up at an alarming rate. The United States Steel Corporation has budgeted $140,000,000 for new plants. The Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation recently borrowed $40,000,000 to finance new mills. The Bethlehem Steel Corporation has just opened a new $20,000,000 mill. The Weirton Steel Company already has a continuous-process tin mill. The new highly mechanized equipment is bound to throw many skilled and unskilled men out of employment. The unskilled worker is used to it, but the skilled worker is seriously alarmed.

In the present drive every precaution is being taken not to expose the worker to the eye of the stool pigeon or to the wrath of the employer. Those who sign applications become members of the Amalgamated and of the C. I. O., but no local lodges are formed and no record of membership is kept anywhere save in the central regional offices. Ordinarily, as soon as a lodge is formed, local members are elected officers and are obliged to hold business meetings for members only. Since such meetings must necessarily be held in the community, the boss, through his spies, readily obtains a record of members. Under the present arrangement only two kinds of meetings are held—large mass-meetings held in the open and really secret meetings attended by a chosen few in somebody's kitchen or in the woods at night.

With the exception of the employees in one or two small plants and the members of two independent unions, who joined in a body, there has been no wholesale recruiting in the fashion of 1933-34. But membership cards stream in from every important steel community. No announcement has been made of the number of members to date. When the S. W. O. C. finds that in its judgment enough steel workers have joined its forces to justify its claim to bargain for the entire industry, it will notify the Iron and Steel Institute. If that body refuses recognition, as it probably will, the next step will be decided upon. For the present there is neither talk nor expectation of a strike.

The experience of 1933 and 1934 had one lasting and important result—the strengthening of class consciousness. Save for the professional labor prostitutes who appear in the newsreels to plead the bosses' cause or serve in other ways as stool pigeons, the steel workers no longer trust their employers.

It is too soon to appraise the present drive in steel, but several facts stand out clearly enough. The C. I. O. is here to do the job which the federation should have done three years ago. It must do the job now, for not a single one of the unions which comprise it is really safe as long as the basic industries, and especially steel, remain unorganized.

Reaction Rises in France

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, October 14

AFTER a hard summer hope is bracing the foes of the government to vigorous action. With the chambers in recess, the summer was a season of plans, maneuvers, and combinations; the saviors of the nation have worked hard—and it must be admitted not without some success—on all fronts, political, social, economic, financial, legal and extra-legal, and even, if certain dark rumors are to be believed, military. By the end of last month they were ready to ring up the curtain and give the country a preview of their labors. The country was duly impressed; one might even say startled. The people, who only six months ago had voted overwhelmingly for the left parties and for a left program, had no notion that the credit of the Front Populaire and the ministry had been so badly shaken by recent developments.

The oligarchy and its political friends are perhaps a little too hopeful. But there is no blinking the fact that grave conflicts have in the last few weeks been straining the left coalition almost to the breaking-point. Hardly less serious are the discords within the Radical Socialist Party.

Faction-ridden in the best of times, the Radicals have since the elections of last spring found fresh points of friction in the decline of their party, for the first time in many years, to second rank. The moderates—the Ere Nouvelle and République groups, the Lavalians, and the like—hold the alliance with the Marxists responsible for that calamity, and urge that the party detach itself without delay and stage a comeback now before the right and the fascists can profit from the collapse of the Front Populaire. Chautemps seems to be heading this group—that is the meaning of his talk about new elections—in opposition to the Cot-Daladier clan.

But all the Radicals are profoundly disturbed over the plight of the middle classes, which with the peasant-proprietors form the bulk of their support. They are aware that until prosperity returns to France, all the laws and palliatives propounded by the government to save the petty bourgeoisie are doomed to be ineffective. And they know, too, that it is not the government but the government's foes that are keeping the country from settling down to work to make a new prosperity possible.

If the strike of last spring was a spontaneous workers' movement for better wages and conditions, the new strike wave afflicting the country is deliberately provoked by the employers. This holds true of the textile strikes that broke out in the north three weeks ago, the recent waiters' strikes, and the hundred and one conflicts which keep the country seething at the present moment. The motive of the employers' associations is not merely economic—to evade the agreements they were obliged to sign last June. They are primarily political. By discharging active union men, by delaying ratification of the collective contracts, by withholding promised wage increases and even reducing wages, by permitting or encouraging rival Croix de Feu "unions," they drive the workers to frequent stoppages and renewed occupation of plants, and thereby arouse public opinion, cause dissension among the parties in the Front Populaire, and cast discredit upon the government as lacking the authority to keep order.

All this, seemingly, is part of the tactics elaborated by the opposition in the last few months. But it is only a fraction of the program. Another section is addressed to the consumer. Prices of all sorts of articles soar "to meet added labor costs." Many commodities are unobtainable "owing to occupied plant" or "because boatmen are on strike" or—since the beginning of October—"on account of devaluation." These stereotyped phrases seem to issue from a common source.

Then there is the renewed activity—under political-party labels—and the increased armament of the semi-military leagues, not merely the Croix de Feu but all the others, including the "Agrarians" of Count D'Halouin (alias Dorgires), who, after giving no sign of life for the better part of a year, some three weeks ago organized the truck growers' strike with the avowed purpose of "starving Paris." Unhappily the government cannot in this instance be absolved of blame. It neither effectively suppresses the leagues nor treats the "parties" under which they masquerade fairly. The irrepressible Colonel bluntly challenged the Minister of the Interior recently to do one or the other. Fair-minded Frenchmen who shudder at his very name conceded that "La Rocque was right."

Why are not the leagues suppressed? The satirical weekly Canard Enchaîné suggests a solution to the mystery which is less absurd perhaps than it appears. "If the tinest little tiff comes up between the partners of the Front Populaire, the Count, without so much as a wink from anyone, gets busy and mobilizes his fascists—and lo! the honeymoon returns to shine benignly on the coalition of left parties. It's a useful and unpaid servant like this man that Salengro has the cheek to want to suppress!" In fairness to the government it must be admitted that to abolish De la Rocque and his rivals would merely result in uniting the half-dozen factions under the banner of Doriot.

The Communists deserve a chapter all to themselves. Only a few weeks ago the Front Populaire parties and groups took the motto: "Whoever attacks the Communists strikes at the Front Populaire." But now that the leagues and reactionary groups, in the classic fascist manner, are concentrating their fire on "the hordes of Stalin," scarcely anyone seems disposed to defend them. What has happened? A number of things—first of all, in chronological order, the Spanish civil war. The Communist meetings were critical of French neutrality, and Humanité was outspoken. For a time Jouhaux and the C. G. T. and some of the left papers, like the Lumière, shared the Communists' attitude. Then Blum called in his friends and laid his cards on the table. Everybody else quieted down; the Communists did not. Unkind persons said the Communists cared more about their propaganda than about the Front Populaire or the peace of Europe. Then came devaluation. During the campaign even the Socialists had said, "Neither deflation nor devaluation," and the posters and orators of the right are not letting them forget it now. The Communists—to save their faces, say their foes—after voting the measure, called meetings of their followers to explain that they had given their approval not to the cheapening of the franc but to the Front Populaire. Finally, it is pretty generally agreed that they have done themselves as well as the government much damage by insisting, despite the pleas of the Cabinet, on holding meetings in such touchy provinces as Alsace and Lorraine—even after their big meeting at the Parc des Princes had obliged the authorities to mobilize 20,000 men to prevent disorder.

Meanwhile the country is showing signs of recovery. In a month or two it is quite possible that the good effects of devaluation may make themselves felt with sufficient strength to save the credit of Blum and the Front Populaire.

Mrs. Simpson and Palace Politics

BY AN ENGLISH EDITOR

By Cable from London

AN ENGLISH journalist is the last person competent to comment on the rumored royal marriage. In the first place, the surrounding events, so widely and intimately described in the American press, are completely unknown here. Mrs. Simpson is not a distinguished or even a well-known figure in England. A close student of the court circular and the traditional press releases from the palace might have learned that among the untitled persons who now crowd around the King there might sometimes be found Ernest Simpson and rather more frequently his wife. During the royal cruise photographs appeared of the King accompanied by, among other ladies, Mrs. Simpson. Beyond this there has been no indication in the English press that the King entertained any feelings toward Mrs. Simpson other than those of a host toward his guest.

The only thing which has so far given any basis for even the limited rumors circulating among the masses has been the failure of the press to handle the Simpson divorce. The palace gave the hint that publicity was considered undesirable. In any case the English press law on divorce prevents the reporting of any of those formal yet intimate details of adultery which must be strictly proved before the court will grant a dissolution of marriage. These factors had a curious effect on the reporting of the actual divorce itself. For example, the Conservative Daily Telegraph sent two reporters to Ipswich but only gave the divorce a paragraph. On the other hand, the Liberal News Chronicle, though saying nothing about the King, spun out the meager details permitted by law into a big center-page story. Thus those readers of the News Chronicle who had never heard of Mrs. Simpson were puzzled that she should receive such publicity, while those who had heard about her had only done so in relation to the King and were therefore even more mystified that her principal claim to fame was passed over. Thus the result of palace interference in this as in other cases was directly opposite from that intended, and rumors are now much more frequent; but outside London they have still only a very limited circulation.

Politically the most important factor in the situation for the moment is that most people in England know nothing of the King's friendship with Mrs. Simpson or of the possibility of their marriage. In the restricted circles where something is known two distinct rumors are afloat: first, that Mrs. Simpson will be raised to the peerage at the expiration of six months when the divorce becomes absolute and will then marry the King. True, for a long time there has been talk of the King cementing the bonds of empire by marrying a colonial; but Mrs. Simpson, though a Canadian through marriage to Mr. Simpson, is hardly the type of bride the empire politicians had in mind, and the King's marriage to her would without doubt produce a far-reaching constitutional crisis. Some indication of the strength of this rumor is afforded by the city quoting a special but high rate—eight guineas per cent—on a postponement of the coronation for causes other than the King's illness, the death of a member of the royal family, or war, which but for the Simpson affair would cover all contingencies. This, coupled with a rise to 26 per cent on the insurance rate against the King's marriage, shows that the city contemplates marriage, accompanied possibly by abdication, but it shows little else. Lloyds is notoriously credulous. The second rumor in well-informed circles is that the King does not intend marrying Mrs. Simpson and that his feelings toward her are not of that nature. He regards her, say some palace observers, as an interesting companion and a most valued adviser but nothing more. There is yet no information available to show which, if either, rumor is correct, but the chances against the King marrying Mrs. Simpson are much higher than is indicated by the city rates.

Politically in England the affair is not a major issue. The Daily Worker, which published a special number ridiculing and attacking the marriage of Prince George, has not yet mentioned it. Indeed, the affair at present appears only to play an important but subsidiary part in the underground political battle going on in the palace. Under King George there was a definite palace clique composed mainly of the older, duller, more respectable peers. Typical of this class were Lords Derby and Salisbury. Derby, whose principal claim to fame was that without participating in the war himself he persuaded millions of others to enlist with his Derby recruiting scheme, is fat, sporting, and correct, unlike Lord Lonsdale, who is only fat and sporting. Salisbury is a dry, lanky second-rater, an invariable officeholder in Conservative administrations, distinguished only as the sponsor of innumerable still-born bills to increase the power of the Lords. Both Derby, through his son in the government, and Salisbury, as head of the Cecil family, are closely connected with the Conservative Party. Supported partly by two archbishops and the Queen, they have taken the lead discreetly in rallying the aristocracy against the new pleasure-seeking palace set, inadequately restrained by Sir John Aird, who is the virtual head of the palace household. They aim to compel the King, whose political rather than social instability they fear, to conform to those traditions of bourgeois domesticity established by George V, which the Jubilee and the royal funeral showed to be capable of almost unlimited exploitation by the National government. In this struggle to make the King a good Conservative, Mrs. Simpson serves merely as an unimportant peg on which to hang rumor.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IRVING DILLIARD of the editorial staff of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch brings out in the November Harper's an extremely interesting fact about the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court on minimum-wage statutes. In going over the decisions of the court in the three leading cases he says that he "made an astonishing discovery: that while the Supreme Court killed minimum-wage statutes in 1936 and 1923 and divided evenly on the issue in 1917, actually a majority of the justices participating in these three cases declared that such legislation was constitutional!" His analysis of this paradox shows that ten judges—Hughes, Stone, Cardozo, Holmes, Brandeis, Taft, Clark, Day, Pitney, and Sanford—favored minimum-wage legislation, while Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, Butler, White, McKenna, and Roberts voted against it. That the decisions were opposed to minimum-wage laws—in one case tied—was therefore due to the accidental composition of the court at the time the decisions were filed. The conservative judges seem to have been longer-lived than the others! Justice Hughes, when Governor of New York, once said: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is." Mr. Dilliard thinks that an unjust use has been made of these words of Governor Hughes. None the less he poses this question: "If someone is bold enough to suggest that, with respect to minimum-wage legislation, the Constitution is rather what the judges who stay on the bench longest say it is, who can contradict him?"

Mr. Dilliard also points out that if the deaths and resignations of justices and the appointment of new members since the District of Columbia case had been such as to establish a court including Hughes, Taft, Holmes, Brandeis, Stone, Cardozo, and Sanford, the New York law pronounced unconstitutional this year would have been upheld by at least seven to two. All of which brings out how accidental are the decisions of the court; how the sacred Constitution is preserved to us often because death does or does not stay his hand. It is a lottery the outcome of which is affected by a number of factors, including the personal predilections and point of view of the man who happens to be President. That this is the case has come as a great shock to many Americans who have been brought up to believe that the court is a magnificent, sterilized institution whose members divest themselves of all prejudices and economic beliefs on taking their seats and then pass upon legislation with sole reference to the basic law of the land.

Since Mr. Dilliard's article was written, this question of minimum-wage legislation has again presented itself to the Supreme Court. At its first meeting of the new term it declined to grant a rehearing in the New York case but did agree to hear a case which involves a similar statute in the state of Washington. In Illinois and other states deep concern is felt over the unfavorable decision, and it looks as if the issue would continue to confront the court until it is decided aright. How and when that will take place is obviously guesswork, but the situation brings up again the question whether the Supreme Court should have the right to nullify social and labor legislation. It was one of the disappointments of the Presidential campaign just ended that there was no real discussion or debate of this vital problem.

Soon after Mr. Roosevelt's denunciation of the decisions of the Supreme Court as putting us back into the horse-and-buggy age I offered to bet (with no takers) that the President would not again refer to the Supreme Court or the issue involved until he was safely reelected—or defeated. That proved to be the case, and speculation is therefore rife as to whether he will bring forward in his second term this question of the Supreme Court—whether that body has not exceeded its functions in dealing with social and economic issues, and/or whether it should be deprived of its present power. If the President chooses to lead in that direction we shall have another tremendous debate in and out of Congress, perhaps the most vital constitutional debate in our history, with the country clearly divided between those who believe the Constitution to be sacrosanct and untouchable, and those who maintain that it must be modernized, that Congress must have that right to legislate on social and economic conditions which adheres to parliaments in all other great countries. Even in Czecho-Slovakia the new Constitutional Court may declare a law passed by the legislature to be unconstitutional only upon a motion by one of six public bodies, three of which are branches of the legislature itself.

That the problem is surrounded by great difficulties no one can deny who read Professor Charles A. Beard's article in The Nation of April 1 last. Ordinarily quick to take a position, Professor Beard could only urge: "It may be well for all parties to the constitutional dispute to wait a while." "Meanwhile," he said, "the search for and clarification of fundamental principles proceed." I for one feel that the policy of drift cannot continue indefinitely and that it is vital to the future of the Republic in this hour when it is menaced from left and right that the issue be clarified, and that the Congress receive the power to deal finally with social and economic issues, though the Supreme Court's right to annul legislation relating to civil rights and personal liberty should still be preserved. There is where we need a real bulwark, as the readiness of our legislatures to pass teachers' oath bills and anti-red and anti-syndicalism statutes clearly shows.

THIS is written before Election Day, but when it appears the result will have been decided and Roosevelt, Landon, or Norman Thomas will have been selected as the next President of the United States. Fortunately the problem I wish to discuss will remain of interest no matter which one of the three has been elected. I am thinking of the needs and necessities of labor for the next four years. If labor had been powerful enough in the year 1936 it might quite possibly have passed up all three men. Franklin, Alf, and Norman, all leave much to be desired from the point of view of organized labor.

Personally Mr. Thomas would probably do his best to cooperate, but he would be badly handicapped by some of the most influential factions in his own party. Dan Hoan has certainly not succeeded in making Milwaukee a workers' paradise. I am not suggesting at all that the agreeable Mr. Hoan could have set up a little Socialist oasis in the middle of a capitalistic country, but he cannot entirely escape the blame for the low estate of organized labor within his city. It would be unfair to call Hoan a red-baiter, but he is jittery for all that and looks under the bed at night. When the Communists announced in the last municipal election that they intended to indorse him, he went into a dither and issued a statement declaring that it was a dirty plot to discredit him and that he would not accept votes from the reds.

When the Newspaper Guild strike first broke in Milwaukee, it was mistakenly assumed that the guild leaders had fomented a conflict in the belief that a Socialist city would be the best of all towns in which to try conclusions with Hearst. A good many of us knew beforehand that Dan Hoan was just a little reactionary around the edges, and we were confirmed in that belief before the strike was a week old. Most of the labor leaders of Milwaukee are also members of the Socialist Party, and they are in addition vain and timid bureaucrats very much afraid of the name and fame of William Randolph Hearst. It was my function on several occasions to attempt to placate labor men who grew angry when the guild strike committee tried to cut the red tape in which they wrapped our efforts. I remember being very apologetic and pouring a great deal of oil on one Socialist in particular. He said that the guild had made many mistakes.

"The worst one you've made," he said, "is about your picket line. I've been reliably informed that Communists have been seen on your picket line. You'll have to change that or forfeit the support of labor in Milwaukee."

I had been kotowing so long that my forehead was sore but now I straightened up. After all, we had had as many as 4,000 pickets out on one or two occasions. We had asked all who wished us well and who were with us to join the ranks. And so I said, "That we won't do. We wouldn't want to and in any case we couldn't. The Newspaper Guild will not set up a board of examiners at the head of the picket line and establish a set economic or political test for marchers. Those who were with us are with us."

The rule remained like that. If this article finds Norman Thomas the President-elect, I trust that he will tend to curb red-baiting by the Wisconsin wing of his party. I trust he will cease to be irritated at the work which John L. Lewis did for Roosevelt and come out much more forcefully than he has done as yet in favor of industrial unionism.

But perhaps the successful candidate is not Norman Thomas but Alfred M. Landon. Naturally I will grant that labor would be worse off under a Republican than under a Socialist administration. Landon will not be much moved by verbal arguments. In spite of a few cover-up speeches toward the end, he ran rather defiantly as the enemy of organized labor and in particular the bitter foe of the industrial type of union. At the moment he would be pretty contemptuous of labor's power. In the event that Landon is now President-elect it will be necessary to push the organization of steel and motors as rapidly as possible. Labor, in order to save itself from a hostile Administration, will have to show its power on the picket line if it is to moderate in any way the unfriendliness of Landon.

But perhaps Franklin D. Roosevelt has won. Does that mean that labor has crossed over Jordan and reached the promised land? Don't be silly. Paul Ward said before the election that the only difference he could see between Landon and Roosevelt was that Landon would call out the troops against the strikers in the first week and Roosevelt would wait until the second. I do not think Mr. Ward should have spoken of such a colossal difference so casually. A good strike is won in the first week. But taking Ward's words rather more symbolically than literally, I think there is small question that Franklin D. Roosevelt's labor policy will be very much governed by labor's own strength.

Some of the blanket condemnation of the NRA is quite unfair. Codes conferred very considerable benefits on workers in those industries which were well organized and none at all where unions were weak or non-existent. Indeed, although I was one of the bitter critics of Mr. Roosevelt during the NRA days I think there were times when he had a right to say that his own indecision and vacillation in regard to certain codes were no greater than William Green's.

Labor's job and labor's obligation are perfectly plain no matter who sits in the White House. It must develop a large and aggressive organization. It must organize not only the mass-production industries but also the white-collar workers and the unemployed. And it must organize along industrial lines.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

OUR BEST-KNOWN WRITER

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WHEN the eighteen volumes of James Boswell's private papers were recently brought to light, it became possible to know their subject more intimately than any other man who ever lived. Few persons were ever more interested in either themselves or others, and by comparison Pepys was almost reticent. Now the discovery and publication of the original manuscript from which the "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides" was rewritten* adds another and valuable item to the most richly documented of literary careers. Of it the prospectus says, "It will have the unique distinction of being the first edition, published 163 years after it was written, of a work that has been famous for generations"; and the description is justified.

Those who are familiar with the notebooks from which Boswell composed the "Life" of Johnson know how completely they dispose of Macaulay's libelous paradox by revealing that the "Life" is the best of biographies, not because its author was a fool, but because he had a superb sense of character which gave him an almost unrivaled skill in turning a phrase or pointing an anecdote to make it more "Johnsonian" than it actually was. Here the interest is somewhat different, since in many ways the original draft is better than the finished work for the very reason that it is less formal, considerably fuller—about half again as long—and a good deal more frank. For publication Boswell eliminated many picturesque details which he replaced by generalities, discarded bits which might be too offensive to living persons or which revealed his "revered sage" in all-too-human aspects, and permitted Edward Malone to help him revise the often easy colloquial style into formal eighteenth-century prose. Here, however, we have about three-fourths of the work as it was written—part of it actually on the tour—and the version to which Johnson himself gave the praise Boswell so proudly records.

Unless I have overlooked something, there is not, to be sure, much that is factually of great importance, but there is much that makes the whole thing more vivid and more intimate, which gives us a realer sense of actually accompanying the strange expedition. If one is to go with the incomparable pair it is better to know that at Elgin they got "good fish, but beef collops and mutton chops which absolutely could not be eat" than merely that "we fared but ill at our inn here" as the published text has it; and if we are interested in the sage it is better that we shall have all of him even when he is calling a Scotch clergyman

"the most ignorant booby and grossest bastard." There is a curious passage, later eliminated, in which Boswell very candidly analyzes the prudent limits of his Jacobite sympathies and several in which his own far from priggish sense of what was below his own or the Doctor's dignity triumphed over his desire to tell all. Usually he was willing to expose himself to any degree necessary for the proper exhibition of his hero, but though he left in part of Johnson's remarkable speculations concerning the manner in which he would manage his harem if he had one, he excised the part which dealt with Boswell's own qualification for eunuch in that establishment. Usually, also, he thought any extravagances of the Doctor were sufficiently excused when he himself had introduced suitable remarks about the solemn thoughts inspired by the spectacle of so majestic a pachyderm at play, but apparently Johnson's reflections on the proper limits of comfort in the furnishings of outhouses and his remarks upon the psychological state induced by necessary sojourns in them were thought to transcend all limits.

As a specimen of formal eighteenth-century prose the traditional version of the "Journal" will of course have to stand, but both as a travel book and as a source of information about the inexhaustibly interesting Johnson and the almost equally interesting Boswell this new edition is the one which everyone will want to use. It is a delight, and it can hardly fail to raise again the old question how a man so obstreperously wrong-headed as we are bound to think Dr. Johnson usually was can not only remain a source of endless delight but inspire profound admiration and affection. Not all his picturesqueness nor all Boswell's skill in setting it off is sufficient to account for the facts, and we are driven to reaffirm that at the bottom of what we admire is a greatness of intellect which no amount of disagreement with his conclusions can hide from us. He had to the highest possible degree one quality characteristic of all the great eighteenth-century intellectuals—a remarkable mastery of the rather limited knowledge and almost equally limited interests which were theirs. Perhaps for the very reason that their materials were relatively few and their scope relatively narrow they learned to handle what they did handle with unparalleled felicity.

Consider, for example, a passage of Toryism from the "Journal" which is not likely to strike a sympathetic cord in anyone today. Boswell has asked if the House of Peers should have as great an influence as it has.

Johnson: "Yes, sir. Influence must ever be in proportion to property, and it is right it should." Boswell: "But is there not reason to fear that the common people may be oppressed?" Johnson: "No, sir. Our great fear is from want of power in government. Such a storm of vulgar force has broken in." Boswell: "It has only roared." Johnson: "Sir, it has roared till the judges in Westminster Hall have been afraid to pronounce sentence in opposition to the popular cry. You are frightened by what is no longer dangerous, like Presbyterians of Popery." He then repeated a passage, I think from Butler's "Remains," which ends, "and would cry 'Fire! Fire!' in Noah's flood."

Whatever accessory reasons there may be, the chief reason for the interest of that passage is that it is so extraordinarily well argued, and that a superb example of method is not only interesting but useful quite aside from the material to which it happens to be applied. Turned to another purpose, the reference to Presbyterians and Popery and the witticism about crying "Fire" in the midst of Noah's flood would make a better retort than any which has yet been given to, for example, the alarms sounded by the Liberty League over precisely the dangers which do not threaten us.

"Not Mine, but Man's"

MORE POEMS. By A. E. Housman. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

HOUSMAN is dead; he who without wit or metaphysics saw death clearly has undergone it. In his will he stated that his brother Lawrence might print such poems as he thought good. We have, therefore, in this book forty-eight more poems which are worthy of the poet, though some have not quite the simple, dramatic perfection of those Housman himself printed. His own funeral poem and many others now belong, as Housman does, to the world; they are the product of one of the finest "minor" poetic talents in English literature. Housman's request to his brother to destroy his notebooks on poetic ideas and his workshop material results in a terrible loss to all students of poetry. Notes on a craft as perfect as Housman's would have been invaluable. We are left with only one example, printed in this book, of two versions of a poem, but this single example indicates how Housman rid himself of the characteristic romanticism and personal emotionalism common to the other poets of his period.

Housman, it must be remembered, knew the impact of modern despair as early as 1895, the year of his greatest poetic output. This is the period of decadent romanticism during which Dowson wrote of passion as a drug to stimulate and to kill, Kipling and Henley hymned physical activity as reason for living, and many poets turned Catholic. Thirty years before our modern poets announced the death of an era, Housman wrote of it. While Yeats wrapped himself in the cloak of Irish myth and legend, Housman faced reality and found it tragic. He was of his own times in that he focused on individual tragedy but of our times in his bitterness against injustice, his hatred of war and empire. And he alone of the poets of his era depersonalized his philosophy and emotions so that they, and his poems, became "not mine, but man's."

To speak of these new poems of Housman's is to speak of his poetry in general. Most of them date with "Shropshire Lad" and the "Last Poems." Housman presents the modern knight, common man, fighting his last battle against too much self-knowledge, fighting with his "sword that will not save," pride and courage. His form is an adaptation of ballad and bucolic lyric, medieval and classical forms shaped to the simple, impersonal lyric which gives the essence of a story and an emotion. In words of one syllable Housman asserts the paradox of life—that the human will is immediately negated by a man's taking thought. The closing lines of poem after poem illustrate this. Here are two examples from his recent book:

The head that I shall dream of
That will not dream of me

Thy creature that thou madest
And wilt cast forth no more

Such dramatic reversals as conclude Housman's poems—"our eyes are in the places where we shall never be"—indicate this poet's irrevocable belief that man's own sense of time and death must deny him—once youth and its illusions of physical delight are past—any reason for living save the will to endure.

There are, as Kenneth Burke once remarked, nuclei of emotions and ideas fused in any poet's writing and from these a poet's characteristic images and symbols emerge. The finer the poet the fewer, most probably, his essential responses, for in the fine poet emotions and ideas form clusters which determine a point of view or a philosophy. Housman illustrates this perfectly. His visual scene is Shropshire, its moor and mountain, town and steeple, barn and stack, a background simple and universal enough to be named and not elaborately described, a country small enough to seem typical of any provincial setting wherein man takes thought concerning his own life and the life of others. His fundamental belief is that man's own awareness of decay and death is tragic. It follows therefore that youth, less aware, is alone happy, that suicide is justifiable if willed, that love may momentarily blind one to an inevitable defeat in life. And Housman's symbols—youth in sport, youth in love, the soldier in the fight of life, the mature man thinking about time and its harvest—all emerge from his philosophy. But because Housman's poetry is rather more classic than romantic, his scene and his essential drama and its characteristics are presented simply and universally, in inevitably correct and direct statement, so that his poetry—even when the first person pronoun is used—seems impersonal and applicable to every man. This is why every clear and perfect line of his, every poem with its dramatic close, is remembered. EDA LOU WALTON

The Triumph of the Traders

CALEB CATLUM'S AMERICA. Edited with an Introduction by Vincent McHugh. Illustrated by Georg T. Hartmann. Stackpole Sons. $2.50.

MR. MCHUGH claims that he was visited one day by a long lean American with red hair and blue eyes, and that before this fellow went away he told the stories which Mr. McHugh sets down here as the stories of Caleb Catlum. "He looked like a young man, and one who had been young a long time." He even "looked young enough to be his own grandson." But "there was about him the air and habit of another age of Americans." In a word, he was timeless. So Mr. McHugh finds Caleb an excellent vehicle for his own opinions and emotions concerning the American past, not to speak of the American future. Caleb will not, I suspect, make his mark as one of our folk heroes, nor does Mr. McHugh offer him as such. He is admittedly synthetic—a dash of Daniel Boone, a whiff of Mike Fink, a whoop of Paul Bunyan, a touch of Mark Twain, a suggestion of Samuel Adams, a suspicion of Jefferson, an aroma of Whitman and Lincoln. He has known all these persons and dozens of others in their class; or if he has not known them his pop and his grandpop have, and every older Catlum back to Eric the Red.

They indeed are Catlums—all the good guys of American history are—and the most that Mr. McHugh wants to do is to make a list of the good guys; in other words, to write American history in something like a folk language, with grammar by Mencken and poetry by God. Since the Catlums are immortal and move easily through time and space, and since Mr. McHugh is no respecter of periods, his history comes at us in a high sort of jumble; which shakes down finally into two lists of names, one a white list of Catlums and one a black list of persons for whom Caleb can find no better name than Traders. Whitman's name for them was hogs. They like war and money, they do not like liquor, and they have never learned how to make love.

Mr. McHugh's allegiance is to the unsymmetrical Americans: to the independent and the original ones, the ones with flavor, the cussed, cantankerous, cockeyed ones, the ones who would rather spend money than make it, and who like best of all to give it away; to the engineers of our destiny who build bridges only to burn them behind them; to the straight shooters who talk a little crookedly out of the corners of their mouths because that is the nature of their lingo. They are not high-brows, and neither are they primitives; they are run-of-the-mill Americans, probably Scotch-Irish—though John Henry is one of them, and John Henry is as black as iron. At any rate they do not number among themselves such notables as Hamilton, Hoover, and Rutherford B. Hayes. They are always something of a disturbance in the state; they like fights even if they see no sense in war, they never balance the budget, and their talk is loud in the land. Their lingo, as I have said, is neither academic nor aboriginal; a condition which Mr. McHugh very economically expresses by having his Indians talk like Harvard men, or worse yet like bally Englishmen. There is the Lakota chief, for instance, who has changed his name from Sleeping Water to Charing Cross and who chirps like this: "'Frightfully awkward, what? I mean, dash it all, one ought to have ponies, don't you know? If you chaps will just set your kit down, I'll have my people fetch it in for you. Travois,' he says, giving a little wave. 'All that sort of thing.' " No, the Catlums talk plain American. "Way I figure it," says Caleb to Uncas, "you got to observe the customs o' the country. . . . I guess I'll take my lingo 'long with me an' just let 'er grow up with the country." Along, that is to say, with Huck Finn, Buffalo Bill, Casey Jones, Davy Crockett, and Johnny Appleseed.

The Traders, of course, we have always with us. One of them was here in the beginning, like original sin, and Mr. McHugh sometimes yields to despair when he notes how their numbers increase. Franklin was one of them, but that was not so bad because Franklin had compensating charms. Latterly the Traders have not been charming; they speculate, they dicker, they budgetize, they withhold relief from the poor, they view with alarm; they are for all the world what good Democrats accuse good Republicans of being. It is not without significance that Mr. McHugh in his preface acknowledges a debt to Parrington's "Main Currents of American Thought." Parrington was Jeffersonian and agrarian, and so as a matter of fact is Caleb, who discovers a cave in the West and follows it down to a wonderful land of golden farms and lazy sunshine—the agrarian's paradise. He comes out of the cave and has many further adventures; runs into more Catlums and identifies more piccolo-players (that is, by reference to a current anecdote which I had better not repeat, Traders). But in the end, exiled with all his tribe from a country which has gone completely Trader, he leads the mournful procession of those he loves back into the cave. And there Mr. McHugh leaves him.

It was a mistake to do so. A few Catlums at least should have been left among us to toughen under opposition and to skylark down the years. They are in essence a minority breed, thriving in unpopular places and difficult to kill. It is sentimental of Mr. McHugh to save them all of a sudden by hiding them in a hole where they must cease to be themselves, and where it is to be feared they will learn the odious virtue known in our days as prudence. It is also sentimental of Mr. McHugh to write as he does of Whitman and Lincoln, whom somehow he never manages to fit into his scheme. But those are minor blemishes in a joyful and powerful book whose heart is on the whole so definitely in the right place.

MARK VAN DOREN

Girl of the Golden 90's

PORTRAIT OF AN ERA, AS DRAWN BY C. D. GIBSON.

By Fairfax Downey. Charles Scribner's Sons, $3.50.

ARTISTS are by no means exempt from the sour-grapes complex. How many times has the present reviewer spoken of the consummate skill of C. D. Gibson's pen drawings, only to be greeted with uplifted high brows and "Oh, that sort of thing!" As a matter of fact, in his mature work the grace, dash, and ease of Gibson's line, the presentation of what he saw fit to present, reveal a master in a chosen field. He was a virtuoso of the pen as Sargent was a virtuoso of the brush. To those who don't like his point of view and therefore denigrate his ability, the answer is "Go and try to do it."

His favorite subject matter, and his attitude toward it, is another story. It is quite possible that if all our artists had been Gibsons and all our producers Ziegfelds, the revolution had ere this been far around the corner—behind us! Gibson, for example, was unconsciously the perfect irritator of the masses. Court chronicler to the "Four Hundred," official historian of the pre-rayon era of metropolitan womanhood, a reversed Thorsten Veblen violently inspiring conspicuous consumption, he created the Gibson Girl.

His achievements as satirist, political cartoonist, war propagandist, and painter all sink to insignificance beside this feat. His Gibson Girl, delicately fed, marvelously clothed, idle, beautiful, insolent, destined to be a spoiled wife, sweeps haughtily and gracefully through his life edifice. Even more romantic than the romantic 90's, for her he became the apologist of courtship with "Love Conquers All" and "They Lived Happily Ever After." A glance at his life illumines his art.

He was "a child normally happy," sold his first drawing to Life in 1886, rose to "an income respected by mining magnates and railroad chieftains," and bought the magazine in 1918. Other periodicals clamored for work. In 1927 he received $100,000 for 100 drawings and later as high as $2,000 a drawing. Handsome, charming, internationally famous, happily married to a Southern belle, a social registerite, and rich in friends, he has had a congenial, busy, and pleasant life.

Aside from the Gibson Girl, the artist's greatest success was "The Education of Mr. Pipp." Here was real Americana. Archetype of "downtrodden consorts," the unlucky protagonist is "the composite of a thousand henpecked husbands." With two beautiful Gibsonized daughters, a social-climbing and domineering middle-aged harridan of a wife (lineal descendant of Louisa M. Alcott's "Little Women"), and no domestic will-power, this retired captain of industry exemplified that pathetic, ridiculous, and, in European eyes, contemptible creature, the American husband. Here was explained why our great business executives of the 90's clung to their offices until arteriosclerosis killed them, and here was suggested a definition of modern marriage—a respectable device by which man pays for love and woman gets paid for it.

None the less C. D. Gibson was primarily a romantic reporter of sentimental and amusing things, a one-man periodical—a Punch without politics, a New Masses without message. As an illustrator he would have been perfect for "The Prisoner of Zenda," medium for "Diana of the Crossways," terrible for "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," and zero for "The Brothers Karamazov." His great creation was his Dream Girl, who was almost as well known in her day as Mickey Mouse is in ours.

— His popularity was enormous, something like that of a later movie star such as Rudolf Valentino. "Along with the captains and the kings he extended his vast and beneficent sway," and, as Mark Sullivan points out, influenced "the manners of a whole generation of Americans." His imitators were, and are, legion.

Twice he renounced line drawing and took up painting. His contribution remains his work in black and white. It forms a veritable storehouse of authentic data on the costumes and etiquette of the American leisure class during a specified period. And if a supreme technical mastery of a certain problem be greatness, C. D. Gibson was, and is, a great man.

Mr. Downey's interesting book, of course copiously illustrated, is good but not great journalistic narrative.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT

Parliamentary History

COMMONS DEBATES OF 1621. Edited by Wallace Notestein, Frances Helen Relf, and Hartley Simpson. Yale University Press. Seven Volumes. $35.

THAT this is the most distinguished piece of editing a record of Parliament has so far received is beyond all question. We are here given nine diaries of the Parliament of 1621 which together cover practically the whole of its proceedings. None of the diaries here produced was previously known. One, on good grounds, the editors feel able to assign to the great Pym; a second, if brief, is nevertheless the work of Wentworth; and a third is the work of that attractive figure John Smyth, who wrote the "Lives of the Berkeleys." The editing of the volumes is superb. Everything that the reader could require, down to a magnificent index, is here; and it should be added that the form of the volumes is worthy of their content. It is important to express one's humble gratitude to the scholars who are responsible for this achievement. They have thrown a flood of light upon a vital period of English history.

For they have enabled us to see the realities of the political scene at a moment when the accent of revolutionary change is beginning somberly to be heard. What is vital in these pages is the picture of ordinary members of Parliament, soberly, vigorously, and with determination, indicting the government of the day for its economic maladministration. They are acting after the collapse of a boom; and they are, clearly enough, shaping their thoughts to the transformation of the seat of power. The matters they discuss—taxation, companies, tariffs—are undramatic enough; but these reports have in them that depth of feeling, that apprehension of grim reality, that one finds in the debates of European parliaments when they survey the economic scene at the present time. In some degree, no doubt, their main value is to the specialist, though there are few pages in which there is not some incident or some phrase that is its own justification. Taken altogether their significance lies in their emphasis upon the economic background of the Stuart crisis. The struggle for parliamentary control was a struggle for a new form of social organization. These diaries make it possible to see how men's minds shaped themselves to that realization. There will be few histories of the English Parliament in the next generation in which these volumes will not have their part.

Their publication has been made possible by a grant from the Commonwealth Fund. Every scholar must note his gratitude to that foundation for the insight it displayed in making that grant. Work such as this is literally indispensable not merely to the historian but to students of politics and sociology. The diaries form, as it were, a moving-picture of a critical epoch, made by the men who shaped its destiny; and they are given to us with an apparatus criticus as exact, as delicate, and as graceful as that which it is traditional to lavish only upon a classical text. I know one other book of the kind only that compares with this in quality; it is Maitland's edition of the "Memoranda of 1306." Professor Notestein and his colleagues will desire no higher praise.

Perhaps I may add one word in conclusion. The debt of English history to American scholars is already a great one. Gross, Adams, Haskins, McIlwain, Read—the roll of distinction is an eminent one indeed. Nothing shows more splendidly the international character of scholarship than that enterprises of this magnitude and quality can be undertaken at an American university and financed by an American foundation. An Englishman is inclined to be humble as he looks at these massive volumes; their precision, their elegance, and their learning are the proof that American scholars have earned the right to stand with those of any other people in the forefront of the battle for knowledge. Professor Notestein writes gracefully of the hospitality he has received in English houses. When he returns friendships with so noble a gift, we should be churlish indeed if we denied him whatever he might choose to ask. And, at the least, he and his coadjutors will accept our thanks and gratitude.

The Golem in Germany

THE WAR GOES ON. By Sholem Asch. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

THE integrated setting of "The War Goes On" helps to give the book an even greater epic objectivity than the author achieved in "Three Cities." No other writer has depicted with such breadth of view and insight the suffering, the pathos, the chaos, and most of all the unmitigated brutality which during the period of inflation combined to spawn the present rulers of Germany. His magnificent pages are alive with the passionate anger of the proud Jew, but even more with the brooding, all-embracing sympathy of the great artist. And if Sholem Asch has in this novel failed to create characters as memorable as some of those in his earlier writings, he has made of it nevertheless a towering work of fiction.

The story deals with the effect of the inflation on the German people, when all values were tumbling precipitately, when the mark finally became "plain dirt," when prolonged hunger drove strong men to despair. The protagonists embrace nearly every type of Jew and German—the petty speculator and the all-powerful Stinnes, the Communist and the Nazi, the Junker,

How SCIENCE Makes Good Eggs Better

VITAMIN D potency increased tenfold, taste improved, shell strong and perfect. Superior eggs—because the poultry raiser has systematically treated his flock with ultraviolet light. More and better milk, healthier cows, a lower bacteria count—also the result of ultraviolet treatment. These benefits are passed on to you in the form of better-quality food products.

Superior vegetables for your table—earlier, sturdier plants are produced by electric sterilization and heating of the soil. Incandescent lighting stimulates and controls plant growth. X-ray treatment of seeds and bulbs is producing new and improved varieties of plants. These and other new movements in agriculture are increasing the certainty of a high-quality food supply.

In these movements General Electric is co-operating with many agricultural laboratories and farm experts. Some of these developments would have been impracticable without earlier G-E research, for from the Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, came the necessary tools for investigation and application of its results.

In every field of productive endeavor, G-E research is contributing to the progress toward higher standards of living the degenerate, and the Bolshevik. There is, foremost, Aron Yudkewitch, the extraordinarily clever Luftmensch who rises from nothing to a place of power in the great Bodenheimer bank. All his fabulous wealth, however, which he loses in the end, is as ashes in his mouth because his bought wife despises him for his impotency and because his conscience never permits him to forget that his life is a fraud and a mockery.

Yet Yudkewitch is after all the interloper; more central to the main theme are the Bodenheimers, the Von Stickers, the Spinners, in whom the tragedy of Germany is concentrated. Max Bodenheimer, the head of a Jewish banking family, kills himself when the inflation makes it impossible for him to preserve the good name of the bank established by his grandfather and made powerful by his imperious father. His brother Heinrich, the selfish genius of the family, devotes his brilliant gifts to the cause of Nordic superiority until tragedy forces upon him the truth which he has all his life tried so eloquently to avoid. Adolf, the artist of the family, gives himself wholly to the enjoyment of painting—only to sacrifice his precious collection in order to feed "two living masterpieces." Hans, the only son of Max and his Christian wife, is the most pathetic and the best-drawn of the Bodenheimers. He was baptized when in his teens on the assumption that the sprinkle of holy water would save him from the ignominy of being a Jew. Yet he suffers most of all for his Jewishness. Nothing can compensate for his tainted blood—not his wealth, nor his Aryan appearance, nor his Christian baptism. These and other Jews are shown broken on the rack of blind, brutal hatred; a hatred giving power and prestige to "Death's Prophet," the "Golem set in motion by an inner mechanism . . . a machine created to give out vibrations of hatred, nothing else."

Of equal significance are the Junkers. When Robert von Sticker, a Goethe scholar completely impoverished by the inflation, learns that his daughter is in love with the son of his Jewish banker, he drives her out of the house with Junker ruthlessness; and when his money is about to give out he makes the proper arrangements for his funeral before sending a bullet through his brain. His son Wolfgang, brutalized by the war and the post-war years of shiftlessness, becomes a Nazi gangster and shoots his sister when she refuses to give up her unborn child. Only Lotte von Sticker has come through the years of suffering with a clear eye and open heart. When she meets Hans and falls in love with him, she does not hesitate to give herself to him. For this she is killed by her own brother. Finally, to fill out the picture, there is Albert Spinner, the worker and Social Democrat, whose acute undernourishment brings him to lend an ear to the Nazi promises of shared wealth and national greatness. All these Germans are uprooted, mad with hunger, suffering for their defeated country; all but Lotte are confused and brutalized and violently anti-Semitic. As they break away from the old order they hie themselves quickly to the groups of gangsters presided over by "Death's Prophet."

These characters are delineated with live sympathy. Yet the significance of the book lies not so much in their individual stories as in the tragedy of Germany which made their stories possible. For the central theme of the book is the epic pathos of a haughty people driven mad by defeat. Sholem Asch makes painfully clear the awful post-war conditions which forced the Germans to strike out with barbaric brutality against those weaker than they and to foster their delusions of grandeur at the expense of others. At the same time he mourns with his fellow-Jews and trains his energies upon the hatred of which they are the outraged victims. The epic objectivity of his approach makes the indictment all the more crushing.

DRAMA

Too Good Not to Be Better

IT IS unfair, of course, but anyone as good as George S. Kaufman must pay the penalty for not being a great deal better. He has paid it before and he will have to pay it again in connection with "Stage Door" (Music Box Theater), which he has written in conjunction with Edna Ferber. Since the penalty generally includes an extremely profitable run, it is perhaps not too severe, and yet Mr. Kaufman must have heard "It's enormously amusing but—" too often not to entertain very melancholy convictions on the subject of human ingratitude. The scene is a boarding-house for aspiring young actresses somewhere in the fifties, and all of the play's very good best is strictly topical in nature. Underneath is a sentimental story and a familiar sentimental moral—that the real actor would rather starve in the theater than live in luxury anywhere else, even in Hollywood—but what really counts is the succession of what would have been called in the seventeenth century "the humours of a boarding-house."

It is true that even these may not be strictly new. One could easily guess beforehand that one was going to meet the girl who could play anything if she was given a chance, the girl who thinks that men are dreadful, and the girl who goes wrong in mink. But Mr. Kaufman and Miss Ferber have hit them off with such crisp, amusing strokes that they seem quite fresh, and the whole thing moves with such perfect ease in such a perfectly calculated tempo that one is carried irresistibly forward on a ripple of laughter. All the gags, whether expressed in words or embodied in "business," are as smart as a night club which won't open till tomorrow and as quotable as what the New Yorker will say next week. The proletarian playwright who goes Hollywood is "one of those fellows who start off on a soap box and end in a swimming pool"; the austere young lady who is sure "Kit Cornell isn't seen at parties" gets "Yeh, Bernhardt was a home girl, too" in reply; and the bit of business in which the irreverent flapper throws the peel of a banana she has been eating in front of the top-hatted proletarian renegade and then beckons him forward with a finger deserves to win a place in the standard repertory of gags. "It's tremendously amusing but—"

The real reason that it is impossible to enjoy one of Mr. Kaufman's shows without feeling a certain undercurrent of resentment is, I think, that the lines are not only much better than the play itself but also actually upon a much higher level of intelligence. At its best his wit is pretty nearly everything which wit ought to be. It is smart and sophisticated and crisp; it is also based upon shrewd insight and a keen sense of sham even in its most modish embodiments. Why is it that the plays themselves must be fundamentally incompatible with the spirit of their dialogue, that they must be based upon hokum of the very sort which the man who writes them was born to expose? How merry he himself could make with the thesis he is preaching and with the more sentimental of the scenes through which he develops it! Or could he? Perhaps, after all, the answer is that his intelligence and his power of criticism exhaust themselves in a phrase, that the part of him which speaks in epigrams cannot make any whole of itself.

The WPA theatrical unit has staked much on "It Can't Happen Here," produced at the Adelphi Theater in New York and simultaneously in various other cities. As a play it is unfortunately not much more than so-so: it is reasonably well acted but rather pedestrian on the whole and rather obvious in its working out. There is no novelty in maintaining that Mr. Lewis's books are convincing largely because of the wealth of their accessory detail, but when the novel has been stripped as bare as in this dramatic version it is, one has lost the very quality which made the whole thing seem real. It is too bad also that the scene in which the radio priest and the potential dictator get together before the microphone should be broadly burlesqued, for the whole effect of the play depends upon its seeming plainly factual, and with such elements of burlesque present there is no possibility that it shall. Is the story a solemn warning or is it a reductio ad absurdum whose title is to be taken literally? At the dramatic version one can't be sure.

"Ten Million Ghosts" (St. James Theater) is Sidney Kingsley's intellectually oversimplified pageant of the munitions industry. Whatever Kingsley's faults, he has shown himself so skilful a writer of speakable dialogue in "Dead End" and "Men in White" that it is difficult to believe him responsible for the wooden and generally incredible talk which goes on in the new play. He has buried his talents not only under a storehouse full of scenery but also under a mass of data which overflows the play on to three pages of introduction in the program. The result is to put one in precisely the mood for "Swing Your Lady" (Booth Theater), a very rowdy tale of a dumb wrestler and his love for a female blacksmith, which the author of "Sailor Beware" has somewhat laboriously but hilariously concocted. Mr. Nicholson is a scholar and perhaps got his idea of an amorous wrestling match from Piron; but if I add that to me the funniest moment was the one when the wrestler stomps on the toes of an opponent, I shall have sufficiently indicated that the real merits of the piece are not literary.

"What I Expect of the New Administration"

FILMS

Cooperative Cannery

"THE President's Mystery" (Republic Pictures) comes close enough on the heels of "Millions of Us" (Cameo) to induce the belief that a new species of American film is on its way, if indeed it has not already arrived. It is not strictly new, since Europe has long been familiar with it, but in this particular form it is new to us; and the interesting thing about the present examples, not to speak of last summer's "Fury," is the success with which they have adapted what has hitherto been a foreign idea to purely native materials. They are, without further preamble, propaganda pictures; or, if one prefers, films of social significance; or better yet, studies of contemporary public life. "Millions of Us" was moving to me not merely because it was a labor film with whose thesis I could agree, but even more because it was an American labor film, with an indubitably American boy dreaming of food in the alleys not of Moscow or Paris but of Los Angeles. And so with "The President's Mystery," which generates authentic excitement out of a story concerning, of all things, cooperative canneries.

Like its Russian progenitors it makes a very black villain out of the business man—in this case the president of National Canneries, an organization which of course is out to do the people. He is handsome, scheming, and cynical; in contrast to the hero (Henry Wilcoxon), who is handsome, honest, and easily converted to the cause of the cooperatives as soon as chance and a pretty girl bring him to see how much they mean to the very people whom as counsel for National Canneries he has been cheating. He renounces his former life, disappears completely from New York and Washington (that, incidentally, is the mystery), and slips into control of the Springdale Cooperative, which after a long fight with National Canneries he steers into solvency and saves for all time to come. I have purposely exaggerated the simplicity of the tale in order to make its origin evident and in order to suggest that the simplicity in question is proper. The purpose of the authors, Lester Cole and Nathaniel West, was to get something said; they chose a transparent rhetoric with which to say it; and they have said it with power. They took off, I understand, from a mystery story which President Roosevelt inspired several other authors to write last year for Liberty; but the direction in which they went, I am also given to understand, was quite their own. They undoubtedly benefited by having a detective story to carry their doctrine; but on the other hand it is to their credit that they saw the value of the vehicle and mixed their types so cleverly. And they have kept the American scene before our eyes.

A French film of the fortnight turned out to be disappointing. "Les Misérables" (Cinéma de Paris) has of course some great acting by Harry Baur, who plays three roles; but as a film it is intolerably slow. The American thing called "pace" is said not to be highly regarded in the European studios, and perhaps it is not the highest virtue a film can have; yet it seems to me a necessary one, and at any rate I can derive only moderate pleasure from a picture that dies dozens of deaths before its close. A few fine moments—and Harry Baur provides more than a few as Jean Valjean—are not in themselves enough.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

"The Used-Car Racket"

Dear Sirs: In your issue of October 19 you published an article, The Used Car Racket, by Elliott Arnold, which for misleading statements parallels much of your pro-Jewish propaganda.

Alluding to a bent frame, Mr. Arnold says: "The proper straightening of a bent frame is a long and costly job. The body of the car must be lifted off and the frame recast in its original mold." Automobile frames are not cast; they are fabricated out of sheet steel, and no mold is at any time used.

Confident in his supreme ignorance, Mr. Arnold continues with the egregious assertion that a slipping "dry clutch" can be "fixed" by inserting fuller's earth "through an oil hole in the transmission"—a manifest absurdity since a "dry clutch" is never located in the transmission case. He then asserts that king-pins, which are without exception made of hardened steel, can be hammered till they are "egg-shaped" and nicked with a chisel; that loose connecting rods are "reinforced," that metal will not take a second welding, that ether, irrespective of its cost, is mixed with gasoline. As an appropriate climax, he cites a case where a screwdriver blade was made to function as a piston!

How many of your readers swallow such "bilge" it would be interesting to learn.

N. W. ROGERS

Tompkins Corners, N. Y., October 15

Dear Sirs: Mr. Rogers's letter, with its splendid tone of politeness and restraint, certainly merits a detailed answer. I'm happy to be able to provide one.

A frame is stamped in separate parts and then riveted together. When a frame is badly bent, to straighten it properly it is necessary to raise the body, and then use a stamp, or mold, of precisely the original shape and size.

I never said that a clutch is "located in the transmission case." A clutch, for Mr. Rogers's benefit, operates on the transmission. At the junction of the clutch and the transmission there is a small lubricating hole, or hand hole. On a dry clutch that is where the powder is inserted. Perhaps Mr. Rogers shifts his gears without using his clutch.

Certainly when king-pins are put into a new car they are of hardened steel. But when they need replacement, they need it only for one reason, because they are worn to a frazzle. And when they've reached that stage they can be flattened, egg-shaped, nicked, or tied into a bow.

When the connecting-rod bearings wear, their looseness can be easily muffled by means of the heavy compound I mentioned. The molasses-like substance acts as a heavy padding, reinforcing the rods for the purpose of fraudulent sale.

The trick of using ether in gasoline to increase power is so ancient I was almost ashamed to mention it.

And lastly, I never said the screwdriver blade "functioned as a piston." My words were: "In one case, where a piston was broken, the dealer put an ordinary screwdriver blade in its place; it worked long enough to sell the car." (Note, I said in one case.) What happened, of course, was that the screwdriver blade, wedged against the broken piston, acted as a stopple, and prevented oil from being pumped through the area.

It may act as a sop to Mr. Rogers's erudite indignation to know that five veteran mechanics scrutinized my article before I submitted it and admitted wryly that they all had used the tricks mentioned, except the screwdriver blade, one or more times.

The Spanish People's Front

Dear Sirs: Anita Brenner's attack upon our integrity in her review of "Spain in Revolt" (The Nation, October 17) exceeds the measure of common decency. Miss Brenner abhors the People's Front. We do not. For this reason she charges that we wrote this book "not to reveal, but to conceal." Our book, she writes, was "tailored" to fit the "party line" and "simple honesty has long since become a useless—indeed a dangerous—virtue" for people of our beliefs. Obviously, people may honestly differ on such questions as the People's Front without falling foul of Miss Brenner's irresponsible charges.

One sentence in her review is peculiarly revealing: "Messrs. Gannes and Repard do prove all this [feudal land relations, etc.], which is to say they assert it and then draw the desired conclusions." To define "prove" as does Miss Brenner may be more autobiographical than critical.

Miss Brenner is an extraordinary person to fling about such charges, considering her record. The subject of the People's Front rouses her to fury. In an article called Who's Who in Spain (The Nation, August 15) she called the People's Front a "political fiction" and applauded the position of the Nin-Maurin group because of its program "workers' front as against Popular Front." On September 27 last Andres Nin joined the People's Front government of Catalonia as Minister of Justice. In other words, Miss Brenner's private hero has joined a "political fiction." Inasmuch as the Anarcho-Syndicalists are in the new Catalan government, this "political fiction" is supported by every left group in Spain with the sole exception of the diehard Trotskyites who support Miss Brenner's position. It is disturbing to find The Nation giving persons of this mind and temper a virtual monopoly on books friendly to the People's Front movement.

HARRY GANNES

THEODORE REPARD

Brooklyn, N. Y., October 16

Dear Sirs: I still charge Messrs. Gannes and Repard with sloppiness, ignorance, and bad faith. This is not a criticism of their politics. It is their workmanship and their ethics I don't like. In the very short space you allow me, I can list only the most flagrant examples of these shortcomings, for there is one on almost every page.

Sloppiness: All references to Angel Herrera, whose name is as familiar in Spain as Coughlin's here, and who is the brains of the Gil Robles crowd, are to "Angel Herrara." On page 206 the Basque province of Alava is put down as "Alvara." On page 211 the name of the Socialist Party is misspelled twice, and so on.

Ignorance: One major inaccuracy is the frequently made reference to the "feudal land relations" and to the "large landholding" of the church and religious orders. The conclusion drawn is that the Spanish revolution is not against capitalism but against feudalism—this is the cornerstone of the whole People's Front platform. History, however, says that the church lands of Spain were expropriated and sold over fifty years ago, at the time of the first republic. The biggest landowners of today made their fortunes mostly out of that bargain sale. The church is the biggest banker and industrial capitalist, and most of the other big fortunes, like March's and Cambo's, are likewise capitalist. These are the backers and financiers of the fascists. The struggle is clearly worker-capitalist, as Gannes-Repard will have to admit almost any day now, just as they will have to forget their enthusiasm for Azaña and company, who have machine-gunned the workers quite a lot of times and who knew for months of the fascist plot and did nothing at all to stop it or to prepare a decent defense.

Another major example of ignorance is the reference to the "backward peasantry," a concept imported from Czarist Russia or the Latin American countries and applied mechanically to Spain, even to the point of saying that the "poor peasantry and the unemployed" follow Gil Robles. The Spanish peasantry backward! Had the authors ever been in Spain for even a week, they could not have dreamed of saying such a thing. But why, at least, didn't they look at the photographs from the front?

Bad faith: (1) Anarchists are defined as people who "despised strikes for partial and immediate ends on the theory that workers . . . would be discouraged from fighting for fundamental change." (2) The Anarcho-Syndicalist C. N. T., which put up an epic fight against Primo de Rivera, isn't even mentioned in that connection. Instead, the authors say that Rivera met no militant labor opposition. (3) Pestaña, ■ right-wing reformist, as prominent in Spain as Woll in America, is put down as a leader of the Anarchist F. A. I. Similar distortions, but with more malice, occur every time the P. O. U. M. and its leaders are mentioned. For example, the authors date this party, which is three years old and now playing a very important revolutionary role, from 1936, and say it has greatly dwindled since the February elections. The Workers' Alliances launched by it in 1933, the most important event in Spanish labor history until this year, are credited to Maurin personally, who "started them in a vague way"; but on the next page the authors betray their confusion by saying that the Communist Party "later regretted having boycotted these alliances."

I say that any book that distorts, conceals. If the authors want to say they did so involuntarily, they then plead guilty merely to sloppiness and ignorance, which is their privilege. But that still does not make them historians worth trusting.

The Shape of Things

ALTHOUGH MADRID IS STILL HOLDING OUT as we go to press, the possibility of its continued resistance appears exceedingly slim. With no means of obtaining food and supplies from the outside world except by a single road from the coast, the only hope of saving the city lies in the sudden appearance of a well-equipped relief army from Valencia or Barcelona. Meanwhile, every day that the embattled residents of Madrid can hold up the Moors and Foreign Legion adds to the chances of an ultimate government victory. Uncensored reports from rebel territory indicate that the peasants and city population in some sectors are continually rising to harass the enemy's rear guard. The entire Mediterranean coast from Port Bou to Malaga remains in government hands, as does the Atlantic coast from near San Sebastian to Gijon. Even without Madrid half of the population of Spain is in loyalist territory. Given a fair opportunity to purchase arms and ammunition from abroad, the overwhelming pro-government majority in these areas ought to be able to organize an effective defense, particularly if the workers of Madrid can inflict serious losses on the Moors. The chances of the loyalists are enhanced by the very real possibility that France's long-standing interest in Catalonia may cause Blum to recognize and support Catalan independence. Catalonia is by far the richest province in Spain, the center of its industry, and relatively isolated geographically. Already far advanced on the road to social revolution, it could readily serve as the nucleus for the new Spain which will yet emerge from the ashes of the present conflict.

THE FARMERS AND WORKERS WHO HELPED elect Mr. Roosevelt are not letting any grass grow under their feet, now that the balloting is over. Various labor groups have already put forward a list of "must" legislation for the new Congress. This includes in effect a new NRA—the abolition of unfair competition in industry, the regulation of wages and hours, the abolition of child labor. A new Guffey bill for the coal industry is urged by Mr. Lewis, to include not only the bituminous but the anthracite industry. The Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill, favored by the President in the last days of the old Congress, is also on the agenda, and pressure will be brought for amendment of the Social Security Act so that the employees' contribution to old-age annuities will be transferred to the employers. This last is, in itself, a neat retort to the pay-roll campaign of the Republicans in the final days before election. The farmers are equally vigorous in pressing for a better agricultural program. A group of 150 farmers' representatives, called to Washington to confer with the President's Committee on Crop Insurance, had very little to say about crop insurance and a good deal to say about the necessity for a new AAA and the control of distribution, "in spite of what the Supreme Court says about it." As if in answer to these prayers, Mr. Roosevelt, in a message to the National Conference on Labor Legislation, promised to ask for legislation which would provide "safe and healthful places of work; adequate care and support when incapacitated by reason of accidents, industrial disease, unemployment, or old age; reasonably short working hours; adequate annual income; proper housing; and elimination of child labor." This takes care of everybody but the farmers; but they have given evidence that they will not allow themselves to be forgotten.

IN THE NEW CONGRESS THERE WILL BE 17 Republican Senators out of 96 and 89 Republican members of the House of Representatives out of 435. Four Republican governors were elected and three held over, making a total of seven out of forty-eight. Pennsylvania Republicans lost control of both houses of the state legislature, and in Delaware, Rhode Island, and New Jersey the G. O. P. could capture only one house. The defeat of a once proud and unassailable political party was a rout, and it was effected by the party which twelve years ago was pretty generally described as dead. Curiously enough, although diehard business men were united before election in predicting the collapse of the American industrial system if Governor Landon were defeated, the stock market showed a healthy activity as soon as the returns were in, and by Thursday stocks had advanced from one to seven and three-quarter points. Even public-utility stocks, which suffered a slight decline the first day, soon picked up to their former levels. The New York Times index of fifty stocks advanced to the highest level since July, 1931. The poll of the minor parties, including the Union Party and the New York American Labor Party, appears not to have greatly exceeded a million votes. In the Senate one Progressive, two Farmer-Laborites, and one independent make only a modest showing; in the House there will be five Farmer-Laborites and seven Progressives. Minnesota elected a Farmer-Labor governor, North Dakota an independent, and Wisconsin a Progressive. It was Mr. Roosevelt's day all around. The minor parties, including the Republican, didn't have a chance.

NOW IT CAN BE TOLD TO WHAT LEVELS THE Republican strategy descended in the last desperate attempt to elect Mr. Landon. We have it on reliable authority that early last summer there was a definite understanding between the Democratic and Republican parties that the Social Security Act was not to be used as an issue in the campaign if only because it had been passed with strong Republican support. In line with this understanding, the Social Security Board refrained from issuing any literature addressed directly to workers. It merely put out routine and pretty dull information. When the Landon attack came, the board was unprepared to cope with it. The employers followed the Landon attack by stuffing pay envelopes with lies about the tax; yet it was not until the closing days of the campaign that the Security Board got out a leaflet addressed to workers explaining the provisions of the act. Meanwhile the Republican cry of dictatorship and regimentation rose higher and higher, reaching a climax on November 2. On that day the New York Sun printed a lurid tale charging that "New Deal Will Tag Workers." The story had come out of the mouth—and out of the imagination—of John D. M. Hamilton. It was illustrated with two pictures, one of the metal tag itself and one showing a handsome but tagged victim of social security. The Sun obviously had strong doubts of the accuracy of the story. The caption over the pictures read: "Everyone May Have to Have One" (italics ours); and the legend underneath ran as follows: "Suggested 'dog tag' for 'security' tax and how it will look on a taxpayer. Such a tag has been prepared and submitted to the Social Security Board for approval." Four days later, in the same position in the Sun, appeared the official explanation of the act and the statement that the worker would be provided with a card, not a tag. In the interim the answer to the stuffed pay envelope had been ballot boxes stuffed with labor's vote against the Republicans.

*

THE FALL OF THE PROPHETS WAS ALMOST AS impressive as the defeat of the press. Forget all the Republican oracles; their errors of judgment were a part of their job. Even Mr. Hamilton's forecast of victory at eleven o'clock on Election Night may be put down to a loyal spirit and a buoyant disposition. Let the dead bury their dead, and turn to the Democrats themselves. Save only Mr. Farley, one and all, the President included, underestimated the extent of Democratic victory. Mr. Roosevelt in his final and most optimistic guess gave himself 360 electoral votes and Governor Landon 171. They were equally wrong about the popular vote, and about the number of states their party would carry. As for the straw-vote takers, the public-opinion samplers, their downfall was a sensational feature of the result. The Fortune survey was very close to accurate, but, as Paul Ward shows this week, the Gallup poll was wide of the mark, while the Digest poll can only be looked upon as a major casualty of the election. But we understand that the straw-vote boys got together after the obsequies and figured out a satisfactory explanation. The error, it seems, was not in their methods or even in their results. It was the election itself that came out wrong. They are thinking of contesting the result.

MEANWHILE THE NATION LOOKS BACK WITH modest pride at the more general predictions that adorned its preelection pages. As early as June 3 we announced editorially, "Mr. Roosevelt will win the election. He has a safe margin of victory now, with enough to spare even for the accidents of the intervening months." From then on our political commentators stood firm for a Roosevelt sweep. Our writers took no polls; they looked at the country with the cold, unsympathetic eye of the political reporter and told what they saw, and what they saw was the truth. Paul Ward predicted the Roosevelt landslide from his first campaign article. Early in August he called thirty-one states "sure" for Roosevelt and gave Landon six "at the moment." His assurance increased as the campaign went along. After traveling with Landon through four supposedly doubtful states—Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana—and talking to Republican leaders, he said, "I would not give a nickel for Landon's chances of carrying any one of them, and if their total of 88 electoral votes goes to Roosevelt atop the 105 votes he will get from the solid South and those he is certain to get from the West, Landon will go down to defeat on November 3 in a Democratic landslide of 1932 dimensions." Two other "doubtful" states were disposed of by two other not at all doubtful observers. Carl Randau stated flatly, "President Roosevelt will carry New York." Jesse Laventhol presented a close analysis of all the conflicting factors in Pennsylvania leading to the equally definite conclusion that Pennsylvania would swing to the President. These predictions lead us to place our faith in the judgment of experienced men rather than in the dubious mathematics of polls and tests.

IT IS DOUBTFUL WHETHER EVEN PRESIDENT Roosevelt's presence at Buenos Aires can arouse popular enthusiasm for the Inter-American Peace Conference opening December 1. The conference has been called to consider the creation of "new instruments of peace." The existing system of conciliation and arbitration is admittedly confused and defective at many points. But in view of the difficulties encountered in the past in securing general ratification of multilateral pacts, it is doubtful that the conference will seek to formulate a new general treaty. On the crucial issue of collective action the Latin American countries are hopelessly divided. Argentina favors both non-recognition of territorial changes achieved by force and economic sanctions against an aggressor, while Chile would limit sanctions to the severance of diplomatic relations. Moreover, despite the effusive messages printed in our press about the popularity of the coming conference, most of Latin America is skeptical of any peace program sponsored by the United States. From their point of view Secretary Hull's pious words regarding the building of a new structure of peace contrast very sharply with the Navy Department's intimation, released the day after the departure of the peace delegation, that the United States is about to construct two new battleships. A "good neighbor" does not show his neighborliness with a gun.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY HAS RECOGNIZED AN important principle in linking its wage increase to the cost of living and stating that future changes in living costs will be accompanied by corresponding changes in pay. It will be noted, however, that the wage scale which the steel industry takes as normal is that prevailing on July 15, 1936, when real wages among steel workers were at least 15 per cent under the pre-depression level. The index of pay rolls for July, 1936, was 74.5 as against an average of 107.8 for 1929, a difference of 32 per cent. This contrasts with a decline of approximately 17 per cent in the cost of living during the same period. Meanwhile, the earnings of the steel companies have shown fantastic increases in the past year. United States Steel had a net profit of $30,000,000 in the first nine months of 1936 as against a net loss of $4,000,000 in the corresponding period of 1935. Bethlehem enjoyed earnings of $8,600,000 this year as contrasted with less than $2,000,000 in 1935. As far as wages are concerned, the steel companies believe in playing the game both ways. During the depression the industry defended a series of vicious wage cuts on the ground that it was losing money. Now that profits are beginning to roll in, it has reversed its policy and established a system of pegging wages at existing living standards. The C. I. O. is on solid ground in attacking the increase as hypocritical; it is evident that any real improvement in working-class living standards can come only through organization and an increase in labor's bargaining power.

THE FAILURE OF YALE UNIVERSITY TO RENEW the appointment of Professor Jerome Davis for reasons which are far from concealing the real cause—fear of his liberalism—was discussed in an earlier issue of The Nation. We are happy to report that the New Republic this week is devoting a special supplement to a thorough examination of all the facts in the case and of the charges on both sides. Everyone who cares about academic freedom should acquaint himself with this material.

FATHER COUGHLIN COMMITTED HARA-KIRI over a nation-wide network in a speech filled with the syrupy vowels and two-way sentences for which he is famous. While reasserting his belief that the sixteen cardinal principles of the National Union can alone save the United States from disaster or dictatorship, he announced that he was withdrawing from all radio activity in the best interests of the people. He sees a new party composed of Democrats, Socialists, Communists, progressives, and Farmer-Laborites; he looks forward to dictatorship. Will he combat these evil possibilities? "I love my country and my church too much," said Father Coughlin, turning both cheeks at once, "to become a stumbling-block to those who have failed to understand." Father Coughlin's stock in trade has been the confusion of issues; like all demagogues he battered on depression. His retirement at this time may denote a realization that prosperity dulls the appeal of panaceas. It may have something to do with the feelings of his religious superiors. It may of course be merely the gesture of a sportsman who has lost a bet. Since he is a demagogue, his speech tells nothing. But the unctuous assurance of the Silver Knight that he is retiring from public life because the forces of evil have won out leaves us with a sense of security similar to that created by the knight errant of San Simeon, who has just discovered publicly that Roosevelt is after all not a dictator but a Jacksonian Democrat. They have both promised to be good in public, but it would be just as well to keep an eye on them in case they start playing with matches behind the barn.

*

THE ENTHUSIASM WITH WHICH PRESIDENT Roosevelt's reelection was received by foreign governments and the foreign press was much greater than diplomatic courtesy demanded. It is evident that the nations have come to believe that a spirit of international cooperation has definitely supplanted earlier American policies of isolation or bullying interference. One and all, they interpreted the Roosevelt victory in terms of their individual interests, with some quaintly paradoxical results. France and Geneva, for example, hailed the continuance of the Democratic policy of cooperation with the League—though carried out within limits and at a safe distance—while Italy spoke with equal warmth of Mr. Roosevelt's "true neutrality," and Japan expressed satisfaction that the party responsible for the Stimson doctrine was not returned to power. Naturally the countries that have benefited by reciprocal trade agreements and new quota arrangements—particularly Canada and Cuba—were loud in their enthusiasm. Russia, too, despite its difficulties with the Roosevelt Administration, openly prefers it to a return to Republican policies. The internal significance of the Democratic sweep is generally and amusingly interpreted by each nation in its own image. Various German newspapers read into Roosevelt's great majority an indorsement of the Führer principle; the Giornale d'Italia explains that the vote indicates popular approval of "the tendency of the President to concentrate political, economic, and directive powers in a form that a European democracy would call dictatorial"; while British and particularly French commentators see in the Roosevelt triumph a magnificent vindication of democratic control and a sign that a great people can still dominate its destiny even against the opposition of the press and the powers of high finance.

REPUBLICAN REACTION TO THE ELECTION has revealed what disunity has been tearing at Republican ranks ever since the nominating convention. Dissatisfaction with the standard-bearer and his advisers, hinted at elsewhere, becomes explicit in the comments of Mark Sullivan and Walter Lippmann. Their thesis is that the Kansas group by trying to "out-deal the New Deal" prostituted the Republican Party in a futile effort to catch votes, whereas they should have kept the G. O. P. true to an uncompromising rugged-individualist opposition. Mr. Sullivan sourly and Mr. Lippmann solemnly conclude that the campaign strategy "compromised" the Republican position and destroyed its "moral and intellectual integrity." As for the rest of Republican reaction, it concedes on the whole that Mr. Roosevelt's victory was not due to the relief or trade-union or any class or sectional vote alone but to the country's recognition that Mr. Roosevelt represents a philosophy of government more in keeping with the realities of the times. Special mention should be made of the New York Sun's rancid editorial, quite devoid of the good sportsmanship shown by most Republican papers; of Mr. Hearst's bad headache on the morning after and his desperate dash for the band-wagon; and of that gem of understatement uttered by Mr. Funk of the Literary Digest, "Perhaps we did not reach a representative cross-section of the electorate."

THE RELATIVE INDEPENDENCE OF THE 1936 voter was demonstrated by two votes in the East. The New York charter and proportional representation went through with pluralities of more than 350,000 despite Tammany opposition and a generous majority for the Democratic slate. Even more impressive was the anti-Curley vote in Massachusetts, where 150,000 persons knew enough to refuse to send their Democratic Governor to the United States Senate, while supporting the reelection of their Democratic President. Unfortunately this demonstration of mass intelligence was sufficient only to beat Curley; not to elect a strong Senator. Young Henry Cabot Lodge is shifting and unstable. In the Massachusetts legislature he set himself up as a friend of the worker, but he supported labor measures and Legion measures with startling impartiality, and against him is recorded, to his permanent discredit, a vote against the repeal of the teachers' oath. Lacking a machine, however, and the other perquisites of autocratic and corrupt power, young Mr. Lodge must be welcomed as the only practical alternative to Mr. Curley.

ONE OF THE SADDEST OF THE CASUALTIES Spain has suffered since the beginning of the civil war is the death of Federico Garcia Lorca, shot down last month by a rebel firing squad. At thirty-seven he was already Spain's most popular poet, his short life wholly devoted to the emergent modern Spain for which he died. Born in Andalusia he took for his themes the passion, suffering, and death characteristic of the "deep song" of the south of Spain, adding to them the sure touch of an imaginative craftsman. While his poetry was winning popularity that overflowed the boundaries of Spain and spread to Latin America, his plays were produced in Madrid (and one, "Bitter Oleander," in New York), his paintings were exhibited at Barcelona, and his transcriptions of old Spanish songs were sung everywhere. With De Falla, the composer, and Zuloaga, the painter, he organized the first fiesta of folk-songs in Granada, and as director of the government's student theater he revived for the provinces the classical drama of old Spain. To the end Garcia Lorca's abundant vitality was devoted to creating a new popular art for Spain and reviving the best art of her past. He used folklore throughout because it was the living expression of the people whose individuality he respected and whose ultimate freedom he sought to bring about.

Roosevelt Is No Dictator

TWO questions are now uppermost in the minds of the American people. One is, What does the Roosevelt Administration contemplate in the way of a legislative program? The Nation is publishing in this issue the first instalment of a symposium by progressive leaders seeking to answer this question. The second question is one that lurks beneath the surface of post-election discussion: Has Roosevelt now a chance to become a dictator?

A vague fear of dictatorship is implicit in the comments of people who say that while they voted for Mr. Roosevelt they wish that the result had not been so tremendous a landslide. It is explicit in Republican editorials, which talk ominously of the power the American people have surrendered into the hands of one man. Along with the wave of rejoicing that has swept the country, there is a wave of fear, mainly unexpressed. Partly it goes back to the American tradition of distrust of governmental power; partly it is inspired by what is happening in Europe.

A fear like this is something that must be faced. Has it any basis in fact? It is true that the people have given Mr. Roosevelt an almost unlimited warrant to go ahead as he sees fit. The power of the executive is always large in the American political system. What produces the present fear is not only that the executive has now been freed from any real opposition but that the checks upon which we ordinarily depend for restraining its power seem no longer to exist. First of all, the humiliation of the Republicans weakens them as an effective opposition. Second, the new Congress is more overwhelmingly Democratic than before, and its members not only owe their election to Roosevelt's popularity but, what is more, they know they do. Third, the newspapers, which generally offer the most vociferous opposition to any Administration, have with few exceptions been so discredited because of their bitterly partisan role in the campaign that their further opposition is likely to go unheeded. Fourth, the crackpots who under the sway of Huey Long and Father Coughlin were always a source of trouble to the Administration seem now to have been at least temporarily shoved off the scene. Fifth, the small vote accorded to the radical parties weakens whatever opposition they may offer. Finally, the Supreme Court finds its prestige seriously impaired.

All this adds up to a rather impressive sum. But cold analysis reveals that we need fear no dictatorship on the part of President Roosevelt. The very fact that the main source of his strength comes from a sweeping popular vote is itself a refutation of the claim that he may exercise dictatorial power. The confidence which the people have given to him they can also take away.

Nor has the opposition really been removed. It has only changed its form. The labor and farmer groups are likely to develop a considerable organization of their own which will function effectively as an opposition. Nor should we congratulate ourselves that reactionary opposition is dead. It seemed just as dead in March, 1933, at the time of the bank panic. Yet within a short time it had revived sufficiently to swing Mr. Roosevelt's policy sharply to the right. In a capitalist state the propertied interests do not sit back submissively because they have lost an election.

But most important of all, Mr. Roosevelt lacks the temper of a dictator. He has often been accused of a strong leaning toward personal government, but he has just as often been accused of not knowing his own mind and of yielding too easily to influence. Neither charge seems to us to sum up the man. He is merely one of our stronger Presidents—of much the same fiber as Theodore Roosevelt or Woodrow Wilson—with a genuine belief in democratic processes.

It is not very difficult to detect what lies behind the talk of a possible dictatorship. Some of it is undoubtedly genuine enough and arises from a misinterpretation of the Roosevelt victory, but a good part of it is drummed up. The plain meaning of the election results is that the people want the New Deal legislative program consolidated and pushed forward; but it is also clear that the Supreme Court has stood and will stand in the way of this program. The logical conclusion would be Congressional action curbing the action of the court, or—what is more likely—a constitutional amendment expressly giving Congress power which is denied it under the existing interpretation of the law.

But this is exactly what the defeated groups are trying to prevent. A Herald Tribune editorial, after describing how the Supreme Court and the Constitution have "held fast against the Presidential will to power during the last four years," goes on, "Here is, we submit, the line upon which those who still hold the American faith must stand and re-form their lines." Translated into less eloquent language that means that the propertied interests, defeated at the polls, are planning again to withdraw behind the earthworks of the Supreme Court as they have done ever since the days when the defeated Federalists intrenched themselves behind John Marshall. But in order to make their position the more secure they are not loath to stir up the fear of a Roosevelt dictatorship.

Brandeis at Eighty

IT IS one of the current simplifications to criticize the Supreme Court because its members are old men. Thus is a grave issue of social policy twisted out of its proper plane and reduced to triviality. The serious observer today cannot doubt that the Supreme Court majority is standing in the path of social progress. But he knows also that age has little to do with it. Justice Holmes's mind was as resilient at ninety as at fifty; Justice Story was already a conservative when he was appointed to the Supreme Court at thirty-two. November 13 of this year marks the eightieth birthday of Justice Brandeis. He is the oldest man on the present court. He is also the greatest in stature as a jurist, the ablest as a statesman and economist, the most uncompromising in his passion for social justice.

The nation has grown best acquainted with him as the leader of the liberal minority during these years of constitutional crisis. What lies behind this leadership is a record that has written itself into the history of the American progressive mind. A boyhood in the individualist frontier society of Kentucky and a brilliant career at Harvard and as a young lawyer in Boston—many a life has started hopefully thus only to end up in a rut. But Justice Brandeis's did not. He would never take a case without turning it about in every direction, seeking to understand it. Similarly he could not live and work in a society without seeking to uncover its foundations. And the deeper he dug the clearer became his conviction that it was the concentration of economic power that was responsible for the social blockage. It stood, a menacing giant, in the path of democratic action; it snuffed out the chances for a decent individual life.

He set himself, David-like, to fight this giant. The only weapon he had was his mind—concrete in a legal brief, swift and sure before a judge or an investigating commission, merciless with a witness—an architectural mind that laid brick on brick until the argument became a structure that could not be broken down. He mastered the intricacies of corporation finance because he saw that it was a key to the economic and therefore the social structure. From a few published figures and weeks of work he reconstructed the accounting system of the New Haven Railroad with such a deadly accuracy that the opposing attorneys thought he must have had access to the books. For twenty years, from 1896 to 1916, he fought the street-railway companies, the public utilities, the railroads, the life-insurance companies, the money trust. It was never a vindictive fight and never an aimless one. He had what Graham Wallas called "social inventiveness," and was always ready with a plan by which the railroads could be operated more efficiently or life insurance could be furnished to workers more cheaply. He took the causes that didn't pay, and became "the people's attorney." At sixty he was a public figure without having held public office—a living proof of how great a man can become if he loves justice and masters arithmetic.

This was the man whom President Wilson appointed in 1916 to the Supreme Court of the United States. For months Wall Street and its allies in the bar associations fought the appointment in the Senate committee. Here was a man whom the propertied classes could not depend on to be their servant and apologist. But the appointment went through. And in his twenty years on the bench Justice Brandeis has shown himself a legal technician of amazing skill and an unrivaled statesman in his social vision.

Today at eighty he is the biggest force standing in the way of Supreme Court reaction: he is also a symbol of how useful the court could be if its composition did not so accurately reflect the dominant economic groups. He has striven heroically, with his liberal colleagues, to interpret the Constitution as a living flexible instrument of government rather than as a shibboleth to freeze the existing economic system. He has striven to keep us out of the constitutional impasse we are now in. If he has failed, the sources of his failure must be sought elsewhere, not in him. His life is one of the high points of our American culture. We wish him, like his great colleague Holmes, another decade on the court. There is the fighting line today, and he was never one to abandon a position.

Must We Take Over the Railways?

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S action in listing "better and cheaper transportation" among the objectives which his Administration will "of course" strive for during the next four years has increased the panic of conservatives, who see government ownership of the railways as an immediate peril. For some months the Railway Business Association has been conducting a spirited campaign against what it felt to be a powerful drift toward public ownership. Writing in the Financial World of September 30, Harry A. Wheeler, president of this organization, declared that the "currents bearing American railroads in the direction of government ownership" could be turned back only "by a strong tide of opposing public sentiment." With a view to testing "public opinion" Mr. Wheeler conducted a poll of 633 business organizations—chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, and groups like the American Newspaper Publishers' Association—and found that with one exception they were unanimously opposed to nationalization.

Although the Roosevelt Administration has never sponsored legislation that would interfere with private ownership of the means of transportation, the Railway Business Organization professes to see a serious threat in the bills introduced by Senator Wheeler and Representatives Lundeen and Maverick. These bills are similar in character, calling for government ownership and operation of the railways through an agency to be called the United States Railways Corporation. The roads are to be acquired by exchange of securities, or by condemnation. While none of the bills were reported out of committee in the Seventy-fourth Congress, they will probably be reintroduced in much the same form in the Congress which assembles in January. The fact that they are believed to have been drafted by the legal staff of the Federal Railroad Coordinator has raised at least a suspicion that Mr. Roosevelt has been merely waiting until after the election to extend his support. Even more alarming than the ownership proposals, from the standpoint of the business diehard, is the series of "make-work" bills, which, if passed, would so add to the expense of the railways that they might actually welcome an opportunity of being taken over by the government. These include the Wheeler six-hour-day bill and measures limiting train lengths and specifying the number of men which trains of given lengths must employ. Passage of these proposals would, according to critics, increase operating expenses by an amount equal to more than 90 per cent of the railways' entire fixed charges.

The pressure for government ownership of the railways should not be taken as an indication of a growing acceptance of socialistic principles. On the contrary, the impetus comes primarily from security holders who look to the government to bail them out of serious financial difficulties. The railroads of the country may be divided into three groups, more or less equal in total mileage. In the first group are 17 important railways which were able, on the whole, to earn fixed charges throughout the depression. The second group contains 22 roads that failed to earn their fixed charges for from two to five years in the period between 1930 and 1935, but which might expect to come out of the red in case of a continued upturn in business. The third group consists of 21 systems the earnings of which have been far below fixed charges and which have been forced into receivership. Stock- and bond-holders of the third, and to a certain extent the second, of these groups may be found at the forefront in the agitation for government ownership.

The financial difficulties of the railways are attributable partially to the depression but primarily to the gradual encroachment of motor transport, an encroachment made possible by the relative inflexibility of railway rates. During the past fifteen years the cost of moving freight has decreased by nearly a third, but rates to the consumer have tended to rise. As a result the volume of freight moved by the roads failed to increase even during the prosperous years of 1923-29 and fell off catastrophically during the depression. Much the same has been true of passenger traffic. It is only within the past two or three years that the railroads have made any serious effort to modernize their equipment and speed up service in order to compete with motor and air transportation.

The Railway Business Association is probably correct in saying that the make-work bills would add an intolerable financial burden to the railways. On the other hand, it is obvious that the government must take some action if the American railways are to be kept running. And there is a limit to the amount of taxpayers' money that can be utilized merely to preserve the existing antiquated, overlapping system of rail transportation. Government ownership has its limitations in a capitalist economic order. But the great majority of countries in the world have found it more satisfactory than private ownership in an enterprise so closely affected by public interest. In the case of the United States, the ordinary arguments are rendered doubly effective by the conservatism of the majority of the railway executives. The prolonged fight which most of the lines waged against the two-cent fare is but an illustration of the incredible bureaucracy and lack of imagination which characterized the management of the larger systems.

It is true that public ownership may be somewhat afflicted by the same evil. But federal ownership could at least eliminate duplication of effort, and the introduction of new blood should have a salutary effect on basic policies. It should also make possible the elimination of much of the dead weight of fixed charges which now overburdens the roads. The chief danger lies not so much in the threat of political influence—the Post Office is not free of politics—as in the possibility that the government may pay far more for the railway properties than they are worth. This is precisely what happened in Canada when the government was forced to assume the obligation of the Grand Trunk system. And unless precautions are taken, government ownership may readily become not an experiment in socialism but a means of propping up one of the weakest sections in the profit system.

How Close Is Television?

TELEVISION broadcasts have already been made available to the British public. They are not similarly available in the United States, but the reason apparently is less a technical lag here than a desire on the part of American interests to be a little surer of their ground before undertaking commercial exploitation. Last week the Radio Corporation and the National Broadcasting Company gave a press demonstration of what can be accomplished at the present moment, and the results were highly interesting. Laboratory experiments had been exhibited before, but this was the first time that a sample program designed as entertainment had been demonstrated on finished receiving sets suitable for home use.

In size and general appearance the R. C. A. apparatus resembles an ordinary cabinet radio except for the fact that a screen, seven and a half by ten inches maximum size, is set in the top and viewed in an inclined mirror. Sound is, of course, transmitted separately, but the synchronization is perfect and the general effect might be best described as that of a miniature talkie, perfect so far as the sound is concerned and at least tolerably good on the visual side. In other words, the pictures, though not so clear or steady as a modern movie, are at least as good (except as to size) as the movies were twenty or twenty-five years ago. The program included two speeches, a singer at the piano, a colored "swing" trio, and the re-broadcast of several short movie films.

Those who are anticipating a new terror in our brave new world have little to fear for the immediate future. Pocket transmitting sets to be applied secretly at keyholes and such like horrors are a long way off, and it is not likely that anyone need be afraid for some time to come lest his private life be broadcast to the world without his knowledge or lest he be compelled against his will to be still further familiarized with the intimate doings of public personages. The broadcasting apparatus is still fearfully elaborate and strictly circumscribed in its field of activity. You cannot point a television "camera" at any old thing the way a modern movie camera may be pointed. Television programs must originate in a studio, and the best results are obtained when the field is about large enough to include a half-length figure.

Of more immediate interest are the questions of entertainment possibilities and commercial exploitation. Apparently the Radio Corporation officials are not themselves sure, since no announcement was made of plans in this direction, although the ten or a dozen receiving sets exhibited seemed ready for the showrooms. One can only say that while probably no one could be interested continuously in present-day television by itself, it would appear to be, even in its present state, a perfectly acceptable accompaniment to certain radio programs—particularly of speeches. There is no question that the sense of intimacy is greatly increased. The President's fireside talks, for instance, would be more real than ever if we could see him as plainly as the speakers were seen last week on the television screen.

BY PAUL W. WARD

It Has Happened Before

Washington, November 9

IF YOU have been reading the public prints devoutly these last few days, your head is full of false notions about what happened in this country on November 3. You are under the impression that Mr. Roosevelt's victory was not only personal but also unprecedented in size and that it represented a great triumph for the forces of democracy, liberalism, and progress over the legions of fascism, greed, stupidity, and reaction. You are also under the impression that the election returns showed that the nation's wage-earners are at last beginning to wake up and feel their oats, and you have been led to believe that in the campaign just ended great strides were made toward a realignment of political forces in this country. In an attempt to exorcise such false beliefs, the following campaign catechism is offered:

Q. Was President Roosevelt's victory the greatest achieved since New Mexico and Arizona joined the Union in 1912 and brought its total to forty-eight states?

A. No. A greater popular-vote victory was scored by another champion of democracy. Warren Gamaliel Harding captured 63.8 per cent of the major-party vote in 1920. Roosevelt, according to the latest available returns, got only 61.7 per cent. Since we shall not know what the minority-party candidates polled until the next edition of the "World Almanac" is printed—and even then shall get only the votes that the Democratic and Republican election judges were magnanimous enough to count up for Browder, Thomas, Aiken, Colvin, and Lemke—it is impossible at this time to calculate Roosevelt's percentage of the total popular vote. For that matter, Harding got 60.4 per cent of the total vote, even though 1920 was the year in which the Socialists rolled up their record vote of 919,799 for Debs. The minority parties got 5.4 per cent of the vote that year; they will have done well to get 2 per cent this year. In 1924 democracy also upsurged and one Calvin Coolidge got 65.2 per cent of the major-party vote; the presence of La Follette in the race as a third-party candidate, however, brought Coolidge's percentage of the total vote down to 54.0. It might also be mentioned in passing that another great foe of the vested interests, Theodore Roosevelt, got 60 per cent of the major-party vote in 1904.

Q. Why should Roosevelt's vote be measured in terms of percentage?

A. Because that is the only sound basis of comparison. Increases in population and in the number of persons eligible to vote make measurement in terms of pluralities misleading. The latest returns give Roosevelt a plurality of 9,809,940 over Landon, and in the unlikely event that the ratio of votes is maintained by the 12,373 precincts yet to report, the total major-party vote will end at 46,330,000 and Roosevelt's plurality at 10,870,000. Mention of the plurality figure alone tends to obscure the fact that while Roosevelt was piling up a bigger popular vote than any other candidate ever polled, Landon was running up a bigger vote than any other Republican seeker of the Presidency, except Hoover, ever got. It is notable that Roosevelt's vote at the moment tops Hoover's actual total by less than 4,500,000 and that at best it will not exceed it by more than 7,200,000. It is also notable that Landon's probable total vote of 17,725,000 tops by 2,700,000 the vote given to Alfred E. Smith, who in 1928 was just as much the idol of the forces of democracy, liberalism, and progress as Roosevelt is today.

Q. Doesn't the fact that more than 40,000,000 votes were cast this year show that the citizenry reached a new high in political awareness and enthusiasm?

A. Not particularly. Between 1928 and 1936 the number of persons eligible to vote increased 10,597,000, according to the estimates of experts in calculating population trends. In 1928, 56.8 per cent of the eligibles voted. If the final returns show, as is likely, that 43,000,000 votes were cast last Tuesday, then 57 per cent of the eligibles voted this year; at 46,000,000 votes, the percentage would be 61. For that matter, the widely ballyhooed increase in registration was not remarkable. This increase, which amounted to 15.6 per cent over the 1932 figures for the country as a whole and to 22.2 per cent for the nation's ten largest cities, also dwindles in importance when measured against the increase in population. In 1932, 71 per cent of all persons eligible to vote were on the registration books; this year the percentage climbed 1.8 points to 72.8. Furthermore, the stay-at-home vote remained about normal. Between 15 and 20 per cent of the registered voters usually fail to vote. The percentage will be 16.1 this year if the total vote reaches 46,000,000. It will be 21.6 per cent if that total vote reaches only 43,000,000.

Q. Isn't it at least remarkable that Roosevelt got 61.7 per cent of the popular vote and almost the whole electoral vote in view of the powerful forces lined up against him?

A. Quite the contrary. No Democratic or Republican seeker of the Presidency ever entered a campaign with the cards so heavily stacked in his favor. He had behind him the biggest political machine the country has ever known. From the start he enjoyed a statistical edge (primary votes, registrations, and so on) in far more than half the states and in nearly three-fourths of the Congressional districts. To keep that machine running, he had at his command the biggest array of patronage any President ever has had. To be sure, the Democratic National Committee did not itself have as much money as the Republican National Committee, but it had more than any Democratic high command had ever had before. Furthermore, the Republican millions were as nothing compared with the New Deal's billions in WPA, PWA, CCC, HOLC, and similar expenditures, which, even if made with the utmost innocence, had the same effect as ordinary campaign expenditures. On top of all this Roosevelt had the most efficient support from organized labor any candidate has ever received. He also possessed the inestimable advantage of having arrayed publicly and indisputably against him all those persons, corporations, and organizations which from time immemorial politicians of both parties have found it profitable to disavow and revile.

Q. Hasn't the Republican Party been crushed for all time, and doesn't that mark a great advance for the forces of liberalism?

A. Yes and no. It is true that the G. O. P. has been crushed as never before, but it still retains some of its roots; the Democrats when given enough rope have always hanged themselves; and there is nothing in the returns of last Tuesday to indicate that the electorate has recovered in marked degree from its notorious fickleness. Teddy Roosevelt used to sound like Franklin Roosevelt and was as popular, and Taft was his successor. Wilson's

New Freedom sounded even better than Roosevelt's New Deal, and its echo was Harding's normalcy—and Teapot Dome, Coolidge, and Hoover. As for the crushing of the G. O. P., in itself a mark of progress toward the true and the beautiful, what reason is there to believe that the party of Bilbo, Robinson, Pendergast, Pat Nash, Frank Hague, Blantin, Carter Glass, and Tammany is any substantial improvement over the party that gave us Norris, Couzens, La Follette, Cutting, and most of the other true progressives who have sat in the Senate?

Q. What myth did the election dispel and what new myth did it create?

A. It killed the Literary Digest myth and set up in its stead the myth of the Gallup poll's accuracy. The Gallup poll erred by nearly 15 per cent in forecasting Roosevelt's percentage of the popular vote. Worse still, it showed him on that basis less rather than more popular than he was in 1932. In addition, it erred by 50 per cent in giving Landon three states as "certain," and it fell 40 per cent short of the mark in assigning Roosevelt only 315 electoral votes as "certain." It placed fourteen states and 204 electoral votes in the column "too close for accurate" prediction, missed the vote proportions all along the line, and ended up as a prophet far below a majority of the chartless and non-scientific newspapermen who made lone tours or traveled with the candidates.

The Task for Progressives

BY MAX LERNER

THE election has swept away various myths that looked as if they would be a permanent part of the American landscape. There was the myth of newspaper prowess, the myth of campaign-fund prowess, and the myth that American voters would swallow whatever was told them with enough iteration. But most important, from the standpoint of progressive action, was the myth that labor must never mass its forces in politics. Back of that myth was, I think, the belief any underlying group has—you find it among Jews and Negroes as well—that partisan tie-ups are dangerous because they expose you as a group to the vindictiveness of the victor. Back of it was also the fear, on the part of the more conservative labor leaders, that once labor learns to act politically as a unit its next step is radical action.

The progressives have massed their forces behind President Roosevelt with an undreamed-of success. Now, on the morning after the election, they confront a difficult prospect. I spoke in my first article of the dilemma of the progressive in the election—torn as he was between the knowledge that Mr. Roosevelt was a very reluctant capitalist reformer and the certainty that under Mr. Landon the difficulty of organizing labor would be immense and the fate of American progressives would be sealed. But dilemmas have a way not of disappearing but of changing their form. The very size of the Roosevelt landslide has, from the progressive point of view, some serious drawbacks. Mr. Roosevelt is now, as never before, a colossus bestriding the American world. If he had just squeezed through the election he might have continued to need the support of the labor and progressive groups for his legislative program. He said at Madison Square Garden, "We have only just begun to fight." But with a popular majority of eleven million his new eminence places him above the battle. There is a further and very serious drawback. As long as Mr. Roosevelt had a strong and determined opposition he could afford to be militant. But the new power placed in his hands makes him vulnerable to accusations of dictatorship. And to ward off those accusations he will be tempted to lean backward and do little.

Today the progressive groups are faced with two questions. One is in the area of what may be called their foreign relations—what attitude they shall adopt toward the new Administration. The other lies in their own domestic economy—what degree of unity of ranks and coherence of program they can achieve among themselves. In France, where a bloc system operates, the progressive groups have joined the Blum government and formed a popular front. In England, where the Labor Party already has a history and where Cabinet government compels an opposition to write a program, the progressives are still far from clear as to their attitude toward either the government or one another. In America the progressives do not yet form an opposition party, nor are they faced with the immediate choice of joining or not joining Mr. Roosevelt's government. None the less they must in a sense at once function as an opposition—the only effective opposition the country can have.

Labor emerges from the election with increased prestige and with a new sense of its power. But in that very fact lies a danger. During the days of the NRA America had in a sense a government of national concentration: labor leaders like Mr. Lewis, Mr. Hillman, Mr. Murray joined business leaders like Clay Williams in cooperating with Mr. Roosevelt. During the campaign Labor's Non-Partisan League furnished money, speakers, energy with which to reelect Mr. Roosevelt. They had their adequate reasons, as I pointed out in my first article. But the first order of the day is to sever this connection. Labor has a task to perform of its own—the task of organizing the mass-production industries. It is a task requiring militant energies and allowing for no governmental commitments. Political alliances can only result in swerving labor from its task.

But there is another task, and it is one in which the progressive bloc in Congress, labor and farmer organizations, peace groups, and professional and middle-class groups must combine. That is to keep the new Administration firm in the direction it has thus far taken toward a liberal social-service state. This will involve a direct confronting of the Supreme Court issue. It will involve further movement in taxation, housing, and public-utility control. As for the labor groups themselves, they must, as they grow stronger, act as spearheads in the movement toward a planned economy. The cry that the reactionaries have raised against Mr. Roosevelt's "unconstitutional" legislation is a cry really directed beyond Mr. Roosevelt to a not impossible labor program. Labor will get its foretaste of what lies in store when the Labor Relations Act is invalidated: in fact, even the Social Security Act cannot be considered out of reach of the court.

I know that the temptation will be great for the progressive leaders to continue along the arc of the 1936 campaign. I know that many of them will be lured by the chance to gain concessions for the lower-income groups by working within the camp of the better of the two capitalist parties. They will argue that unless they are inside they can hope for nothing at all. But they must remember that progressive support of Mr. Roosevelt in this election was not premised on a belief that the progressives could capture the Democratic Party, or even find comfortable quarters in it. It was premised on the necessity of fighting off reaction and gaining time and an open state of civil liberties in which further organization could be pushed. The logic of such action ends with the election. To push it farther and make the alliance permanent means the destruction of independent labor action.

The problem of inner unity is far knottier. The crux of it lies in the present struggle for power being waged between the C. I. O. and the executive board of the A. F.

of L. This struggle is bound to come to a head in the very near future—perhaps we shall see its climax within the year. Many peace formulas will undoubtedly be offered, and undoubtedly peace must be striven for. But the only possible peace here is one that provides for continuing the organization drive at the greatest pitch of intensity. Whichever group of leaders or combination of leaders gets the allegiance of the men who are waiting to be organized is the group which must win out in the struggle. There can be no other answer, no other peace formula—one which does not provide for it is worse than disunity.

The situation seems to me far less serious with respect to the more purely political groups. There has been considerable feeling during this campaign between the Socialists, the Communists, and the Roosevelt labor progressives—although far less than the dissensions that have torn progressive groups in past years. It was Justice Holmes who said that hard cases make bad law, and it may be true in a sense that a Presidential campaign is a bad time in which to start working for a popular front. The reactionary danger this year was great, but it was not as great as it is some day going to be. Unity is the one thing to strive for in the political field—a unity that includes in a labor party every progressive group that wants to come into it with sincerity and will subordinate itself to the decisions of the entire group.

God, we have been told, is on the side of the biggest battalions. That, whatever your beliefs, is a good maxim for political action. But where are the big battalions in American life? We had always been convinced that they were irrevocably with big enterprise. Now we are not so certain. Mr. Roosevelt has marshaled the big battalions in the teeth of reactionary opposition. Can labor and the progressives ever marshal them without the help of a Roosevelt? They can if they stay clear of further political alliances and achieve a unity of their own. If they fail they may look for themselves in the mirror that Sinclair Lewis holds up to the American future.

John L. Lewis

What I Expect of Roosevelt

[The Roosevelt victory has swept away many of the landmarks in American political life. In the belief that progressive thought should be clarified and brought to bear on the problems of the next four years, The Nation asked a group of progressives and labor leaders for their opinions on the prospect for the new Administration. Two questions were asked of them: What action do you think the new Administration ought to take? What action is it likely to take? The writers were asked to discuss either the entire program or the field of their own interests. Other statements will appear in next week's Nation.]

NORMAN THOMAS

THE Roosevelt landslide was easy to predict; the future is less easy. There are too many contingencies in the labor situation and in domestic and foreign politics.

The campaign was encouraging by reason of the collapse of the Coughlin-Lemke semi-fascist movement and, to a degree, the proof it gave of the political solidarity of Lincoln's "common people." Nevertheless, I am rather pessimistic. Far more than the support which labor gave Roosevelt do I deplore the way in which it was given. Nothing was asked; nothing was promised. Mr. Roosevelt's campaign was intellectually on a low level. It was skilful politically, but it made no contributions to statesmanship or to intelligent democracy. The President discussed no issues looking toward the future. He goes in without definite mandate, without definite philosophy, and without proper inspiration or restraint in Congress. The next Congress will probably be in general more conservative than the last; it may have a higher percentage of crackpots put in by the efforts of Coughlinites or Townsendites, and it will be even less amenable to the right sort of leadership. I fear that it will not be able to supply that leadership from its own ranks. I do hope for something from a progressive bloc, which will, however, need to develop a more positive program and a sounder philosophy than it has yet evolved.

Under the circumstances a man with less tendency to a Messianic complex than Mr. Roosevelt would be greatly encouraged in its formation. I doubt if his plans will be definitely right or left. They will be personal; they will be shrewdly calculated in the light of their political effect. He will probably continue to give the worst reactionaries in the country a free hand in the South in return for their political support. He will probably continue a leadership in naval armament which can only have tragic consequences.

I think the imperfections and the increasing unpopularity of the Security Act may lead him to propose certain amendments. He may, especially if there is pressure from the left, really do something to push the inadequate Wagner housing bill. I have little hope of him in the field of constitutional policy because I think he has played a very undemocratic role in refusing to discuss it. His appointments to the bench have not commanded confidence, and there is still some persistence of the rumor that one of the first vacancies in the Supreme Court may be filled by Joe Robinson.

Under all these circumstances about the most we can reasonably hope for from the Administration will be a rather friendly attitude toward organized labor and a willingness to continue unemployment relief in a form which, while very unsatisfactory, is better than nothing and probably better than what Landon would have done.

The President will probably respond to pressure, but proper pressure from the left will require far more principle than was evidenced by anything done or said by labor's Non-Partisan Committee for Roosevelt. Certainly I am more than ever of the opinion that the right sort of pressure must come from those who definitely reject the profit system to which the President has again affirmed his undying allegiance. Unquestionably, however, there is a real place for a genuine farmer-labor party—and by that I do not mean a party from the beginning socialist in all but name. In such a party the Socialists, I think, will be glad to cooperate, and through cooperation will have a genuine contribution to make. The danger is that the President, with the aid, let us say, of Governor Earle of Pennsylvania as crown prince, can play a game which will make a labor party not so much a real force in its own cause as an instrument of political maneuver.

LABOR is rejoiced at the reelection of President Roosevelt, and labor is largely responsible for that reelection. Those unions which are members of Labor's Non-Partisan League have stood firmly in support of the President, and unorganized labor has followed their lead.

Labor's Non-Partisan League, which has announced its continuation as a functioning entity for political action in the future, is unquestionably responsible for much of the President's success in this campaign.

Our experience before and since 1933 has conclusively demonstrated that our financial and industrial leaders are unable of themselves to govern our economic life in the public interest.

All precedents and present-day objectives so far as industry and agriculture are concerned point to the necessity in the future for constructive action through the federal government guaranteeing economic freedom and democracy to wage and salary workers, accompanied by a high degree of economic planning and regulation for both industry and agriculture.

By what legislative policies and measures such objectives may be attained, and how soon we may be able to establish economic democracy and a life of plenty for all groups of our people, can only be a matter of conjecture at the present time. If the Supreme Court were only responsive to popular mandates, as it should be, the happy day of America's deliverance from economic bondage would be greatly hastened.

MARY VAN KLEECK

AS ONE who supported the American Labor Party in New York State and therefore voted for Roosevelt, I believe that the trend of governmental action in the next four years will be determined not by the mind of the President but by the political and economic strength of labor, the farmers, and all other workers and producers. The issue, as in the election, relates to the forces which will control policy rather than to specific legislative proposals. The overwhelming vote of the people has been a rebuke to the efforts of big business to elect its candidates. But in industry big business continues its anti-union policy.

For labor the decisive issue has been the right to collective bargaining and the preservation of civil liberties, particularly as affecting the right to strike. These demands of labor will be challenged with renewed vigor by the anti-union forces in the highly organized corporations. The Roosevelt Administration will probably act upon the philosophy voiced in the early days of the NRA. The President will seek the "cooperation" of labor, and all agencies of government will work to prevent strikes. With rising prices and lagging wages, and with the working class burdened by the vast number of unemployed, a strike movement on a wide front is inevitable. The plea to cooperate by government officials will meet a new situation and new elements. The rank and file yielded in the early days of the NRA. The American Federation of Labor united in a program of cooperation. Now industrial unionism and its natural counterpart, a labor party, give new strength to the rank and file. Weak leadership and obvious inclinations to compromise will be repudiated sooner or later by the masses of the workers. The labor movement is entering on a new phase.

Industrial unionism and political action by labor give a new status to professional workers. The rebuke given by the vote to Hearst and the forces which have tried to curb teachers and other professional workers should set them free for more courageous discussion of issues. In increasing numbers they have been joining the labor movement. Here is a new element which will determine the political outlook. Along with the professional workers, the middle class and all the others in the group known as "the people" want security and a higher standard of living, and they begin to see that the organized forces contending for these needs are to be found in a broadened labor movement. At least they voted for a President accused of favoring labor and flirting with communism.

Roosevelt will not go left. He has declared that he is determined to save capitalism. He has probably interpreted the vote as a mandate to lead a united people to the right, though a right with a social conscience. The decisive moment will come when his Administration deals with the demands of the maritime workers, the steel workers, the miners, the automobile workers. Upon the relative strength of the forces which will then be revealed will depend whether the Social Security Act will be revamped, renewed efforts made to control monopoly, the Constitution broadly interpreted, and foreign affairs handled as a challenge to growing international fascism.

CHARLES A. BEARD

I HAVE no way of knowing whether President Roosevelt will go to the right or the left, or what specific steps he will take in various branches of administration. Nor do I feel competent to forecast the fateful events which may compel him to act in domestic and foreign affairs. What will he do in case of another European war or of another crash in business? Does he know himself? Will he and the country acquiesce in allowing fifteen or twenty million people to stagger along on doles and make-believe work? Answering such questions I leave to others more clairvoyant than I. Even what seem to be the clear trends of history may be reversed. In the election of 1852 the dominance of the slave power in American politics appeared to be firmly established, but ten years later the Proclamation of Emancipation had been announced. By appealing to myth, symbol, force, and fear, Mussolini and Hitler reversed, at least for a time, the long trends toward complete political democracy. To know is one thing; to express hopes, desires, and good-will is another.

DOROTHY DETZER

THE most vital problem facing the country in its next four years is keeping out of war. Our participation in another war would mean military fascism in this country. It would mean complete loss of the slight progress toward social security we have made. The industrial-mobilization plan of the United States War Department shows that this is not an alarmist point of view. This plan would come into operation the day we declared war. It would suspend child-labor laws, protection of women in industry, collective-bargaining rights, and all other safeguards to labor. A government board under the chairmanship of an "industrial leader" would devise "measures to prevent grievances of employees, whether actual or imaginary, from interfering with war production." The risk of having such a fascist system fastened on this country is the gravest risk we run today.

The Roosevelt Administration has not faced this issue squarely, but it has made some advances and many promises toward keeping us out of war. The reciprocal tariff policy, by removing bars to international trade, has done much to build international good-will. The Democratic platform has pledged its continuance. The neutrality law embargoing munitions and credits to belligerents is a step forward, but it does not embargo basic raw materials. An inter-American neutrality treaty will probably be proposed by the United States at the Buenos Aires peace conference.

Such a treaty is highly desirable, but unless it includes embargos on shipments of basic raw materials it cannot be an effective peace instrument. If the President is in earnest in his hatred of war he will throw all his power into support of real neutrality for the Western Hemisphere.

Nationalization of the munitions industry and taking the profits out of war, both urged by the Nye committee, are peace measures which should pass the next Congress. The President has eloquently attacked war profits; consistency will require him to push legislation against them.

A Nye committee resolution providing for a national referendum at the elections of 1938 as a "limitation of the powers of Congress to determine whether ever again there shall be a military draft of men for service outside continental United States" should also have Administration support. The President has proposed that we define an aggressor as he who sends armed forces across his borders. He has implied, therefore, that our army and navy are to defend our own shores. The referendum resolution would enable the American public to express their views.

The Democratic platform of 1932 called for "a navy and army adequate for national defense, based on a survey of all facts affecting the existing establishments that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000 annually." No such survey has ever been made, and armament appropriations now exceed one billion dollars. The Benson bill "to establish a policy of national defense" provides for study of our defense needs by a civilian commission. This should have Administration backing because it is basic to the determination of our armament expenditures.

ALVIN JOHNSON

NO other American ever received so overwhelming a vote of confidence as President Roosevelt received on November 3. Has he not then a mandate to proceed with whatever program he has in mind? President Roosevelt set no specific program before the voter, except to maintain and consolidate the positions he had already established. The Republicans proposed to dismantle social security, the WPA, the AAA, the tax on undistributed profits, the Hull reciprocity agreements. The voters rejected this proposal. We want to keep what we have, but we are not asking for more. Prosperity is upon us and we hope that we may enjoy it in peace. It is reasonable to infer that this is also Roosevelt's attitude. Not business alone but Roosevelt himself needs a breathing spell.

It is doubtful that the breathing spell will be of long duration. Organized labor, which may rightfully claim a large share of the credit for Roosevelt's huge majorities, does not want a breathing spell. It means to proceed militantly with the organization of the mass-production industries. It recognizes that it will meet fierce resistance from employers who are now beginning to feel their oats—profits. There will be trouble, and labor will expect from Roosevelt and the Democratic Party something better than Spanish neutrality.

What can Roosevelt do for labor engaged in a fierce struggle with the employers, backed by local and state governments? Under the Constitution, very little. Will he then be prepared to insist upon the submission by Congress to the people of an amendment permitting effective federal intervention in the industrial struggle? The Democrats have the necessary two-thirds' majority in both Houses. With their labor and farmer-labor allies they could control three-fourths of the state legislatures. If the President demands such an amendment, and his party supports him, it can go through in record time.

But experience shows that a party which commands an overwhelming majority is not easily subjected to discipline. What keeps a party from developing factional differences is a dangerous enemy; and for the next two years the Republicans will not be dangerous. If Roosevelt tries to move forward into the field of the industrial struggle he will necessarily produce a cleavage between the old Southern wing of the party and the new labor wing. If he sidesteps the issue, labor will turn against him.

President Roosevelt's talent for political combination is indeed brilliant. But it is exceedingly doubtful that even he will be able to bring the party intact through the stresses of the next four years.

MARY K. SIMKHOVITCH

THE President has pledged the Administration to a program of slum clearance and rebuilding for the low-income groups. There is no use regretting that this program was not one of the earliest efforts for recovery.

It was doubtless too much to expect that public housing could be secured in this country without a period of education. Business enterprise, and especially the real-estate groups, looked askance at what at first seemed to be a program in competition with and hostile to its own interests. But now that these groups themselves have recognized their inability to build with profit for families unable to pay commercial rents, the problem of public housing ought to have an easier path to follow.

Subsidy is the major necessity for public housing. To what extent and in what forms may still be profitably studied. A low interest rate is a major essential. But this will have to be accompanied by government grants—federal, state, and local. Construction should be of the simplest sort consistent with proper standards. Land values, community planning, and financing present many difficulties to be solved. But by and large the Wagner bill offered a sound base for legislation. It is expected that Senator Wagner will take up this legislation again.

A building shortage is already here. The policy to date has been to allow the low-income dwellers to occupy houses unfit for habitation and abandoned by those who can afford a minimum standard of decency. For workers of a higher economic level limited-dividend housing or cooperative housing is the answer. For workers in the lower-income groups only subsidized public housing can create houses fit for occupancy.

Public housing is the neglected feature in a national health and welfare program, but it is not too much to hope that with the President's support it will become an accomplished national policy within the next four years.

Labor Showdown at Tampa

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

Washington, D. C.

IT IS the fate of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor that the Committee for Industrial Organization will steal all the headlines at the forthcoming convention in Tampa, whether its ten unions be readmitted, continued in suspension, or thrown out.

The plight of the executive council in relation to the C. I. O. is a replica in small of the plight of the craft-union bloc in relation to American labor as a whole; moreover, at Tampa, the industrial-union advocates will work under a difficulty which does not apply to the general situation. Green and his craft-union friends may still command a majority for the simple reason that organized labor comprises only a small percentage of labor; in the country at large Lewis and his colleagues command the allegiance of that overwhelming majority of labor which has never been organized. The Tampa convention, and the maneuvering which is sure to precede and accompany it, must be judged in the light of these larger considerations.

The fight within the federation has been personalized in the figures of John L. Lewis and William L. Hutcheson, who came to blows at the last convention. Their hatred of each other is not entirely unrelated to the fact that at one time their day-by-day ideas and policies were very similar. Both have been dictators in the most extreme sense. But where Hutcheson, the carpenter, has remained as stiff and dry and narrow as a two-by-four, Lewis, the miner, has shown imagination and a great capacity for flexibility and growth. Both like power; but Hutcheson sees power in terms of a tight organization, not so large as to get out of control, business-like, ruthless, regularly collecting dues, impervious to troublesome new ideas. Lewis sees and wants power in terms of national position and control over the minds as well as the dues of a vast labor movement. By espousing industrial unionism so wholeheartedly he has committed himself to a measure of democratic rank-and-file rule which he never risked in building up the United Mine Workers. Lewis was once a Republican. His political shift represents a move which may be described loosely as to the left, but which is more accurately described as a move toward the center of popular will.

It has been disclosed that it was Hutcheson who brought about the actual suspension of the C. I. O. unions by threatening to withdraw the carpenters' union from the federation. Since he heads the largest union in the federation, next to the miners, this threat meant that Lewis would have gained complete control of the A. F. of L. The status quo was safer with Hutcheson. Then arose an issue on which the executive council could not accept the domination of Hutcheson even though he might be able to protect them from the tides of industrial unionism. Hutcheson is a diehard Republican. He was chairman of the labor committee of the Republican Party. Among other things, he issued pamphlets denouncing "John L. Lewis and his C. I. O. with its radical Brophys, Hillmans, and Dubinskys who are pleading for labor to vote for President Roosevelt so communism can overthrow the American form of government." The executive council, which believes in more rather than less government regulation of economic life, could not be neutral. Hutcheson could not stomach even its mild indorsement of Roosevelt and resigned.

The election of Roosevelt further weakens Hutcheson's position, just as it increases Lewis's prestige. The Democratic strategy by which Labor's Non-Partisan League was made an adjunct of the Democratic National Committee injures the chances of a labor party in 1940. It does not alter the fact that Lewis will be in a stronger position than any other labor leader to influence legislation. That position would be stronger if the Roosevelt landslide had been less sweeping—if the carrying of Pennsylvania, for instance, could be set down without reservation to Labor's Non-Partisan League. It will get stronger only if the C. I. O. completes the job of organizing labor, thereby maintaining pressure in Washington.

These political developments make less desirable or likely the expulsion of the Lewis group from the official labor movement. Aside from the fact that craft unions have no inherent basis for unified action, there are groups in the federation which are dependent for their gains not so much on ordinary trade-union tactics as on legislation. These groups include the railway unions, the metal trades, which are heavily represented in the railroads and also in the navy yards and arsenals, and the civil-service unions. In general it may be said that the members of the executive council are divided in their loyalties by bread-and-butter considerations. At the same time political factors alone should serve to increase unity in the C. I. O.

There are straws in the wind to show that the executive council is finding the voice of Hutcheson far less persuasive. Since his resignation the council has failed to extend the suspension order to two unions which have given their unreserved support to the C. I. O., namely, the International Typographical Union, whose president, Charles P. Howard, is secretary of the C. I. O., and the United Hatters, Cap, and Millinery Workers, headed by Max Zaritsky, whose name also appears on the C. I. O. roster. The executive council prefers to believe that these two unions are not affiliated with the C. I. O. This means that the C. I. O. will have friends at court in the delegates of these two unions. Likewise the Brewery Workers, the Bakers, and the Pressmen may be counted upon to vote against suspension. They will be joined by delegates from the many central labor bodies and state federations that have either condemned the suspension of the ten C. I. O. unions or remained neutral—which often meant tacit disapproval. These bodies have only one delegate each but they will help to destroy the diehard morale. The fact that the dynamic of the executive council is inertia makes any positive dissent all the more telling.

It seems doubtful that the Tampa convention, assuming that the suspension is not lifted, will revoke the charters of the C. I. O. unions. That would require a two-thirds' majority. The convention, more probably, will find a way of putting off the decision for another period, which will, among other things, enable the C. I. O. to strengthen its prestige enormously by a whirlwind drive in steel, rubber, and automobiles. It is possible of course that the A. F. of L. may find a way of lifting the suspension without losing too much face, but in that case it will also have to find a way of turning over the organization of mass-production industries to the industrial unionists. The C. I. O. in Pittsburgh has already made it clear that it will not accept reinstatement only to have industrial unionism beaten again at Tampa—as it could be by a simple majority.

Meanwhile industrial unionism has raised its head in Hutcheson's own bailiwick. In the time-honored A. F. of L. manner, jurisdiction over the Federation of Woodworking Industries, comprising some 72,000 members, was handed to the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, which had contributed not at all to its organization but was willing to accept its dues. Now Hutcheson the carpenter has discovered that one of his juiciest oysters is tainted. At the convention of the woodworkers in September, the delegates presented their chief with a sheaf of resolutions which cursed him up one side and down the other, indorsed industrial unionism and condemned the suspension of the C. I. O. unions, denounced Hutcheson for supporting Landon and came out for Roosevelt, and demanded that the whole question of industrial versus craft unionism be submitted to a referendum of the rank and file of all unions. Unfortunately the woodworkers are as yet "non-beneficial" members of the carpenters' union. They are allowed to pay dues but their delegates have no vote at the union's convention in December. They intend, however, to raise their voices.

THE OLD HOMESTEAD

The parlor floor of the American Federation of Labor building in Washington is dedicated to the memory of Samuel Gompers; and his spirit lingers on every other floor. Even the elevator, in its measured ascent, bespeaks his era. The office of William Roberts, legislative counsel for the A. F. of L., is cluttered, but it is not the clutter of a modern busy establishment. It is the accumulation of a small-town lawyer's office which has been gathering inertia and cigar smoke for a generation. And Mr. Roberts? He is the salt of the earth, an average man, a good union man, who worked on newspapers in Chicago and now works for labor on Capitol Hill. He was cordial even after he heard I was from The Nation. He lectured me in fatherly fashion for The Nation's "lies" about the A. F. of L. What could we possibly know about the trade-union movement, sitting in an office in New York?

I assured him that we were only anxious to see the building of a strong labor movement and bore no ill-will against the executive council. I went on to suggest that the issue now dividing the labor movement could best be settled by a referendum of the rank and file. Mr. Roberts then introduced his second theme.

"What Communist," he asked, "told you to say that?"

Disavowing Moscow, I admitted that I had come across the suggestion in an account of the proceedings of the convention of the Federation of Woodworking Industries. Mr. Roberts reverted to his first theme. "Those people," he said, "don't know anything about trade unionism."

He went on to elaborate his objection to a referendum. If you did that, he said, you'd have people going around the country getting locals to vote one way or the other. And that, said Mr. Roberts in shocked tones, is politics. The A. F. of L. has nothing to do with politics. "Why it's not even mentioned in the meetings of the executive council." He assured me that Hutcheson's resignation from the executive council had nothing to do with politics. (He also assured me, however, that Communists are not allowed in the A. F. of L.) His grievance against Lewis is that Lewis wants a big strong political party so he can be President in 1940. "And he's willing to destroy the American labor movement to do it," said Mr. Roberts in a flash of indignation and trade-union loyalty.

Mr. Roberts was anxious to disabuse my mind of the idea that industrial unionism is the issue in the present controversy. The issue, he declared, is majority versus minority rule. . . . He chuckled over the New York stories in the Times which had been playing up dissension in the ranks of the C. I. O. . . . When I told him that I, like himself, was a member of the A. F. of L., he referred briefly to the Newspaper Guild strike in Seattle. That strike, he said, was ill-advised. It just went to show what happens when a union hasn't had experience. Instead of waiting for the National Labor Relations Board to decide the case, the guild called a strike. He made it clear that he regards strikes with distaste. "That's why," he said in summing up, "a union must be affiliated a year before it can get strike benefits." He did not say, but he meant, that those people don't know anything about trade unionism.

After that Mr. Roberts grew mellow. When I repeated that The Nation wanted to see more labor in the labor movement he told me about trade unionism. If you got too many people in the unions, said Mr. Roberts almost confidentially, there'd be a lot of trouble. "Did you ever read 'The Ancient Lowly'?" he asked. I hadn't. He told me about it. He reflected that there had been a wonderful improvement in working conditions since then. Mr. Roberts takes the long view—backwards. Then he got to his real point. "Look at Spartacus," he said, "Spartacus got too strong and they crushed him. That's what happens when labor gets too strong. It gets crushed by its enemies."

Mr. Roberts is right, in a way. The issue is majority against minority rule; the hitch is that the ranks of labor extend far beyond the present limits of the American Federation of Labor. Taking the long view—forward—it is this larger group which will eventually decide how strong labor dares to be. But I wouldn't think of bothering Mr. Roberts, or the memory of Samuel Gompers, with such a "communistic" idea.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Great Extermination

NEVER before was an American election so far-reaching as the one just concluded. Never before were there so many political pests eradicated by one volley and so many others riddled with buckshot. Not only were Landon, Knox, and Hamilton retired to private life, where they belong so obviously, but Curley of Massachusetts, "Big Bill" Thompson of Illinois, Townsend of California, Father Coughlin of Detroit, and Gerald Smith of Louisiana were definitely put out of the running—though doubtless we shall continue to hear from Father Coughlin. The unspeakable William Randolph Hearst received the worst drubbing of his career—only promptly to discover that after all Franklin Roosevelt is perhaps just such a Democrat as Andrew Jackson! Senator Dickinson, one of the most reactionary men in the Senate, was defeated in Iowa—he, the "gallant keynoter" of the Cleveland convention. Senator Hastings of Delaware, who was the darling of the Liberty Leaguers because of his constant attacks on every phase of the New Deal, will remain at home. The Liberty League itself was crushed, and the pitiful figure of Alfred E. Smith is now definitely relegated to the sidelines; his political career is at an end and deservedly so. It was the most magnificent house-cleaning.

It will be a long time before we shall again see such a brazen effort to frighten and dragoon the American workingman to vote against his own interests. It will be a long time before the possessors of great wealth and special privilege will undertake again to besmear a President whose boots they licked at the beginning of his administration when they were imploring him to save them. For they will not soon forget what happened in 1936, when these tactics of theirs helped to roll up what will doubtless long remain the greatest Presidential plurality in our history. It will be a long time before the donors of the huge Republican campaign fund forget just how useless that expenditure was and how utterly mistaken they were in thinking that they could elect a nobody in opposition to Franklin Roosevelt. It will be a long time before we get a clearer demonstration of how completely the American daily press in the North and West has lost touch with its readers and fails to represent their views. Never was the political prestige of daily journalism so low. At least 75, if not 80, per cent of the most powerful newspapers in the North campaigned against the President—and also helped to roll up the greatest plurality in history. We have seen the pitiful spectacle of great Democratic newspapers either withholding their support or going over to the enemy, the saddest of these being the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, only three years ago the foremost liberal daily in the Middle West, if not in the entire United States. There could not be better proof of the fact that as newspapers or their owners become richer and richer, or require more and more capital, their managers more and more take their places among the reactionaries of the land. The press is not the least of the proper victims of Election Day.

That we shall now see a reorientation in our political life admits of no question. Even if there should not arise in the next four years a strong farmer-labor party to include within its ranks what remains of the Socialists, together with the progressives, the farmer-labor organizations of the West, and the new American Labor Party of the East, the Republican Party, if it is to survive, must either become as liberal as the Democracy of Roosevelt or a completely reactionary nucleus around which the conservatives of both the old parties may group themselves.

If the Republican Party is not dead, it is near dissolution. For it is utterly leaderless as well as without a program. What is left of all that talk last summer that a new group of able and progressive men from the Middle West had seized hold of the Republican Party to give it new life and new vigor and to bring it into step with the progressive elements of the Middle West? The two ex-Bull Moosers, Landon and Knox, proved the willing mouthpieces of the old reactionaries. Mr. Hamilton showed himself not only entirely unscrupulous in his attacks upon his opponents but destitute of vision, of all constructive statesmanship, and even of managerial ability. The successors of these failures are not in sight, and, what is more, there is very little chance of any leadership being developed in the next four years. For there are only seven Republican governors left, and only seventeen Republicans, conservative and progressive, will sit in a humiliatingly small group in the Senate, with Vandenberg of Michigan as the foremost figure among the old-line representatives, now actually numbering only twelve, incredible as it seems. The mortality in the House has been equally amazing. Think of Missouri with a solid Democratic delegation, Pennsylvania with only six Republican Congressmen out of thirty-four, New York with only sixteen out of forty-five, Illinois with only six out of twenty-seven, and Wisconsin without one!

Even this only tells half the story. Franklin Roosevelt has more nearly accomplished what Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson set out to do—break the power of "the masters of America, the great capitalists," as Mr. Wilson put it—than anybody could have deemed possible. How will he accept his great victory? That becomes the one great question. Will he sink back and try to establish an "era of good-will," or will he strike boldly toward the reorganization of our economic and social life and the further reorientation of the government to industry and labor?

The President Needs a Gadfly

ON numerous occasions during the recent campaign Republican orators asserted that President Roosevelt was being advised by Communists, but when the specific Communist was named he turned out to be Felix Frankfurter, Herbert Bayard Swope, Roy Howard, or Henry Wallace. In the sober judgment of after election I think we can admit that not one of these estimable gentlemen quite fits the definition. And yet it seems to me that now it might be an excellent idea for Mr. Roosevelt to make good that charge. He ought to have somewhere close to him a devil's advocate.

The danger of his huge majority has been mentioned by both friendly and unfriendly critics. It is not a good thing for any American executive to proceed without some severe critic at his elbow. In theory this corrective force should be furnished by the American press. But the newspapers of America took an even greater licking than Governor Landon. Why should the President seek counsel from a source which was so obviously out of touch with public opinion? Somewhere between 80 per cent and 85 per cent of our national press opposed the President in his campaign for reelection. Practically all this criticism came from the right rather than the left. For instance, the Daily Worker was far more friendly than the New York Herald Tribune or the Chicago Tribune.

I am not maintaining for a moment that Roosevelt's mandate is a command to him to introduce immediately either socialism or communism in the United States. On the other hand, I can see no interpretation of the returns which does not suggest that the people of America want the President to proceed along progressive or liberal lines. Unfortunately both of these words are extremely difficult of definition. After all, Governor Landon called himself "a practical progressive," and that great liberal Amos Pinchot was one of the strongest supporters of the candidate from Kansas. In suggesting that Mr. Roosevelt draw into his counsels a true left-winger I am not urging that he necessarily follow the advice of such an associate 100 per cent or even 10 per cent of the time, but I do think that Mr. Roosevelt ought to keep in mind the criticism of those who feel that he does not go far enough or rapidly enough.

I am not denying the rights of the conservative minority. In spite of the landslide the voters were not saying that all conservative ideas should immediately be liquidated. However, the conservatives, in spite of the fearful defeat at the polls, still control many avenues of expression. Colonel McCormick may not have won his point in arguing for a reactionary economic program but he is still articulate. With a few exceptions, such as that of the New York Sun, most of the opposition papers took their licking gracefully and suggested that perhaps we were due to move into a Monroe period of complete agreement and amity. Even William Randolph Hearst, who felt during the campaign that Roosevelt closely resembled Stalin, is now somewhat convinced that perhaps he looks a little more like Andrew Jackson.

By now we should all be convinced that the final decisions of Franklin Delano Roosevelt on any subject are wholly his own. We have lived through the era in which he was supposed to be run completely by Raymond Moley. Mr. Moley seems to have moved away and the President continues to function. Then there was the strange fiction that Rexford Guy Tugwell really wrote the Administration measures and tossed them over to President Roosevelt for the mere conventionality of executive approval. Mr. Tugwell was not at all in the limelight during the campaign and it is rumored that he may resign because, in spite of loyalty, the role of whipping boy has become too onerous. Again while Louis Howe lived many newspaper commentators felt that he was the supreme political strategist and that in all questions of campaign policy the President took his word without question. But Mr. Howe died and Roosevelt moved on to his greatest triumph.

Of the political acumen of Jim Farley there can be no doubt whatsoever, and I assume that a vast amount of detail was left in his hands during the recent campaign. Nevertheless, anybody who saw the President at all during that drive must have realized that the entire major strategy was in the hands of the candidate.

It may seem disloyal on my part but I think that the chief objection to the set-up of Roosevelt's councils is that it includes too great a number of newspapermen. Nobody can serve very long in a journalistic capacity without getting an exaggerated idea of the power of the press. Though I have on numerous occasions expressed the opinion that the influence of the newspapers is waning, I am still held to a hope and the belief that they may presently reach their former stature. If a man's salary check is dependent upon the success of some portion of the daily press, he does not like to admit that maybe radio is a medium which puts his activities into a wholly secondary position. It seems to me that labor has a right to say, in spite of the landslide, that it contributed vastly to the success of Roosevelt. It is a startling thing that Pennsylvania should have gone Democratic by a huge vote even though state after state was running to get on board the band-wagon.

John L. Lewis moves ahead with increased power and prestige. Mr. Lewis has a right to exert pressure upon the President to move for certain measures, but it would be a great mistake at the present time for John L. Lewis to devote all his energies to the political front. His first job is that of organization. And so I come back to my point of a devil's advocate for the President's inner circle. Incidentally I did not mean to suggest that Lewis was red or even slightly pink around the edges. Franklin Delano Roosevelt needs a resident gadfly. HEYWOOD BROWN

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NOGUCHI"

BY DONALD CULROSS PEATTIE

FRANKLY, canaries have never interested me. I remember longing passionately for a gilded tenor at the age of six, but with maturity and a maturing preoccupation with native American wild birds, canaries in my thoughts recurred less and less often; I was willing to praise them, but unwilling to learn anything more about them. They assumed at last the position that people's pet begonias occupy in my esteem for flowers.

Dr. Eckstein, professor of physiology in the University of Cincinnati, author of "Noguchi," dissolved my prejudices more rapidly than I had supposed anyone could do. He accomplished his feat in about ten short pages—no, fifty, to be exact; it was at the end of the first ten pages that I became so thoroughly captivated by Dr. Eckstein himself that I would have read on if his pets had been scorpions and centipedes. Dr. Eckstein is the man I have been looking for—the scientist who keeps a Steinway in his chemical laboratory, who knows languages, appreciates alien cultures, like the pre-Occidental period of Japan, can speak the name of God without embarrassment but does not think, with some astronomers and physicists, that God is chiefly an astro-physicist on the grand scale. I had a friend at college, also a German by descent, who was a brilliant chemist and played Chopin by the hour to an astounded Harvard Yard. Since I lost track of this boy I have gone about bewailing the small-business-man mentality of the average American scientist, a sober fellow, conscientious and fundamentally uninteresting, remote from life, or sometimes (in the fields of education and sociology and economics) boisterous, faddy, cocksure.

I don't honestly know the reputation of Dr. Eckstein in physiology, since I know nothing of its recent progress. I assume it is high. Even if it weren't, this man would be a citizen of the world precious to the world. Anyway, I am not reviewing his scientific work but only this book,* offered not upon the tables of animal behavior but to literature, and in particular the literature of nature.

Dr. Eckstein has a style, and a style entirely his own. It may remind you at moments of the style of Time, but I really mean to praise it more highly than that comparison would suggest. The style will remind you still more of a man talking—of a literal, shorthand account of an extempore speech. From this it derives its naturalness, its fresh directness. It is as nearly naked of adjectives as a style with any public decency could be. He omits the connectives, leans upon the elided grammar of colloquial utterance, and finds that it holds him up, conveys his meaning. By virtue of this stripped yet loose construction the author keeps his subject—canaries—before you every instant.

And now for canaries. Dr. Eckstein shows himself the scientist he is in his approach to his hobby of canary raising, into which he stumbled accidentally and more or less unwillingly, for he treats his birds—I really don't know how many he had altogether or at any one time, but it was enough to make his observations have some universality of meaning—as the individuals they undoubtedly are. Presumably every animal in the world, down to a paramoecium, is an individual, but individuality only reaches the horizon of our poor human vision when the animal is high enough in the scale to have intelligence. And by intelligence Dr. Eckstein seems to imply the ability to learn from experience (excluded from definitions of pure and simple instinct, as of reflex and tropism). Intelligence among canaries implies also the capacity to make a choice, educable associative memory, and some forethought.

Individuality among canaries in Dr. Eckstein's laboratory meant more than his ability to tell the birds apart by their appearance, to know their voices in the dark. It meant very different behavior amid identical environments and events. It meant that among themselves the birds had distinct aversions as well as attachments—not all of them sexual. Every animal lover has tales, incredible to his listeners, to tell of the indelible personalities in a litter of pups that to us look all alike. But animal lovers are not scientists, not even unprejudiced reporters. Darwin got into hot water because he uncritically accepted reports from Tom, Dick, and Harry in the matter of animal behavior. I am inclined, however, to trust Dr. Eckstein on his reports of the way that one canary with a vulgar voice corrupted the tone of the community, of the shifting pattern of the sexual liaisons, of the interest taken in injured members of the community by the rest, of the traits of youth, adolescence, maturity, and senescence so similar to, or at any rate parallel with, our own age changes.

How much has the behavior of birds to do with human behavior? This is a question often whipped out by the theorists of human society. Science is not ready with a pat answer. It objects to being quoted, to having its findings transposed into some other terms. Science would remind you first that most people, from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the author of the latest book on the Russian experiment, are all too likely to confuse human behavior with human nature. Canary behavior and canary nature are also not identical. Dr. Eckstein, I'm afraid, assumes that everyone knows this. So there is danger that someone will moralize from his beautiful little monograph. I hope that, instead, it will be read as the literature of a very fresh surface of experience with nature.

Woodpile

By MARK VAN DOREN

The high heap that now and then,
When the wind thumps it, settles—
The breathing space decreases for the grass
Beneath it, and the nettles—
Will lie, when April thrashes,
Compacted ashes.

Not here, not like this mountain, tossed
From the saw's teeth all fall;
Not here, but humbly leeward of the house,
And ghostly small—
Nothing, after this winter,
Of sap or splinter.

There will be nothing of the difference,
When grass grows again—
Nothing between the big and little mountains
Save two unfrozen men:
The blood in them still running,
Lukewarm and cunning.

For such as them this pyramid
Must pass, becoming flame—
All but a little powder on the ground there
That no lit match could tame;
Lest their poor lives be finished,
Bulk is diminished—

Shrinking until a room expands
To summer under the snow;
Melting away though earth is solid iron,
And ice-flakes blow.
Perhaps itself should stay.
Yet who can say?

Playing the Generals

THE WAR IN OUTLINE. 1914-1918. By Liddell Hart.
Random House. $2.

CAPTAIN HART'S latest volume will add additional luster to his already great reputation as a military critic. If it is a condensation of his "History of the World War," he has created it with a masterly hand. His style is brilliant, and the whole narrative is fascinating even to one familiar with the whole dreadful story. Indeed, the sweep of the presentation may well be the envy of novelists. The "blurb" on the cover is correct in stating that Captain Hart has told the whole story "without the slightest sacrifice to accuracy and clarity." It is really astounding that he has been able to cover the whole panorama of the conflict so completely in so short a space and yet to discuss fully some of the most important mysteries of the war, such as the reasons for the loss of the Battle of the Marne and the disaster at Gallipoli, and the German failures to utilize their frequently tremendous successes. His summary of the Battle of Jutland is masterly in its compactness. More than that, he is entirely detached in his judgments, being influenced least of all by the fact that he himself wore the British uniform and is an Englishman. This book ought to become an invaluable reference volume, for it contains all that the average person need know about the struggle. It is impossible to see how it can be improved upon in the years to come—even if we should profit by future confessions of statesmen and military autobiographers.

But what a story it is! Never was the incompetence of military leaders set forth in so devastating a manner. Out of their own mouths he convicts them, reprinting here their own utterly absurd prophecies as well as chronicling their stupidities and their blunders, which often cost in a day from 50,000 to 100,000 lives. If there are those who think that the history of the Army of the Potomac for its first two years is a heart-rending account of the butchery of gallant men because of totally incompetent leadership, this story is a thousand times worse. One after the other Captain Hart strips the generals naked. He shows them no mercy, Joffre, Foch, Nivelle, Haig, Henry Wilson, Sir John French, Kitchener—even Pershing comes in for some raps. Petain and Lettow-Vorbeck alone escape. Hindenburg, Ludendorff, Moltke, Falkenhayn, as well as the Russians, come in for their share of the guilt; on the German side he leans to the school that is giving more and more credit and praise to General Hoffmann as the real brains of the German eastern offensive. Captain Hart never fails to remind the reader that these shortcomings and failures were inevitably paid for by the lives of thousands upon thousands of Englishmen, Australians, Germans, Frenchmen, Italians, Portuguese, and even Americans.

How anyone can believe in military leaders after reading this soldier's story of the greatest of wars is beyond me. Their lack of vision, their lack of knowledge of anything but the details of a military art which proved to be completely outmoded the minute the "war of position" began, the way they were themselves victims of the military machines they had created, all are clearly set forth here. And Captain Hart, moreover, most effectively shows up the weaknesses of the modern war of masses. He shows how defense triumphed over attack, "the kind of attack on which, before the war, all the general staffs had counted confidently for success." He brings out how the "brass hats" opposed the machine-gun, which became the great weapon of the war, opposed the tank, opposed every new device, and even when they got the new weapons spoiled their effect by failure to use them properly. What could illustrate the military mind more clearly than this quotation from Sir Henry Wilson in mid-September, 1914? "Kitchener's ridiculous and preposterous army is the laughing-stock of every soldier in Europe. . . . Under no circumstances could these mobs take the field for two years. Then what is the use of them?" Could anything have been more terrible than the autumn offensive of 1915 when the British and French lost 240,000 men and the Germans 140,000 in attacks which, as the "Official British History" admits, "had not improved the general situation in any way and had brought nothing but useless slaughter of infantry"? It is no wonder that a number of French divisions finally mutinied against this war of attrition.

The worst of all the blunders, as Lloyd George has recently pointed out, was Haig's Passchendaele offensive, in which 400,000 men were sacrificed, thousands upon thousands being drowned in mud and water in a flooded and water-logged country. So for years on the Western front, as Captain Hart says, "the formula of victory became merely a formula of futility—and death. The more ranks of attackers, the more swathes of dead: that was all." Is it any wonder that he adds, "But there is over 2,000 years of experience to tell us that the only thing harder than getting a new idea into the military mind is to get an old one out." No pacifist ever wrote such an overwhelming and unanswerable indictment of the whole war system as has Captain Hart.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Behind Spoon River

ACROSS SPOON RIVER. By Edgar Lee Masters. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.

THERE was no actual village of Spoon River, nothing but a muddy creek "winding its way through flatlands, amid hills that only distance lifts into any beauty, through jungles of weeds and thickets and melancholy cottonwoods." The imagined village of the book was made up from memories of Petersburg and Lewistown, where Edgar Lee Masters spent his youth. Some of the characters are close to life. Lucinda and Davis Matlock are Lucinda and Davis Masters, the poet's grandparents. The death at five of a brother, Alec, colors the tragedy of Hamlet Micure. Webster Ford—recalling the Elizabethans—is Masters himself, under the pseudonym which he used when the epitaphs first appeared in Reedy's Mirror in St. Louis between May, 1914, and January, 1915. His autobiography identifies many of his characters with their originals, though he named some of them "by combining names I found in lists of the signers of the constitution of Illinois." In 1906 he planned to make his book a novel, he told his father, showing that human beings are the same in villages and in cities. But in May, 1914, after a visit with his mother during which they talked about Petersburg and Lewistown, Masters suddenly wrote The Hill, the opening poem of the later volume, and two or three of the epitaphs. "Why not make this the book I had thought about in 1906, in which I should draw the macrocosm by portraying the microcosm?" Overworked by his legal practice, he was so possessed by a continual poetic excitement that he could write in any chance moment of leisure, and he finished and published his book within a year. But the strain wore him out, he nearly died of pneumonia, and he was delirious when his proofs reached him.

"Above everything poetry has been the passion of my life to which philosophy and science and history have been but handmaidens." "'Tis vain, O youth, to fly the call of Apollo," says Webster Ford in his epitaph, and Masters speaks in his own person of "my brother the god" who brought him fortune. Perhaps it is always hard to distinguish between flight and pursuit in the life of a poet. Did Masters hunt after Apollo, or did Apollo follow him like a Hound of Heaven? No matter. Once for a few months, like A. E. Housman in 1895 or Wordsworth in 1797-98, Masters ran side by side with Apollo, alive and aflame. Whatever the rest of Masters's story may be, these months will outlive it all.

The rest of the story also is told down to about 1917 in "Across Spoon River." There was nothing in Petersburg or Lewistown—or at first in Chicago—to direct a young poet, and this particular poet was not sure and simple enough to direct himself. He read greedily, savagely, randomly. He could not quite make up his mind about a profession, he had to turn his hand to odd jobs to earn a living, he was slow in discovering his true idiom as poet, he held unpopular opinions that handicapped him as lawyer. He was susceptible to women, toward whom he seems to have been sometimes taurine, more often transcendental, like Goethe with his ewig-weibliche. The episodes of Masters's little loves, the drama of his infatuation over Deirdre, the history of his cool, dry marriage to the Golden Aura—these would be distractions if they were not so large a part of the story that at times they are the story. It is plain that he has by no means resolved some of his old intellectual conflicts yet. The narrative never steadies itself to a quiet stream but is still turbulent with its old vitality. Lacking grace because it is not serene, it is downright and honest, the blunt, ardent story of a troubled man finding out that he was a poet.

Tabasco and Fudge Sauce

THE MELANCHOLY LUTE. By Franklin P. Adams. The Viking Press. $2.50.

GAILY THE TROUBADOUR. By Arthur Guiterman. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

VIRTUALLY all the town wits and lords of light verse have given F. P. A.'s "selected songs of thirty years" a send-off that makes the gaudiest blurb-writer sound like a master of understatement. The reviewer, dazed by such goings on—dazed, for example, to find Miss Dorothy Parker abandoning tabasco for fudge sauce—can only drop hastily on one knee. Who shall dissent when doctors don't disagree? he might reasonably ask before insisting, as he reasonably must, that for himself this output of thirty years seems a little bony, not quite so full of verve and gusto as it might have been. It is all according to the best recipe, has been cooked with a clock right on top of the stove, and certainly it never offends the palate; but it recalls somebody's classic comment, "There is no such thing as a pretty good omelette."

There is little point in being doctrinaire about light verse, but in order to be good I think it should show at least one of three qualities: charm, bounce, or bite. It must be more than amiable, and more than correct; and if much of its appeal is to be technical—which is open to some doubt—then it should offer a completely flowing and uncramped technique. Mr. Adams, so far as I am concerned, always makes one conscious of his craftsmanship: first, because it seems fussed over, but second, and more important, because his craftsmanship is his light verse. He has not many ideas, and his humor and satire, though pleasant, have not many sources. As for charm, bounce, and bite, he has a little of each and not enough of any.

Nothing could be more evident than F. P. A.'s genuine love and extraordinary knowledge of light verse. But it seems to me that his real role—by analogy with tennis, violin-playing, and the like—is that of a master coach and not that of a performer. His work has all the earmarks of the critic turned creative. It is flawless, but it lacks blood and bouquet; it is essentially academic, and there is something as professorial in Adams the poet as in Adams the man. He is constantly reverting to quotations, literary allusions, literary puns, archaisms, book-knowledge, Latin tags; and it is in vain that he attempts the personality of a fun-loving Tom Rover. This does not mean that he lacks personality; he has it; but possibly he has the wrong kind for light verse. The man who in The Conning Tower has compiled, by catching out our mistakes in English, a veritable Who's Whom in America; the man who knows that October 12, 1492, was a Friday and not a Wednesday; the man who probably remembers what he had to eat on July 16, 1895, has

BULLETIN

Marxism is Wrong!

That Karl Marx perceived the tremendous economic fact of Ground Monopoly too late in life; and that his tardy recognition of it was embodied in posthumous editions of "Capital" as an appendix having no organic relation with the body of the work; was pointed out in the preceding number of this bulletin.

Claiming that private capital is the original and fundamental force which exploits labor, Marx and his followers have never understood how Labor and Capital are joint victims of Ground Monopoly; that both Labor and Capital together must produce enough to liquidate ground rent and taxation before Labor can receive wages, and before Capital can draw interest or make profit.

Inaccurate Definition of "State"

That the modern "State" represents victory of the "bourgeoisie" (capitalists) over medieval groundlordism, is the false and preposterous doctrine advanced by Marx to explain the phenomena of modern parliamentary government.

As a matter of actual record, and provable from the structure of existing legislative institutions, the modern state (whose pattern originated in Britain) is a compromise between the historic prestige of Land and the economic energy of Capital. The failure of Marx and his followers to grasp this fact is correlated with the faulty Marxian proposition that Labor is oppressed and enslaved by Capital.

"Marxism vs. Fascism"— a False Issue

On the basis of these economic and political errors, Marx and his followers have precipitated the false claim that civilization is now compelled to choose between Common Ownership of Productive Capital and Private Business Enterprise.

Marxist propaganda has accordingly provoked and raised up the opposing force called "Fascism," which is based upon premises equally false with those of Marxism itself. And in the face of this threatening new form of reaction, the disciples of Marx are now retreating into opportunism in search of allies among liberals and progressives, while temporarily holding in abeyance their platform calling for public ownership of productive capital.

The strategic ideology of this move is that cooperating liberals will be automatically imbued with Marxism and become converts through acting against the common enemy. The subtle intrusion of Marxists into the background of the liberal movement furnishes evidence which helps to justify Fascism and keep it alive.

Today's Real Issue:

Fate of Productive Capital

Since the modern State represents compromise between Capital and Ground Monopoly, the logic slowly taking form in the midst of today's confusion is not class war between employers and employees, but the liberation of Productive Capital (as distinguished from "finance capital") by the transfer of taxation, as far as possible, from industrial and agricultural enterprise to ground values, improved and unimproved, in city and country.

Issue Further Confused by Henry George and "Singletax"

To dismiss these propositions by saying, "Oh yes! Henry George!" is not only to credit the author of Progress and Poverty with more economic and sociological insight than his works reveal, but also to misread the unfolding of today's tragic history.

In a way which alienated men of wider acquaintance with economic thought, George proposed exclusive taxation of ground values on the theory that such values alone are "a social product, due to the presence of society"; whereas he assumed that capital pertains to "the individual," and therefore should not be taxed.

But capital (i.e., "productive instrumentalities") cannot be explained by individual reference. As a fact in today's world, it is the result of exploitation through past epochs. Capital is that portion of material goods which is used for the purpose of producing more goods; and as Dewey and Tufts have emphasized in specific contrast with George, "the wealth of modern society is really a gigantic pool. No individual knows how much he creates; it is a social product. To estimate what anyone should receive by an attempted estimate of what he has individually contributed is absolutely impossible" (Ethics, 511).

"Social value," as a measure of the distinction between land and capital, was unwittingly discarded by George himself in saying, "the social organism secretes, as it were, the necessary amount of capital" (Progress and Poverty, Bk. 1, ch. 5).

Adam Smith on Monopoly, Value, Exploitation, Taxation

"As soon as the land of any country has all become private property, the landlords, like all other men, love to reap where they never sowed, and demand a rent even for its natural produce . . . Nothing can be more reasonable than that a fund (i.e., ground rent) which owes its existence to the good government of the state should be taxed peculiarly, or should contribute something more than the greater part of other funds toward the support of the government" (Wealth of Nations, Bk. 1, ch. 6; Bk. 5, ch. 2).

Smith wrote at a time when it was dangerous to speak too plainly; and his real significance has been ignored not only by most professional economists, but also by Henry George.

"Capretax" not "Singletax"

The demand that fiscal burdens be shifted from productive capital to ground values is not based upon impossible distinctions between "social" and "individual" value; it arises out of the urgent, but inarticulate, need of business and agriculture to be liberated from the intolerable pressure of inflationary ground rents and an unscientific revenue system which overburdens actual production while promoting speculation in land. Hence the situation calls for a "capretax" (capital-relief-tax) rather than a "single," or exclusive, levy.

This measure is compatible with the co-operative program and with public ownership of enterprise involving exclusive rights-of-way over land, such as railroads, telegraph, telephone and pipe-line systems, etc.

not perished in the poet. Moreover, Adams's greatest enthusiasm among light-verse writers is Calverley. I have always felt that Calverley has done the tradition a great deal of harm because, while he uniquely managed to perform miracles with dry form, as Bach did with fugues, he, like Bach, did all that could be done, leaving behind disciples who could not improve on him and were headed in the wrong direction—if not actually up a blind alley. Calverley is superb in his way, but it is a bookish way, and it is largely the bookishness that a man like Adams has inherited. Gilbert, less exquisite but more effervescent, has had more to bequeath even though his bequest has been more rudely handled. Unfortunately the two maestros between them have devoured modern light verse, and the poetic content that the Elizabethan and Caroline wits could squeeze into the form has all but disappeared. Adams, for example, lacks the faintest sense of style, which helps to account for his frequent woodenness. His really great service to light verse has been his admirable appreciation of it. The Conning Tower has printed more good stuff of the kind than all the other newspaper columns rolled into one.

In his new book Mr. Guiterman continues to be skilful. He lacks charm and bite, but his verses usually have bounce and swing, and he has a greater range of matter than F. P. A. He drops now and then into a kind of cuteness I would gladly spare, and his work has in it too little feeling for life and, like Adams's, a rather too unfailing sense of propriety. But it carries one along at a very agreeable pace. If Adams's chief fault lies in being too professorial, Guiterman's lies in being too professional. He is too smooth and slick to give one that unexpected sort of pleasure one seeks above everything else in light verse; and as Dr. Johnson might have said, if Mr. Guiterman seldom disappoints by sinking, he seldom exhilarates by soaring.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Craftsmanship

THE TALLONS. By William March. Random House. $2.50.

IN "The Tallons" Mr. March deviates from his usual position of gentle irony and Chekhovian despair over life's problems, and attempts a tragedy on the grand scale. Two brothers, living on a farm in a small Alabama community, love the same girl. Andrew Tallon is idealistic, dependable, and physically repulsive (he has a harelip and a defect in his speech); Jim Tallon has all the contrasting qualities of thoughtlessness and physical charm. It is Jim, of course, who marries the girl; and when he brings her home to the Tallon farm, he insists that Andrew continue to live there. Andrew's presence, however, is a constant spur to his jealousy: there are violent quarrels and a general atmosphere of tension and hate. One night, after a particularly brutal scene, Andrew intervenes and kills his brother. With the assistance of Myrtle (Jim's widow), he is able successfully to conceal the crime; but his conscience gives him no peace—and he finally confesses. His love for his brother's wife is taken as the obvious motive for the crime; and he is convicted of murder in the first degree.

"The Tallons" has all the virtues of the realistic tradition: intelligence, honesty, detachment, and skill. It is upon these virtues, indeed, that Mr. March's reputation as a writer is based; and for such themes as have occupied him in the past—compassionate studies of "little men" pitted against some universal fate beyond their control or understanding—they are indispensable. Yet it is to be doubted whether they will suffice for such a study of the passions as the present book aims to portray. For the tragedy in "The Tallons" is the tragedy of individual wills: the fate which pursues and destroys the leading characters rises out of certain maladies peculiar to each—Myrtle's vanity, her savage desire to possess Jim at all costs, Jim's jealousy, Andrew's love for an inferior woman. And tragedy of this kind demands something more than mere discernment or a talent for narrative—be the author's eye ever so sure or his statements ever so convincing.

There must first of all be full-sized individuals; and while Andrew comes closest to satisfying us in this regard—he is plausible so long as the drama surrounding him remains familiar and unimpressive—as soon as he is posed against an event of startling proportions he stands revealed for the conventional figure that he is. But what is chiefly lacking in this tragedy is the tragic sense—that element of power which can take us beyond the act into the significance of the act: we feel at all times in the presence of craftsmanship rather than of power. There are times, too, when Mr. March's craftsmanship, expert though it generally is, tends rather to betray itself; when certain situations of prime importance to the plot appear to have been unduly forced. Jim's transformation from an easy-going, self-confident wastrel into a neurotically jealous husband—suspicious above all of his unattractive brother Andrew—is too sudden to be thoroughly credible. But neither these defects in composition nor the book's more serious weaknesses prevent it from being an extremely readable and for the most part honest piece of work.

Murder with a Moral

DEATH IN THE DEEP SOUTH. By Ward Greene. Stackpole Sons. $2.

IN this novel about murder in Georgia, Mr. Greene has made an interesting departure from the usual pattern of crime stories. His long experience as a newspaper reporter has left him dissatisfied with the elaborate ingenuities of master-mind detectives who, in fiction, monotonously solve mysteries as remote from reality as a card trick or a cross-word puzzle. Mr. Greene has examined the news behind the distortions of the yellow press and has rewritten it in a swiftly moving narrative. To be sure, he has not been so imprudent as to omit trial scenes and unexpected clues; but he has used these conventional devices to dramatize a serious social problem—the annulment of civil liberties by local politicians who manipulate prejudices for the sake of the election returns.

The rape and murder of fifteen-year-old Mary Clay provides a perfect campaign issue for District Attorney Andy Griffin. Shrewd and ambitious, Griffin blocks the inevitable conspiracy to lynch Tump Redwine, Negro, who is implicated in the murder more by his color than by the flimsy evidence which has been cooked up against him. Lynchings, as Griffin cynically calculates, are too common to keep the headlines for more than a day; as a candidate for higher office he prefers to scoop his fellow-Democrats by making a big and unusual kill. The crime is pinned on Robert Hale, who has the double advantage, from Griffin's point of view, of being a school teacher with ideas and a Northerner. Most unscrupulously a case is manufactured against young Hale, a case which is plausible only to a jury poisoned with rhetorical insinuation. In a last gesture of cynicism the prosecution momentarily abandons the hypocrisy of white superiority and produces the Negro, coached by whippings and lies, as star witness against Hale. In the North the case becomes a cause célèbre for progressives; but Griffin's strong-arm tactics defeat the superior logic of the Civil Liberties lawyers and the eloquent protestations of Heywood Broun. Griffin gets his man, and the nomination for Senator.

Mr. Greene hints in his text, and the publishers expand the hint in the blurb, that there is an analogy between the Hale case and the trials of Mooney, Sacco and Vanzetti, and the Scottsboro boys. But this suggestion is altogether misleading, although it does, by contrast, indicate the limited scope of the novel. Hale is not at all a symbol of class conflict; he is, as we are constantly reminded, an average citizen, a fairly characterless innocent bystander. The case against him is motivated not by the pressure of a threatened group in power but by the ambitions of a provincial schemer. The significance of the frame-up is correspondingly less great than the significance of the historic trials of a Mooney or a Vanzetti. The benevolent governor of this novel, who pits himself ineffectually against the district attorney, introduces another note of extenuation which is conspicuously missing in real political trials. But this does not invalidate the unavoidable conclusion of the novel that justice in the courts is still largely an abstraction, that behind the excitement of the headlines lies a frequently untold story of duplicity and terror.

Motor as Metaphor

CLUTCH AND DIFFERENTIAL. By George Weller. Random House. $2.50.

THE clutch of an automobile (so I am told) is the mechanism which transmits the engine's power to the rear wheels; the differential is the mechanism which permits two wheels on the same axle to revolve at different speeds. Using these two devices as the symbols of two categories of experience, Mr. Weller's "novel" is an arrangement of thirty-five sketches of Americans. Those who are in the "clutch" category receive some impetus of personal vitality, either for good or bad ends; the "differential" sketches show two lives becoming in some way desynchronized. Each "clutch" incident is preceded by a brief prologue called "Change of Gear" in which the character gives a clue to his nature by a monologue about an automobile; each "clutch" is followed and each "differential" preceded by a section called "Universal" (after the coupling in the power-transmission shaft), which contains some bit of lore about cars—advertisements, the traffic cop's spiel, the ethics of the road, how to break in the new job, the truth about men and women drivers—a weighty summa of automotive philosophy. Carrying stylization yet farther, Mr. Weller Plutarchianly pairs off his male and female characters and arranges them in ascending order of age (speed? mileage?); so that we begin with Irene, six, and end with Mrs. Julia Rawson, seventy-eight. In short, Mr. Weller has written a book in which pattern takes the place of form and convention substitutes for plot, for each incident is discrete and the characters of one sketch are never involved with those of another. The only integration lies in the relationships of similarity and contrast which the author chooses to show.

The use of pattern as something apart from plot has been one of the important characteristics of modern fiction since the appearance of "Ulysses"; our awareness of social groups and social contrasts makes it pertinent. Mr. Weller is original only in that he relies on pattern to the total exclusion of a continuing narrative. In Dos Passos's novels, for example, or in "Ulysses" itself, the pattern advances and underscores the plot but does not take its place or invalidate the Aristotlean virtues of Beginning, Middle, and End. But Mr. Weller refuses to recognize these virtues, and consequently he deadens utterly the effect of a book that has elements of significance.

To understand how thoroughly Mr. Weller's experiment has failed we must remember that he is a writer of very considerable talent. Indeed, his first novel, "Not to Eat, Not for Love," was so brimful of talent that it slopped over untidily; it was tricky, extravagant, and clever, but nevertheless it was successful and moving. Mr. Weller's talent has not really diminished, but by comparison with the first novel its effect in "Clutch and Differential" is trifling. The symbolic pattern in itself says nothing, or only something very trite, about the machine age. The author's fine poetic gifts are unorganized and diffuse and, what is more, they serve sentimentality rather than illumination. It is not unfair to turn Mr. Weller's symbol against him and to say that his book is imbued with the sentimentality of the motorist who has been "studying the country" on the road—that fine, false sense of having "learned human nature" which one gets from the chance meeting.

Not all of Mr. Weller's knowledge of what people are like can rescue his characters from the cliché abstraction into which the pattern forces them. Had they appeared in a novel, Monty's wife, the Negro porter, Mr. Hargreave, Randolph Lewis Beebe would have been very real people, but set in the easy and pointless pattern they become static, like figures in a dull mural, the Bride with Eyes to the Future, the Exploited Negro, the Ruthless Industrialist, Intrenched Bureaucracy—all in appropriate attitudes of self-explanation, with a running frieze of carburetors and traffic lights. But Mr. Weller's talent is still there, and if his experiment has failed his promise has not.

Japanese War Power

MILITARISM IN JAPAN. By Kenneth W. Colegrove. World Peace Foundation. 75 cents.

THE World Peace Foundation continues its informative series of pamphlets on world affairs with this study of the factors behind the power of the military in Japan. Mr. Colegrove finds the source of the military tradition in the military clans and emperor loyalty, and regards the existence of the "supreme command" as one of the basic reasons for the strength of the military class. The constitution of 1889 made the "supreme direction" of the army and navy "subject solely to commands issued by the Emperor." This provision has put Japan under a dual government, the civil government having no control over the military. While the Emperor's power is supposed to be exercised with the advice of "responsible ministers," the jurists of the old school—they also have their "old men" it seems—and the militarists have held that this term applies only to the ministers of war and the navy. These Cabinet posts, in turn, are open only to high-ranking officers; so that the military can wreck any Cabinet by refusal to serve in it. This, however, requires unanimity among the generals, and it is to the lack of such unanimity in 1930 that the author attributes the ratification of the London Naval Treaty, which he says "marked the culmination of the progress toward parliamentary government."

Dual government has also led to dual diplomacy, and the army has in many instances ignored the decisions of the Foreign Office. In 1931, for instance, "after the 'Mukden incident,' Baron Shidehara's policy of friendship with China, which had the support of the Cabinet and of a majority of the Diet, was completely frustrated by the independent action of the military." While Mr. Colegrove believes that the several failures of the army to establish a complete military dictatorship give ground for hope that the civil authorities are gaining the upper hand, he recognizes that this would hardly signify an end of Japanese imperialism since the control of the major parties is in the hands of the financial interests which have profited most from the vast military expenditures.

Of interest to American readers will be Mr. Colegrove's account of the effects in Japan of our recent increases in naval expenditures and the Pacific maneuvers. By picturing these moves and the increases in the Russian military forces as a direct threat to Japan, General Araki succeeded in securing vast increases in military and naval appropriations. It is significant that General Araki's further suggestions that the tax burden be shifted from the farmers to capital and industry were turned down. The tie-up between industry and the military machine is obviously closer than this book reveals. And the author confesses as much. In his final paragraph he says, "All too brief is this survey of militarism in Japan. Much more remains to be said regarding the munitions industry, regarding the imperialist program of Japanese capitalism, regarding the corrupt alliance of political parties and financial interests . . ." It is to be hoped that Mr. Colegrove will have the opportunity of discussing this most important phase of the subject in a future pamphlet.

THAT WAS BALZAC. By George Middleton. Random House. $2.

Honoré De Balzac was a man of exuberant genius; and his other qualities seem to have been dealt out to him in the same extravagant measure. Says Mr. Middleton in his Introduction: "Balzac never conceived a more amazing character than he himself was, nor wrote a more spectacular novel than the life he lived." And then he proceeds to prove it in this play. In recreating this gargantuan character, the author has used biographical material as Rodin, before whose famous statue of Balzac the prologue takes place, used the sculptor's clay—to convey the essence of the man. Indeed, this prologue serves as a not altogether necessary defense of the method, which really needs no defense beyond his success with it. Here is no mere story about Balzac, but the man and artist in all his magnificent, contradictory, and faintly preposterous reality, from the youth of twenty, dreaming and working prodigiously in a Paris attic, to the dying man of fifty, lamenting that he has burned himself out before having finished the stupendous task he had set himself. The eight episodes depend for dramatic continuity and tension upon the novelist's relations with three women: his jealous, self-pitying, and loyal mother; the wise middle-aged woman who was his first love; and the beautiful Polish countess with whom he carried on for eighteen years that strange love affair which led at last to their marriage a few months before his death. Like Balzac himself, these women really come to life in the pages of this book; and so do a host of minor characters who contribute their services to the building up of Mr. Middleton's vivid portrait. The play reads well and should produce well. One longs to see it acted, with someone like Charles Laughton in the title role.

S. L.

SKUTAREVSKY. By Leonid Leonov. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.

"Skutarevsky," called "the Russian Arrowsmith," is said to have had an enormous success in the Soviet Union. It is possibly mainly the fault of the translator, Alec Brown, that in English the novel appears confused and ineffective. Stylistically the book seems to run in clots. There are passages of great force, precision, and clarity; but there are also stretches of dreadful verbal awkwardness and downright unintelligibility. The novel is the story of the adjustment of a great scientist of Czarist days to the planned scientific program of the Soviet regime. Consequently, the imagery is largely scientific; the simplest, everyday human acts are frequently interpreted in the language of physics. Out of the application of the scientist's vocabulary to the material of life come some of the novel's best effects, but this technique is likewise responsible for the grossest faults of the book; overused, it makes for ponderousness and verbosity. The flaws of "Skutarevsky" are, however, not all stylistic. The book is overloaded; too many things are started and dropped. With most of its themes unresolved at the conclusion, the novel, for all its striking qualities, is unsatisfactory.

MARY MCCARTHY

DRAMA

Red, Hot, and Blue

IT seems that Mrs. "Nails" Duquesne—known in private life as Ethel Merman—is desperately in love with a young man who finds it impossible to return her affections because he is fixed upon a girl he has not seen since she was five, and it seems further that "Nails" is heroically determined to help him find her. Now you might suppose the task nearly impossible, but that is because you do not know an important fact, namely, that at the tender age mentioned above the unfortunate girl sat down, while attempting to elude a kiss, upon a waffle iron all prepared to receive something else. Obviously the sensible thing to do is to institute a nation-wide hunt for the missing young lady, and obviously—from a dramatic standpoint—it is a good idea to let the audience participate in the hunt by requiring all the claimants to parade in cellophane skirts through a brightly illuminated doorway. I shall not go so far as to reveal by what surprising accident the long-lost love is actually discovered outside the ranks of the formally qualified pretenders, but I have already gone far enough, I hope, to indicate in a general way the spirit of the book which Russel Crouse and Howard Lindsay have provided for the music and lyrics of Cole Porter.

"Red, Hot, and Blue" (Alvin Theater) is the name of the piece, and it provides an evening of good, cleaner-than-you-might-expect fun. It is not, to be sure, as good as "Anything Goes." Even the presence of Jimmy Durante cannot conceal the fact, and even Ethel Merman cannot persuade an audience that any of Mr. Porter's new songs is as exasperatingly insouciant as "I Get a Kick Out of You." But probably Mr. Porter will never be able to live up to that again, and if comparisons can be forgotten, "Red, Hot, and Blue" is far above the revue average. Miss Merman remains supreme as the exponent of a style she seems to have invented. No one else that I have ever heard seems to me to have achieved a combination of superficial blatancy with subtle undercurrents of nuance and satire so perfectly the expression of the spirit of jazz.

A NEW LIFE — THROUGH EDUCATION

To build a new social order, to transform a population, largely illiterate, into a nation of enlightened citizens—that was the momentous task undertaken in 1921 by the new Mexican government. How this task is being fulfilled, how cultural missions and instructors are teaching not only the fundamentals of learning but of decent living as well, is told in this volume with sympathy and understanding. Illustrated. $2.75

In "Forbidden Melody" (New Amsterdam Theater) Hollywood's Mr. Brisson sings, dances, and dimples at unpredictable intervals and devotes the remainder of his energies to a consideration of his librettist's dashing Rumanian Lieutenant Gregor. After eleven more or less complete shifts of scene Mr. Brisson, with the aid of a bassoon-playing comic, sings his way into a tangle of ladies and restores to his throne the banished King Carol. The ingredients are not unfamiliar, and Mr. Romberg, along with his colleague, Otto Harbach, has been to the attic for his tunes. The result is a rehash of the Graustark fable which stupefies the spectator with gipsy fiddling in the opening scenes and puts him to sleep in—of all places—the royal suite of the Hotel Buda.

RECORDS

THE interest expressed by readers of this column led me to investigate the subject of needles further; and I can now amplify my recent remarks with factual detail. Bear in mind that we are concerned only with the minute point that travels in the grooves of the record, and that I am beginning with steel. The point must be slender and rounded so as to fit into the groove; its surface must be smooth, otherwise its action on the walls of the groove will be that of a file or a saw, and these are things that cannot be observed by the naked eye. Variations in the shape of the point, by altering the contact of the point with the groove, produce variations in reproduction; and the variations I heard recently in the sound of the records of Brahms's Second matched the variations I had seen in the shapes of the points of Columbia half-tone needles when I had looked at them through a microscope last August. Also, certain variants—for example, those which are squared instead of rounded—may injure the walls of the grooves; and so will accidental broken, jagged points or rough surfaces. Such imperfections are inevitable, and can be detected only by shadowgraphing each needle separately. This is a laborious process that makes shadowgraphed needles more expensive; but if you want a perfect needle you will have to pay what it costs; and H. W. Acton of 370 Seventh Avenue, New York, has it to sell.

The wearing down of the point results from the presence of abrasive in the record. The effect of the abrasive at first is to cause the needle to fit better in the groove; as it continues it creates a flat surface with sharp edges; and if the needle is worn down to the point where these edges are brought into contact with the walls of the grooves they will cut away what is recorded on the walls. Hence the admonition to use a needle for only one record-side. This is extreme; but what is essential is not to put back a used needle once it has been removed, for the changed position may bring the sharp edges into contact with the walls of the grooves.

It is here that cactus and other non-metallic needles enter the discussion: they cannot injure the record when they are worn down, because their substance is too soft for their edges to cut into the substance of the record. They have this advantage, however, only at this stage of wear in the needle; before this stage—before, that is, the point of wear at which the steel needle begins to damage the grooves—the softness of non-metallic needles is no advantage and is a definite disadvantage: they are not hard enough to bring out the sounds of high frequency that are what is meant by high fidelity. There is no use in getting the finest new orchestral records and a phonograph with pick-up, amplifier, and speaker capable of bringing out what has been put into the records, and then using a needle that keeps this from coming through. And it is silly to do this to avoid scratch: non-metallic needles reduce scratch because they do not bring out the high frequencies; if you want the musical sounds of high frequency you must use steel and accept the noises of high frequency as well.

Chromium is even harder than steel, and therefore brings out even more of the high frequencies, as you can tell by the greater scratch. But the chromium-plated point is dangerous. No process has yet been found of plating the point uniformly; sometimes only one side gets plated; and if you put in the needle so that this side happens to face the wrong way, you have, in effect, two sharp cutting edges traveling through the grooves of your records.

Now chromium and other permanent needles have been introduced for people who don't like the trouble of changing records or needles. Since these needles are all bad, it would seem that one must either take the trouble or ruin the records (and I am informed that certain machines with record-changing mechanisms give faulty reproduction and have heavy and badly placed pick-ups that will ruin records with any needle). But though he does not want to go on record as recommending the practice, Acton thinks his shadowgraphed steel needle can be used safely for a number of sides.

Steel needles, then; and half-tone rather than full-tone, because the shank of a half-tone needle being slenderer there is less rigidity and greater play in the groove. This makes a slight difference in quality of reproduction, but one that I like; and the loss in volume can be made up by amplification.

"The Pope Needs America"

Dear Sirs: In religion I am a Roman Catholic and in politics I am registered as a Democrat. But neither my Catholicism nor my registered Democracy have had much influence on my political opinions. I make these personal statements for what relevance they may have to my criticism of James T. Farrell's two articles, The Pope Needs America.

I am perfectly willing to admit that the Catholic church has meddled in European politics at least since medieval times. Its influence, however, has waned. Spain is the most recent example of this trend. I am also willing to admit that the Catholic church has stepped from religion into politics too often in Mexico and South America. I even admit the all too frequent interest of the Catholic hierarchy in local politics throughout these United States.

There may naturally be the thought that the Catholics, because of their large numbers and because of the wealth the Catholic church has amassed, might if united be a controlling force in national politics. But the Catholics of America are historically disunited. They are Democrats and Republicans and Independents, Progressives and Farmer-Laborites, Prohibitionists, Coughlinites, and Townsendites. They are as widely split as the poles. And they are, thank God, increasingly refusing political suggestions from the church. While no doubt in some localities Catholic organizations will be used and abused politically, the normal Holy Name Society will remain a religious organization; the normal Knights of Columbus branch will continue as a social organization; the normal St. Vincent de Paul Society will go on as a charitable organization. And never will they be welded into a national political group. It is much more foolish to presume the political menace of Catholic Action than to presume a dictatorship by either major political party.

Together with many Americans I am a firm objector to political influence on the part of clerics, no matter what their faith. And I believe this country has no more to fear from Catholic political dominance than from Methodist or Baptist or Presbyterian or, for that matter, Mohammedan political leadership. Certainly that great mass of Catholics who enjoy the privileges our country gives of thinking and acting for themselves will never surrender these constitutional rights to any dominant political force.

We're for It!

Dear Sirs: Now that the Presidential campaign of 1936 is ended, the time is ripe to begin the agitation for a reform of incalculable value to the country—the shortening of the campaign. Let the nominating conventions be held between the first and the twentieth of September. Between the time of the conventions and Election Day every important issue could be clearly and adequately put before the voters.

At no time within my recollection (I cast my first vote for Grover Cleveland in 1892) has so large a proportion of the campaign discussion been devoted to banalities and shadow-boxing, not to speak of "You're another" personalities, as in this campaign. The effect of all this is to repel and disgust thoughtful people. Many of them, but for a sense of duty to their country, would say, "A plague o' both your houses," and spend Election Day in attending to their own business.

A Scandal in Chicago

Dear Sirs: Having been a resident of New York City and a reader of the Times and the World-Telegram until a new position brought me to Chicago six months ago, I was quite unprepared for the yellow journalism and partisan news of Chicago. I set about immediately to find a readable newspaper, one that would fill the gap left by the New York papers. Being able to smell a Hearst a mile away, I steered clear of the Herald Examiner and bought the only other morning paper available, the Tribune. The layout impressed me as being neat and attractive, but I soon discovered that the Tribune's content out-Hearsts Hearst.

In the evening I caught the odors of another Hearst product, the American, and hurried on to the Daily News, which I had heard of in connection with John Gunther, Howard Vincent O'Brien, and Edgar Ansel Mowrer, and therefore expected to find somewhat more wholesome than the rest. But again I was disappointed. The Daily News, I found, was as reactionary as its editor, Frank Knox. Another Chicago paper, the Daily Times, a tabloid in the best tradition, in all seriousness impresses me as being quite on a par with the Daily News, which seems to be Chicago's best—or should I say least obnoxious—newspaper.

There must be other residents of this city who are as indignant about the press situation as I am. And it is with this thought in mind that I am writing to you. Perhaps something could be done to encourage the Scripps-Howard syndicate to enter this field, or maybe the New York Times could devise a plan for flying early editions into this city. At any rate, organized action on the part of Chicago's citizens might bring about some solution to a problem which is a scandal not only for Chicago but for the nation as well.

Gentlemanly Insecurity

Dear Sirs: Dr. Floyd S. Winslow in an address before the New York State Medical Society on September 17 makes the following very extraordinary statement:

The advocates of socialized medicine lure the profession with the siren song of bureaucratic jobs . . . But we do not want to be secure. We want to remain insecure. We want to continue to be required to give our very best to every patient or lose out in the gentlemanly competition which exists within our ranks. This is an incentive which operates to our insecurity, but to the security of the patient. We prefer the discipline of private practice, which keeps us on our toes, to an assured income under bureaucratic control where our highest ambition is more likely to be to keep ourselves solid with the politicians who have taken over the job of running our profession.

It should no longer be necessary to try to convince intelligent persons that financial insecurity within the medical profession itself increases the insecurity of everyone who must depend on the members of that profession. If insecurity for all doctors meant security for all patients I believe that most persons would say by all means let physicians be financially insecure. But it does not. On the contrary,

Tomorrow's Headlines TODAY— in The Nation

Applied to politics, this statement invites trouble. Yet, the accuracy of Paul W. Ward's predictions during the Presidential election campaign seem incredible.

As early as July 11, for example, Mr. Ward stated that despite the extravagant claims of the Union Party leaders, Lemke would prove of little importance in the campaign and would actually run "at the expense of the Republican nominee and not, as Mr. Landon, his aides and mentors so patently believe, at the expense of Mr. Roosevelt."

PAUL W. WARD

On August 3 the polls conducted by the Literary Digest, Dr. Gallup, and the Farm Journal predicted victory for Landon. Yet, in The Nation of that week Mr. Ward stated that "Roosevelt will have a record-breaking total of 510 electoral votes."

During the months preceding the election, the accuracy of Mr. Ward's keen analysis of the factors which eventually caused the Roosevelt landslide and the larger Democratic majority in Congress, added immensely to his reputation as a political prophet.

As the symposium in this issue indicates, the turn our political future may take seems uncertain. On the basis of past performances, however, readers of Paul W. Ward's weekly article in The Nation are very likely to know, far in advance of its appearance in the headlines, all the significant news that will come out of Washington during the next few years.

Correction

Dear Sirs: My attention has just been called to the editorial which appeared in The Nation for October 31 on my case. I want to call your attention to the following inaccuracies:

1. I came to Yale in the fall of 1924 and was promoted to the associate professorship in 1927, not in 1930 as stated by you.

2. A letter was written by Mr. Cheney to Dean Brown, not to Dean Weigle.

3. President Angell did not insist on the cancelation of the Senator Nye meeting but did insist on postponement. However, the tickets were on sale, and the result was that Senator Nye did not come to New Haven at all.

I want you to understand that my only reason for writing is to avoid any possible misrepresentation in my case.

The Cooperative Movement

Dear Sirs: In reporting the Biennial Congress of the Cooperative League at Columbus October 8-10, in your editorial columns you make the very pertinent statement that "there are limits to the advantages to consumers' cooperation." Your criticism is very well taken, but to readers not familiar with the cooperative movement it would imply that the members of the cooperatives look upon consumers' cooperation as a panacea.

The attitude of the cooperative movement toward other movements working toward the same goal is exemplified in the following statement by E. R. Bowen, general secretary, in his address to the Cooperative Congress:

We are happy to have on our program representatives of the three national consumer organizations, namely, consumers' cooperatives, credit unions, and public utilities, and the three national producer organizations, namely farm cooperatives, labor unions, and professional associations, the combination of whose programs into one great whole, I believe, will eventually largely solve our problems of unemployment and poverty as well as the economic causes of crime and war.

The Shape of Things

THE SECOND ROOSEVELT HONEYMOON IS ON.

The New Dealers and the economic royalists may be confidently expected to lie down together in complete harmony—at least for a time. With dividends zooming, tax rises expressly forbidden, relief costs scheduled for a cut, and the budget about to be balanced, big enterprise is discovering merits and perfections in Mr. Roosevelt hitherto undreamed of by the chambers of commerce and the Liberty League. As for the President, he is reported to be sobered by the huge responsibilities put upon him by the landslide election. Arthur Krock, writing from Washington, is convinced that Mr. Roosevelt considers the emergency over, and in his new mood of normalcy will cold-shoulder those of his advisers who have social-reform hobbies to ride. The President, we are informed, knows the country has given him a blank check, but he has no intention of making it payable to Messrs. Tugwell, Ickes, Hopkins, Lilienthal, et al. If true, these reports should dispel any illusions our wishful thinkers may have had that Mr. Roosevelt will some day lead a Labor Party, or any fears our more cynical friends may have had that his reformism would cut the ground from under the labor forces in politics. If Mr. Roosevelt takes the new "era of good feelings" seriously, he is less realistic than we have thought. He should know that the sweetness and light that now suffuse Wall Street are illusory. The bitterness with which big business and its allies among the corporation lawyers are still fighting the New Deal in the courts is a sign of the gathering storm that is just around the corner.

A MORNING-AFTER MOOD HAS ALREADY assailed some of our pre-election optimists. Headaches are general, indicating that the brew of campaign promises and high hopes may have been spiked with at least a splash of political wood alcohol. In the field of relief the symptoms are particularly acute. Mr. Hopkins has already "predicted" that by the end of the year 1,000,000 fewer families and individuals will be on the relief rolls of the country. Such remarks must be taken as storm warnings rather than as statistical estimates. And to gauge their real significance it is useful to examine the situation as it emerges in individual localities and projects. In New York City, for example, the WPA has undertaken a hospitals project designed to modernize and enlarge, to clean and paint and repair, a dozen public hospitals which for years have been a disgrace to the city and a source of danger and misery to their unfortunate patients and employees. The work has been carried on by a staff of about 5,000 workers. Before the election an unexpected raise was given to all the white-collar employees on the project. After the election 850 workers were ordered dismissed. Neither the needs of the men nor the needs of the project were examined. The workers were simply laid off against their protests and those of the technicians in charge. What has happened on a single project in New York is undoubtedly happening in much more drastic form in other parts of the country. We have no doubt that private industry is absorbing many employable workers; a legitimate drop in the relief rolls is inevitable. But we want to issue a storm warning of our own against wholesale dismissal of workers whose condition since November 3 is unchanged except in one respect—that their votes have been cast and counted.

WHAT WILL HAPPEN AT TAMPA? TWO WEEKS ago it seemed as if the executive council was trying to find a way of letting the C. I. O. unions back into the fold. At the moment of writing, the two camps seem farther apart than ever, several incidents having occurred to shorten tempers on both sides. A proposal by the C. I. O. that Green and Lewis meet to talk things over dissolved in bitterness when Green said he had no power to lift suspensions and Lewis replied that a conference would therefore be futile. The C. I. O. admitted to its ranks two unions that had been refused industrial charters by the A. F. of L. President Green was summoned by the executive board of the United Mine Workers to appear before it and answer charges of conspiring against the union by aiding in its suspension. In Tampa the pre-convention meetings of the executive council and of various departments of the A. F. of L. have been filled with denunciations of the C. I. O., although it is clear that there is division in the ranks of the A. F. of L. Meanwhile none of the unions in the C. I. O. have sent delegates. The question is whether the diehards at the convention can muster a two-thirds' majority for expulsion. At first glance this would appear to be a simple task. But the C. I. O., with its political and economic implications, has set up a criss-cross of loyalties among the rank and file in all unions which will be reflected in Tampa and which makes the outcome anything but certain.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S STATEMENT THAT wage rates should not be tied to the cost of living is interesting for two reasons. It indicates a friendly post-landslide attitude toward the mass-production labor that contributed so much to his victory; at the same time it sets this friendliness in its proper context, namely, the President's general theory that capitalism must be preserved by increasing mass purchasing power. Labor can take much more comfort from the informal opinion of Miss Perkins questioning the right of company-union representatives to sign a contract binding their fellow-workers to accept a wage increase attached to a cost-of-living string with which the employer can snatch it back if living costs fall. In any case the two Administration comments have taken much of the effect out of the gesture of a wage increase with which the steel employers and their spokesmen have attempted to prove that outside unions are superfluous and that John L. Lewis is trying to snare the workers only for his own aggrandizement. Two simple facts, which steel workers as well as steel barons know, have further pricked the bright-colored balloon. While steel wages have been raised 10 per cent, the profits of the steel industry for the first six months of 1936 increased 139 per cent over the same period last year. Steel prices will shortly be raised $2 or $3 a ton, which means that the wage rise will be passed on to the consumer. Big business has signally failed in the attempt to ward off strikes and create anti-union propaganda by insignificant wage increases that could scarcely have been avoided in view of the rising tide of recovery. Unionization, like business, is booming.

JOSEPH EASTMAN, OF THE INTERSTATE Commerce Commission, and Thomas Lamont, of J. P. Morgan and Company, discussed railroads at a grand dinner of the Academy of Political Science at the Hotel Astor in New York. Civilities were of course exchanged, but the atmosphere was none the less tense. Mr. Eastman strikes us as being the consummate public servant. He knows more about the railroad industry than the railway magnates themselves. As he stood there telling the assembled grandees of industry that it was possible the system of private ownership of railroads would break down, and that "we would not be embarking on communism" if our government took over the railroad control directly, one felt confidence both in his courage and his objectivity. Mr. Eastman is himself a living proof of his statement that the government could run the railroads "under men of excellent character and capacity and without political corruption." Mr. Lamont resorted to a parade of imaginary horrors, arguing that if the government took over the railroads it could not stop short of taking over the entire transportation system of the country. Private enterprise is torn between concern for its current investments and fear that public operation of railroads would be an entering wedge for further socialization of industry. Meanwhile the automobile industry, as shown by automobile shows reminiscent of the halcyon days, is preparing for a boom year—and thereby furthering the competitive forces that have been cutting under railroad revenue. Even the court decisions upholding the new railroad pick-up and delivery service, which the trucking industry has been fighting, seem but an incident in a continuing struggle.

THE ATTACK ON SUIYUAN, INNER MONGOLIA, supported by Japan, represents the culmination of years of intrigue in this highly strategic area. The famous Captain Nakamura, whose disappearance in the summer of 1931 was one of the immediate causes of the Japanese coup of September 18 of that year, was believed to be a secret emissary to the Mongols. Since that date at least half the territory of Inner Mongolia has been occupied by the Japanese or their allies. Jehol was invaded and incorporated into Manchoukuo in 1933; the Mongols of Chahar appear to have been either intimidated or bought over by Japan. Japanese military missions have been established at the capitals of each of the four Inner Mongolian provinces, and airdromes have been constructed throughout the entire region for the use of Japanese military planes. Despite these evidences of overwhelming force, Fu Tso-yi, Chinese governor of Suiyuan, has vigorously opposed Japanese penetration and is reported to have created a well-equipped army of 60,000 men to resist the threatened invasion of the Japanese-supported troops from Chahar and Manchoukuo. Had the attack occurred a few months ago, the chances are that Nanking would have taken little official notice of it. Today, however, the Suiyuan situation has attracted nation-wide attention, and Chiang Kai-shek, swept along by the rising tide of patriotism, has declared that he is willing to go the limit in defending "China's gateway to the Northwest."

THE IRON-BOUND CASTE SYSTEM OF INDIA was breached on November 13 when the Maharajah of Travancore announced that hereafter the untouchables in his own state would suffer no restrictions in entering or worshiping in temples controlled by him. Travancore is itself a small and not very important state in southwestern India, but the movement may well spread to other and larger states. There is no reason to believe that the Maharajah's "emancipation proclamation" was inspired by or even will have the approval of the British government in India. Britain has pursued the policy of dividing and ruling in India as in other parts of the Empire, and the caste system, like the favoritism shown the Indian princes at London conferences, has served to emphasize disunity among the Indians rather than to further unity. Gandhi, however, although his activities are no longer a frequent news item—probably because of the rigid censorship imposed by Britain—continues to agitate for his program of unification, of which the abolition of the caste system is a major feature. It is altogether likely that the removal of the restrictions on the untouchables in Travancore is the result of his efforts. If other states follow suit, Britain may yet see not only a casteless India but one united in opposition to imperialist rule.

THE HONOR PAID TO EUGENE O'NEILL IN the award of the Nobel Prize indicates the passing of a stage in the long struggle of American literature for European recognition. The 1930 award to Sinclair Lewis, portrayer of Babbitt, might have been construed as a back-handed compliment to America—as an official confirmation of the European estimate of our character. England, especially, has always been relatively well disposed toward those writers who were critical of American culture, or who were quaint or uncouth in the way Americans were supposed to be. But both England and France have usually been scornful of any attempt on the part of Americans to bid for a place in the obviously civilized tradition. Mr. O'Neill, on the other hand, is interesting at all only if he is interesting apart from any local peculiarities. His scenes are naturally American, but there is nothing clearer in either his own comments or in the plays themselves than the fact that their real subject is not America but Man. If the Nobel committee has chosen to honor him, it can only be as a writer who has successfully attempted the highest and most difficult of literary tasks. Perhaps it is unfortunate that in this case, as so often in the past, the substantial monetary award amounting this year to some $45,000 should go to a man who is no longer in need of financial assistance. It is too bad that two awards cannot be made instead: one, largely honorary, to established success and another, largely monetary, to struggling merit.

Judge Thacher's Trial and Error

THE utilities have launched their final and crucial judicial bombardment against the Public Utility Act of 1935 and other pertinent legislation. The warriors for the industry include ■ former Secretary of War, a former Democratic nominee for the Presidency, and a former Solicitor General of the United States. What induced Newton D. Baker, John W. Davis, and Thomas D. Thacher to lend their wits and conscience to the anti-Administration forces before the courts of the country is not included in the voluminous records now accumulating. Suffice it to say, that probably few major issues of the last four years have produced spectacles like those of the Supreme Court in its last October term throwing out a case brought by Mr. Davis, and now of former Judge Thacher apologizing to government attorneys after having charged them with misrepresentations which, if made, could have led to disbarment.

On November 9, the Monday preceding the Thacher incident, the government before the Supreme Court and through Solicitor General Stanley Reed contended that the District Court in the District of Columbia had properly exercised its powers in staying trial of all cases arising out of the holding-company regulatory law except that of the Electric Bond and Share Company. If the stay were set aside, Mr. Reed said, the Department of Justice would be swamped with an intolerable number of cases. This could be avoided, the Solicitor General argued, by allowing the Bond and Share case, which covered the main points at issue thus far, to be settled first.

The following is extracted from ■ transcript of the proceedings:

MR. REED: We do not contend that they [the Bond and Share case and other holding-company suits] are identical; but in all these cases you find many questions which are similar. . . .

JUSTICE SUTHERLAND: Then is it your contention, in that situation of affairs, that if the act be held valid it puts an end to these cases; there is nothing left to litigate?

MR. REED: No, I cannot go so far. I wish it were possible to say that one case would put an end to all the litigation. The government does not take that position. It takes the position that many of the most important questions will be decided by cases such as the Electric Bond and Share or any case that goes to the Supreme Court. But certainly there will be further litigation in regard to some features of the act. . . .

Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General, supplemented Mr. Reed's argument as follows:

MR. JACKSON: Where counsel and ourselves differ about the merits of the Bond and Share case is that we contend that neither his company [North American Company] nor the Bond and Share Company and other companies which are defendants with it, as unregistered companies, can question the provision of the act which relates only to registered companies. . . . We contend that it is premature in his case or any other case now to question the applicability of the death sentence because they are not registered, and the death sentence can apply only to registered companies; that the validity of the registration provision must first be determined.

These statements are plain and unequivocal; yet the following is what Judge Thatcher, a former head of the American Bar Association, said when he appeared two days later before Federal Judge Julian W. Mack in New York as counsel for the Bond and Share Company:

MR. THACHER: Now, if the court please, it does seem strange that this great government of ours in the administration of this statute should have represented in other courts and the Supreme Court of the United States only yesterday or the day before that Your Honor, in this case, would finally settle and determine all of the questions affecting all of the companies in this industry, and that then these very same counsel should come into this court and say to Your Honor that nothing can be settled here except the validity of registration.

It will be observed that Judge Thatcher here enlarged Mr. Reed's "many of the most important questions will be decided by cases such as the Electric Bond and Share" to "all of the questions affecting all of the companies in this industry." Furthermore, Mr. Jackson specifically stated to the Supreme Court that "the validity of the registration provision must first be determined," while Judge Thatcher tried to give the impression that Mr. Jackson was singing this tune only when he appeared before Judge Mack.

To charge men of the official standing of Mr. Reed and Mr. Jackson with deliberately misleading the Supreme Court on the one hand and the Circuit Court of Appeals on the other is something even the most hard-mouthed corporation lawyer would be careful to avoid unless the stakes were high and the weapons few. When confronted with the record by the government, Judge Thatcher apologized on the following morning in court and withdrew his statements. No New York paper except the World-Telegram noted the incident, although Judge Thatcher blamed the newspapers for his erroneous impressions.

What led so experienced a counsel to rely on sketchy news stories in making charges as serious as this? Viewed as part of the tactics of the industry, exemplified by the Burco suit last year, which was preceded by the telegraphic deluge of Congress, it serves to discredit further the character of the industry's pleading. The Burco case will be remembered as the case which John W. Davis prepared without ever meeting his client till court convened. When the industry was unsuccessful in destroying the act by this suit, a succession of actions approximating fifty in number were brought by individual utilities in an effort to swamp the government's legal machinery. It is no wonder therefore that Judge Thatcher's "error" looks suspiciously like an unsuccessful attempt to give an impression of a government double-cross in the hope that such an impression might lead to dissolution of the stay against the other fifty cases. And this would have prevented the government from concentrating its attention on the Bond and Share case and would have diverted it in fifty different directions.

False Hopes for Europe

DESPITE the European turmoil over Spain, a number of seasoned observers have recently found reasons for hope that the Continent is farther from war than is ordinarily supposed. The mere fact that nearly four months of passionate controversy over the Spanish crisis have passed without an outbreak of hostilities may indicate that no one, not even the fascist countries, really wants war at the present time. Hitler's rather unexpected agreement not to interfere in the dispute between Poland and the Nazi-controlled Danzig senate may be further evidence that Germany is not desirous of an immediate conflict. Anthony Eden's forthright statement that Britain opposed Germany's desire to exclude the Soviet Union from a European settlement heads off, for the moment at least, a very alarming anti-Soviet trend among all European states. Some observers also see substantial grounds for optimism in the elimination of the Heimwehr from political influence in Austria and in the more democratic tendencies of the new government in Hungary. The currency-stabilization pact contributes to the economic strength of the democratic countries at a time when the fascist powers are being progressively weakened by vain efforts to establish greater self-sufficiency.

Some of these developments do furnish grounds for hope. But it is the hope of a condemned prisoner clutching at each reprieve. For what fragmentary gains have been achieved would appear to be counterbalanced by unfavorable factors far more fundamental in nature. The ink is as yet scarcely dry on the Ciano-Hitler agreement, in which the two fascist powers finally buried their differences over Austria in order to devote their energies to the larger task of ridding the world of communism. In the past week the extension of fascist influence in Central Europe has been confirmed by Mussolini's action in permitting Austria and Hungary to seek new trade relations with countries other than Italy. Yugoslavia and Rumania have lately moved toward Hitler. Belgium's neutrality gesture, while qualified, was likewise a symptom of the growth of Nazi influence.

More than all this, the Spanish crisis has accentuated the basic class conflict which underlies more superficial national rivalries. Fascism has gained prestige even in the democratic countries as a defense against social revolution. As a result the traditional division of Europe into "have" and "have-not" countries has been replaced by a new conflict which cuts bewilderingly across national lines. The British and French governments have virtually cooperated with the fascist powers in enforcing an embargo against the Popular Front government at Madrid. But the French Communists, and to a certain extent the Socialists, together with a strong section of the British Labor Party, have sided with the Soviet Union in urging support of the Spanish government. While the conflict has thus far been kept within bounds, no one can say what would happen if a struggle broke out between the French Popular Front government and growing fascist groups under De la Rocque and Doriot.

In general, the development of class consciousness has reacted almost entirely to the benefit of the fascists. Paradoxical though it may seem, the doctrine of class solidarity is put into practice by the dominant economic groups long before it is accepted by the working class. It was the Tories in England and the extreme right in France that prevented the British and French governments from thwarting German and Italian aspirations in Spain. The growing fear of communism in the British upper classes has made Britain far more sympathetic toward German rearmament than would normally be expected. As long as Hitler and Mussolini continue to get their way without war, Europe is in no immediate danger of conflict. But this is merely another way of saying that when the war comes it will be at the time and under the conditions most favorable to the fascist cause. Peace on these terms can offer no security.

What the Seamen Want

THE seamen's strike in the East has aroused less public interest than it deserves. One reason is that it was called primarily as a sympathetic walk-out to support the Pacific Coast unions, although the strikers are also making wage and hour demands, the issues have been further confused because the officials of the International Seamen's Union, whose rank-and-file members are involved in the strike, have denounced it as an "outlaw" strike and have used every method known to employers for breaking it. As a result, the employers have had to do little except issue statements abusing the strikers and standing by the I. S. U., leaving it to David Grange and his fellow-officials to provide the strike-breakers, the red-baiting, and the public confusion.

The ultimate objective of the strikers led by Joseph Curran and the Seamen's Defense Committee in New York City is the improvement of working conditions through collective bargaining. But the only established agency through which they can bargain collectively, their union, is at present autocratically controlled by a group of officials who first wiped out democratic procedure and then signed agreements with the shipowners in open defiance of the wishes of the membership. It should be said that the homelessness and mobility of sailors make it peculiarly easy for landlubber officials to seize power.

The same general conditions prevailed in the West until the rank and file, through the Maritime Federation, obtained control of the various marine unions on the Pacific Coast. The East Coast and Gulf seamen cannot hope to better their conditions until they too obtain control of their unions. They will eventually succeed. The present strike is a continuation of a campaign begun last spring, not an isolated battle. The obstacles the rank and file must overcome are vividly illustrated in an incident that occurred in New York last week. The strikers' Defense Committee succeeded in making a tentative separate agreement with the American Range Lines which would have given them parity of conditions and wages with the Pacific Coast workers. The agreement went by default when Ivan Hunter, official of the I. S. U., refused to attend the negotiations and denounced his fellow-unionists.

If, then, the strike is primarily a sympathy strike, it is not because the East Coast seamen have no grievances. It is pretty well agreed that workers in the American merchant marine, which has absorbed millions of American tax dollars, live under much worse conditions than the skilled or even the unskilled workers on land. The President's National Committee on Safety at Sea pointed out in its findings that "under present conditions the sea as a career has little to offer the type of man who is so greatly needed if ships are to be safely and efficiently operated." A report based on a first-hand investigation of several hundred ships made by the Department of Labor with the assistance of officials of the Commerce Department is reliably said to condemn very severely the living and working conditions on American ships. This report, unfortunately, has not been published, although it would do more than anything else to clarify the issues behind the ship strike. The report describes in detail the eighteen-hour day of skilled and always courteous service for which the East Coast steward gets $45 a month. He also gets tips, but tips have sharply declined, and if the steward does draw a section of profitable first-class quarters he has probably paid a good round sum for the privilege.

While the East Coast seamen fight for a maritime federation of their own, the Bridges organization on the West Coast stands firm. It has much more money and is much more solidly organized than in 1934. The owners are making concerted attempts to force arbitration and have reproached the unions for not agreeing to a device which has always worked to the advantage of employers. In negotiations the question of hiring halls has consistently stopped the show. The award of 1934 gave control of these halls to the unions. Formerly they had been controlled by the employers and had justly earned the name of "fink" halls, since they provided an excellent method for keeping the black list effective. The control of hiring halls is an issue on which the unions cannot and will not compromise. Let the public keep this in mind as the wails of the subsidized shipowners mount.

BY PAUL W. WARD

Think Pieces

Washington, November 16

THIS is thumb-sucking season in Washington journalism. It is the time when the men who report to the nation the doings and misdoings of its federal government find the springs of factual news all but dried up and are reduced to turning out, in the guise of news, dispatches that in major part are the product of the reporters' communion with their own imaginative souls. The production of such dispatches is known to the craft as "thumb-sucking," and the products themselves as "think pieces." These pieces are only mildly dishonest and would not be dishonest at all if the reporter were allowed by his editors to write, "This is what I think is going to happen and here are my reasons," instead of disguising his views with a mesh of such phrases as "according to insiders," "it is reliably reported," "it is said," "it is understood," and "authoritative sources report." If the practice of thumb-sucking has any evil consequences they arise from the fact that the cogitations of the individual reporters do not always lead to the same conclusions, and that confusion results among their unwarned readers, who, for example, read in one piece that "officials here say" a new NRA is in the making and in another, maybe on the same day, that "officials here say" there is no chance of the NRA's revival.

Although there is always likely to be some of this sort of "reporting" going on in Washington and elsewhere, the present thumb-sucking season is without parallel in intensity, for it comes at the close of an election campaign which produced no concrete issues or pledges, obliterated the opposition party, and returned Roosevelt to power in a fashion that left him without a precise debt to any specific section of the electorate. Worse still from the newswriters' standpoint, the election results have caught the various federal department heads unprepared to quit the defensive positions they have occupied for more than a year and resume the offensive with definite programs; and, to make matters worse, the President himself is taking pains to keep both activity and public discourse at low ebb while he decides what disposition to make of his unexpected electoral riches.

A major theme in the current output of think pieces is speculation on prospective changes in the Roosevelt Cabinet. There is very little factual basis for these forecasts. The firmest of them derive their authority from a member of the Cabinet who shortly before election confided to a select group of reporters that three high federal officials would be tossed out on the scrap heap if Roosevelt were reelected. He named Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, as one of the doomed and Frances Perkins,

Secretary of Labor, as another, and this much of his forecast was at least credible. But he destroyed the credibility of the whole when he named J. Edgar Hoover as the third party in his triumvirate of the damned. It will take more than a Roosevelt to get the chief of the G-men's job; it will take dynamite and tractors to eject him. There are a number of New Dealers and more than a few Congressmen who regard Hoover as a menace, but there is no visible sign as yet that the President shares their aversion for J. Edgar, and there is no reason as yet to believe that Roosevelt would be willing to brave the public outcry that the ousting of the heavily publicized Chief G-Man would arouse. If Hoover's foot should slip, his decapitation might follow quickly, but there is little likelihood of that; Hoover, a wily fellow, even sleeps with his ground-grippers on.

Apart from the Cabinet officer's prediction, the chief ingredient of these think pieces forecasting changes in the Cabinet is gossip of either the playful or the malicious kind. Much of the speculation is the inspired product of jobless politicians seeking to garner kudos from having their names appear in the public prints as persons of Cabinet caliber. But in even greater part it is compounded of a mélange of old newspaper stories turned out by certain journalists who conceive it to be their duty not merely to report the doings of government but to try to shape those doings. They work on the theory that if the projected ousting of a certain official is printed often enough, the person in question eventually will begin to believe the reports and file a precautionary resignation. It is also the theory of this school that such reports of impending ousters or resignations often awaken the President or department heads to the need for scuttling the underlings in question. There is even a word for the practice; the reporter about to write such a story tells his colleagues he is "resigning" so-and-so, and frequently he persuades them to dispatch similar stories to their own papers so that widespread and simultaneous publication will lend weight to the yarn. Secretaries Roper and Perkins being held in high disesteem by a large section of the capital's press corps, they have been the chief victims of this type of thumb-sucking.

The emergence of speculation on Cabinet revisions as a favorite theme for think pieces is in itself a reflection of the present lack of the stuff out of which news is made, for it is a poor theme. A brief review of American history will show that Cabinet changes between the first and second terms of an Administration are relatively rare. They are not even numerous when the Administration itself changes without a change in party control, as is shown by Coolidge's retention of Harding's Cabinet and Hoover's retention of most of Coolidge's Cabinet. Nor is there any practical reason why there should be important changes at this time. Cabinet changes are due, in the main, to one of three causes: a wish to punish the ousted one for disloyalty or recalcitrance; the need of rewarding some individual or group of individuals who contributed in substantial degree to the President's election; or natural causes, including death, illness, or the discovery by a Cabinet member of a better job elsewhere.

Consider the prospective changes in the Roosevelt Cabinet in the light of those three possible reasons for change. No member is subject to a charge of disloyalty unless the charge be stretched to include Secretary of War Woodring, whose bumbleheadness—to use the politest possible term—has repeatedly embarrassed the Administration. The charge of disloyalty cannot even be leveled at the bellicose Ickes, who repeatedly has quarreled with the Administration's public-works muddling, and his very bellicosity may be expected to save him from any gesture toward elbowing him out of the Cabinet. The election results preclude the sort of pressure for Cabinet changes to which Roosevelt might otherwise have been subject. Since he owes his reelection to no one group or machine, he is under no compulsion to scatter Cabinet or other posts among his political creditors. Had the race been close and had such states as Indiana and Pennsylvania decided it, then it might have been necessary at this time to give serious consideration to the reports that Curtis Bok of Philadelphia would be made Ambassador to the U. S. S. R. and that the Hoosier Hitler, Governor McNutt of Indiana, would be made either Secretary of War or an Appellate Court judge. There remains for consideration the factor of "natural causes." Some of the Cabinet members—notably Cummings, Roper, and Swanson—are aging and in poor health. None at the moment seems to face a prospect of equally honorable and more secure employment elsewhere. And one or two are what a distinguished British journalist calls "human problems," meaning that they would be in financial straits if they lost their Cabinet berths; it is one of the oddities of politics that their dependence on their jobs makes them more secure in them than are other Cabinet officers who fill their posts independently and well.

The only Cabinet change we have reason definitely to expect is in the Secretaryship of War, and there the reason is that Roosevelt in appointing Woodring a few months ago emphasized that the appointment was good only until January. A change in the Attorney Generalship might be expected, but for less definite reasons: Cummings on several occasions has indicated his desire to spend his last days in the Philippines as High Commissioner, and there is a vacancy there now resulting from Frank Murphy's election as Governor of Michigan. Roper's handling of the Commerce Department might seem to make him eligible to walk the plank, but he has been equally eligible from the beginning of the New Deal and it has made no difference, even though Roper was not in a position substantially to help Roosevelt achieve reelection. It is certain that attempts will be made by various labor groups, ably abetted by Miss Perkins's journalistic enemies, to have the Labor portfolio snatched from her hands; but they will be working against heavy odds, including especially the inability of her foes to agree among themselves on a successor to her, her own prideful tenacity, and the difficulty of contriving a satisfactory substitute method of honoring the woman voter. It is being suggested that at least some of these difficulties will be surmounted by the creation of a Department of Welfare with Miss Perkins as the Secretary in charge, but any such attempt is sure to stir up bitter warfare among the various departments, bureaus, and agencies that might be involved. Even the threat of slight interdepartmental changes involved in Ickes's attempt to change the Interior Department's name to "Department of Conservation and Public Works" has nearly produced bloodshed.

Madrid Fights Off Franco

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Madrid, November 16, by Cable

BOMBARDED from the air, shelled from the ground, with a hostile semicircle drawn tightly around the suburbs, Madrid still holds out. Republican Spain regards every additional day of successful defense as victory. How many more such days there will be nobody can say. Ever since November 6 the pressure has been terrific. Moors and legionnaires may enter the city at any moment, although the enemy is showing signs of fatigue. In the last week the fascists have been harassed by loyal aviators and an effective tank attack. An expert has estimated, on the basis of certainly insufficient information, that Franco's 12,000 men who hoped to occupy Madrid have lost 10 per cent of their effectives in the last seven days. Observation airplanes are unable to discover that any reinforcements have been brought up to replenish the insurgent columns.

It is admitted that Franco's soldiers are fine fighters who stand up to tank attacks and do not flee from airplane bombing. Most of the legionnaires who have fallen into Loyalist hands are illiterate. The theory is that with smaller culture goes less fear of death. But despite these considerations, the adventurers, desperados, and legionnaires of Franco's army seem to value their lives more dearly than the Republicans. The rebels are superbly equipped with modern arms. Franco evidently thought he could take Madrid with the forces at his disposal, but the strategy he has employed, which showed his contempt for his antagonists, now exposes him to the danger of being cut off from his bases in western and northern Spain. Franco's army, spoiled by the ease with which it has advanced on the capital, may become demoralized by Madrid's firm resistance.

Between November 6 and 10 Madrid, shaken out of its lethargy, went fearlessly to work at the task of defending itself. In innumerable streets sandbag barricades have been erected and houses converted into fortresses. The fascists within the gates have been reduced by execution and imprisonment. Madrid will be a very hot and uncomfortable place for the enemy if he enters. He may come in and go out again. As a general said to me today, "The city cannot be captured, it can only be surrendered." The great question is whether the Loyalists, by mistaken tactics or faulty organization, by panic or overconfidence, will make a present of the capital to the rebels. For four days, while Madrid found itself menaced, it shed its earlier frivolity and carefree attitude. Now its customary self-assurance has returned. The people have become accustomed to a state of semi-siege and feel the city can hold out for months. Herein lies its danger, for one result is that the government troops outside Madrid, whose function is to strike the enemy in the rear, show a disinclination to fight. This may quickly change.

The Loyalists have received assistance of incomparable importance from the international column of foreign Socialists and Communists, whose two units, now in the hottest part of the front line, have acquitted themselves with unprecedented valor. These reserves, originally intended for other purposes—for an offensive into hostile territory—had to be thrown into the battle to defend Madrid. The international force, however, is growing steadily through the influx of enthusiastic volunteers. If the enemy is compelled to retire even a short distance from Madrid, the government will be able to muster enough strength to strike a blow at Franco's lines of communication. In any case, the Republican Foreign Legion has tremendously improved the morale and combative qualities of the Spanish Republican army, as has the presence of newly equipped airplanes and tanks. The government cavalry came on the field three days ago with good morale and military effect. The Loyalists suffer from an insufficiency of machine-guns, which Franco has in abundance. If this deficiency can be remedied, fear of the foe's superior armaments will disappear.

The many bombings have failed to affect the morale of the population. This morning my hotel windows were shaken by exploding bombs. From the balcony I saw three giant enemy planes fleeing before Loyalist machines. The rebels' aim was to bomb the chief railway station, but they missed. Some bombs fell in the streets not far away. One made a hole through which the underground railway tracks could be seen, another brought down two huge marble columns on a public building, overthrew another column nearby, burst a water main, and shattered innumerable windows. Other bombs made deep craters in busy streets in the heart of the city, but business went on as usual. The food queues are as long as ever, but the cafes do not lack patrons.

Soviet Russia's New Deal

BY SIDNEY WEBB

THE All-Union Congress of Soviets will meet on November 25 to ratify the new Soviet Constitution, a document which has astonished the Western World. The embassies and foreign offices throughout the world were impressed by the gesture of its publication. It sounded the note of achievement. Those in authority at the Kremlin are today able to announce, in effect, that the immense difficulties of so gigantic a social and economic reconstruction have been overcome. Not stability only, but also success, has been substantially secured. A second impression is that of maturity. The child born in 1917 has come of age and takes an adult place in the world. Development is still proceeding, but it is now the development of an adult, rising toward its prime of power.

Nearly all the press comments have failed to emphasize the most important of the innovations of the published draft. Thus the method of direct election of representatives by the largest electorate ever known already prevails in city and village alike, no fewer than 77,000,000 votes having been actually cast for the Soviets at the last elections, out of a total electorate of just over 91,000,000.

This method of election was actually included in the published program of the Bolshevik Party in 1903 and has been in operation since 1918. It is true that the members of the four or five thousand district and provincial councils, like those of the supreme assembly, the All-Union Congress of Soviets, have hitherto been indirectly elected, just as members of the Senate of the United States used to be. It is not clear to the outsider how much difference has been made in the character and composition of the United States Senate by the substitution of direct for indirect election. No one can predict with any confidence that any greater difference will be made by the analogous change in the U. S. S. R.

Similarly with regard to the proposed enlargement of the electorate and the equalization of representation of citizen and villager. Certainly the abandonment of all exclusions and inequalities from the electoral franchise is an impressive gesture. Neither ill-gotten wealth nor former anti-social occupation, not even family relationship to the late Czar or membership in a religious order, will henceforth deprive a Soviet citizen of his vote. It has scarcely been noticed that most of these exclusions had already lapsed in practice. It is true that, without any change of official policy toward theology, nearly 50,000 practicing priests of the Greek Orthodox Church, together with some hundreds of Roman Catholic, Evangelical, Mohammedan, and Buddhist ministers, will for the first time next year receive votes. But what are 50,000 in an electorate that has already reached a total of more than 90,000,000? Moreover, the vote of each of the 60,000,000 rural electors will henceforth count for as much as that of each of the 30,000,000 urban electors, instead of only about half (usually misstated as one-fifth) as much. This is Stalin's effective answer to the constantly repeated slanders as to the oppression of the peasants.

But to the student of political science the most important innovation will not be any reshaping of the electoral machine but the enshrinement in the constitution of a new set of "rights of man." The Declaration of Independence of the American rebels of 1776 and the United States Constitution of 1787 were both founded on an almost unfettered individual ownership of private property for the purpose of profit-making. The French Declaration of the Rights of Man in 1789 (and as rewritten in 1793) had a similar basis. These were alike sanctifications of the motive of profit-making, then believed to be the necessary foundation of economic progress. Even in the "Principles of a Civil Code" Bentham allowed only one encroachment—that of taxation—upon private property, and recognized only four "ends" of civil government without specifying how they could be attained, namely, individual subsistence, security, equality, and abundance. In 1848 Louis Blanc asked in vain for the addition of the "right to work," meaning the right to be found employment by the state. In 1936 the Soviet constitution insures to every citizen not only protection against aggression but also the right to have remunerative work; the right to specified hours of rest and paid weeks of holiday; the right to education of every kind and grade free of all charges; and, most far-reaching of all, the right to full economic provision, according to need, in all the vicissitudes of life. What is even more important is the fact that the inclusion in the constitution of these enormously extended "rights of man" is but the explicit recital of what is already in practice. The right to "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness" promised to every American citizen in 1776 is nowadays seen to have been but an empty phrase, to which no substance was given. Louis Blanc's "right to work" of 1848 equally remained a dead letter. But in the U. S. S. R. the right to have and to enjoy remunerative work—not necessarily employment at wages or salary, because it includes the self-chosen alternative of "self-employment," either individually or in cooperative partnerships as associations of producers—has for years been a fact. Similarly, in the Soviet Union "woman's right to economic security" is already much more than mere equality of opportunity with men. The fulfilment of woman's peculiar social function of maternity carries with it the right to be indemnified against all the pecuniary charges or sacrifices that childbirth involves, on the same principle as that by which the official is repaid all the traveling or other expenses that are incident to his official duties. All these new and unprecedented rights of man are to be guaranteed by the proposed constitution, not merely to a ruling class, a dominant race, a favored sex, or even a specially insured minority, but universally, according to need, without exclusion of sex or color or social past, and without insurance premium, to all persons over eighteen in city or village, including the backward peoples of nearly two hundred different tribes throughout the vast continent. This is in startling contrast to the constitution and practice of every other state in the world. It is notably for these stupendous innovations, unparalleled in any previous constitution, that the new draft of the Soviet Union, which embodies an effective socialism, will be regarded by the future historian as even more momentous than the American Constitution of 1787 or that of the French Republic of 1793.

Not less original in conception and unprecedented in history is the method by which the draft constitution has been launched. It was not called for by any popular agitation. The proposal, including all its striking novelties, emanated spontaneously from the chief governmental authority. But it was not then put into law or even given the seal of approval. It was referred to a hierarchy of committees composed of the most expert administrators and the most authoritative writers on government. The draft thus elaborated was next laid before the whole people of the U. S. S. R., not only by publication in all the hundreds of newspapers in the five score principal languages, but also by the issue of 15,000,000 copies—one to every three families from Leningrad to Vladivostok—in all these languages, either in cheap pamphlet form or in larger type in the form of posters which are to be seen in every public place. Meanwhile it has been broadcast from all the radio stations to tens of thousands of public loud speakers and to millions of domestic wireless sets. In every center of population, often at meetings in the village street, it has been popularly discussed, not merely in order to voice the very general public approval, but particularly with a view to responding to the official request for criticisms, suggestions, and amendments. The number of these received at Moscow, within two months of publication, is reported to have run into tens of thousands. All these were sorted and classified and laid before the expert committees by whom the draft is being corrected and amplified before being considered by the specially elected All-Union Congress of Soviets. This elaborate procedure, it may be noted, is merely in accord with the principle of participation which—though the West finds it difficult to believe—actually runs through so much of Soviet administration.

Almost as unexpected to the Western world is the inclusion, on the lines of the most civilized democratic states of continental Europe, of provisions safeguarding the liberty of the person against unauthorized arrest and imprisonment by the police or by arbitrary action of the executive government unsanctioned by the judiciary. As in other Continental countries, there will not be what is so much cherished in England, the special protection of that British peculiarity the Habeas Corpus Act. But by Article 127 "the citizens of the U. S. S. R. are guaranteed inviolability of person. No person may be placed under arrest except by decision of a court or with the sanction of a state attorney" (meaning the judicial department of the Procurator, which is independent of the executive). Equally remarkable is Article 125, by which "the citizens of the U. S. S. R. are guaranteed freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and of holding mass-meetings, and freedom of street processions and demonstrations." These "rights of the citizens," the article goes on to say, "are insured by placing at the disposal of the toilers and their organizations printing presses, supplies of paper, public buildings, the streets, means of communication, and other material requisites for the exercise of these rights." Truly a unique and unprecedented conception of public freedom!

Considered as a political gesture alike to the millions at home and to other nations, the diplomatic world allows it to be magnificent. Even the most skeptical of gentlemanly attachés cannot avoid being shaken in his faith that Bolshevism cannot possibly endure. The student of political science tabulates a brand-new specimen in the way of constitutions. But of course constitutions are judged in the long run not by what they say but according to how they work—or are worked. All the friends of freedom throughout the world are welcoming the document that is shortly to go into effect for nearly one-sixth of the entire land surface of the globe. The new constitution of the Soviet Union, to go into effect in January, 1937, will be judged by the world according to the way in which it is found to be actually working, say, in January, 1942, after five years' experience without war.

Elegy for the Elite

BY STUART CHASE

I HEARD the election returns from a radio in a Pullman club car going from New York to Chicago. There were perhaps twenty of us listening desperately to flurries of figures momentarily drowned in static. My companions were obviously in the higher-income groups. With one or two exceptions their faces were long and sour as the pluralities mounted. When the incredible Mr. Hamilton told us at 11 p.m. that we would go to bed as Democrats to wake Republicans, the anguish abated. Then: "Connecticut—Roosevelt 97,386; Landon 70,241," and the glassy expressions returned.

By 11:30 even the most hopeful knew it was all over. About midnight came Jim Farley's generous, unvindictive message. "Yeah, you bought 'em, you ought to know," said the man on my left. The Sunflower contingent drifted off to their sleepers leaving just four of us around the radio—an exceedingly prosperous-looking older woman, a Jewish traveling man, a manufacturer of porcelain ware, and myself, to drink a nightcap to victory. Presently the porter politely joined us in mutual congratulations. A Jew, a Negro, a scribbler, a manufacturer, and an up-stage matron—class angle this if you can.

In the washroom of my car two men were holding a postmortem. One was beefy, bald, pink-faced, in a loud pepper-and-salt suit. The other was young, lean, long-nosed, with hexagonal glasses. It developed that their line was women's garments.

LEAN FACE: "Well, that's that. Jesus Christ, two to one! And Pennsylvania. The more you stick to your own business and forget about the government, the better you're off. We've always had politicians and we always will."

FAT FACE: "You said it, brother. Do you think he'll pull this dictator stuff?"

LEAN FACE: "No. That's a lotta hooey. What gripes me is all this spending. Jesus! Maybe 15, 20 per cent of the people on relief really deserved it. All the rest are bums. Well, the thing to do now is to get down to business."

FAT FACE: "Yeah, you're right. Funny thing; my business is better than it ever was. People are buying. These new models are a wow."

LEAN FACE: "We've always had depressions and we always will. Politics' got nothing to do with it. Business ought to be good now for three or four years. We got to make the most of it. I'm going to get all I can while the going's good."

FAT FACE: "What do you suppose the market'll do?"

LEAN FACE: "I think she'll go up—all but utilities. You know for a while there I thought Landon had it in the bag—that bloody Digest poll—and I was going to buy utilities. If he'd been elected you could have made a killing in utilities. Guy was telling me there's a chance to clean up in Western railroads, with those new streamlined trains."

FAT FACE: "Well, maybe. What do you think Princeton's going to do to those birds Saturday?"

LEAN FACE: "I'll tell you, brother. The backfield's okay, but the line has some sour spots. . . ." And class angle this, if you please.

Twenty-eight million votes. What did it? Certainly not an acute comprehension of technical economics—say, the savings-spending formula, which the two drummers noted above so charmingly mangled ("What gets me is this spending." . . . "You're right, it's terrible. My business is better than I've ever seen it"). Certainly not a comprehension of the raw facts which indicate that America has matured and must adjust its institutions to a new series of growth curves. Certainly not votes bought by relief money, for there are not that many on relief. Certainly not blind hero-worship. Save for the historic Hundred Days, Mr. Roosevelt has never had that.

What did it? There are undoubtedly many reasons. One to my mind outranks all others. I have traveled a good bit first and last, up and down, to and fro, across this slice of continent. The mass of the American people, especially west of the Appalachians, are decent folks. They are not very intellectual, or very critical, or very discriminating, but they are somehow immensely decent. They do not ride much in Pullman smokers.

The minds of the electorate were probably more influenced by Republican propaganda than by Democratic. The notions of squandering, of vast misty debts for the future to pay, the attacks on the Constitution, undoubtedly alarmed them. But something stronger than the mind was operating. In their hearts they felt that the New Deal was decent; that the man who had launched it and fought for it was decent. Deep answered deep. For the first time in their experience government had tried to help them in their agony. Always before government had promised all things and delivered nothing. The New Deal had actually and tangibly remembered the forgotten man. It had raised his wages and shortened his hours before the Supreme Court intervened. It had pulled the farmers out of bottomless despair. It had saved millions of small home-owners from foreclosure. It had stopped the losses to small depositors in floundering banks. It had reached out to broken, wandering, jobless souls and said, "You shall not starve." It had put four million of the unemployed to work on public tasks. It had taken the wild boys from the freight cars and the street corners and made hardy men of them in forest camps. It had given the people of a great river basin in the South a new pattern and a new hope. It had made Wall Street writhe, even as stock prices began to climb.

Here were no campaign promises, no tub-thumping about the tariff and the pauper labor of Europe, no spread-eagle appeals to the unapproachable American standard of being, no verbalisms at all, but hard, tangible, decent facts. Something was actually being done. It might cost more than it should, it might be bad for the budget as Mr. Landon said, it might make a lot of debts and taxes—but things were happening, the depression was lifting.

This deep feeling, as the election returns show, went far beyond the immediate beneficiaries of relief, up into the ranks of employed skilled labor, into the middleclasses, and even scarred the professions and the intellectuals. Only the coastal tribes of Bar Harbor, Back Bay, Newport, Long Island, Park Avenue, and Chestnut Hill—they and their bobbing junior executives—were impervious to it. (Still, there was that woman on the train.) Twenty-eight million Americans voted for a man who had demonstrated in a thousand concrete ways his fundamental decency.

Where do we go now? Where do the economic royalists go? Where does the organized radical movement go?

It appears that any political group which by tangible performance can demonstrate an increase in social security, hope for the future, a break for the mass of the people, need not fear the antics of Park Avenue dowagers with their "ten days more to save America," the yelps of the press, the stuffed pay envelopes of the tycoons, the bogies of the Constitution, the brain trust, states' rights, the pipeline to Moscow, or the house-broken statistical experts.

This tends to put the economic royalists back on their haunches. If their old charms will not operate, they are in a sorry predicament, for their actual votes are few. Meanwhile Mr. Roosevelt is commander-in-chief of the army, navy, and air force—quite a considerable air force. Nor has the military arm any grave cause for complaint. The tycoons cannot vote such a leader out; nor can they throw him out by force. For the moment, at least, they will have to grin and bear it. A look at their profit-and-loss accounts in the past year should provide consolation.

Big business has been on the defensive now for five years, and the election blackens the other eye. It is far from out of the ring of course, but when the elite, or ruling caste, turns from easy arrogance to the defensive, when it begins seriously to justify itself, the slide to the salt sea has begun. Big business is now buying full-page space, with the slickest of publicity assistance, to broadcast the news that finance, industry, business are really quite presentable institutions, not nearly so black as pictured. This is an ominous sign, the beginning of the end. Says Lasswell:

By the use of sanctioned words and gestures the elite elicits blood, work, taxes, applause from the masses. When the political order works smoothly, the masses venerate the symbols; the elite, self-righteous and unafraid, suffer from no withering sense of immorality . . . a well-established ideology perpetuates itself with little planned propaganda by those whom it benefits most. When thought is taken about ways and means of sowing conviction, conviction has already languished, the basic outlook of society has decayed.

This, I think, is the long-swing interpretation of the election. The old order is breaking up. People are ready for change, and will follow a leader committed to change if he registers humanity and decency.

If capitalism were in one of its regular nineteenth-century cycles, this conclusion would hardly be warranted. A brisk recovery based on the prompt investment of private savings in expanding plant would soon reestablish the elite and its ideology. Fortunately or unfortunately the present recovery, while reasonably brisk, is predicated on public works and social spending rather than on Empire State buildings and private capital goods. On the momentum of public spending private investment might take up the slack for a short period, and the elite come crawling out of their defensive trenches. But unless I am very gravely mistaken, the emergence would be brief. One more down swing would finish the elite altogether.

This question of a slipping ideology and wavering public support for the religion of business is profoundly important. It explains the hysterical tone of the whole Republican press. The terror is eminently justified. The "American way of life" is indeed in jeopardy. The old gods are tumbling, the horse and buggy headed for the tomb. Private enterprise has demonstrated its inability to support the population. In the depression to date it has cost the American people one hundred billion man-hours of idleness through unemployment, and refused to produce two hundred billion dollars' worth of goods and services which the plant and the labor force were ready and eager to produce. This is failure on a cosmic scale. The people have turned to a new god—the government—led by Mr. Roosevelt. The new god works.

The economic royalists are losing their function. Let this sink in. Instead of assisting the American economy, as they certainly did in the days of rapid expansion, they have been a drag and a weight upon it since 1929. Conceivably the whole group of finance capitalists and financially minded industrialists could be exported to a sunny island in the South Seas with no net damage to the American economy at all. Rather the reverse. In 1900 the damage would have been serious. Today the government is in a position to operate the credit system far more effectively than Wall Street—and is in fact doing so. The salaried administrators and technicians of the two hundred great corporations are in a position to produce goods and services without help from boards of directors who know nothing of technical operation and whose attention is riveted on the stock market. An elite whose only function is sabotage can hardly be guaranteed a long and happy life.

Mr. Roosevelt now commands the symbols and dominates the American economy. The only considerable barrier to any reasonable program on behalf of economic reform is the Supreme Court. This barrier will not be permanent; it cannot be, when a people speak so emphatically. What will he do with his mandate and his power? Nobody knows, but one may hazard a guess, based on the trend.

Mr. Roosevelt is without dogma or fixed economic principles. He is not a Socialist, a single-taxer, a devotee of Adam Smith, a proponent of consumers' cooperation, a rigorous social planner, or any other "ist." He just wants to make people more comfortable, and he passionately wants to save the land and resources of America so that oncoming generations may be comfortable. He does not like Wall Street very well; he does not like the power boys very well—a natural reaction in a country squire. He has nothing against the profit system as such, but only asks, Will it work? In those areas where it will not work he is ready to change it. Broadly speaking, then, I think his leadership in the next four years will be pragmatic, and follow in a general way the course of Sweden or Denmark. There will be no onslaught on capitalism as such, but a steady growth in collective enterprises in these sectors where private enterprise has proved its inability to make folks comfortable. Specifically I think we may look for:

National controls for minimum wages and maximum hours; the abolition of child labor.

A long-term collective plan for agriculture, including curbs on the surplus, crop insurance, an increase in cooperative marketing.

Strengthening of federal control over banking, credit, stock markets.

Further restrictions upon holding companies of the milking-machine variety.

More and more electric energy at less and less cost, as the yardsticks swing into action.

The TVA may hatch out a few brothers and sisters.

A real program for housing the lower-income groups.

A real attempt to limit the pain-and-beauty boys through adequate food-and-drug legislation.

Redoubled efforts to conserve the land, water, and wild life of the American continent and the absorption of the unemployed in conservation and other public works.

An amended and improved Social Security Act.

A shake-up in the organization of the federal government in the interest of greater operating efficiency.

Continuation of the drive for lower interest rates.

The budget will probably be balanced by 1933 or 1939, but this is a detail.

No wars to save democracy; Mr. Morgan, Mr. du Pont, the Constitution, the flag, Mrs. Dilling, the Socialist Soviet Republic, the Open Door, or anything else down to Mr. Smith's brown derby. But any power which tries to invade us will step into one beautiful hornet's nest.

There is nothing in the above to cause an honest business man to blanch, and nothing to encourage the extreme left that the revolution is at hand. Union Leaguers will of course grow apoplectic over their toddies, and the ancient ladies of the D. A. R. swoon amid their cup cakes and iced tea. This is the middle road on the Scandinavian, or even British, model, and certainly the limit of what the mass of the American people will stand for at this particular point in history. One hopes that they will stand for no less.

Finally, what does the election signify to the radical and progressive movement—apart from the Communists? The major question for the progressive movement to answer is whether Mr. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party are to continue to do a job far more effectively than the progressives have ever been able to do it themselves. Short of revolution, he has brought about reforms and breaches in the old order so colossal as to stagger the imagination. If he continues on this road, there is no place for the radical movement except on the left flank urging him along. A separate political movement might have many devoted leaders but no popular following—head without body—or votes. Mr. Roosevelt has blanketed the radical movement, except the simon-pure revolutionaries, since 1932, and it is about time the boys woke up to the fact. They are impotent while the New Deal proceeds on its massive, popular path. Often as rigid in their dogmatism on the left as is Wall Street on the right, they join with Wall Street in bewailing any increase in mass well-being because it has not been brought about on the correct principles. Both wings prefer bottomless depression to recovery on the wrong principles. The principles of neither Marx nor Adam Smith interest the American electorate. What it looks for is results.

If Roosevelt succeeds in making a genuine liberal party out of the Democratic Party, there is nothing for the progressives to do but get aboard—of course, on the extreme left flank. If he tires of the New Deal, or if the Democratic Party reverts to its normal barrenness, it is manifestly up to the radicals and progressives to form a new farmer-labor party, pick up the torch, and appeal to that great mass who, in the election, showed their hunger for security, their willingness to accept change. The American Labor Party, it seems to me, had the right idea—Roosevelt and Lehman while they steer straight, but a massed, fighting organization ready to lead on if they falter.

[Mr. Chase's discussion of Mr. Roosevelt's program will be followed next week by the second instalment of the symposium "What I Expect of Roosevelt."]

Faking Car Accidents

BY ELLIOTT ARNOLD

AUTOMOBILE owners in this country are being victimized daily by racketeers who bring fraudulent accident suits against them. These men and women prey mainly on car owners who carry personal-liability insurance; but the effect of their work is felt by everyone.

Rates for automobile-casualty insurance are calculated on the amount of money paid out by insurance companies on claims against car owners insured in that area. Insurance rates in one city will be double those in another if twice as many successful claims are made against insured car owners in the first city as in the second, providing of course, that the average settlements are about equal. This will be true even though the death and accident rates in the second city are far greater than in the first. For this reason, New York City, which has the lowest death rate from automobile accidents, has the highest liability-insurance rate. Wherever you live the rates you pay have been doubled or more because of the fraudulent claims paid by insurance companies. Rates are fixed annually, based on the record of the five previous years.

There were 22,565,347 private automobiles licensed in the United States at the beginning of this year. Outside of Massachusetts, where a compulsory insurance law is in effect, just 25 per cent of those cars carried liability insurance. That means that of every twenty persons who were injured or killed in automobile accidents, only five were injured by automobiles whose owners were definitely in a position to help compensate for the accident. Out of 3,655,705 commercial vehicles licensed at the beginning of the year, little more than 50 per cent carried liability insurance. Now there were almost 900,000 persons injured in automobile accidents last year and about 37,000 killed. The dead are dead and cash won't restore life, but a large number of persons today possess permanent injuries because of inability to pay for proper medical treatment when the injuries were first sustained.

The injury faker works hand in hand with the shyster lawyer and the unprincipled doctor. The activities of the ambulance chasers will be dealt with in a second article. Let us consider here the methods of the "flopers." This is how it generally works out.

You probably know Joe Doakes. He's a nice, quiet family man with a wife and children and a small automobile and a smaller job. It's a rainy night and he is driving slowly and carefully, watching traffic lights and looking out for unwary pedestrians. He's stopped by a light on a dismal corner and he sits at the wheel and wonders how he's going to be able to swing the next instalment of his automobile insurance. It is New York City, say, and he has the ordinary "5 and 10" policy—a maximum of $5,000 protection for injuries to one person, and $10,000 for injuries to two or more persons. That costs him $95 a year; collision insurance, property-damage insurance, and fire-and-theft insurance about double the figure.

The traffic light changes. He starts his car, hears a scream, and jams on his brakes. He gets out of his car and finds a woman against the front wheel. She is moaning. Her clothing is torn. Her shoulder and neck are bruised. A cop comes. He calls an ambulance. The interne examines the woman.

Her eyes are dilated. A thin stream of blood seeps from her left ear. "Possible skull fracture, contusions and abrasions of the face, arms, and shoulder. Possible internal injuries. Shock," the interne diagnoses. The cop reports those injuries on his card. The woman moans. The cop takes Joe Doakes's name and address, makes a nasty remark about learning how to drive, and smells Doakes's breath to see if he has been drinking. A few weeks later Doakes is the defendant in a damage suit.

Whatever the claimant is awarded above $5,000, Joe Doakes has to pay himself. Probably the case will be settled out of court. The insurance company adds the bill to future premiums, and the woman and her lawyer and the doctor who took her out of the hospital to "treat" her privately split up the money and plan another accident.

This is not an imaginary case. One woman faked this type of accident in twenty cities before she was caught. She once underwent a mastoid operation and one of her eyes became slightly dilated. She could make a convincing representation of nausea, double vision, convulsions, intense pain. She would bite her lip and draw blood and rub it in her ear. And if you think all this sounds fantastic it may interest you to know that she fooled doctors in more than fifty hospitals throughout the country.

In Pittsburgh recently the police uncovered a "house of pain." In this unique establishment the manufacture of injuries later to be attributed to automobile accidents was carried on wholesale. The place was ruled by a likable middle-aged man, who occasionally posed as a lawyer. The house was equipped with graters, made by puncturing tin cans. These were rubbed on the intended "victims," creating long, ugly scratches. A half-dozen good rubs on the neck and shoulders and the "victim" would look as though he had just passed through a meat grinder.

Before the "accidents" were scheduled to take place the participants reported to the house. They beat each other with their bare fists and with sacks filled with apples, potatoes, and oranges. Then they went to work on each other with the graters. In a few minutes they were hideous sights—covered with black-and-blue marks, welts, and bruises. Sandpaper was also used, and occasionally, to make injuries look especially bad, knives and razors. Clothing was ripped and covered with dirt.

Then the "victims" went out and had "accidents." These accidents occurred simultaneously in various parts of the city. After the accidents other methods were used to keep up appearances. The victims always insisted on being treated at "private hospitals." There mineral oil was inserted into the flesh to cause inflammation and thickening of tissues. Hot paraffin was spread over the scabs to keep them soft and prevent them from healing until the case was settled, or at least well on its way in court.

This outfit collected more than $1,000,000 in its four years of operation. It ultimately was rounded up and all the devices described above became part of the court record. The proprietor received a five-year jail sentence, and prison terms of varying lengths were meted out to his confederates. It was brought out that some of the participants in the systematic frauds originally were honest persons who actually had suffered an injury in an automobile accident; they had been prevailed upon by shyster lawyers to permit exaggeration of their hurts, and then blackmailed into continuing the practice, with the lawyer taking a share of the profits.

Various other astonishing frauds have been uncovered. A favorite device is to take advantage of an earlier injury which left permanent effects. For instance, one man, now safely incarcerated, broke his wrist when he fell from a horse a number of years ago. The bone never set properly. His technique was to bind his wrist until it swelled, pull a "flop," and then rise with an enlarged, apparently injured member. He would threaten suit, allow himself to be "persuaded" into taking a quick cash settlement, and disappear, to turn up in another city and repeat his trick. He got seven years in state's prison when the police finally caught him.

Probably the ace of the racketeers was an Italian who formerly was a field-hospital attendant in the Italian army. While there he learned the use of a subtle drug which, when introduced into the base of the spine, paralyzed the subject from the waist down for some time afterward. The drug was used as a merciful anaesthetic for wounded soldiers. This man stole the formula for the drug and came to this country. He would inject the drug and then, just before it took effect, step in front of a moving automobile. At the hospital the routine tests would show him to be totally paralyzed from the waist down. He would moan and whimper and cry piteously in Italian. He was able to win quick damage settlements from insurance companies, whose agents thought they were lucky to escape heavy suits. He maintained his paralytic pose until he was released from the hospital, apparently to spend the rest of his life as an invalid confined to a wheel chair.

As soon as he got home, of course, he packed up and disappeared, to turn up in another city and pull his gag over again. He was captured in an amusing fashion, worth recording. An Italian detective, employed by a suspicious insurance agent, went to the hospital where the man was seemingly bedridden. Suddenly the detective shouted an Italian oath and then yelled out, still in Italian: "Get out of that bed, you're caught!" The panic-stricken "patient" leaped from the bed and the detective downed him with a flying tackle. The man was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary.

It was estimated by the Massachusetts Claim Investigations Committee that one out of three claims for automobile damages was entirely fraudulent or grossly exaggerated. Before 1930 only one insured car in ten was involved in an automobile accident. In 1932 one in five was the rule. It is doubtful that the number of honest accidents could have doubled in two years.

The National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters, a voluntary organization representing thirty-nine stock companies which transact the bulk of casualty and surety-insurance business in the country, has for the last few years waged, by means of an effective cross-index system, a relentless war on these traders in fake injuries. Its work has been remarkably effective, but it is apparent, nevertheless, that the surface of the trouble has just been scratched. In 1935 the casualty and surety companies licensed in New York State (the majority extend their operations all over the country) paid out more than $121,662,660 to claimants on personal-injury and property-damage claims—an increase of $2,319,148 in a year.

Whenever a claim is made against a casualty company which is a member of the bureau, the details of the case are passed on to the bureau. The claimant, his past history, the type of injury he claims are thoroughly investigated. Thousands of records are kept on file. The claims are cross-indexed by injuries, names, addresses, characteristics, size, physical deformities, and so on. When a man files suit in Kansas City, for instance, the information is forwarded to headquarters. There the items are checked in every one of the cross-files. It may be found that a man answering his description—the name will be changed of course—filed similar suits in one or more other cities. The pictures and descriptions of the previous claimant will be sent to the member company in Kansas City, and often it is possible to confront a claimant with proof of his fraud and either end his latest suit or, sometimes, even institute criminal proceedings against him.

During the past several years scores of lawyers, claimants, doctors, and "witnesses" have been arrested in connection with accident frauds. The number of arrests is constantly on the increase, as the index system of the bureau gradually becomes more complete and effective, and as local law-enforcement agencies take more and more interest in the subject.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AN OUT-OF-TOWN reader writes me that he looks for a "war to the death" between the radio and the newspapers as a consequence of the election. He puts at 85 per cent the number of newspapers which were "given a sound trouncing" by the voters, and says that as an institution the newspapers of the country are "thoroughly discredited." "Since the advent of the radio," he continues, "they have been losing ground rapidly as a molder of public opinion and they are well on their way to a well-deserved death. Look at their editorial-page format and content, their drab sameness. Who writes their shallow and biased articles?" Then he declares that the broadcasting companies are aware of their superior advantage. He knows that many newspapers are buying up radio stations or establishing their own, and he thinks that they would like to take over the broadcasting companies.

Now there is a good deal of exaggeration in this—the newspapers are not well on their way to death—but it is undeniable that they have had a terrible licking and that they are rapidly losing their editorial influence. Take the city of Chicago. The three dailies with a large circulation are the Chicago American, a Hearst paper, the Chicago Tribune, as despicable editorially and in its biased news columns as the Hearst press, and the conservative Chicago Daily News of Colonel Knox. All of them were for Landon, and so Chicago went for Roosevelt by an enormous majority. The Chicago Tribune used to print maps of Chicago and the adjoining states which it labeled the Chicago Tribune belt, claiming that it dominated that field. It could not print those maps today, for everybody would laugh. It is a newspaper with a great circulation and no influence. Similarly Mr. Hearst faces the fact that wherever his papers are published they have no influence whatsoever on the popular voting.

The October 1 circulation statistics of the New York City newspapers do not bear out my correspondent's allegation that they are fast going down hill. The Hearst American has dropped only from 322,099, as reported on September 30, 1935, to 316,914, a small loss when one considers the anti-Hearst boycott; his Mirror has shown a gain of 40,000 copies, while the other tabloid, the Daily News, has increased its sales from a daily average of 1,616,111 to 1,629,178. During the same period the Herald Tribune's week-day issues registered a substantial drop of nearly 10,000 copies a day. Both the Times and the Post, like the Daily News, supported Roosevelt. The Times shows a healthy increase from 428,429 to 460,054 a day, while the Post has gone up from 120,836 to 177,277. My correspondent is also unaware that advertising has come back to these newspapers with a rush during 1936; so that most of them are doing quite well financially. The newspapers with the largest circulation are the tabloids, whose readers buy them not for any editorial comment but to get the news through pictures.

The lack of influence of the American press as a whole which this election has brought out is not novel; it has long been apparent and has a number of causes; but I am afraid that Captain J. M. Patterson, the owner of the Daily News, is about correct in saying that most of the newspapers opposed Roosevelt "with much strength and sincerity" because "Roosevelt's reelection would be a bad thing for their pockets," which made them think that "Roosevelt's reelection would be a bad thing for everybody." There were many honorable exceptions, of course, like the Baltimore Suns and some of the Gannett newspapers, which were not influenced by business-office considerations. None the less, what happened thoroughly justified Sir Willmott Lewis, Washington correspondent of the London Times, in saying that the election was an "uprising against big business and the newspapers."

The fight between the radio and the newspapers will now go on with fresh impetus. But what is more important is the future orientation of the press itself. Will it continue to get farther and farther away from the bulk of the plain people and their aspirations and become more and more the servant of the big business men with whom its owners and managers now associate, or will it undertake to serve the wishes of the multitude, interpret honestly their aspirations, and accept the election as proof that the American people are with Franklin Roosevelt in his desire to use government as an agency for human progress and welfare? On that rather than on the radio competition will depend, in my judgment, the further waning or waxing of the influence of the press.

A personal word: forty years ago this month I joined the Philadelphia Press to see, in that newspaper office, whether or not I had the makings of a journalist. I felt that on my mother's newspaper, the New York Evening Post, I could hardly get a judgment on my merits. After six months' service in Philadelphia, which convinced me that I had found there the way of life which I most wished to follow, I was called to the Evening Post by a sudden staff emergency. One is prone after so long a service to look back and insist that conditions are not so good in one's profession as they were when one started. There were grave defects in the press of 1897, yet I think I am right in saying that, beginning with the disappearance of great and unfettered personalities in the editorial rooms, the power and prestige of the press have steadily and alarmingly waned during the entire period. It is a purely commercial business now and not a profession.

WITHOUT pointing too markedly in the direction of any individual, I think that some radical leaders have erred in leaping at the conclusion that all those who espoused Labor's Non-Partisan League did so with the naive notion that the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt would solve all the problems of the worker. I do not know a single leader in the C. I. O. group who is animated by any such notion. Labor's chief job at the moment is to organize as rapidly as possible along the economic front. Politics will have to be shoved aside for the time being.

Quite obviously the drive in steel did take on the aspect of getting out votes for Roosevelt and proving to the workers that even though they lived in company towns some rights remained to them. The response was magnificent, and in cities like Weirton, Aliquippa, and Homestead big majorities were rolled up for Roosevelt. Does that solve the problem of the unorganized worker? It does not, but it is the beginning of wisdom. The worker who finds that he can go against the orders of the boss in the polling booth gets a sense of confidence and proceeds to vote his company union into alliance with the C. I. O.

It does not seem very likely that the forces at Tampa desire peace, and it seems to me that if the A. F. of L. wants peace it must agree to end all interference and potential interference with the drive for industrial unionism in steel and motors and rubber. As a matter of fact, the A. F. of L. has no savory reputation among the workers in these industries. The rank and file are not at all eager for any kind of compromise with Green and his lieutenants. They are looking for a new day and a new dispensation.

Nor is the tendency of the A. F. of L. to sabotage its own strikes limited to its activities, or lack of them, in mass-production industries. The American Newspaper Guild is new in the federation, but it has already experienced that sharp pang between the shoulder blades which comes when you are stabbed by one of your own crowd. In the hearing before the executive council of the A. F. of L. concerning the Seattle strike the guild representatives were made to feel that they were on trial, with Harvey Kelly of the Hearst management acting as special prosecutor.

Of course the Newspaper Guild is well aware that a recommendation from the executive council is a suggestion and nothing more. We know that we have the right to take it in whole or in part or to toss the whole thing out the window. But unfortunately the executive council hopes that here and there its niggling little plan may be construed as binding. It seeks to arrogate to itself new powers which it never dreamed of before, and delusions of grandeur dance happily in the minds of Messrs. Frey and Green.

One constitutional point may be solved by the time this article appears, but it seems to have been put in the path of William Green by some deity interested in ironical retribution. Mr. Green has two pressing engagements. Tampa is calling but so is the executive committee of the United Mine Workers of America, and it can hardly be questioned that this body has a right to discipline members if they are found guilty of working against the interests of the union to which they belong. Green is, of course, a member of the Miners' Union as well as president of the A. F. of L. But how can he sit as presiding officer at a convention of the A. F. of L. when his own union is under suspension and when in addition it has refused to pay its current per capita dues? William Green tried to cross these bridges by saying that he might go to Tampa as a delegate from the American Newspaper Guild since he is an editor of the Federationist. Experts on the guild constitution told President Green tersely that he could not use membership in the guild as a Tampa passport because the guild does not take in editors.

One thing about the present ruction does disturb me. Newspapers are just beginning to wake up to the fact that labor is news, and now Tampa will offer them no such rich mine of material as did Atlantic City. After all, Hutcheson is not going to get punched in the jaw and knocked down every year, more's the pity, and Lewis will not be on hand to attend to that part of the entertainment furnished the visiting reporters. A reporter who stood close at hand when the blow was struck tells me that the right hand of Lewis toppled not only mighty Hutcheson but also six other carpenters who were sitting nearby at a table on the convention floor.

Perhaps I am in error in the belief that the press of America has just begun to wake up to the importance of labor news in the general scheme of things. Immediately after the election Captain Patterson of the New York Daily News and J. David Stern of the Philadelphia Record arraigned their fellow-publishers for having alienated the public by unfair use of the news columns in the campaign. But Editor and Publisher, which speaks unofficially as an organ for the publishers, minimizes this sort of self-criticism. In speaking of the newspaper campaign against the President it says, "It is undeniable that some of them far overstepped the elastic limits of partisanship in their fight against him." What does Editor and Publisher purpose to do about it? Its advice is contained in a much later paragraph and runs, "The wars are over, and it is not good for any or all newspapers to break down public confidence by emphatic charges that the backers of the loser were conscious and willing servants of interests hostile to the public good."

In other words, freedom of the press means that you can assail the President of the United States to your heart's content but you may not speak ill of a newspaper editor. That's not liberty. That's license.

BOOKS and the ARTS

GOOD JOKES AND BAD

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

SOME years ago Anthony Ludovici looked at animals and concluded in one of the best-known books on the subject that the essence of humor is a veiled aggression. Max Eastman starts out by looking at babies instead, and reaches the nearly opposite conclusion that the ultimate source of humor is not enmity but playfulness.* We show our teeth when we hear what Pat said to Mike not because we are snarling our sense of superiority but because, like the infant to whom something is offered and then playfully snatched away, we adapt ourselves playfully to the trick which has been played when we are led to expect one meaning and get another instead. Of the famous story of the porter who announced himself with the words "I am the Kuhn of Kuhn, Loeb and Company," he says: "People with a violent prejudice against 'coons' will, I suppose, imagine that their comic pleasure lies in scorning the Negro in this picture. People whose prejudices, abetted by their financial experiences, lie rather against the Kuhns, will be equally sure they are deriding the banker. People who possess the gift of humorous laughter will know that what they are doing is enjoying a joke."

Any attempt to summarize in brief form a theory as well elaborated as the one Mr. Eastman proposes is bound to do it a good deal less than justice, but perhaps the joke just cited will offer as good an opportunity for analysis as any other of the hundreds upon which he comments. He does not, if I understand him aright, deny that the joke is complicated and enriched by the aggressive element which may exist in the reaction of specific individuals to it. Neither does he deny that other humorous anecdotes are similarly complicated and enriched by those sly eludings of the inward censorship against obscenity which Freud tries to make the essence of humor. What he is insisting upon is that the sine qua non of a joke is the playfulness, that though one may be shown to exist without aggressiveness or impropriety, neither aggressiveness nor impropriety can be funny unless the playfulness is there. However frequently they may recur, the humor never consists in either in itself but always in the fact that we accept one or both playfully.

Most of the specimen jokes which Mr. Eastman analyzes are good and therefore complicated. Since nearly all provide several sources of pleasure, the vast majority might be cited to support one of the theories he is arguing against almost as well as they support the one he is arguing for—just as, incidentally, most of the great masterpieces of literature can be used to illustrate almost any theory of aesthetics for the simple reason that most literary masterpieces are so rich that, to some degree, they exhibit nearly every quality which has at any time been singled out as the indispensable one. To say this is to indicate not only that the problem of humor is a problem in aesthetics but also that the value of a good book on humor, like the value of a good book of literary criticism, does not depend so much upon the absolute, demonstrable, and exclusive truth of the theory underlying it as upon the extent to which the author is led to illumine his subject in the course of his argument.

By that test Mr. Eastman's book is certainly one of the best ever written. Somewhere he remarks that none of the works which discuss the essence of humor ever provide any means of distinguishing good jokes from bad, and one is again reminded of treatises on aesthetics, which so commonly demonstrate that the essence of literary worth is social passion on the one hand or wish-fulfilment on the other without giving any indication that the author is even aware that Tolstoy is better than Charles G. Norris or Stendhal better than any hack with an Oedipus complex. Mr. Eastman has the indispensable thing called taste. He knows a good joke from a bad one, and the important thing is not that he also has a theory to explain this knowledge but that he leads one on to the enjoyment of good jokes as a good critic of poetry leads one on to the enjoyment of good poetry. To read him is to be made hungry for humor; and to that extent he is surely incomparably superior to Ludovici and Bergson, as well as to Freud—whether he is more nearly right or not.

Having said that—and it is so much the most important thing that nothing else really matters very much—I should like to add that Mr. Eastman does not quite do justice to either the indecency theory or the superiority theory, which ultimately come down to the same thing. Whatever the essential, primitive, or infantile basis of humor may be, and however fundamentally the technique of humor may depend upon the playful surprise, the fact remains that in an overwhelming proportion of modern instances that technique is employed for the purpose of achieving a sense of inward superiority to a person or an idea. To laugh at an indecent word or at the physical or even intellectual discomfiture of another is a very crude form of humor. To rise superior to a prejudice, a stupidity, or a taboo is probably the very highest; and though Mr. Eastman is right in denying that the best jokes are even usually jokes at the expense of somebody, they are usually at the expense of our common human nature, which submits to the commands of tradition or sentiment or morality but is filled with a glorious sense of the free man's superiority when a witticism flies in the face of an untruth in which we have felt compelled to acquiesce.

It is true that Mr. Eastman has on his side Aristotle, with his definition of the comic as "some defect or ugliness which is not painful or destructive"; Kant's "the sudden transformation of a strained expectation into nothing"; and Lincoln, who, as I did not know before, either adopted or reinvented Figaro's motto in the form, "I laugh because I must not cry—that's all, that's all." On the other side is Hobbes with his definition of laughter as "a sudden glory [that is, "glorying" or "exultation"] in the soul." Mr. Eastman resists it in part because it suggests a certain brutality, because he is sure that in himself the humorous is the antithesis of the cruel. But humor may be what cruelty turned into, and for that very reason the most humorous people may be the ones least given to cruelty.

I still believe that "sudden glory" is the best description of the humorous experience, and that leads me to suggest that I should like to read a book on humor which took its point of departure not from the things which cause us to laugh but from the inward character of the laughing process. We should then have something analogous to the aesthetic studies which begin not with works of art but with the aesthetic experience, and it might be discovered that the unity of the subject lies rather in the nature of what we feel when we are amused than in the various ways in which the feeling of amusement can be provoked.

BITTER VICTORY. By Louis Guilloux. Translated by Samuel Putnam. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

APPARENTLY this novel began with the notion of tracing on a grand scale, by means of the unanimiste technique, the moral and psychological degradation of a whole community in provincial France in the third year of the World War. Such a scheme is promised in the opening chapters, in which we are introduced in rapid order to a fair assortment of local worthies gathered to do honor to a deputy's wife on her receipt of the Legion of Honor. There is a dull-witted general surrounded by appreciative female Boche-haters; there is a pompous little schoolmaster who has composed a poem for the occasion without realizing that his son has just been reported dead; and there is the extraordinary character known as Cripure. Everything points to the sort of exhaustive penetration into all the currents and cross-currents of a given social microcosm that we have been led to expect from the publisher's description and from the information that the author is a member of the revolutionary wing of recent French letters. A little later on, in a scene describing a mutiny of troops leaving for the front, we are given further reason for such an expectation. But we do not reckon sufficiently with the character known as Cripure. From the first it is evident that he is to be important, either as a contrast or as a sardonic commentator on events, but it is hardly to be guessed that he is to overshadow and finally destroy the whole pattern of the book. This shift from the city to a single one of its inhabitants, from the social phenomenon to the personal trauma, occurs gradually through the central chapters; but when it is accomplished it is complete. And what we get from this point onward is less like a product of the red front than something by Pushkin or Dostoevski with a French setting. "Dead Souls," murmurs Cripure concerning his fellow-citizens, and the same resemblance seems to overwhelm his creator. Like the group of decadent roisterers in one of his most effective scenes, M. Guilloux throws himself very hard into the game called "playing the Russian novel."

For the truth is that it must be argued whether Cripure, who runs away with this book, has anything directly to do with what was evidently its original intention. He will undoubtedly be interpreted as an example of the modern intellectual rendered futile and absurd through his scorn of a society with which he has nothing in common. But turning from such a formula to the reality, we cannot but be struck by the fact that the source of all Cripure's troubles is extremely personal: it is reducible to something as unforeseen and irremediable as the enormous size of his feet. Presumably it was for this and similar reasons that his wife abandoned him—a tragedy in turn responsible for the uncompromisingly anti-social behavior which incurred for him his almost obscene nickname. It is not so much society as life itself that is the object of his resentment. At no moment are his scorn and hatred condensed into a definite criticism against the world around him. Like the gloomier Dostoevskian heroes, he accepts its conditions as part of the general bad deal of existence. Taken in this light, he is of course a strange irrelevance in a work whose obvious implications are that society is responsible for most human ills and sufferings, including those connected with war. To account for him, one can only conclude that in the final test M. Guilloux was more absorbed by the idiosyncrasies of character than by the logic of a thesis. He would therefore offer us a remarkable instance of life triumphing over theory in the mind of a writer within the pages of his own book.

Cripure, with his spectacles and his acromegalic feet, with his devotion to Kant and the slatternly earth goddess with whom he has cast his lot, is one of the richest creations in recent French literature. If it is not quite Dostoevski, it is at least an excellent French imitation. But there is too much of him before the end, and the novel is perhaps a hundred or more pages too long. It never recovers from the central dislocation of its structure. It suffers throughout from a repetitiousness of situation and a general poverty of invention. Guilloux will write a more satisfying book when he learns how to subordinate his considerable gift for individual portraiture to some of the other demands of the novel form.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Putnam has marred an otherwise able translation by American slang words and colloquialisms which have the effect of setting up associations which are either jarring or quite inappropriate for the background.

WILLIAM TROY

The Perfect Dilettante

MOVERS AND SHAKERS. By Mabel Dodge Luhan. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

THE third volume of Mrs. Luhan's "Intimate Memories" is no less intimate and no less "infuriatingly readable" than the other two. This book covers the years 1913 to 1917, from the day when the then Mabel Dodge sent her husband packing—as eventually she sent all her gentlemen packing—to the day four years later when she dispatched Maurice Sterne to Santa Fé and began to have visions of a dark Indian face "with wide-apart eyes that stared at me with a strong look, intense and calm" (mysterious glimpse out of the future of Mr. Luhan). In those days of the "salon" at 23 Fifth Avenue Mrs. Luhan counted among her friends and acquaintances persons whose names are now familiar words among the literati. The list, indeed, reads like a Who's Who of the liberal and radical movement and the more liberal world of art, not only of twenty years ago but of today. It includes among many others Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman, John Collier, all the Duncans, Walter Lippmann, Eugene O'Neill, Boardman Robinson, Alfred Stieglitz, Leo and Gertrude Stein, Lincoln Steffens, Frank Tannenbaum, George Sylvester Viereck, Carl Van Vechten, Helen Westley, William Haywood, Max Eastman, and of course John Reed and Maurice Sterne.

In the midst of these diverse groups Mabel Dodge moved like an irresponsible fairy godmother, dispensing cold turkey and conversation, engaging in deep, sophomoric discussions about art and the soul and a distressed world, making love, doing over houses, in short, looking for diversion. Her various houses were always full of guests, for an evening or for a month; her larder was evidently inexhaustible; her excitements, whether of ecstasy or despair, were constant. And if she ever had a conviction or an idea, she has neglected to mention it in her copious recollections. "I just switched on one viewpoint and switched off another; I have often thought that hardly anyone I knew would recognize me if I were overheard talking to any of the others!"

It is impossible to believe that Mrs. Luhan would have functioned as a patron of art and ideas in any age but our own, which accepts the fact of wealth and therefore power without duty. She was unattached—by law, by temperament, and by an independent fortune. Tolerance was the mode; therefore her husbands and lovers made no complaint—or almost none—when she tired of them. Although she was the mother of a son, she felt, and was asked to feel, no responsibility to anyone. Although she accepted men when she wished and kept them if she liked, she maintained her amateur standing and suffered no social censure thereby. She was a free agent, and by the standards of any time—except perhaps this one—completely immoral, not because her sexual relations were irregular but because her nature admitted of no obligation except the temporary satisfaction of her own extraordinary ego. Her friends often found her generous and sympathetic; but fundamentally her generosity and sympathy were less for their sake than for hers.

If this is a harsh picture, Mrs. Luhan paints it with her own hands. Perhaps she even realizes its harshness, for of her relationship with Maurice Sterne at one point she says: "Alas, poor Maurice! How sorry I am when I remember it all! . . . I was always afraid he was not noble enough for me! Heavens!" Yet in spite of all this, her book is interesting. It may be the perennial entertainment of gossip, particularly about familiar persons. It is at least partly the quotations—there are poems, innumerable letters, articles—notably a magnificent piece by John Reed printed in the old Masses about the Pater-son silk strike. There is a picture of the radical movement of twenty-five years ago—in this case the activities of the I. W. W.—comparable in its triumphs and its defeats with the Communist movement today. There is the always moving spectacle of a powerful and energetic personality. There were, in short, plenty of reasons why Mrs. Luhan should not have been allowed to live as she did; but there are just as many reasons why she will be read.

YOU CAN HELP RUIN AN INDUSTRY

The hosiery industry, supported by the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, has tried to save itself from returning to the sweatshop days.

It has stood by a code of fair competition and has said: "Here is stability. Here is security for workers and fair employers."

Now comes before the people one mill—the largest in the Nation—Berkshire Knitting Mills of Reading, Pennsylvania, and says "No!"

Its officials laud Hitler publicly. They refuse to recognize the union. The workers tell of intimidation. Girls who are no longer learners are paid $8 instead of $13. Women boarders are paid half of what men earn for the same work. Hours beyond code-limits are worked. Wages have been cut again and again. The pay of skilled men is now much lower than union pay.

The mills are struck. Pennsylvania State Police have ridden down the strikers.

WHEN YOU BUY STOCKINGS YOU VOTE ON THE ISSUE

Buying Berkshire-made stockings while Berkshire is anti-union and anti-code is a vote to help ruin an industry, both the workers and employers in it.

Refusing to buy Berkshire-made stockings is a vote to prevent the whole industry from returning to chaos.

The American Federation of Hosiery Workers asks you to help maintain the security of the workers, and to save an industry instead of ruining it.

DON'T BUY BERKSHIRE WHILE BERKSHIRE IS FOR CHAOS!

Most widely used brand names of Berkshire are "As You Like it" and "Berkshire" but firm sells the bulk of its goods to large distributors who use their own brands. When buying stockings, therefore, insist that they are not made by Berkshire. Send post card to the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, 2319 North Broad Street, Philadelphia, Penna., for copy of Hosiery "White List" which itemizes nationally advertised brands made by 100 per cent Union firms.

Philosopher and Statesman

GENERAL SMUTS. By Sarah Gertrude Millin. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

WITH this second volume Mrs. Millin completes her biography of one of the most influential figures in a major crisis of human history. Biographies fall into two main categories. In the first one finds the biographical essay whose author, brilliantly exemplified by Strachey, sums up and paraphrases those known facts of his subject's life which fit into his own interpretation, arrived at after supposedly exhaustive reading. In the second are those works which endeavor to assemble all essential available information. Laboring in this more difficult of the two vineyards Mrs. Millin has produced a book of permanent value to the student of world affairs and the student of personality. She believes Smuts is a very great man, yet she preserves an admirably impartial attitude toward him. "His character," she says, "is difficult, complex, and contradictory. His platitudes jostle his profundities. His cynicism laughs at his idealism. He is dependable and also incalculable."

This miscalled "handyman of empire," who fought the English in the Boer War, came tremendously to their aid in the World War, and, refusing a brilliant career in post-war England, returned home to face a half-hostile South Africa, has been as extravagantly vilified as praised. The idealists who applauded his plan for a League of Nations and his stand against the cruel terms of the peace, his belief voiced in a vengeance-mad world that harshness to the vanquished enemy might drag Europe to ruin, were subsequently alienated from him by various of his actions in South Africa. Negrophiles have denounced him for failing to give equal suffrage to the Kaffirs, and the Nationalists have denounced him for championing the Kaffirs. Labor has denounced his suppression of the Rand revolution. Mrs. Millin lays before us the facts which confronted Smuts. She posits him, very convincingly, as an idealist forced to arrive at decisions in a world of actualities against which he was often in violent revolt, but which nevertheless conditioned the steps he could take.

In the welter of opposing aims, rapacities, vengeance, and idealisms that accompanied the peacemaking, he displayed unusual insight and sometimes, like Wilson, was able to phrase his intuitions so eloquently as to sway the world. It is true that his definition of the British Empire as a Commonwealth of Nations partook of the resonant airiness of Wilson's "war to save democracy," yet a real change in dominion status grew out of his phrase. He observed, "Europe is being liquidated and the League of Nations must be the heir to the great estate," but he was unable to see that the economic as well as the political system of Europe was being liquidated. This failure defeated much of his splendid work, but it no more detracts from his stature than it detracts from Lincoln's to observe that he hadn't grasped the importance of the Communist Manifesto, issued years before he came to power. Within the world as he knew it and as the world knew itself, Smuts was one of the few men in high positions who acted with statesman-like insight and with the magnanimity of the truly great. He could even so far step out of the world as he knew it as to warn the Allies against intervention in Russia. The comments he made on Russia and Germany during the war are interesting to read today. "If I were a German statesman I would bear carefully in mind the wise old Bismarckian policy, and avoid making the Slav the future historic enemy of the Teuton."

The philosophy he calls "Holism" has brought him a number of notable adherents, including Dr. Alfred Adler and Arnold Toynbee; Robert Bridges declared that his "Testament of Beauty" was an adumbration of the same thesis. Smuts believes the coordinating principle of the universe to be "an impulse toward wholeness that manifests itself in each individual by a power of development or evolution from within. . . . The summit of this new created and creative whole is human personality."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Democracy in Confusion

INTELLIGENCE IN POLITICS. By Max Ascoli. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

INTELLIGENCE is most easily defined as that quality which is supposed to be measured by intelligence tests. Politics is not easily defined at all. While definitions are often devices of escape from reality, they are indispensable to clarity of thought. A book named "Intelligence in Politics" from the pen of a distinguished social scientist entitles readers to anticipate some definition of terms and some critical analysis of the difficult problem of the role of rational thinking in the struggle for influence between power holders and power seekers. But Max Ascoli, professor of political philosophy at the New School for Social Research, has not addressed himself to this topic. He has instead written of the position of "intellectuals" in American "democracy," with both of these concepts left ambiguous. His book is brilliant and suggestive but also exasperating and disappointing.

Professor Ascoli is an Italian who still believes in liberalism. He writes with Continental grace and subtlety. But he feels little need to confine his flow of words within some framework of assumptions. What he has to say he says vividly and beautifully, but after the perfume of phrases and figures is gone, there remains doubt as to what has been said. His first chapter on the current bewilderment of intellectuals sparkles and glows with shrewd insights and pithy aphorisms. But the two hundred pages on American democracy which follow are cloudy, diffuse, almost Wagnerian. They wander about the ideological and sociological periphery of their subject, and seldom come to grips with it.

Democracy's "apparent meaninglessness may be the greatest element of its strength. . . . It is good for the greatest number that the intellectuals be lost in technical details or in the foggy of generalizations. This deformation must be cleverly cultivated. . . . But in a democracy the final responsibility lies nowhere and with nobody. . . . There are no reasons why intellectuals as such should feel any particular loyalty toward any kind of political regime. . . . Intellectuals cannot direct politics in place of politicians. . . . Intelligence here has been prevented from falling into arrogance, and politics has not yet passed beyond the grasp of human control. In the country where all the promises and all the dangers of democracy seem to be impending, intelligence is still the force which may dispel the haziness of democratic politics by the awareness of its function and the responsibility of its freedom."

Therefore—? But a volume without a thesis and almost without a theme leads to no conclusions. Life today is turgid and confused. Belles-lettres are permitted to mirror these mists and shadows. But the intellectual who is also a social scientist should perhaps have a different goal. Professor Ascoli has enjoyed writing down his rambling thoughts in charming prose. Many persons will enjoy reading them. But of new wisdom there is little in these pages.

MAN'S WORLDLY GOODS

The Story of the Wealth of Nations

By LEO HUBERMAN

Author of "We The People"

This story of how man has earned his living since feudal times explains history by economic theory, making it easy to see behind the catchwords, "free trade," "rack-renting," "Marxism," and so on, the living mass of human beings whose wants and needs brought about changes in the economic system. Many illustrations.

MAX LERNER, Editor of The NATION, says:

"Mr. Huberman has traced the development of economic history . . . simply, clearly and fluidly. His book is a brilliant piece of work . . . clear writing and sound scholarship."

A WORLD I NEVER MADE

By JAMES T. FARRELL

"I believe that this novel includes some of the finest writing that Farrell has yet given us—which amounts to saying, some of the finest of our time. Certain of its scenes . . . should settle once and for all the question whether we are here concerned with a genius in the creation of living human characters."

Leslie Howard's Hamlet

IT WOULD be difficult to find two productions of "Hamlet" less alike than that with Mr. Gielgud at the Empire Theater and the new one with Leslie Howard just opened at the Imperial. I belong to the minority—by no means insignificant—which found the former a bitter disappointment, and I must say at once that whatever the defects of Mr. Howard's performance may be, his conception of the part is infinitely more satisfactory to me, and the whole play as he has directed it much closer to what I believe Shakespeare himself intended. That his supporting company is much better and the setting of his production less perversely eccentric, few I think will deny. In the end, therefore, any difference of opinion must come down to a difference concerning the merits of the two actors themselves and, even more importantly, concerning the dominant traits of Hamlet's own character.

To begin with, Mr. Howard is brooding and calm where Mr. Gielgud was frenetic. The worst that can be said of him is that he is somewhat deficient in power, and if one feels—as I do not—that Mr. Gielgud's almost feminine fits of hysteria are evidence of power, then he scores where Mr. Howard fails, for Hamlet is certainly, among other things, a powerful man. But Mr. Howard, on the other hand, is strong precisely where Mr. Gielgud is weak, and he brings to vivid life exactly those aspects of Hamlet's character which, in his rival's performance, simply do not exist. He is above all else the intellectual and the ironist, the tender and ingenious thinker, the man who exclaims, "Oh cursed spite that ever I was born to set it right," because he knows so clearly that it is his business not to do things but to consider them curiously. And one result is that those very scenes which in the Gielgud performance become almost meaningless—the mocking of Polonius, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern with the recorders, Hamlet at the grave of Ophelia, and the rest—become the very center of the play.

I am not unaware that there has been in recent years a tendency to minimize the importance of "Hamlet's delay," to argue that his melancholy is merely a temporary cloud through which the resolution of a hero breaks through. That is essentially the contention of Dover Wilson, probably the most interesting of contemporary Shakespearean critics, and Mr. Howard has evidently read Wilson, since he says "too, too sullied" instead of the conventional "too, too solid flesh." But in the emphases on the character he has followed what seems to me the sounder tradition, which makes Hamlet's scruples and hesitations not the result of weakness but—however inappropriate they may be to the situation in which by "cursed spite" he now finds himself—the inevitable consequences of the virtues for which we love him. Looked at in any other way Hamlet becomes merely a lesser hero, an imperfect example of a type Shakespeare had portrayed in all its vigor in other plays, and it is impossible for me to believe that Shakespeare would have chosen a near-failure as the central character of his most lovingly elaborated play, or, for that matter, that such a man could have become the most-discussed and most-cherished of his creations. Hamlet's "weakness" consists only in the fact that he is too good and too subtle for the situation in which he finds himself, and if the intention was not to make that subtlety the essence of the character, then there is no point to the most fascinating and most often analyzed scenes in the play.

Has anyone, I wonder, ever pointed out that the comic characters contribute to the complex harmony of the whole because they are comic variations on, almost parodies of, Hamlet's own tendencies? Polonius's absurd verbal ingenuities parallel Hamlet's poetic ones, and his scrupulously empty parentheses correspond to things like the hero's "at least I'm sure 'tis so in Denmark." In the same way the gravedigger's mortuary humor is a burlesque analogue not only to Hamlet's "imperial Caesar" but also to the whole of his grim humor as expressed in such speeches as that about nosing "him as you go up the stairs." If it were not so, these comic characters would be dissonances; since it is so, the fact indicates that Shakespeare, seeing Hamlet's intellectual subtlety as the theme of the play, chose it also for variations in his scherzos.

I said in the beginning that Mr. Howard's chief defect was probably a lack of sufficient power. That does not mean that he is weak, for he is not. It means only that the best of him is seen in the more ironical passages, and much the same may be said of the fact that his speech, though clear and musical, does not soar as it might; as a result one gets more of Hamlet's subtlety and charm than one does of his elevation. There are I fear, no perfect Hamlets, but Mr. Howard is an extremely interesting one set down in the midst of a very beautifully staged production and surrounded by a very competent company. Pamela Stanley's tense and yet graceful Ophelia is especially noteworthy.

FILMS

The Infected World

IT SEEMS to be settled that we shall hear no more than half the text of any play by Shakespeare which wanders into the movies. Doubtless I exaggerate; the fraction may be two-thirds, or even three-fourths. But in the case of "As You Like It" (Twentieth Century-Fox) it does appear that about half of the effective words are missing, and at any rate it has become clear by now that we must accustom ourselves as best we can to an all-but-mortal surgery; noting as we pass that even when the heart has been cut out and thrown away a remarkable amount of life remains in the other members. The question, of course, is not whether the text as such is sacred. For movie purposes it certainly is not. The question is whether the whole of Shakespeare's effect in a given play can somehow be preserved on the screen; and whether, when his own verbal means to this end are perhaps not practicable, any other means are available, or so far have shown themselves to be available. If half of "As You Like It" is missing, as I think it is, the specific question then is whether anything takes its place; and if nothing does, whether it is conceivable that in some future production something should.

What is missing? Merely the heart, I think. Rosalind is here in the person of Elisabeth Bergner, and very charmingly so; but Rosalind is not the heart of "As You Like It." Neither is any other individual man or woman—Touchstone or Jaques or Audrey or Oliver or Orlando. All of them are necessary, and the ruthlessness with which these others have been trimmed away is a reminder of their value as individuals. But at the heart of the comedy, as indeed befits all comedy, there is an operation of the intellect, and it is this that beats so faintly in the film if it beats at all. The play is a complete expression of a sentiment; with emphasis upon the word complete. The rarity of such a thing indicates that it must be difficult. One would say, except for the fact that Shakespeare did it, that it was impossible. He did it, as a matter of fact, with an ease so delightful and deceptive that many of his admirers, including I should say Paul Czinner, the producer and director of this film, have never been conscious of its having been done at all.

The sentiment in question is the pastoral sentiment. Shakespeare has understood and stated it completely. This can mean either that he is never serious or that he is always serious; and it certainly means that no single speech exists for its own sake, or should be spoken as if it alone contained the "meaning" of the play. Leon Quartermaine as Jaques speaks the famous lines about man's seven ages so clearly and well that the audience breaks into applause, as if now they had it. But it isn't there, any more than it is in Jaques's boast (missing) that, given leave to speak his mind, he will "through and through cleanse the foul body of the infected world"; or in his remark (missing), when at the end of the play he sees all the marriages about to take place, that "there is, sure, another flood toward, and these couples are coming to the ark"; or in his proud sighs (all missing) as he contemplates the richness and uniqueness of his melancholy. I am not trying to show that Jaques is the heart of "As You Like It." His exquisite humbuggery is merely one of the means by which Shakespeare attained his end—one of the best means, of course, since Jaques almost understands himself. But only one; and most of him has been thrown away. Another one is Touchstone, most of whom also is missing, so that we do not see him as the dry mind which he is: rationally critical of the country into which he has strayed and yet ridiculously out of place in it, and almost, though not quite, recognizing his irrelevance, just as Jaques never quite confesses his sentimentalism.

Through these and the other persons of the play, including the witty Rosalind and the sluttish Audrey, Shakespeare has achieved an analysis of the pastoral sentiment so searching that in the end we have both no illusions about it whatever and all the illusions which it is possible to have. The Forest of Arden emerges as the perfect and permanent symbol of that simple existence which if we could live it would purge the world of its infections; and at the same time we know that we shall never be able so to live, or even to desire that anyone should. In other words, the Forest of Arden is left where it belongs, in the mind—where, in fact, Charles the wrestler puts it at the beginning of the play when he is asked where the old duke lives. "They say he is already in the forest of Arden, and a many merry men with him; and there they live like the old Robin Hood of England. They say many young gentlemen flock to him every day, and fleet the time carelessly, as they did in the golden world." The point about this speech is not merely that it is very pretty; it is witty, too, as Shakespeare hinted by putting it smilingly into the unregenerate mouth of this great bruiser.

The heart of the play being gone, and its brain, we do have left, as I have said, a very nice Rosalind in Elisabeth Bergner. She is worth going a long way to see, and indeed the fragment of the play which has been photographed is in itself delightful. As for the questions I began with, I confess now that I cannot guess their answers. They must wait until we have a genius of the films who understands his medium as well as Shakespeare did his. And what he will do no one at present, naturally, is genius enough to predict.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

The Case of Jerome Davis

Dear Sirs: Your editorial of October 31 on the reappointment of Professor Jerome Davis achieves so vicious a distortion of the truth that immediate protest is called for. I will not dwell on your detailed misstatements of fact, though there are enough of them to make one wonder how carefully you checked your information.

For example, President Angell was not "questioned on the Davis case" at the time the first news stories appeared, as you asserted; and he did not say it was "purely a financial matter." His only word to the press was a written statement, which was garbled by the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times but which was published in full by the New Haven Journal-Courier, October 22, 1936, and by the Yale Alumni Weekly, October 30, 1936. It is worth reading. . . .

But the main fault of your comment is not inaccurate reporting. It is reckless disregard for both fairness and plain decency. You deliberately convey the impression that President Angell is primarily responsible for the termination of Mr. Davis's appointment. The fact is that responsibility rests primarily with Mr. Davis's colleagues, the professors of the Divinity School, a majority of whom have repeatedly judged his work not to justify promotion to professorial rank; and with the majority of the corporation, who last February declined to reappoint him for three years, as recommended by the Divinity School, but instead reappointed him only until June 30, 1937. Those acquainted with the situation at close range will recognize that your last two sentences convey an unqualified falsehood. That falsehood you have tried to sustain by quoted bits from "a conversation reported by Mr. Davis," of which you know nothing except what he has told you; and from letters which cannot be interpreted fairly except in the light of information which you do not have. In particular, the letter which you quote as a climax is one which no fair-minded and well-informed person would have used as you have used it, to the confusion of innocent readers who trust The Nation in this as in other matters.

What your editorial has done, in short, is not to further the cause of truth and justice but to show in this case a deplorable lack of concern for both.

ROBERT L. CALHOUN

Professor of Historical Theology,
Yale Divinity School

New Haven, Conn., October 31

[Professor Calhoun's letter was forwarded to the Committee on Academic Freedom in the Colleges of the American Federation of Teachers, which is handling Professor Davis's case. Professor S. Ralph Harlow of Smith College replied for the committee.]

Dear Sirs: Professor Calhoun's letter renders a real service by making clear to Nation readers that the Divinity School faculty and the Yale Corporation should share with President Angell the public censure incident upon the discharge of Dr. Jerome Davis. That President Angell was by no means guiltless, in fact, that he assumed a leading role in the case, is suggested by the recital of incidents in The Nation and by the record of the case in the New Republic. The Nation was well advised in stressing the letter in which President Angell terms Jerome Davis "an increasing nuisance," since this letter was read to faculty members of the Yale Divinity School just before they voted on the question of a permanent appointment for Davis. The errors of fact which marred The Nation's account were corrected by Mr. Davis in last week's issue.

A memorial signed by Professor Calhoun and ten of his colleagues on May 6, 1936, terms the action of the president and fellows of the Yale Corporation "an injustice to Professor Davis and an action which will prove very injurious to the Divinity School." The memorial asks reversal of the corporation's action "before irreparable damage has been done." This protest was followed by a second appeal of the Board of Permanent Officers of the Divinity School to continue Davis's contract at Yale. An overwhelming majority of the faculty and students of the Divinity School have urged Davis's retention. Their requests have gone unheeded by the President and the corporation.

The execution of Jerome Davis was not a simple act. Dr. Calhoun has stated the superficial facts: The full professors of the Divinity School failed to recommend promotion, and the Yale Corporation in the interest of economy decided to eliminate the "marginal person" who had not met the test of his peers. What he omits is the active hostility of trustees and major executive officers of the university, brought on by Davis's lectures and writings, which upset the complacency of the Divinity School campus and made almost inevitable the final decision. It was not accidental that the President was moved from time to time to write that "our friend [Jerome Davis] seems to have broken out in a new direction" or that "Jerome is becoming an increasing nuisance." In 1933 Professor Douglas Macintosh of the Divinity School asserted that "when the promotion of Professor Jerome Davis was being considered . . . Dean Weigle stated that the Yale Corporation was opposed to his promotion to the full professorship, that it was also reported that no one in Yale was going to be promoted to the full professorship that year, and that if the Divinity School faculty voted for his promotion, the Provost would take the floor of the corporation against him. This vitally affected the action which was taken at that time." Or note the circumstances in 1936 as reported by Professor Macintosh: "The Dean . . . urged us not to ask for promotion, giving as his reason that the President and the Provost would not support such a recommendation and that the President had said the corporation would not promote Mr. Davis. . . . I . . . protested that we were being confronted with what amounted to a fait accompli and that it was unfair to keep us in this way from considering the case freely and on its merits from our own point of view."

Once the Dean of the Divinity School had obtained votes against permanent appointment for Davis, the rest was easy. The President and Fellows of the Corporation, in the interest of economy, failed to renew the appointment for the usual three-year period and instead terminated it at the close of one year. Yale is now seeking to obtain a successor for the endowed chair which Davis has occupied.

No telescoped statement of the Davis case can be adequate. We shall undoubtedly have in due course careful reports on the case from responsible agencies.

S. RALPH HARLOW,

Smith College

Northampton, Mass., November 5

Answering Mr. Broun

Dear Sirs: Heywood Broun in his Thomas-baiting column in this week's Nation calls on the Socialist candidate to curb the powerful "red-baiting" elements in his party and to speak out for industrial unionism more strongly than he has so far spoken.

I find it puzzling that Mr. Broun should single out Thomas, of the three candidates he discusses, to receive such advice, since he is the only one of the three for whom it is gratuitous. Thomas has spoken out unequivocally for industrial unionism. He did so in his speech at the Manhattan Opera House on September 8, to mention only one instance. He has been also the outspoken enemy of red-baiting both in the Socialist Party and elsewhere. It was in fact his stand against the red-baiting of right-wing members of the party, his insistence on debating with Browder, and his willingness to consider cooperation on certain issues with the Communists that led to the present split in the party. A large number of the right-wing Socialists who insisted on disciplining Mr. Thomas for this stand are now in the ranks of the American Labor Party. Moreover, Thomas is the only one of the three candidates facetiously discussed by Mr. Broun who raised his voice against red-baiting and in defense of civil liberties in connection with the outrageous attacks on Earl Browder at Terre Haute and Tampa. If Mr. Roosevelt or any prominent members of the American Labor Party did as much and if they were any more backward in repudiating Communist support and Communist sympathies than the Milwaukee Socialist Mr. Broun mentions, these news items have escaped me. Nor was it Mr. Roosevelt or the members of the American Labor Party who dared anti-red terrorism in Arkansas in the fight for the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union.

The powerful red-baiting forces in Mr. Thomas's party seem to be mightily disturbing to Mr. Broun. He might more profitably worry about some of the powerful reactionary elements that helped swell Roosevelt's plurality, particularly in the anti-red, anti-Negro, and anti-labor South. He might also more reasonably worry a little about those red-baiting elements that left the Socialist Party to join the American Labor Party.

MARTHA GRUENING

New York, November 6

Dear Sirs: I congratulate Mr. Broun upon his generous concession that Norman Thomas as President would do more for labor than Alf Landon. I also applaud his attack—in his Socialist-baiting article in The Nation of November 7—upon Communist-baiters.

Broun sure is on his toes. Now that F. D. R., Working Class Leader No. 1, has lost his title of Labor's Enemy No. 1, Broun will any day now nominate either Norman Thomas or Dan Hoan for the honor.

Whatever you do, Heywood, we Socialists will never shoot you as the Communists once promised to do. Your great contribution to the labor movement makes you a friend of the Socialist Party no matter what your personal pique may be. No, we won't shoot you. We'll merely sentence you to read some of Thomas's nation-wide speeches on industrial unionism which you overlooked during the campaign in your enthusiasm for Roosevelt.

ISADORE FRIED

New York, November 7

Mr. Broun's Reply

Dear Sirs: My critics inform The Nation that Norman Thomas has made several speeches in favor of industrial unionism. So has William Green. No man can effectively support the drive for industrial unionism without coming out wholeheartedly for the C. I. O. and against the present position of the A. F. of L. Possibly Mr. Thomas has done so. His speeches are not adequately reported in the American press. All I can say is that the name of Mr. Thomas was never mentioned at the recent C. I. O. meeting in Pittsburgh. If Mr. Thomas is lending support, I think he ought to notify John L. Lewis, the chairman of the committee.

When Governor Landon got himself on a hook by his labor attitude in his acceptance speech, Mr. Thomas sent him some mild questions which enabled him to wriggle off. When the Republicans started a red drive by asserting that the Communists were supporting Roosevelt under orders from Moscow, Mr. Thomas chimed in and said that the charge was true. When even the principle of social security was endangered by the dog-tag attack, Mr. Thomas's name appeared in the newspapers just across the page from the speech by John D. M. Hamilton. I am aware that Mr. Thomas was attacking a highly imperfect measure from the left. But I still maintain that even radicals should admit the existence of a thing called timing.

The Shape of Things

A DECISION OF GREAT MOMENT HAS BEEN handed down by the United States Supreme Court on the New York unemployment-insurance act. The court divided equally, four to four, Justice Stone being too ill to take part in the decision. In the case of an equal split, the judgment of the previous court is allowed to stand. Since the New York Court of Appeals had upheld the New York law, the decision is tantamount to a declaration of constitutionality. No written opinion was rendered, but it would be a safe guess that the line-up was Justices McReynolds, Butler, Van Devanter, and Sutherland against Justices Brandeis, Cardozo, Hughes, and Roberts. This is the first review by the Supreme Court of state unemployment-insurance laws now being passed to supplement the federal social-insurance program. The decision therefore, while not directly on the federal program, means nevertheless that the first crisis in the judicial review of the Social Security Act has been weathered. New York has the "pooled-fund plan," whereby payments to the unemployed are made out of a single pool, regardless of the amount paid into the fund by the particular employer. This is in contrast with the Wisconsin "reserve plan," whereby each employer's contributions are kept intact for his own employees. It was this feature of the New York act that was principally under attack, and a victory on that score is all the greater. The decision is also interesting because, as the first important utterance of the court after the election, it serves as a test of Mr. Dooley's remark that the Supreme Court follows the election returns. It would not be surprising if Justice Hughes should veer somewhat with the winds of public opinion. But the change in Justice Roberts's attitude is more surprising, and seems too good to be true.

WE ARE SKEPTICAL ABOUT THE CHOICE OF Joseph E. Davies as the new Ambassador to Soviet Russia. At any time it would be curious to select for such a post a corporation lawyer, an old Democratic Party stalwart, the husband of the heiress of the Post breakfast-food millions. The Davies-Hutton wedding last year set a new high in America for ostentatious and conspicuous consumption. Surely there is an irony and a gratuitous mockery in setting up such an ambassadorial establishment in the one country in the world where private fortunes have been abolished. What makes the appointment not only bad taste but doubtful statesmanship is that the coming years will be years of world crisis centering in the relentless encirclement of Soviet Russia by the fascist powers. An American ambassador at Moscow will need not only wisdom and tact but sympathy for the institutions of the country to which he is accredited. Mr. Davies is a hard worker and a man of great tact and resource, but it is hard to find the roots of such sympathy in his career. What may have recommended him to President Roosevelt was his experience in business affairs. Perhaps the President believes that the task of the Moscow post for the next few years will be one of fostering trade relations, and that an ambassador not suspected of any untoward liberalism by American business interests will be strategically suited for such a task. But we cannot escape a simpler explanation. Mr. Davies, for party services rendered, was in line for an embassy. The only important vacancy was Moscow.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR convention in Tampa is putting on a parade of spite, reaction, and plain self-seeking which will not be lost on the general public. The convention has joined its voice with that of John M. Franklin of the International Mercantile Marine in branding the rank-and-file seamen's strike as "communistic." Mr. Green warded off a possible speech by the Spanish Ambassador by saying that the situation in Spain was "muddled." The fight of the Spanish workers, like the seamen's battle against self-appointed authorities, probably seems likewise "communistic" to the embattled craft-union brotherhood. The convention, however, descended to its lowest level in voting to boycott the label of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. The A. F. of L. could scarcely have found a more despicable weapon in its fight against the C. I. O. Neither could it have found one more certain to prove a boomerang. Meanwhile the convention is not to be allowed, after all, to stew in its own spite. C. P. Howard of the Typographers has stated that his union may pull out of the federation unless the illegal suspensions are lifted. If Mr. Howard's lead is followed by other unions sympathetic to the C. I. O., the American Federation of Labor may come to realize that in fighting off industrial unionism, which means mass organization, it is writing its own death warrant. The C. I. O. might well picket the convention with the slogan: The A. F. of L. Is Unfair to Unorganized Labor.

EVEN THE NAZIS HAVE ENOUGH SENSE NOT to allow a winner of the Nobel peace prize to die in a concentration camp or a prison hospital. They anticipated the formal announcement of the award due in December, and released "unconditionally" the man who has come to symbolize the best that still survives of pre-Hitler Germany, Carl von Ossietzky. Our gratitude for his release must go first to the Nobel committee and the Norwegian Labor government, second to liberals and pacifists all over the world who have urged his name for the prize. The decision to honor Ossietzky took courage. Months ago the German government announced that it would consider it an unfriendly act to award the prize to "a man imprisoned for his traitorous behavior." The Reich deserves no credit for a deed forced on it by world opinion and performed in a last-minute effort to save its face.

HOUNDED BY A CAMPAIGN OF CALUMNY IN the French rightist press, Roger Salengro, Minister of the Interior in the Blum government, committed suicide on November 17. There is no need here to go into the details of the charge against him of desertion in the war. His innocence was established by a government investigation and the proof substantiated by a special tribunal under General Gamelin, commander-in-chief of the French army. The charges were worth nothing in themselves except as a means of discrediting Salengro and through him the government. But even after his official exoneration, the press, led by the weekly Guingoire and echoed by a flood of leaflets and broadsides, continued its accusations. Salengro was the object of the right's especial hatred because, next to Blum, he was chiefly responsible for forcing industry to make concessions to labor after the stay-in strikes, and for disarming the Croix de Feu and drafting the legal curbs on the opponents of the Front Populaire. Three weeks ago we commented on the measures Blum will take to end personal defamation in journalism. Though too late to save a valuable life they will probably now be hurried to enactment. Whether the affair will grow into another Dreyfus or Stavisky case, splitting France from top to bottom, it is too early to say.

THE TUGWELL RESIGNATION ENDS ONE PHASE of New Deal history—the heroic days when a group of heaven-stormers (once called the Brain Trust) thought they could capture the Olympus where the money gods sat. It also subtracts another progressive from the rapidly dwindling number at Washington, and at a time when we can ill afford to lose him. While The Nation has in the past criticized the work of the Resettlement Administration, and while there is a solid base of fact for Paul Ward's acid comment elsewhere in this issue, we none the less deplore Mr. Tugwell's passing from public life. The ferocity of the tory attacks on him indicated, not that he was the monstrous radical he was depicted as being, but that he stood for an approach to the problem of government which the Liberty Leaguers recognized as a threat to their dominance. That approach was the rational planning of our economic life, whether on a capitalist base or any other. Mr. Tugwell did not always act consistently with such a view, nor was he in a position within the Administration to get much accomplished. It looked for a while as if he might eventually align himself with a farmer-labor party, and he has a following in the Middle West which would have brought strength to such a party. But his acceptance of a lucrative post as a business executive puts an end to such hopes. Molasses is a sticky substance, and any prospect of Mr. Tugwell's being able to detach himself from it to become a leader of the progressive forces seems very distant.

CAN A LAWYER IN CALIFORNIA DEFEND radicals with impunity? The president of the California Bar, in an article in the American Bar Association Journal of May, 1936, affirms the right of attorneys to represent persons accused of "communistic practices." But in the face of this statement the California bar association has ordered Leo Gallagher to appear on November 24 to show cause why he should not be disbarred. Although Mr. Gallagher was refused a copy of the charge as well as the name of the person making the complaint, he was accused of making improper statements about his opponent in the primary campaign for the office of Judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles. The complaint was made on July 15; nothing was done about it, however, until the election was over and the judge he had attacked for his anti-labor record was safely reelected. More than that, Mr. Gallagher was summoned to the hearing just after he had consented to defend the maritime strikers arrested in Los Angeles. Bar-association hearings are private; the standing committee which hears complaints against lawyers has lately been reconstituted and its new personnel has not been made public. Mr. Gallagher is well known as counsel for Tom Mooney and for the Sacramento criminal-syndicalism defendants, and as an American representative at the Reichstag-fire trial. One may suspect that for the California State Bar he is too well known. But disbarment of Mr. Gallagher will reflect discredit on his attackers rather than on himself.

WE PRINT IN THIS ISSUE A DEFENSE BY Representative Patman of the Robinson-Patman Act, for which he is largely responsible. The act has created a furor among manufacturers, retailers, advertisers, farmers, and cooperatives. Some of it arises from uncertainty on the part of these groups as to how an act seeking primarily to protect the independent merchant as against the chain store and the mail-order house, but framed in general terms, will affect them. Some proceeds from doubts as to its constitutionality and the details of its administration. Some has undoubtedly been stirred up by groups which stand to lose from the legislation. Mr. Patman's article will provoke wide discussion, and we are printing it to help clear up the controversy. We do not mean thereby to commit ourselves in support of the act. The issues it raises are profound ones. They involve the question of the best way to proceed against monopoly and price discriminations, the question of bigness in our economic life, the question whether the trend toward the integration of industry should be checked at the expense of the consumer and of efficiency in distribution. The Nation has in the past been skeptical of the anti-trust approach which personified economic bigness as the devil and turned its face backward to the simpler economic entities preceding finance capitalism. It has always seemed more important to us that the processes moving toward large-scale industry should not be arrested but controlled, and the whole eventually socialized. It is from this point of view that we shall publish next week a critical appraisal of the Robinson-Patman Act.

THAT LOVER OF DEMOCRACY, MR. HEARST, still occupies himself with his old alien-baiting activities. As soon as the deportation cases of Dominic Sallitto and Vincenzo Ferrero arrived at the office of Carol King, their counsel, a Hearst reporter appeared and asked why the men had not been deported and whether it was even then legal for them to remain in the United States. The answer, for the benefit of Mr. Hearst and our readers, is that it is still legal. Ferrero has appealed to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari; his case is therefore in the courts. Sallitto's deportation was affirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals and has been taken back to the Department of Labor for reconsideration. Both men are accused of being anarchists. One of their misdeeds seems to have been the operation of a restaurant in Oakland, California, in a building which was also the mailing address of the anarchist newspaper Man, which discontinued publication in 1929. Ferrero is also accused of helping to distribute the paper; the charge against Sallitto rests on the allegation that at a meeting to discuss Marinus Van der Lubbe, victim of the Reichstag-fire trial, he acted as chairman and used these words: "We, members of the International Group [a so-called anarchist group] . . ." Four American citizens present at the meeting testified that Sallitto had not used those words; two months after the meeting an immigration inspector testified that he "recalled" hearing the words used. Both Ferrero and Sallitto are deportable to Italy, where it may be assumed that Mussolini's government will not make their reception pleasant.

SHORTLY BEFORE THE BELGIAN REXIST demonstration last month in which the leader, Leon Degrelle, was arrested, he excused himself from a meeting of his party on the ground that he was going to be absent for a few days "in pious meditation." It now appears that those few days were spent in pious conversation with Dr. Goebbels in Berlin. From the Berlin correspondent of the Matin the Manchester Guardian quotes in these terms the advice given by the expert to the promising beginner:

Work exclusively by parliamentary methods. Fascinate and terrify the crowds by painting the Communist peril in the darkest colors. Keep the ball rolling by resounding polemics. Send back every reproach like a boomerang at the head of your opponent. . . . Above all, know how to amuse and delight the crowd. Be more lively than the others; everything depends on that.

This is of course the stock in trade of every fascist barker, and our interview with Degrelle on another page shows that he has listened attentively to his teacher. But while the system worked with Hitler, it presents difficulties for Degrelle in Belgium and Mosley in England. In these countries there is no defeat in war to avenge, no Communist peril, no deep depression—all factors which helped German fascism. The Rexist demonstration ended in fiasco; the Black Shirt parade staged in London after Mosley, too, had been in communication with Goebbels created a wave of public disapproval. Though by no means scotched, both movements have had setbacks which show that it takes more than oratorical juggling to establish dictatorship.

THE DEATH OF ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-Heink, contralto, grand opera diva, pet of the radio and motion pictures, must have staggered many who read of it. Not that the great lady had not attained a fulness of years to match her many other full achievements. From a debut nearly sixty years ago in "Il Trovatore" she went on to fame as Carmen and then to the climax of her art in Wagnerian roles. For many years in Berlin, Bayreuth, London, and New York an opera season was unthinkable without Schumann-Heink. But she had become almost legendary. Her deep, indefatigably strong and moving voice had come to be expected as the official Amen-maker of each Christmas tide, every Armistice Day, all occasions when air waves of dignified good-nature must descend upon all households of the land. She will be missed widely, periodically. Hollywood fought hard over her. It must have pleased her enormously, this sudden battle to perpetuate her, to bring her—from the top of her kindly old head to the soles of her mannish shoes—before the many millions of yet another public. German-American, she came with courage and eloquence to the American side in the war, and there remained, singing the Star Spangled Banner, somewhat to the peril of anyone who happened to be sitting comfortably inattentive within the radius of her devotion. Hers was no disembodied voice. Along with her art and her instrument, you had to take Schumann-Heink's personality. She was that nobly expansive Erda whom she loved best to sing in her last years in opera. She was Erda on all scales, including the vocal.

The Little World War Begins to Grow

ONLY confusion can result from an attempt to analyze the situation in Europe in its separate parts or from day to day. To understand any single event at any given moment it is necessary to understand the whole intricate mess. Perhaps the central fact to keep in mind is that a world war is even now in progress. In the streets of Madrid, in the sky above the city, at the port of Barcelona, on the seas that surround Spain, a war is being fought in which every important nation of Europe is engaged. They are calling it the "Little World War" in Paris. But its size should not be judged by the territory over which its legions fight; it should be measured by the magnitude of the powers engaged and the interests involved.

Had it been a genuine civil war the struggle between the fascist troops of Franco and the Spanish republican army would probably have ended early with the defeat of the fascists. But it never was that. From the beginning, arms and planes and technicians flowed across the borders from Italy and then from Germany, to augment the inadequate rebel supplies. After the neutrality agreement came into being, the fascist flood continued, and finally, belatedly, Soviet Russia began to ship equipment to Madrid. Officially, of course, it is still a civil war. Germany and Italy have consistently denied their shipments to the rebels. Russia has denied similar charges, though it showed enough diplomatic honesty to announce that it would feel free to aid the Spanish government if the fascist powers continued to help Franco. And the Non-Intervention Committee has saved its face by deciding that none of the accusations has been proved—though all are known to be true. So that, behind a diplomatic false-face, a situation has developed in which Italy and Germany are waging undeclared war against Soviet Russia, both actively with guns and men on the soil of Spain and through charges and counter-charges and diplomatic maneuvers in capitals a thousand miles from Madrid. France is not yet physically engaged, although its sympathies are with the Spanish government and its interests are there, too. But diplomatically it is tied to Great Britain and emotionally it is torn between sympathy for Spain and horror of war, a conflict that divides and confuses the government itself and the masses that support it. As for Britain, it is following its traditional policy, the policy that always works so well until the fatal day when it fails to work altogether and complete catastrophe results. The government temporizes, pretends the war is a local affair, pretends the neutrality agreement is still effective; and meanwhile speeds up its armament program and is said to be negotiating secretly with the Spanish fascists in an effort to secure its interests in the Mediterranean in case of Franco's victory.

But the principal belligerents are going to make it difficult for any nation to continue to hide behind a policy of concession and compromise. During the past week Germany and Italy have recognized the "government" of Franco, though his mercenaries are still camped in the suburbs of Madrid; and the fascist general has utilized the prestige thus conferred upon him to announce a blockade of the port of Barcelona and even to demand from France the funds the Spanish government has invested there for safe keeping. Italy has followed its recognition of Franco by an announcement that under no circumstances will it permit a "Communist state" to exist on the Mediterranean. A loyalist cruiser has been struck by a torpedo which the government more than hints came from a German submarine. The British have decided to convoy merchant ships on the high seas.

Behind these minor maneuvers looms the anti-Communist alliance made or in the making between Germany, Japan, and Italy. An agreement between Germany and Japan has been ratified this past week in Tokyo; an understanding between the Reich and Italy was reached during Count Ciano's recent visit to Hitler; and the existence of a bloc pledged to fight communism is freely admitted on all hands. This cannot please Great Britain, whatever its sentiments toward the Soviet Union and the Spanish left. But it may easily frighten both Britain and France into continued delay and hesitation. The militarist-nationalist powers have satisfied themselves that Great Britain can be cowed by threats and will accept accomplished facts. The weakness of the democratic states has become an axiom among dictatorships; and even Soviet Russia shares this reputation in so far as it has preferred peace to the defeat of fascism. Thus the Little World War grows bigger, and responsibility for its growth must be laid upon the nations that have refused to act at a time when action might still have saved Europe's peace.

The curious aspect of this tragedy is that every nation knows that the fascist states were determined to do what they are now doing. Yet each step in their progress toward the domination of Europe is greeted with mild surprise and treated as a detached incident, when political realism would demand that it be understood for what it is—a single maneuver in a general war.

Dismantling the WPA

HARRY HOPKINS and Rexford Guy Tugwell have generally been regarded as the Administration's left wing. Mr. Tugwell has yielded to pressure, and his program for rehabilitating the low-income farmer, inadequate though it was, is to be further curtailed. Now the enlightened relief policies of Mr. Hopkins are being subjected to the withering, if indirect, fire of old-line politicians. If this means that Hopkins is to be forced out, the President may look forward to a serious loss of confidence from his liberal supporters.

Today it is work relief, not crops, that is being plowed under in the name of the balanced budget. Once it was every third row of cotton. Now it is every fourth job in the WPA. A hint of the sweeping cuts that have already begun to be made came in the very first post-election speech of President Roosevelt, whose victory was swollen with the votes of relief workers. It was a speech calling on private charity to resume a responsible role in caring for the unemployed. Since then we have had James Farley's statement to the press in London on November 16 that the WPA is to be abandoned and relief shifted back to the local communities. At home, orders have been received by the directors of local projects to cut their staffs 25 per cent by December 15, and plans have been worked out by the government to eliminate 500,000 of the WPA's total of 2,400,000 by January 1. To pay the cost of relief until June 31, the end of the fiscal year, the Administration, it is reported, will ask Congress for $500,000,000, which will keep the WPA going only if its program is reduced by 25 per cent.

Where the ax will fall in the general process of curtailment is indicated by cuts now under way. Reductions are not likely to be uniformly distributed over the entire country. Though the schedule calls for large cuts in the cities, it is more probable that in order to avoid organized protest the Administration will accomplish its objective by drastically reducing or completely liquidating projects in the rural areas, where WPA workers are unorganized and lack the mass support necessary to exert pressure on Congress. We may also expect disproportionate reductions in white-collar projects, particularly in the cultural ones. This is unfortunate not only because the four arts projects have made a remarkable showing in proportion to their cost but also because actors, musicians, artists, writers, and white-collar workers in general will be the last to be absorbed by private industry just as they were the last to be taken care of by the government. Already in New York City 1,000 each have been let out from the theater and music projects; 800 have been dropped from the art project; the writers' project has been reduced by 16 per cent and is scheduled for a further cut of 26 per cent. We commented last week upon one of the most blatant examples of slashing without regard to need, which occurred when 850 white-collar workers were dismissed from the New York City hospital project despite the fact that their work of modernizing a dozen city hospitals is essential to the public health. When the city administrator, Colonel Somervell, received protests from all sides he offered to reinstate the workers in jobs at Fort Hamilton. Forts must be modernized though hospitals fall apart.

From other cities come similar reports. In San Francisco as many as 50 artists are said to have been laid off in a week, and California newspapers have announced that 20,000 WPA workers will be dropped. The writers' project in Oklahoma City has been asked to report on the "minimum number of workers needed to complete our 'American Guide' "—not the minimum number of workers who must be kept on relief. The Artists' Union of Boston reports that 100 art workers are to be dropped by December 15.

Now the groundwork is being prepared for the general dismissals. The process must be devious because of the resistance which a direct attack would provoke. Instead of direct dismissal, investigation of all New York's 214,000 WPA workers has begun. True, 90 per cent of them have already established their claim to relief either by being transferred from home relief or by submitting to some prior investigation, but the present survey is to establish their "current need," and it is significant that the "interview sheet" asks no questions about the debts of the relief worker who, it is hoped, will be found ineligible for relief. Presumably next month's survey will establish their next month's "current need." And the surveys will go on until the rolls have been pared to the bone.

What will happen then? Several procedures are open to the workers who are being dismissed because the election is over and a dividend recovery is sweeping the newspapers. They can go back to home relief, if they can get it. They can be reabsorbed by private industry, when, where, and if they find private industry offering jobs. Some of them, in their extremity, may do what Victor Brown and Goldie Larner did in New York last spring when they received the fatal pink slips—they may commit suicide. In the big cities the workers can and will put up a fight to be retained on the WPA. For the white-collar workers this is the only alternative; and in New York at least they are so strongly organized in the City Projects Council that their protest may well be effective. Last spring when the WPA quota was cut 42,000, the white-collar men escaped with no dismissals largely because of their intelligent and courageous resistance. Workers in other cities have also found that organization is the most effective weapon. They must not hesitate to use it to its full strength. To that pressure must be added the voice of organized labor, which can ignore this new attack on the unemployed only at its own peril.

Tampa and the Future

THE Convention of the American Federation of Labor in Tampa has continued the suspension of the unions affiliated with the Committee for Industrial Organization in a resolution which makes a frantic attempt to put the blame on the C. I. O. for all that has happened. It recounts, in whining and hypocritical sentences, the aid the A. F. of L. has given to the estranged unions, which have now turned against their parent body. It says nothing of the long record of sabotage and actual betrayal which American workers, organized and unorganized, have suffered at the hands of the craft-union bloc. Its very tone reveals a desperate and authentic anxiety. This anxiety springs from the certain knowledge that the future of American labor lies with industrial unionism. It haunted the opening speech of President Green. The strength of the idea of industrial unionism is to be measured, in one sense, by the ferocity with which the C. I. O. has been attacked at Tampa, for this ferocity reflects the inroads it had made and is making in the minds of the rank and file even in craft unions.

The "unity" and "peace" which everybody would like to see brought about have been dramatized for the newspaper reader in terms of the personal ambitions of the leaders who find themselves at swords' points in this controversy. While this has made the issue vivid, it has also limited the perspective in which it must be seen to be understood. What are the larger considerations?

Industrial unionism is a technique of mass organization growing directly out of the system of mass production which characterizes our highly industrialized modern state. To the concentrated power of modern monopolistic industry labor must oppose an equal concentration and solidarity, which it can achieve only by organizing all the workers of an industry into one big union. Industrial unionism is the great natural weapon with which the human element in that system, the workers, can bring about in this country a political society that will correspond to our system of production. Through a combination of developments, political and economic, industrial unionism some three years ago burst out of its relative obscurity as a sound theory and emerged as a practical functioning technique for organizing the great bulk of American workers, hitherto unorganized but ripe for unionization. That section of the A. F. of L. represented by the C. I. O.—which includes specific unions already organized industrially and leaders committed to the principle—welcomed this development and seized upon the new prestige of industrial unionism as an opportunity to build a genuine national labor movement in contradistinction to a select club comprising 5 per cent of American workers. It was, naturally enough, rejected by those craft unions whose workers are best organized horizontally—and there are a few such. It was much more violently rejected by those craft unions whose memberships, if they were recruited on an industrial-union basis, would be enormously increased, to the peril of the ruling group.

William Green has often insisted that the A. F. of L. provides for industrial as well as craft organization. And certainly the intelligent and logical solution, granting that the A. F. of L. is sincerely devoted to the interests of labor, organized and unorganized, would be to allocate to the craft unionists those sections of labor which are best organized on that basis, and to the industrial unionists the workers in the mass-production industries. The trouble is that on any democratic basis the industrial unionists would command the great majority of workers, and the machinery of the American labor movement would pass into their hands. The craft unionists who now control the machinery will defend and are defending it with every weapon available: they deny that the issue is industrial unionism; they charge the C. I. O. with being communistic; and certain reactionary trade-union elements have even raised the race issue in the attempt to pry predominantly Jewish unions away from the C. I. O., arguing that Jewish unions cannot afford in the light of the anti-Semitic danger to be connected with a "communistic," un-American movement.

In view of the larger considerations here adduced and the day-by-day bitterness that has emerged from the political conflict involved, is there any reason to hope for genuine unity or peace?

Historically and practically, the only basis for peace is that the industrial unionists be given a free hand to organize the mass-production industries. Since the executive council insists that the constitution permits both types of organizing, it should be able to make this concession. At the moment, however, too many bridges have been burned. It seems very unlikely that the A. F. of L. would make such a concession openly, and the issue is so crucial and has been so well advertised that it would be difficult to find a face-saving disguise. It was equally unlikely, however, considering the essential lack of energy in the decadent and dwindling craft-union bloc, that the convention in Tampa should have taken positive action against the C. I. O. It has, to be sure, sustained the suspensions. This looked like action; is really inaction. To expel, on the other hand, would have obligated the executive council to the violent action involved in giving charters to rival unions and to the actual knifing of the industrial-union drive in every basic industry.

Industrial unionism must eventually win out, since it is stronger than its advocates. The A. F. of L. must permit the mass-production industries to be organized industrially if only because they are being so organized.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

The End of Tugwell

Washington, November 23

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL has just decided to stop making America over, roll down his sleeves, and dip his hands in the molasses barrel. Tugwell was cast by fate for the role of the young and somewhat precious professor to be found on every campus, perching on a desk corner and delightfully impressing sophomore boys and girls with things that neither Marx nor Winchell knew till now. It is completely untrue to say, as has been said innumerable times in writing since his resignation was announced, that Tugwell was never one to quit under fire. On the contrary, he belonged to the tradition of Anatole France's necromancer. According to Sir Willmott Lewis, the London Times's incomparable Washington correspondent, France used to tell his friends of a certain necromancer who had power to change himself into a dragon and terrify the countryside. He exercised that power until one day, while in dragon's guise, he encountered St. George. Whereupon he changed himself into a rabbit and fled.

Tugwell has emulated the necromancer on various occasions. He always did so when the share-cropper situation in Arkansas was pushed up under his nose and the shadow of Senator Joe "Terror" Robinson loomed before him as an avenging St. George. He also did so when he was summoned before a Congressional committee and challenged as a deep-dyed radical on his right to appointment as Under Secretary of Agriculture. "I am a conservative," he replied. He several times offered to resign when the fire of his enemies inside the Administration and out got particularly hot. Each time he yielded to Roosevelt's blandishments and remained, and he kept on yielding even after he had become convinced that Roosevelt no longer took him seriously and regarded him instead as an amusing bit of excess baggage that the Administration could afford to carry to keep the attention of liberals engaged. Tugwell began to tire rapidly of government service after he had been elevated from the post of an idea man to that of administrator of the resettlement project and was told to start putting into practice his ideas of proper land use and rural rehabilitation. As a man of action he proved to be a fumbler, and for more than a year the RA was a scene of administrative turmoil that defied the descriptive powers of pen, brush, or camera. Only the drought saved it from complete disintegration and gave it something about which to rally its forces, and here it followed a course carefully mapped out for it in advance by the FERA and the AAA. Tugwell's chief value to the RA—as to the Department of Agriculture—was that of a court favorite who was able to keep his pet agencies in funds and through his real or imagined pull at the White House protect them from raids by rival agencies. There is reason to believe that behind his decision to quit the New Deal were the waning of his influence at the White House and his weariness at the prospect of having to fight to keep the Resettlement Administration from being gobbled up by the Department of Agriculture or dismembered and parceled out among several departments. But the chief reason was that he had been offered a better-paying job with what looked like a more secure future; he could have stayed here if he had wanted to.

Don't be upset by the current reports that the Roosevelt Administration is about to make peace with the power companies and sell the TVA down the river. They are without foundation, and that statement stands despite the little speech that the TVA's chairman, Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, made to White House reporters a few days ago after a conference with the President. It is altogether possible that Mr. Roosevelt's new-found satisfaction with the status quo—a satisfaction expressed in his note to the A. F. of L. convention and between the lines of all his other recent utterances—may in the end make him an easy mark for the power boys' seductive plea that if he will take the TVA off their backs they will loose a billion dollars in new capital expenditures and provide jobs for several hundred thousand men now clinging to PWA and WPA rolls and clogging the budget-balancing efforts. But up to the present moment this wooing has not elicited from him even so much as a coy glance in the direction of the wooers, as they, privately, are quick to admit. More important still is the fact that most of them have lost faith in the ability of their own charms to turn his head and are waiting for the Supreme Court to do it for them.

It is unlikely that there will be any concrete developments in the situation until the Supreme Court says which side it is on. When the power magnates were summoned to the White House some two months ago to talk about "pooling" private and public power resources in the Tennessee Valley, Roosevelt cleverly choked off all discussion of the one thing the corporation representatives wanted to talk about—TVA competition in the distribution field. In all the negotiations that have taken place since that time, Commonwealth and Southern—one of the two big holding companies directly affected by TVA, the other being Electric Bond and Share—has not once been given an opportunity even to put forward the various proposals it has for peace. And of all the power companies involved, it is the only one ready to sue for peace. The others—Electric Bond and Share in particular—still are trusting to the courts to break the New Deal to their harness. Meanwhile they are making things as unpleasant as possible for Commonwealth and Southern for being the first to indicate a readiness to break and run before the flood tide of public ownership. They are even suspected of responsibility for the failure of Commonwealth and Southern's deal to sell its Springfield, Illinois, property to the municipal power system; and in their present state of mind they might also be expected to try to sabotage Commonwealth and Southern's peace proposals, since these involve the sale of some or all of the corporation's Southeastern properties to the TVA.

Tied to those proposals are some strings that the TVA is unable and unwilling to accept, but they represent the first approach to a business-like statement of alternatives in what, barring Supreme Court intervention, is an inevitable clash between public and private utility interests in the TVA area. Various factors are responsible for the attitude taken by Commonwealth and Southern, and all of them are financial factors. Its Southeastern properties need new capital to meet maturing obligations and to construct new facilities. While the TVA conflict remains unresolved, these properties cannot get that new capital and they cannot take advantage of the present cheap money market to save themselves millions by scaling down their interest charges. In consequence, the holding company has had to advance them approximately $20,000,000, and prudence dictates that it tighten its purse strings from now on. When the strictly business attitude that these factors have generated in the Commonwealth and Southern management removes the strings from the management's proposals and spreads to the other companies at war with the TVA, the Roosevelt Administration will be ready to dicker in earnest with them on a program aimed at the ultimate conversion of the Tennessee Valley into an area of exclusive public ownership and operation, the change to be achieved without loss to those who actually have put money into the development of the private companies now in the field. That at least is still the position of the TVA and the White House, and the strength of that position is not to be found so much at the White House as in the person of David E. Lilienthal, TVA director in charge of its power program. Lilienthal is a hard-bitten, hard-working empire builder with a crusading zeal different in direction but as cold as that the elder Rockefeller used to have. It is probably true of him, as some of the power tycoons say, that had destiny faced him in the right direction, he would have made an excellent Wall Street raider and bear-market operator.

Curbing the Chain Store

BY WRIGHT PATMAN

THE Robinson-Patman Act has been the subject of widespread discussion. But out of it all several questions have emerged that may still profitably be examined. What does this new law, which became effective June 19, 1936, really mean? What effects are already apparent? Will it really prevent price discrimination? Is it constitutional? Can it be enforced? How does it affect the consumer? What was the background of the law, and why and how did Congress pass it? Does it affect intrastate commerce, or only interstate transactions? How does it affect manufacturers, chain stores, independent dealers, "voluntaries," and consumer cooperatives? Does it help the farmer or hurt him? Will follow-up legislation be necessary, either in the states or in Congress?

As the member of Congress who introduced this bill in the House, after conducting an investigation of chain stores versus independents, I am in a position to give what I believe to be accurate information bearing upon these questions. Let us go to Washington and look in on the drama that preceded the passage of the act.

ACT I

The scene: A conference room of the House of Representatives, occupied by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The time: 10 a.m., July 10, 1935.

Cast of characters: The committee, Hatton W. Sumners of Texas, chairman; Wright Patman, a Representative in Congress from the state of Texas; many other witnesses who desired to be heard either for or against the bill. (The dialogue has been abbreviated.)

THE CHAIRMAN: Gentlemen, I assume you are advised with regard to the object of this hearing. Mr. Patman is here and I assume, Mr. Patman, you are ready to proceed.

MR. PATMAN: Yes.

THE CHAIRMAN: If you would like to make a statement now, we shall be glad to hear from you.

MR. PATMAN: We recognize, in the introduction of this bill, the rights of the chain stores and mail-order houses to do business. This bill proposes to give independent merchants of this country the same rights, privileges, benefits, and opportunities as the larger chain concerns receive.

I feel there is an evil existing in this country in our economic system. I speak specifically of the consolidation of food and grocery chain stores. Before a committee of which I am chairman, investigating lobbying activities of certain large concerns, it was disclosed that only 18 per cent of the cash business of the food and grocery business in 1933 was done by independent stores, including volunteers.

Therefore, the cash business is done by corporate chains, and that has caused this situation to result: You have a chain store on one side of the street that is getting special benefits, special discounts, special commissions and bonuses, and they are able to put the same goods on their shelves as the independent across the street puts on his shelves at about 20 per cent less.

The day of the independent merchant is gone unless something is done quickly. We have reached the crossroads; we must either turn the food and grocery business of this country—and that is just one division—over to a few corporate chains, or we must pass laws that will give the people an opportunity to exist. We want individual units, independent business; we want to encourage independent business.

MR. MICHENER (Congressman Earl C. Michener, Michigan, a member of the committee): You mean all along the line?

MR. PATMAN: Absolutely—all along the line. We know when a few people get control of the food business, or any other business, what they are going to do—tell the producer what he can get for his products, and tell the consumer what he must pay for what they sell. Right now is a critical time. This Congress should determine whether they are going to give the independent merchants a chance to live, or whether they are going to let them be frozen and squeezed out of existence by unfair methods of competition.

ACT II

Scene: The same.

Time: February 7, 1936.

Additional characters: Hubert Utterback, Iowa, chairman of the Subcommittee on Bills to Amend the Clayton Act; O. M. Kile, representing the Mail Order Association of America; Congressman U. S. Guyer, of Kansas, a member of the committee.

MR. KILE: . . . so it looks to me as though you are headed straight into a maze from which there is no exit...

MR. UTTERBACK: Mr. Kile, by that statement do you mean that we might just as well throw up our hands and quit, not try to do anything to stop the present trends? Is that what you mean, not make any effort at all? No matter what we do, you are going to lick us?

MR. KILE: I would not say that; no, sir.

MR. UTTERBACK: We have the anti-trust laws, we have the Federal Trade Commission Act, and we have our Clayton Act. What have we accomplished by them?

MR. KILE: Naturally, the Federal Trade Commission has considerable powers . . .

MR. UTTERBACK: You say we are getting into a maze and that we cannot do anything.

MR. KILE: The Federal Trade Commission has certain powers, but I think, coming right down to it, that there is no need for any act; that it will solve itself. You were shown a few days ago how a retailer, who is really a retailer and not a man who will sit off and wait for the trade to come to him, can take care of himself. You were shown how 20,000 retailers were consolidated through cooperative agencies into buying concerns that got the very same discounts on nearly all of their goods, and they did not . . .

MR. GUYER: In order to get the benefits, they are forced into those organizations, or similar ones?

MR. KILE: Yes. Is there any reason why, in this day of cooperative efforts of all kinds, the local retailer should not have that responsibility?

MR. GUYER: The question is, must we all go into a chain—some kind of a chain?

MR. KILE: Do you feel that Congress has a responsibility to the man who will not recognize that things have changed from the days of his own father and will not cooperate and go along with modern methods of doing things? Do you feel that you have much responsibility for that individual? He has it in his own hands to get the same discounts as these other groups.

MR. UTTERBACK: We are not trying to take the place of inefficiency and ignorance and extravagance and bad credits. All we are trying to do is put all business on a basis of equality. It seems that no matter how efficient some manufacturers are, or some merchants are, no matter how hard they try, they are gradually being put out of business; not because of ignorance or inefficiency or bad business methods, but are absolutely being put out of business . . .

MR. KILE: Well, I certainly do not see that we have arrived at the point in this country where we ought to legislate a man into a permanent business.

ACT III

The third act of this political drama is well known. Congress did decide to give the independent merchant a right to live, and President Roosevelt signed the bill on June 19, 1936.

As finally passed, the act is a consolidation of the provisions of the various bills introduced in Congress by Senator Robinson, myself, Senators Borah, Van Nuys, and others. H. B. Teegarden, attorney for the United States Wholesale Grocers' Association, drafted the original bill. Before and after its introduction many changes were made. Mr. Teegarden, I consider, is the best informed attorney in America on anti-trust legislation. For many years he was Assistant Attorney General of the United States, handling anti-trust matters, and represented the government before the Supreme Court of the United States when the Packers' Consent Decree cases were satisfactorily settled by a consent decree in favor of the government. The Robinson-Patman bill amended Section 2 of the 1914 Clayton Act, defining unlawful price discriminations, and supplemented the act by eliminating brokerage allowances, except for services actually performed, and advertising and other service allowances, unless made available to all purchasers on proportionately equal terms. The bill was designed to prevent arbitrary discrimination in the course of interstate commerce as a result of which sellers conferred substantial competitive advantage upon some customers and not upon others; in other words, to restore equality of opportunity in business without penalizing service and efficiency. The law allows different prices to competitive purchasers from one manufacturer when such differences are based upon "differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from different methods or quantities in which such commodities are sold or delivered." So the law does not specifically prevent all price discrimination and is not a price-fixing bill in any sense.

Our probe of chain stores during the summer of 1935 disclosed that over half of the net profits of one chain-store concern in 1934 were realized from secret and confidential rebates, amounting to $8,000,000. The law was intended to correct such practices, and it is already doing so.

A letter from an independent dealer in New Jersey is typical of hundreds that I have received since the Robinson-Patman law was passed. He wrote: "I have noted that the differentials between chain stores and myself as a retailer have been drawn closer together than ever before," and added that the wholesale prices he was paying on coffee, flour, sugar, and lard had been reduced and that he was passing on these savings to the consumer.

After the bill was signed, one big tire-manufacturing concern canceled a huge contract with a mail-order and chain retail concern, ending a price discrimination which the Federal Trade Commission had been unable successfully to control. Other manufacturers are also terminating contracts which had been damaging them, their employees, and the consumer. As a direct result, small business is expanding, new buildings are being built and vacant ones occupied, men and women are being employed, the farmer is being aided by getting a fair return for his crops, the buying power of consumers is being protected, and they are getting lower prices because monopoly has been checked and competition increased.

There is little question about the act's constitutionality. It is backed up by the Interstate Commerce Act and the Clayton Act, both of which have been accepted for more than two decades.

Three complaints charging violations of the Robinson-Patman Act have already been filed by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice, and five respondents have been named. An automatic enforcement clause in the act provides that any person or firm discriminated against may sue for threefold damages—costs, interest, and attorney's fees. The criminal penalties provided by the law include a fine up to $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than one year.

A jobber or manufacturer who sells to customers within the state, none of whom buys for shipment into other states, is unaffected by the act, which attempts only to regulate interstate commerce in accordance with the Constitution. However, if a jobber or manufacturer buys from a manufacturer in another state, or from one in the same state who sells also to customers in another, he becomes potentially subject to the provisions of the act in case that manufacturer discriminates in favor of him or against him.

No doubt many of the states will adopt measures similar to the Robinson-Patman Act. The associations of retail druggists and retail grocers are at this moment preparing a model bill for introduction in the various state legislatures. I am also testing out sentiment in regard to a bill which would prevent a manufacturer from operating a retail business and a retailer from engaging in manufacturing. This bill has been prepared, and I may introduce it early in the next session of Congress.

The belief has become widespread that consumer cooperatives are exempt from all provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, but this is not so. The final section of the act protects the distribution of cooperative earnings or surplus among the members. In the dealings of cooperatives with others they share the protection provided by the act as to equal treatment. There is nothing which distinguishes cooperatives either favorably or unfavorably from other agencies, as far as their dealings with others are concerned.

Owing to an effective campaign, which received practically all of its backing from retailers, the small press, and trade journals, the people of the nation demanded that Congress save the small business man from oppression. I spoke before hundreds of trade groups, telling them how to exert influence for the bill. We were supported in our stand by druggists, grocers, wholesalers, and others, including many individual consumers. Independent merchants from all over the country, 3,000 or more, came to Washington on March 4, 1936, held a mass-meeting, and interviewed their representatives in Congress, urging them to work for the Robinson-Patman bill. On April 30 the Senate, without a record vote, approved the Robinson bill, which had been amended several times; and on May 28, the House, by a standing vote, approved the measure 290 to 16. After both houses had adopted their measures, the legislation was sent to final conference, where a dangerous provision in the Senate bill, which would have allowed "discrimination . . . made in good faith to meet competition," was eliminated. A Senate provision exempting raw materials was also taken out, thus preserving a means of protecting the farmer and other producers from pressure by the chain stores exerted through the factories. Congress approved the conference report shortly before the President signed the bill.

GERALD P. NYE

I AM quite at sea when undertaking to guess what will be the probable course of the Roosevelt Administration during the next four years. There are so many reasons why it ought to continue energetically progressive, and at the same time so many evidences that frightful pressure will be brought to move it rightward. That the progressive gains already won will be held I have no doubt. Federal relief will of course be greatly restricted, but it must continue indefinitely. Restriction of a harmless nature can come through the weeding out of undeserving cases, and experience should make possible the elimination of a good deal of waste through consolidation of administrative agencies. Since acquaintance with local problems is essential in successful administration, a way must be found to increase local assistance. I expect to see larger requirements levied upon the states for meeting their relief obligations.

Farm gains won during recent years must be supplemented through greater aid to cooperative effort, crop-insurance plans, and easier agricultural credits. Keeping in mind the utilization of available water resources now being wasted, the conservation and flood and drought emergencies must be fully met through large federal aid. The restoration of marginal lands to their original forest purposes must continue.

Social security must be carried forward to a point where the aged can count on having enough to maintain themselves in comfort and decency. That seems to me a prime necessity.

Labor must share more largely in the earnings of industry. Reduced hours with a resultant spread of employment seem now the only adequate approach. If there is an attempt to revive the NIRA, it must be with the strictest provisions against the possibility of monopoly enlarging its control and with provisions insuring greater precautions against the adoption of trick codes by industry.

Reciprocal trade agreements must be watched lest the American farmer become the goat through an endeavor to aid the foreign trade of American manufacturers. Rigid control over exchange markets should prevail, but here I fear reverses. Further banking reform with larger governmental control over the Federal Reserve system is essential, but I do not expect to see this accomplished.

The ensuing years are going to see the Philippine problem in our lap again. The islands cannot possibly carry the load which in the name of national defense is being wished on them by our American military minds, who don't like the idea of our getting out of the islands. As a result of this burden the Philippines will want to come back on the old basis. When that desire is expressed we should be prepared to counter with the strict stipulation that the islands provide every penny of the American military budget alleged to be for their defense.

The largest field for progressive action is offered by the prevention of war. America must not be drawn into other peoples' wars, to the destruction of whatever economic balance may have been restored after the last war. A strict neutrality policy of a mandatory rather than discretionary type must be resorted to if we would avoid seeing our appetite for trade outweigh our appetite for neutrality and peace. While the maintenance of an adequate national defense is essential, Americans must now recognize it as the cloak of interests profiting from mad armament races. Strong legislation against the influence of profit both in war and in preparation for it is very necessary, but I fear that in these fields the Administration will be found painfully compromising.

An Administration never had a finer opportunity to go forward in an intelligently progressive way. Let us hope that the opportunity will not be dodged.

EARL BROWDER

IT is clear that in the elections the American people voted for something more than the middle-of-the-road policy of President Roosevelt. He has himself stated that they gave "a mandate in unmistakable terms." It is the opinion of the Communist Party that it was a mandate against reaction and fascism, for democracy and peace, and for a general improvement in living standards.

The reactionaries are well aware of the implications of this mandate. They realize that they must use very clever maneuvers to recover from the serious blow they suffered in the elections. The sweeping character of their defeat smashed their plans for challenging the validity of Roosevelt's election. Hence the spectacle of Hearst crawling on all fours, the sudden magnanimity with which the employers give pay increases, the amorous bout between Rockefeller and Farley, and the many offers of peace to Roosevelt by big bankers and industrialists.

The Liberty Leaguers are obviously changing their clothes and their tune in a new effort to curb the forward movement of labor and the people. They are worried over the growing consciousness on the part of labor that now is the time to march forward to greater independence and achievements in the economic and political fields.

The people voted for very definite things, things which Roosevelt promised both directly and by implication in his speeches. It is an encouraging sign to all progressives that the American workers indicate they are determined to take advantage of the favorable opportunities created by the election results to augment their power economically and politically. This is shown by the big marine strike, by the organizing activity in steel, automobiles, textiles, clothing, and other industries, by the increasing demands for higher wages and shorter hours, by the formulation of labor and social legislation, by the rising demand for an active peace policy, and by the strengthening of the farmer-labor movement all through the country.

The present push on the part of labor shows that the election results in large part were due to the sharpening of the class struggle, and that this now accelerates the regrouping of the people along class lines. The seeds of the future American People's Front and the Farmer-Labor Party were sown in the election campaign; their fruits are becoming visible and should play an important part in the 1938 elections. We have not yet a people's front, but we have the conditions for its formation.

If the forward movement of the people is to succeed, then labor, farmers, and middle-class people must make demands upon the Administration and back up these demands with independent action on the economic and political fronts. While the reactionaries have received a setback, they have by no means been routed. They still occupy important posts within the Administration and the Democratic Party. The reactionaries will increasingly use the tory wing of the Democratic Party and the Supreme Court; they will exert pressure on the Roosevelt Administration to realize those objectives which they were trying to achieve by electing Landon.

The danger that reaction will reconsolidate its positions makes it imperative that all progressives support labor in the organizing and wage drives, support the unemployed in their efforts to win adequate relief and jobs, support the struggle of the Negroes to win full equality in every field. Now is the time to go full steam ahead, to strengthen every progressive force and build the Farmer-Labor Party.

In the elections labor was united as never before in its determination to defeat Wall Street. Independent and semi-independent movements of workers and farmers registered great progress and were largely responsible for the sweeping nature of Roosevelt's victory. On the basis of these advances, with the increased confidence and class-awareness of the workers, and with the present favorable situation, it is the duty of every liberal, progressive, and radical to pitch in and help labor in the organizing drives and to help build a party of the people—the Farmer-Labor Party.

THURMAN ARNOLD

STATEMENTS of the future course which the Administration should take without regard to the political factors involved are of no use to anyone. Successful action depends upon an accurate appraisal of the political support which the Administration can expect. With respect to that support one thing is clear. The people demand national leadership and national policy with regard to social problems which four years ago were regarded as beyond the proper scope of government. They will support an Administration which attempts, through organizations which it creates or controls, to step into areas where private enterprise is unable to operate effectively. On the other hand, there is little indication of a desire to change the theory of government. The Constitution is still an important unifying ideal and the Supreme Court its most important symbol. Private industrial corporations are still the backbone of our system of distribution. The voters are asking for new activities but not for new theories. With respect to these new activities there is little agreement on anything definite. The general demand that something be done about credit, labor, agriculture, investments, housing, and public utilities becomes a clash of conflicting interests when specific plans are mentioned.

In such a situation a broad announcement of plans would be suicidal. Such announcements are needed when public morale is at a low ebb and when faith and slogans are required as they were in 1933. In such times the price in terms of confusion and disillusionment which must always be paid is not too high. Today there is no need to pay that price.

Therefore the next four years can be devoted to building efficient organizations which can take advantage of a changed conception of the function of government. We have enough new ideals. We need to build organizations which can carry them out. For example, the Social Security Act will take care of itself so far as amendments are concerned as soon as a nation-wide organization is able to instill confidence and respect. The same is true in other new fields of government activity. Private industry should be conciliated. This is important, because although men may die for principles they live through organizations. Organizations never become efficient and disciplined in times of heated debate.

ROGER N. BALDWIN

IF ONE accepts the New Deal as a collection of devices for making capitalism work better, it is evident at once that the framework within which change can take place is narrowly limited. The New Deal, after its tremendous indorsement, will undoubtedly keep moving in the direction of a more workable capitalism. Such a capitalism means increased purchasing power, more stable labor relations, increased social security, and the maintenance of unemployment relief. It may mean extended government ownership or regulation.

In all these fields the United States is still behind the most progressive capitalist countries. Even the New Deal measures which embody these reforms lack the thoroughgoing character of, let us say, the British and French precedents, to say nothing of the Scandinavian.

I have no fear that the Administration will capitulate further to the tories. They have been buried. The field is clear for further experiment. How far left—that is, toward the interests of producers and consumers as against property owners—the Administration will go depends upon how much pressure is exerted. The new movement for organization of labor in industrial unions is in my judgment the most promising basis for this pressure, as well as for the building up of a political party expressing the class interests of organized producers. Without such economic and political pressure New Deal reforms will continue to be compromises or shams. Such pressure, too, is essential if one of the great obstacles to reform under capitalism is to be overcome, namely, the veto power of the Supreme Court. One of the outstanding needs of the moment is a powerful movement for curbing the power of the court by a method based on maximum agreement.

In the field of civil liberties I expect no more interference by the New Deal than in the last four years, and that is slight. But resistance by employers and Tories and drives against Reds are to be expected in a world beset by insecurity and fear. Yet with democracy still flourishing vigorously, as it does in the United States, the road is open to the building up of popular forces.

ERNEST K. LINDLEY

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S course will depend on circumstances and pressures. Any forecast must be made subject to two questions: Shall we remain at peace? How much farther will the present surge of recovery extend? In the event of a general European war I expect Roosevelt to resist the economic and emotional suction that would be applied to us. I believe that we could remain neutral, but I am not confident that we shall. At best, a general war abroad would set in motion currents at home which might drastically alter the present political and economic scene.

Roosevelt's major problem now is to maintain or accelerate the present upward trend of production, thus reducing unemployment and balancing the budget. He probably will be conciliatory toward business and industry, without sacrificing his explicit and implied pledges to labor and other special groups. An "era of good feeling" is dependent on the acceptance by employers of collective bargaining where employees want it and of maximum hours, minimum wage, and anti-child-labor legislation where it is needed. So long as the recovery curve is upward, Roosevelt probably will concentrate on rounding out definite reforms which he already has begun or has publicly projected. If the curve turns downward, he will put forward or accept further reforms. I believe he will move ahead steadily with such long-range programs as conservation, reduction of land tenantry, cheap electricity, and possibly housing.

Unless Chief Justice Hughes and Associate Justice Roberts heed the election returns and vote consistently with the liberals, or unless some of the conservative justices retire within the next few months, Roosevelt will deal with the problem of the Supreme Court. I doubt that he has decided what to do. But apart from keeping us at peace and filling out the present program, the clearing of judicial or constitutional obstructions to the continuing process of readjustment by democratic means is probably the most important contribution Roosevelt can be expected to make during his second term.

UPTON SINCLAIR

IN THINKING about President Roosevelt, and what he is likely to do during the next four years, I always recall a statement he made to me: "Mr. Sinclair, I cannot go any faster than the people will let me." Several friends tell me that he has made the same statement to them; so evidently it is a formula of his. Such a formula may be either an evasion or an elementary truth of political procedure under a democracy. In either case it is permission to those who believe in a planned economy to go ahead and educate the public and build up a demand for the change.

I take it that our present business prosperity is a product of government borrowing and spending, and that it would collapse immediately if the borrowing and spending were stopped. I take it that our ten million unemployed are still with us, and will be with us for the remainder of the profit system's life. I take it that Roosevelt, or any other President elected by the people in their present mood, with such a large part of the sources of public opinion in the hands of the capitalist class will go on borrowing and spending to make prosperity as long as that course is possible. That is the easiest way, and not until the last dollar has been borrowed, and the last deflation of the debt has taken place, will anything basic be attempted.

Our great danger in the meantime is war. I take it that Hitler and Mussolini cannot starve their people indefinitely, and that they will not permit themselves to be overthrown without having a fling at using the glorious machinery of destruction which they have built up. When war starts, all our manufacturers will have an opportunity to make money again, and they will clamor for the right to do this. There will be no way to prevent it, except by declaring embargos, and that will mean such collapse of business that no patriotic President will find it possible to take this step.

Whether our democratic system can stand these strains is a grave problem, and I do not profess to know. All that I can do, with what little power I have to reach the public, is to try to educate the people to a program of production for use by and for the unemployed as the simplest and most obvious way to begin the change. That seems so plain to me that I cannot but believe that it will finally become plain to the masses. Our experiment in California proves that the people will understand this program if it is explained to them. But, of course, it may be that the profiteers have too tight a grip upon the thinking of America and that they will drive ahead under the impulse of their own blind greed and plunge us into world war, which can have no possible final outcome save revolution—perhaps preceded by civil war and fascist counter-revolution.

These are the issues which will be decided during the next four years; and how Franklin Roosevelt acts in relation to them depends upon how many citizens there are in our country who are willing to take the trouble to study these questions and understand them, and spread the understanding among the victims of capitalist newspapers, radio, and moving pictures.

The Ambulance-Chasing Game

BY ELLIOTT ARNOLD

DURING the past five years ambulance-chasing in this country has increased to an almost unbelievable degree. The depression caused many lawyers who otherwise might have confined themselves to honest legal practice to turn to this method of making money. In considerations of the subject attention has been centered on the lawyers themselves, their betrayal of a noble profession, their bribing of doctors, juries, witnesses, and even judges, their mulcting of the insurance companies. But this is only one side of the story.

The real victim of the practice, in most cases, is the poor claimant—the man, woman, or child who after suffering an injury intrusts his case to an unscrupulous lawyer. It is commonly believed that the claimant in any action conducted by a shyster lawyer is part of the fraud, possibly its inspiration, and that exaggerating an injury in order to obtain greater compensation is the natural reaction of an injured person. Investigation into the methods of ambulance chasers has disproved this.

New York's first criminal investigation of ambulance chasing and shyster lawyers is now in process. The investigation is being handled by the District Attorney's office, through a new department, called the Accident Fraud Bureau, created for that purpose, headed by Assistant District Attorney Bernard Botein. Since the formation of the bureau four months ago more than 5,000 cases have been investigated; and virtually the whole blame, the evidence thus far has shown, may be placed on the shyster lawyers and their paid "runners."

"As long as there are crooked lawyers and runners they will breed crooked claimants who ordinarily would shrink from committing larceny," Mr. Botein informed this writer. "Most victims of accidents are from the underprivileged classes. They are ignorant, credulous, and often hungry. Unscrupulous lawyers or runners fan the spark of avarice latent in most human beings. They persuade the claimants—often only by means of prolonged argument—to change the details of the accident so as to pin negligence fraudulently on to the defendant. They overcome his moral scruples by telling him that it really isn't wrong, as the only one hurt will be a wealthy insurance company. He is informed that 'everyone does it.' The fraudulent doctor joins the shyster lawyer in urging these tactics. This dissipates the remaining qualms of the poor, ignorant claimant, in whom an abiding reverence for professional men has long existed."

The thesis has often been advanced that ambulance-chasing lawyers fill a need, that if it were not for them poor claimants would be robbed pitilessly by the cold-blooded insurance companies. This also is a fallacious theory, for every investigation into ambulance-chasing conducted in this country has disclosed that shyster lawyers, far from allowing the claimant to have even a moderate share of the spoils, first rob the defendants in negligence cases and then turn around and as heartlessly rob their own clients.

The shyster's client is the foreigner, the illiterate person, the frightened denizen of the slums, who probably never has had contact with the law, who fears pathetically all things connected with it. He would no more try to fight his lawyer or dispute his actions or advice than an African savage would rise against his local witch doctor. If he should try to protest against the actions of the shyster, he would find himself pitted against an efficient, wealthy, close-knit professional class that wouldn't bother even to laugh at his efforts.

The unscrupulous attorneys who practice negligence law may be divided into two classes. In one is the large firm that employs several so-called investigators on a salary-plus-commission basis. The investigators, who are really only chief runners, employ as sub-runners a number of persons in a position to note accidents—hospital internes, generally penniless, hospital orderlies and switchboard operators, policemen, ambulance drivers, taxi drivers, and the like. In the other is the small practitioner who buys his cases from independent runners. These men peddle cases about among lawyers, selling to the one who can give them the best price and is best fitted, racially or by religion, to handle the case. A fracture case in which the runner has obtained the signature of the injured party to a retainer agreement with the attorney's name left blank can be sold for from $150 to $500, depending on the severity of the injury, the degree of negligence of the prospective defendant, and the latter's financial means.

It works this way: Within half an hour after an automobile accident the information is relayed by one of the sub-runners mentioned above to the runner. In most cases the runner, through a system of petty bribery, has access to hospital wards when even members of families are forbidden to enter. The injured person may be only semi-conscious. Possibly he is delirious. The runner talks fast. He has seen the accident; he mentions the street corner, the details. If members of the family are present he includes them in his confidence. It certainly was a shame! How much longer will reckless drivers be allowed to go around hitting people? It certainly was a fortunate thing that he happened to see the accident. Has the injured person a lawyer? He hasn't? Well, he knows just the man, a man with a humane outlook who has devoted his legal career to aiding the unfortunate, underprivileged victims of automobile drivers' carelessness. (If more than one runner is interviewing the injured man, they will pause to argue among themselves about who got there first. One runner will finally win out. He may be the better arguer or he is of the same nationality as the patient and can speak his language. Perhaps he is of the same religion.) All the victim has to do is to sign this piece of paper. He will receive enough money to make him comfortable for life.

Once the injured person's name is on the retainer, he's licked. In the first place, he has associated himself with a shyster lawyer, and most shyster lawyers are known to the insurance companies. Thus he has already stamped his claim as a fraudulent one. Secondly, the average shyster insists on 50 per cent of the final settlement, and this is stated in the retainer.

The shyster now gets to work. He communicates with the insurance company or the private defendant and instructs his medical accomplice to appear on the scene. This doctor immediately orders the removal of the patient to a "private hospital," where his injuries can be altered to taste. The suit is filed, usually for some fantastic amount. The victim is told not to worry, that everything is being arranged.

In the great majority of cases, with the great majority of shyster lawyers, the suit is never tried in court. The ordinary shyster is interested in effecting a quick settlement. In this phase of the job he often works hand in hand with the insurance adjuster, who, fearful of the result if the case should actually get before a jury, is himself anxious for an out-of-court settlement. Many legitimate claims, which might net the claimant a substantial award if presented honestly in court, are sold down the alley for quick settlement by the shyster lawyer.

After the settlement is effected, the shyster determines the division of the spoils. His own 50 per cent cut is taken immediately. Of the remaining half he allocates large parts for doctors' fees—always padded—witnesses, investigations, examinations, and other expenses. If the poor claimant, who probably is still suffering from the effects of his injuries, gets one-fifth of the settlement for himself he may consider himself extremely lucky. Under this system, everyone is made to pay for the work of the shyster. The claimant gets a negligible amount. The insurance company is mulcted. The future premiums to be paid by other automobile owners are increased. And the aroma of fraud created by the whole process poisons the attitude of insurance companies and judges toward claimants who come into court represented by honest attorneys.

In reporting on the more than 5,000 cases which have been investigated by his bureau, Mr. Botein said, "We found conclusive evidence of fraud in the initiation or development of over two-thirds of these cases." In one law office, the head of which has been indicted, more than $200,000 a year was collected from insurance companies. In New York insurance companies must pay money to 174 persons for every 1,000 automobiles insured in the city annually. The average settlement is $297. Ordinary liability insurance ($5,000 protection for injuries to one person, $10,000 for two or more) costs $95 a year in greater New York. In Philadelphia the companies pay annually 178 persons for every 1,000 automobiles insured. The average settlement there is $202. Philadelphians get the "5-and-10" policy for $50 a year. The automobile death-rate in San Francisco is almost twice that of New York City, but insurance companies have to pay only 37 persons for every 1,000 persons injured. The average settlement is $626, and the same policy sells for $40.

Fifty per cent of the negligence cases in New York courts are handled by 2 per cent of the lawyers of the city. The work of these shysters, it must be obvious by now, knows no bounds of truth or fact. One of the most glaring cases uncovered by the New York investigation was brought into court by a lawyer who profited to the extent of $50,000 annually from his ambulance-chasing practice. In this case a man lost control of his car, raced across the white dividing line of the street, and crashed into a man who was driving properly on his side. The man who lost control of his car and caused the collision—on the wrong side of the street for him—was severely injured.

Two policemen appeared on the scene, made a report on the accident, and specifically stated that the accident was caused by the injured man's hurtling across the street and crashing into the other car. This report was duly recorded on the police blotter. It would seem that the driver of the second car was pretty safe. But the injured man, who had caused the accident, decided during his stay in the hospital that it might be a smart thing to sue the other man. He offered the case to several lawyers. They all investigated and then laughed at him, pointing out that he had caused the accident and would be lucky to escape suit himself.

An ambulance-chasing lawyer took the case. First he paid the two policemen $100 each to testify that in the excitement of the accident, unnerved by the groans of the injured man, the crowds, and so on, they had made a mistake. What really happened, they were told to testify, was that the injured man was driving along on his own side of the street when the other car crossed the white line and struck him. One of the policemen offered to have a friend also appear as a witness, and she too was paid $100 to tell that tale. Fantastic? The case went to court and the injured man collected a substantial amount. The fraud was not discovered until the lawyer's whole practice was investigated.

One too clever runner, now also under indictment, probably ranks as the cream of the lot. By paying a not inconsiderable weekly sum he was permitted to wear an interne's uniform in a hospital and walk around the halls with a stethoscope in his hands. He attended a number of recent victims of automobile accidents, sat by their bedsides—he was a fine-looking man—and gently conversed with them about their mishaps. It was all very unfortunate, he agreed. It was worse, he said, when he found out that the injured person was not legally represented. No lawyer? Well, it wasn't his general practice to recommend lawyers, but here was such a flagrant case of driver recklessness that he just couldn't bear to see it go unpunished. Now he happened to know just the man, a lawyer who . . .

The Belgian Hitler

BY HANS HABE

Brussels, November 12

A STAY of only a few hours in Brussels is sufficient to make one acquainted with Léon Degrelle, the Belgian Hitler, for whom more than 300,000 votes were cast at the last election. His portrait is offered to the foreigner at every bookstall; the great boulevard paper Pays Reel reproduces three times a day his youthful head, that of a boy rather than a man.

Degrelle's party is called the Rexist Party; the leader himself is generally referred to as Rex. When I went to interview him, Degrelle was at the top of a ladder, hammering nails into the wall of the new building the Rexist are putting up near their old house in the narrow Rue des Chartreux, behind the market where fish, stockings, flowers, and neckties are sold at bargain prices.

"Rex" was not alone. There was movement to and fro, many men were busily occupied. He gave orders frequently in a tone of command. Most of the men wore the ribbons of the World War, and each had an arm band with the word REX on it in red letters, under the design of a dragon. On the unfinished walls hung posters announcing meetings; on each was depicted the face of the young man before me on the ladder, always with a light shining around him. I saw an amiable young man of about thirty, with frank blue eyes, a slightly aquiline nose, and a mouth turned up at the corners. His lips gave him at once a youthful look and a look of defiance.

"You must talk to me here," he told me. "I have no office. I have not a room yet, and we must build very quickly. That is why I am helping my comrades."

He did descend from the ladder, but he walked ceaselessly up and down during the interview. I accompanied him to the mason's; I waited while he finished with the painters and the joiners. The surroundings gave the impression of a theater just before the rise of the curtain.

"We Rexist," declared Degrelle, "consider that the greatest political error of our time, the one which permitted the development of communism, was opposing to the rising bolshevism a capitalism that was mortally stricken. My party is as much the enemy of one as of the other. We also want a new society. But instead of lowering the general standard of living, we wish to raise it; instead of making all men proletarians, we wish to raise all proletarians to a position of human dignity. Only the narrowest conservative could believe that a period such as ours, with its formidable technical progress, can be held within its former social and political limitations."

"Then, M. Degrelle," I said, "you preach a revolution of the lower middle class?"

"I do not deny it. The middle classes have been sacrificed all over the world. I do indeed preach the revolution of the middle class. I preach it in the strictest sense of the word, for I am opposed to all violence."

"Yet you are thought to be a fascist."

"What is a fascist? Mussolini is called one and so is Hitler. Yet I cannot find any resemblance between them. Or is everyone who enters the lists for order and peace a fascist? I am a fascist, though actually I do not believe that fascism is an article susceptible of transference from one country to another. The desire for internal order and a desperate resistance to bolshevism take different forms in every country. I agree with the Italians and Austrians as to the necessity for the corporative state. But, to cite one difference among many, our Belgian state will give first importance to the family, which in other fascist countries plays a secondary role. We hold that the father of a family ought to have as many votes as he has children under voting age. We desire to give every preference to large families. The father must guard his children and work for their future. It is therefore just that he should have the right to vote for them. The family is the first, and the corporation the second article of our charter. The state takes third place. After that you can call us fascists if you wish."

"In your opinion, M. Degrelle, who are the greatest European statesmen?"

"Mussolini, Hitler, and myself. Doubtless you will consider me a megalomaniac. But believe me, only the living, persuasive force of a man can create a movement that will sweep away obstacles, that will conquer with the speed of a thunderbolt. . . . I prefer Mussolini to Hitler. Moreover, our program more closely resembles the Italian than the German."

"The idea of race does not enter into our program. Our movement was from the beginning Catholic. It is generally believed that our name 'Rex' connotes a faith in the monarchy. That is not exact. We Rexist are wholehearted partisans of the monarchy and expect to strengthen it by our accession to office, but our motto comes from 'Christus Rex.' We began our crusade under the emblem of the cross. This fact alone distinguishes us from the German National Socialists. We make no distinction of class, religion, or language."

"You obtained a phenomenal vote at the last election. Can you tell me the secret of your success?"

"I do not know this secret. Ask the great leaders of history what was their secret. From all of them, as from myself, emanated a fluid subjugating the masses. As soon as Mussolini or Hitler begins to speak, a spark springs from him which lights the flame in the hearts of his audience. I was born in the south of Belgium; I admit that I am descended from a lower-middle-class family. I have studied the humanities, law and philosophy, and certain literary movements. Even when I was a student I commanded the attention of my comrades. I worked then as I work today. At present I direct my party and at least once a day I write the leading article in our paper, the Pays Reel. I can mount the platform three times a day and deliver each time a great speech. It may be that work is my secret."

"What are your plans for the future? Can you overthrow the left parties at present in power in Belgium?"

"I give you my hand on it—in six months I shall control all the principal instruments of power."

With this conclusion, Degrelle took up his hammer and began again on the nails.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

ARTISTIC New York has lately enjoyed an art exhibition of extraordinary interest. Paintings, drawings, and sculpture by the women of five generations of the Emmet family were brought together at the Arden Gallery for the benefit of the Art Workers' Club for Women. No such showing has, I am sure, ever been made by a single family anywhere else, and it is impossible to recall another family which in any line has displayed talent for five successive generations, except perhaps the Adams family in our public life. But the talent in that tribe has been vested in the men—with all respect to the extraordinary character and force of Abigail Adams. In the Emmet family the talent has almost invariably continued on the female side. The Emmet men have been solid and worthy but undistinguished, save for one of the younger generation of today, Robert Emmet Sherwood, the playwright, who is the son of Rosina Emmet Sherwood, one of the five painters of the third generation. The works of no less than thirteen artists were on show, with Lydia Emmet and Ellen Emmet Rand the most brilliant of the portraitists—they have all run to portraiture. The sculptures were those of Julia Townsend, the granddaughter of Rosina Emmet, of the fifth generation from the Mrs. Thomas Addis Emmet who came to this country with her family from Ireland in 1804.

Ten of these gifted women are now living; two of them are members of the group not by descent but by marriage. Frank Crowninshield writes that the masculine quality is strong in the painting of all of them, particularly in Lydia Emmet and Ellen Emmet Rand, "whose portraits . . . are characterized by strength, dignity, and traditional good-breeding." He also adds correctly that another of their family traits "is the rare gift of honesty, of sincerity; taste, too, is an essential characteristic of their work—an unerring instinct for what is balanced." They have beauty and sensitiveness, too, and a remarkable power to create a living portrait. I have never anywhere seen so extraordinary a likeness as that of Richard Aldrich by Mrs. Rand; and one could not desire to own a lovelier picture than hers of Mrs. Gardner Stout.

But I was not merely compelled to admiration while at the exhibition. I could not help thinking again of all the talent among the women of mankind that was bottled up and undeveloped through the centuries when woman's place was considered to be the kitchen alone, when those women who dared to break the bonds and to find vent for the inner urge for self-expression often did so at the price of becoming social outcasts, the "unsexed females" that agitated the world three or four generations ago. What affects me even more is the thought that if the prevailing political tendency on the Continent continues unchecked we shall again see humanity deliberately turning back to the dark ages and restricting the activities of women to the rearing of children for cannon fodder and the keeping of the home for the warriors. That is the objective of the National Socialists in Germany, headed by Hitler. They have already severely restricted the attendance of women at the universities, and by enlisting girls from twelve years up in the ranks of the Nazi youth organization, they begin early to impress upon them their ideals for womanhood. If they have not as yet deprived German women of the ballot, that is only because Hitler has done away with real elections and everybody is compelled to vote one way. If it becomes necessary for the dictator in the future to permit a certain amount of democracy, we may be absolutely certain that the ballot will be taken away from the women of Germany. Only those who bear arms will be permitted that privilege.

I do not need to stress the folly of this procedure. I do not believe that in the modern world it will be possible to reduce women to the level of brood mares. The very fact that all the dictators propose more and more to make use of women as auxiliary members of the war machine makes me believe that those women will some day, when the pendulum has swung back, demand the right to be active in other fields. For us Americans the objective should remain not less freedom but more—freedom for women to live their own lives and to engage in any enterprise to which they are drawn, to set up their own standards, to support themselves, even when married, on equal terms with men, without any discrimination against them by private employers or by the state on the ground that their husbands also have the privilege of earning their living. It is to me incredible that there are actually American women who think that we ought to have a Mussolini or a Hitler in order that we may be properly disciplined and coordinated. The very first victims of fascism are the women, not only because they are at once written down as inferior persons save for the function of child-bearing, but because their men folks must either become the automatons of the state or run the risk of being torn from those they love and thrown into the nearest prison or concentration camp.

If I have wandered from that exhibition which I began to talk about, it is perhaps because I was so impressed by its worth and what it signified. It was not a showing of amateurs or dilettantes but of artists of recognized standing, commanding and deserving high prices, asking no favors because of their sex, and gladly challenging comparison with anyone. It was as heartening as it was unique.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green

THE Herald Tribune's Walter grows less interested in straight news and pays increasing attention to gossip. One of his best columns in the closing weeks of the Presidential campaign was about the King and Wally. But I like Mr. Lippmann better when he really sticks to the facts and does not rely wholly on persiflage. For instance, I did not think that the humor of his piece entitled "Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green" was heightened by its lack of factualness.

Mr. Lippmann seems to be under the impression that the problem of industrial unionism is as recent as the beginning of the NRA. He overlooks the ancient roots of the question and pretends to see the struggle as a personal quarrel between Lewis and Green. The commentator chimes in neatly with the smear campaign which is intended to convince the public that the head of the United Mine Workers of America is actuated wholly by selfish ambition. John L. Lewis is an ambitious man, but it so happens that the objectives which inspire him concern the welfare of millions of workers in America.

Mr. Lippmann writes, "This is not a fight therefore for the control of the existing unions. It is a fight for the control of unions that are at present scarcely more than paper organizations."

Now as a matter of fact, the C. I. O. has already enrolled something like a hundred thousand steel workers. This is rather more than paper. But Mr. Lippmann's error is even more fundamental. He speaks of Lewis and Green fighting for the right to organize the mass-production industries. It is true that William Green has made some recent statements as to the intentions of the A. F. of L. in this direction, but past history proves that the federation under the leadership of Green either will not or cannot carry on the campaign. It is therefore not a fight to see who is to organize these industries but a struggle over whether they are going to be organized at all.

Such feeble gestures as Green has made of late are wholly the result of pressure from the C. I. O. It is a dog-in-the-manger attitude which the federation has taken. In effect the A. F. of L. has been saying, "We won't, and we defy you to try." It is no secret that Mr. Green and most of his associates have no desire to increase the membership of the federation. They want a small static organization. By maintaining the status quo they assure themselves of their jobs. Holding a majority in the convention largely by the support of the carpenters, Green will not welcome a batch of new delegates.

Again it seems to me that Walter Lippmann is either ill informed or desperately unfair in promoting the fallacy that the C. I. O. drive is a one-man movement conceived solely in the mind of John L. Lewis. Even within the ranks of the United Mine Workers the drive has drawn very much from Brophy and Murray. And in the associated unions Hillman, Howard, Gorman, and Dubinsky have contributed to the primary idea and to the strategy. It is quite true that John L. Lewis is the Babe Ruth of the labor movement, and it is easy for the lazy reporter to make a showing by covering the whole complicated situation in terms of the personality of one man.

I thought Walter Lippmann was made of sterner stuff. Am I wrong in assuming that once upon a time he pretended to write in terms of fundamental tides and deep-seated economic currents? I have said that Lewis is not a solitary leader but that he draws aid and inspiration from his associates. Naturally I should go a good deal farther than this. The drive for industrial unionism is not founded on any man's whim or notion. It has arisen out of a mass necessity. To me Lewis seems a brilliant leader, but he could hardly start for first base if the time were not ripe for the new development.

Mr. Lippmann says, "The main uncertainty in the whole situation is whether the Administration is really backing Mr. Lewis or whether Mr. Lewis thinks he has the backing of the President because he has backed the President. As long as that uncertainty exists, the internal struggle in the labor movement will continue, and union labor will go through the ironical experience of becoming deeply divided because the government tried to help it too much."

John L. Lewis is not as naive as all that, and in all fairness to William Green neither is he. Mr. Lippmann suggests that the whole plan of action by the C. I. O. rests on the assumption of Presidential support. I say flatly that this is untrue. During the campaign Franklin D. Roosevelt made no public statement of his attitude in regard to the labor split, and there are no secret treaties. Lewis has been around too long to put all his trust in princes or Presidents. Of course, he feels that the triumph of Roosevelt was a victory for labor, but he does not regard it as the final conflict. Of course—adopting a familiar formula—John L. Lewis feels that Roosevelt more than any recent Executive understands and sympathizes with the objectives of labor. But John L. Lewis would be a fool if he had any notion that Roosevelt was about to hand him a blank check, and Lewis is not a fool.

I'm not dealing in theory; I can point out what the United Mine Workers did when the NRA first came along. Some unions were harmed by this set-up because they got the idea that like the Indians they had become wards of the government and could sit back and let federal agents solve all their difficulties. Not so the United Mine Workers. Lewis and his associates realized that the promise of Section 7-a would be decidedly useful in promoting a membership drive. But they certainly did not leave that to government officials. They went out and worked harder than ever before. HEYWOOD BROUN

Song of the Little Death

BY FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA

(Translated by Rolfe Humphries)

Mortal lunar meadow
And blood under the ground.
Ancient bloody meadow.

Yesterday, tomorrow.
Mortal grassy heaven.
Light and sandy darkness.

There I met with Death.
Mortal earthy meadow.
Tiny little Death.

The dog on the roof top.
And my lonely left hand
Crossing endless forests
Where the flowers wither.

Cathedral of the ashes.
Light and sandy darkness.
Tiny little Death.

Death and I, a man.
A man alone with her,
Tiny little Death.

Mortal lunar meadow.
The snow heaped high and sifted
Across the very doorway.

A man, and what? I told you,
A man alone with her.
Love, light, and sand, and meadow.

blood of prejudice—with the unreasonable love for every individual, whatever his persuasion, whom Chesterton knew well, and with an equally unreasonable hatred for those who never found individual places in his heart; the theosophists, for instance, he continued to dislike "because they had shiny pebbly eyes and patient smiles." It is the most intimate record we have of the man in our time who has been most like Dr. Johnson; Chesterton himself thinks that Belloc is the man, but his own impromptu remarks to George Wyndham on the subject of Japan are irrefutable evidence: "I distrust Japan because it is imitating us at our worst. If it had imitated the Middle Ages or the French Revolution, I could understand; but it is imitating factories and materialism. It is like looking in the mirror and seeing a monkey." It is enormously good-natured and intelligent, and so of course it is amusing.

But like any other book of Chesterton's it is organized about an idea which to him is serious and important. If the idea in the present case arises from an image, and seems never to be separable from it, that is only saying that Chesterton is after all a literary man, perhaps even a poet. The idea is that he never ceased being a child; that the author of every one of his books was a child; and that the reason for his having always been right in a lifetime of argument was that he saw the world as a child sees it. Chesterton knows that this must be explained, for there is nothing about which we are hazier; and indeed he devotes the whole of his book to explaining it, beginning with a very early experience and reviewing all subsequent experience in its light. The early experience was with a peep-show his father had made for him, and in particular with the vision one day of a young man about six inches high crossing a bridge over a chasm in order to reach a young lady who looked out of a window in a castle. What he fell in love with here was the definiteness of the image—the clear distinctions between mountain, castle, bridge, and chasm; and if the image remained with him to his death it was because, as he says, "all my life I have loved edges; and the boundary-line that brings one thing sharply against another." A child for him is not what it was for Robert Louis Stevenson, a creature with a cloud about its head, a creature dreaming and pretending. Grown men pretend and dream, and obscure distinctions; children, on the other hand, see things in "a white light" that "cuts things out very sharply" and "emphasizes their solidity." It is only a child who can see an apple tree as an apple tree, just as it is only a man with a child's brain who can see England as England. Most men, or at any rate most Englishmen, see it as the Heart of the British Empire. Chesterton, who always kept things limited in his mind, and little, was therefore not an imperialist. "I had no use for an empire that had no sunsets."

Socialism was obnoxious to him for the same reason that imperialism was; "both believed in unification and centralization on a large scale," whereas he believed in multiplicity and smallness, and had preserved in himself that childish love of limits which makes us all more or less enjoy reading "Robinson Crusoe" and which moves most of us to invent prohibitions where there are none—the prohibition, for instance, against stepping on every other paving-stone. The book is little more than a list of the things which Chesterton loved, because, to quote a phrase of Donne's, they had been reduced or could be reduced "to a brave clearness." "I like

Chesterton as Child

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF G. K. CHESTERTON.
Sheed and Ward. $3.

CHESTERTON'S last book is being advertised as amusing, and among other things it is that. It can be read without effort. It contains dozens of first-rate epigrams. "The principal objection to a quarrel is that it interrupts an argument." "Religious liberty might be supposed to mean that everybody is free to discuss religion. In practice it means that hardly anybody is allowed to mention it." "Bernard Shaw . . . is seen at his best when he is wrong. Or rather, everything is wrong about him except himself." "All [boys] tend to three things: to going about in threes; to having no apparent object in going about at all; and, almost invariably speaking, to suddenly attacking each other and equally suddenly desisting from the attack." It is warm with the life practically all kinds of English weather," he says somewhere, "except that particular sort of weather that is called 'a glorious day.'" This would be because clear skies are boundless. And so on into more important matters, the chief of which for Chesterton was of course his religion.

The story of his conversion is best understood against the background he furnishes here of the search he made, as every Englishman of his age did, for Truth. The search consisted for most of them of getting together in lecture halls and drawing-rooms and arguing. For Chesterton at last it was a wilderness of words, a jungle of incompletes and ill-defined ideas; freedom of thought in the modern world finally presenting itself to him as the freedom to think badly. Wearying of freedom, his own no less than anybody else's, he looked about for a garden instead of a wilderness; and found it in the Catholic church. Here, utterly surrounded by limits, he felt utterly alive. He could understand, for instance, why a priest had once said to him: "The Fall is the only cheerful view of human life." And he could be especially thankful for the child's mind in his vast body which had always, even before he knew he was a Catholic, taken things "with gratitude" and not "for granted."

He liked to think that he had always been a Catholic because he had always been clear. It is surely not necessary to believe this; or to suppose that praise of the one thing has anything to do with praise of the other. However that may be, the mind behind this book must be praised. It is one of the most attractive minds let loose in our time, and this book is one of its completest expressions.

Savage Messiah

REASONS FOR ANGER. By Robert Briffault. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THOUGH many of Robert Briffault's premises derive from the Marxian critique of society, he is hardly a representative of classic Marxism. In his zeal to condemn our political institutions for their basic inhumanity, he fails to distinguish between necessary historical advance and its attendant evils, between truly progressive forces and downright corruptions. With such strident simplifications of history, all of civilization is soon reduced to a huge blot on the escutcheon of man which can be erased only in a new social order created by the proletariat. Thus it is the destruction rather than the transformation of the past which Briffault is advocating, and he is committed to a pigeonholing of history into a dark past which has witnessed the triumph of stupidity over the natural intelligence of man, and a bright future reversing this formula. Undoubtedly this division has certain conveniences, especially for drowning the past in a sea of vituperation, but it obscures the process of social change, which requires the long and gradual accumulation of the forces of revolt.

Given his absolute rejection of the bourgeois world, it was inevitable that Briffault should ride roughshod over all fields of culture, proving with invective, when analysis failed, that the arts and the sciences are tied to the purse strings of capitalism. "With uncanny æsthetic sense," writes Briffault in one of the essays, "the whole of literature, art, science accord in their least modulation with the interests of good business." Apart from the palpable absurdity of such a remark—how would Briffault explain the very real achievements of science and literature?—it amounts to a denial of tradition, with each "bourgeois" writer inventing a new system of apologetics, and each "proletarian" writer fumbling childlike at the foundations of a new world. In fact, Briffault would deny the bourgeoisie any constructive role whatever in history, to the point of insisting that any reference to the French Revolution as a "bourgeois revolution" is a misnomer, since the fighting was done by the "people," who are somehow distinguished from the "bourgeoisie." And it is but one step farther to denying, as Briffault does in the essay Is Man Improving?, that there has been any social progress. Has history been marking time all these years, awaiting the signal for emancipation?

What is especially distressing in these essays is that, in the name of human intelligence and of a more civilized world, Briffault invokes a critical method which can only nurture and sanction dogmatism. One can certainly agree with him that not all opinions are equally tenable without jumping to the conclusion that "differences of opinion are now known to be not a matter of private judgment but of private property." For surely there can and must be differences of opinion among "propertyless" intellectuals, whose numbers are legion, and even among avowed Marxists, unless we believe that there are truths which can be accepted prior to thought and experience. Similarly, Briffault's jibes at a "judicial attitude" and at liberalism—he refers to it in one place as "the residuary legatee of the Christian church"—go beyond mere disagreement with the social premises of liberalism to an impatience with any processes of thought which do not arrive at conclusions which Briffault can indorse. This zeal to abolish stages of belief leads one to suspect that his intransigence is but the mask of his dogmatism.

It is a tribute to the philosophy which has influenced Briffault that, despite the inflexibility which constantly warps his analysis, many of his ideas carry as much conviction as they do. Sometimes the sheer energy of statement, when it is not turned into a shrill rhetoric, gives credulity to his arguments, but in the end the force of his doctrines is dissipated in his riotous assaults on our cultural heritage. What a proud but futile isolation is implied in this statement of credo: "I believe that any form of compromise is today a waste of time and energy!"

Success Story

FREMONT OLDER. By Evelyn Wells. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

AMONG the dozens of writing men and women throughout the country who have known and worked with Fremont Older, it would be difficult to find one who could write of him with that combination of personal appreciation, critical objectivity, and social insight needed to give significance to his story in relation to his time. The disarming quality of his personality and the glamor of heroic personal journalism which remained about him to the end defeated critical examination. It was a unique tribute both to his personality and his reputation that the last phase of his career evoked only a legend of personal frustration in liberal circles; that even among the most intransigent radicals his uncritical alliance with the Lord of San Simeon aroused no epithet more bitter than "sentimentalist." Officially, at least, that alliance had its beginnings in the Mooney case.

The biography of Older by Evelyn Wells is an official biography in more ways than one. While Miss Wells is too good a reporter ever to become fulsome, her book is a labor of love by one who knew Older intimately during the last sixteen years of his life and who shared both his editorial point of view and his personal standard of values—including his admiration for their common employer. Coming under Older's influence as a very young "cub," Miss Wells is the last of that long line of women feature and serial writers—including the author of "the immortal 'Chickie'"—developed under his tutelage. If parts of the story come as a shock to those who knew Older only by reputation as an "embattled liberal," that is the fault not of the biographer but of those who have endowed the Western editor with a social philosophy which he never—at any time in his career—possessed.

The career of Older—devoid of those deeper and more impersonal implications which could make of his biography a significant sidelight on the history of American journalism—is an Alger tale of a poor boy who came out of a clearing in the Wisconsin wilderness and rose to the position of editor-in-chief and president of the Fiction Board of the entire Hearst newspaper chain. With the omission or even the proper "treatment" of the Mooney episode, it could—and possibly will—make excellent screen material. There is nothing unorthodox now in those dramatic graft exposés and anti-railroad fights which made Older's reputation on the old Bulletin; or even in his preoccupation with prison reform, his friendships with publicans and sinners, his contempt for stuffed shirts, and his flouting of journalistic precedents.

Miss Wells writes freely and excitingly of all those melodramatic episodes with which his fighting years were crowded; of his crusading fervor (before his "victory" in the San Francisco graft prosecutions taught him the futility of such crusades); his profound sympathy with the individual under-dog, particularly if he or she were a convict or a prostitute; his horror of war and of man's cruelty to man and animals; that almost professional pessimism which he shared with his friend Clarence Darrow. She barely mentions Older's vice-chairmanship of the American Civil Liberties Union and omits altogether—as might be expected—his pre-war friendships among the Western wobblies and labor-anarchists. It was one of these who once called Older a "Jesus-thinker," and like those other "Jesus-thinkers" of the time—Darrow, Steffens, and Hutchins Hapgood—Older was as fascinated by the hard-boiled, direct-action, instinctive labor militants as he was impatient of any social or economic philosophy. But all these attitudes and activities added together did not—in Older's case—constitute a point of view. They were merely the many facets of a unique, honest, and courageous individual and a great popular editor.

Older's withdrawal from the Bulletin in 1918 and his acceptance of Hearst's offer to "come to the Call and bring the Mooney case with you," was a national sensation in both newspaper and labor circles. Older—and his biographer—are unquestionably correct in believing that in accepting this offer he was maintaining his own integrity. The Bulletin's ultimatum to abandon the Mooney case gave him no other choice. For all the rest of his life he never doubted the disinterestedness of the Hearst offer or faltered in his admiration for the man who made it. Both Hearst and Lord Northcliffe—who cabled the Call his congratulations—knew that the man in the street cared little—one way or another—about the Mooney case; and Older, who had already fathered most of the features of present-day journalism, including the "confession story," was a circulation-builder par excellence. He was something more. With his reputation and prestige as a fighting liberal and a friend of labor he was exactly the decorative note which the Hearst press needed. They could afford to let him have the Mooney case. Granted this, he was "as free as any editor can be" because he had no further fight to make.

Probably because she does not recognize the phenomenon,

LINCOLN STEFFENS SPEAKING

This collection of Lincoln Steffens's writings from 1927 to 1936, completed just before his death, provides valuable addenda to his great AUTOBIOGRAPHY. For here is a record of his rediscoveries of the America in which he lived for the last decade, his reflections upon the current scene, his penetrating, alert, humorous commentary on happenings around him. Dedicated to "perplexed students, teachers, statesmen, businessmen, crooks, and artists," it is a trenchant and unorthodox book which is typical Lincoln Steffens and therefore necessary to large groups of readers.

Ferdinand Schevill's HISTORY of FLORENCE

"A good history of Florence is of first importance, not only to the lover of art and poetry but to any one who wants to understand modern living. . . . That this is the best integrated (history) thus far available, the most logical, the most illuminating and the most instructive seems to this reviewer incontrovertible. It is a credit to American scholarship, American intelligence and above all American humanity, for while it is not fair to those who like their histories and biographies sugar-coated to say that it makes easy reading, it is animated throughout by a most warm and human spirit. It does not smell of the stacks. It is not dull or pedantic in any way."—Thomas Caldecott Chubb, N. Y. Times.

Miss Wells does not attempt to rationalize the irony of Older's position during his last few years while the Call-Bulletin (Hearst had bought the declining Bulletin years before) was becoming the embodiment of red-baiting reaction. Older had long since ceased to be more than a name on the editorial page, and the paper was run by hard-boiled young executives under the direction of John Francis Neylan. But the editor commuted each day from his beautiful 200-acre ranch in the Santa Cruz foothills, wrote an occasional reminiscent column, read fiction for national publication, and visited regularly at San Simeon. In 1934, when the San Francisco press under Neylan was being whipped into a fury of vigilantism, I went to an interview with Older, sickened with pity and embarrassment for his position. It was quite gratuitous. He talked of Dennis Kearney and early California history, of his garden, of the beauties of San Simeon. The clamor outside apparently did not touch him. He had done his job; he had earned a rest. It was foolish to ask more of him.

Miss Wells has told her story with reportorial accuracy and complete sympathy. It would also be foolish to ask more of her.

LILLIAN SYMES

Clown or Hero?

SALAVIN. By Georges Duhamel. Translated by Gladys Billings. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

FOR all the excellence of its characterization, the clarity and finish of its style, M. Duhamel's novel—or, to be precise, collection of novelettes—leaves one a little confused. This is not due to the peculiar form in which it is cast; loose and episodic as that undeniably is, the novel nevertheless adheres strictly to a single theme. Each of the four novelettes emphasizes the hero's sense of maladjustment to the world he lives in; two of them are concerned with his efforts to compensate for this by achieving a heroic identity. But what makes M. Duhamel's story appear to split in half is the obvious and inexplicable change that takes place, somewhere in the middle of the book, in the author's own attitude toward his subject.

Clearly it was M. Duhamel's original intention to depict a "sad clown"—one of those unfortunate souls eternally lost between the grandeur of his aspirations and the ineptitude of his performances. With such tragi-comic material M. Duhamel would seem especially fitted to deal. He has all the precision, irony, and penetration characteristic of French authors; he knows how to preserve the right balance between pathos and comedy—and in his comedy there is that mixture of truth and extravagance, of the repetitious and the unexpected, that belongs to comedy at its best. The novelette entitled Salavin's Journal, in which Salavin decides to become a saint, and in which his efforts toward sainthood end in the most ludicrous blunders, is a masterpiece of wry humor. With the conclusion of this episode, however, M. Duhamel devotes himself to the tragic implications in his tale; and the effect he thereby produces is not only out of line with the impression we have already formed of his hero; it is in itself unconvincing. Perhaps the most tragic thing about heroes of the Salavin order is that we can believe in them only so long as we are not required to take them seriously.

In The Lonnais Club, we are required to take Salavin very seriously indeed. Yet tragic as this section ought to be, it fails to rouse us to anything like the pitch of compassion we felt after reading the most ridiculous escapades of the early Salavin. End of Illusion tends to alienate us even farther from Salavin—who appears, in this concluding section, to have developed into something of a prig. In any case, we cannot forgive M. Duhamel for allowing this creature of papier-mâché perfection to triumph over the real Salavin, the erring little clerk whose appeal to our sense of humor was not more valid than his claim on our sympathies.

HELEN NEVILLE

Hindenburg and the Kaiser

THE KAISER AND ENGLISH RELATIONS. By E. F. Benson. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

WOODEN TITAN, HINDENBURG IN TWENTY YEARS OF GERMAN HISTORY, 1914-1934. By John W. Wheeler-Bennett. William Morrow and Company. $5.

IT IS hard to see the reason for this new volume on the Kaiser. That it is well written goes without saying, since Mr. Benson is the author; but it is not based on any newly discovered evidence. The citations are from the letters of Queen Victoria and the Empress Frederick, from familiar biographies and other well-known sources. Nor is there anything fresh in the point of view. Mr. Benson portrays the Kaiser in the worst possible light and adds one more to the many indictments drawn against him. The book's merit is simply that of a compact statement of the Kaiser's relations with England, and especially with his English cousins. Here and there he corrects an author like Emil Ludwig, Prince von Bülow, or Baron Eckhardstein, but in the main the narrative proceeds along orthodox lines with many passages of extreme bitterness. Not that one could write about this extraordinarily unhappy and direful man without intense feeling, so dreadful is his record of inefficiency, weakness, egotism, inconsistency, selfishness, cowardice, and total failure to live up to the opportunities of his high position.

Mr. Benson stresses the fatal effect upon the Kaiser of the accident at his birth, when the bungling surgeons maimed his left arm, thus creating a disability out of which grew his inferiority complex and his delusions of grandeur and greatness. He also correctly interprets the relationship of the Kaiser to his tragic mother. He points out repeatedly that the Kaiser could not act honestly at any time. Indeed, Mr. Benson feels that the Kaiser's attitude toward England, especially during the South African War, was that of a treacherous and crafty enemy. Masking his real purpose under the guise of friendliness, "he adopted," says Mr. Benson, "the crookedest of methods, he appeared to devise hostile combinations of other powers, he reared bogies to terrify England, he used tricks to which no straightforward man would condescend, but these were in accordance with his diplomatic methods, and in every case they were devices to further the accomplishment of his sincere desire to be allied with England." He knew how to dissemble his love—with a vengeance! The strange contradictions in the Kaiser's "most exasperating character" are all set forth—for example, that "side by side with his intimations of omnipotence and his incurable inferiority complex" there was "a childlike eagerness to be appreciated." He even did not resent being told the most unpalatable truths to his face, provided it was done with tact and friendliness. The narrative stops with the coming of war, but the Kaiser's existence at Doorn is recorded in his own words as that of "an outcast by the vile intrigues of the British statesmen." Mr. Benson concludes thus: "He loved England still—there was the pathos of it—even as he had always loved her. Treacherous and black-hearted though he held her to have been, he had never succeeded in killing that love."

Mr. Wheeler-Bennett's biography of Hindenburg, who in the end will probably turn out to have had an even worse influence on the fate of Germany than the Kaiser had, is an elaborate book of 500 pages, and it leaves little more of Hindenburg's reputation than Mr. Benson's book does of the Kaiser's. It brings out in complete detail the relations of Hindenburg to Ludendorff and to General Hoffmann, the real brains of the Russian campaign. It shows how Hindenburg stepped into a situation at the Masurian Lakes which made it easy for these three to plan victory. Later on this "spiritual marriage with Ludendorff," as Hindenburg himself termed it, became the undoing of Hindenburg and of the German people. Mr. Wheeler-Bennett gives credit to Hindenburg for having stronger nerves than Ludendorff and for keeping his head clear and his courage undiminished in several critical moments when Ludendorff went to pieces. But he shows how these two men finally came to dominate both the war policies and the German people, with the results which always follow when military men take control of a country. It was they who made and unmade chancellors and decreed the fatal submarine warfare. That was where the Kaiser failed? He always crumpled up when Ludendorff and Hindenburg placed the dagger, in the shape of their resignations, at his throat.

Mr. Wheeler-Bennett does not conceal that weakness of Hindenburg's character which led him to agree to the surrender and then to place the responsibility for his act upon others. He takes the part of General Groener, the unfortunate scapegoat who, under Hindenburg's instructions, had to ask the Kaiser to abdicate and leave the country when the Field Marshal himself did not have the honesty and straightforwardness to tell the truth. He thinks that Hindenburg was essentially treacherous and untrustworthy, and he sets forth clearly how the President was responsible for the undoing of the republic and the rise of Hitler. Naturally a good deal of his account of the final years is based upon rumor and hearsay. He uses, for example, the story that Hindenburg in his latter years thought that a marching column of Brown Shirts was composed of Russian prisoners, though there can be no verification of this and much more. But he is very clear that Hindenburg violated his oath of office and betrayed his country.

Mr. Wheeler-Bennett has done a great deal of research and examined a mass of literature and documents, and as he has had the advantage of being in Germany frequently during the post-war period he is able to record facts of his own knowledge and observation. However much his book may be corrected by future revelations, I cannot but believe that his opinion of Hindenburg is in the main that which will be held by unprejudiced historians in the years to come.

A Proper Study

THE STUDY OF MAN. AN INTRODUCTION. By Ralph Linton. D. Appleton-Century Company. $4.

ONE need not be an anthropologist to see that in this introduction Mr. Linton offers a new and broader conception of his science than is generally encountered. An "introduction" the book is, but in the sense that it leads one into new fields. And the value of the venture may be judged objectively even though externally if it be remembered that one of the important criteria of the success of scientific research is the number of new problems it discovers. In his discussion of cultural dynamics Mr. Linton frequently runs up against important questions so far unsuspected, and field research does not yet supply the data necessary to answer them.

It is not, however, Mr. Linton's technical contributions to anthropology that the reviewer wishes to emphasize. He would rather call attention to the seminal efficacy, the power of suggestion, which the non-specialist will find the book to have. Take as an instance the light it throws on problems of value. It is not the discovery, as old as the Greeks, that moral codes are relative to social factors which gives these suggestions their stimulating quality. What does so is rather the nice and detailed study of the mechanisms through which society determines attitudes in its members by opening to them certain possibilities through induction into objectively recognized statuses, while closing quite effectively other possibilities. Or take as another instance the suggestions for a methodology of the social sciences. With the atomistic approach to social studies thoroughly bankrupt, there is danger that as a reaction a mystical, organismic approach may attempt to take its place. Such a tendency, instinct with anti-rationalistic obscurantism and giving comfort to political totalitarians, is quite discernible in certain quarters. For this reason Mr. Linton's conception of the nature of society is not only refreshing but of methodological and material importance. What Mr. Linton offers, as a result of empirical study, is not a compromise between naive atomism, giving an utterly unrelated picture of social phenomena, and the unrealistic conception of a mystical social Gestalt, the defining quality of which is intuited by transcendental means. What he proposes is a real third alternative, which seeks to do justice to the discrete as well as the organically integrated aspects of society, to the disruptive as well as to the cohesive forces, which are, respectively, left out of account by one or the other alternative methods of approach. Such instances of the manifold suggestiveness of this book could readily be multiplied.

Because it is so thoroughly well thought out, it is a pity that the book is marred by a conception incompatible with its main intention. Difficulties are gratuitously thrown in the author's way by his own implicit assumption that the mind is a purely internal affair which is possessed privately by men and is therefore definable in isolation from the outward material world. A less idealistic notion would go a long way toward dissipating the pseudo-difficulties which Mr. Linton, whenever he bumps up against them, generously passes on to philosophers to resolve. And yet the book is an important contribution, and men weary of the unscientific wrangling of contemporary social and political dogmatists will find it a liberating experience.

LABOR UNIONS AND THE PUBLIC. By Walter Chambers. Coward, McCann. $2.

Mr. Chambers takes as his thesis the well-worn story of racketeering in labor unions and the subsequent damage to the American labor movement. It is true that in certain unions, notably the building-trades unions in Chicago and the poultry and fish unions in New York City, notorious cases of racketeering have come to light and a few labor leaders have gone to prison. But in the large majority of unions no such charges have ever been made. When it is remembered that unions are administered by the same human race as are our often corrupt city governments, it is surprising, not that there is so much racketeering and maladministration, but that there is so little. Mr. Chambers's earlier chapters are concerned with a brief history of the American labor movement, intended presumably for the elementary student of the subject. A number of inaccuracies mar its usefulness, however. For example, when he is discussing the opposition of American employers to trade-union organization, Mr. Chambers makes the extraordinary statement that "English industrialists accepted without hesitation the principle of their workmen being organized." When it is recalled that a little more than a century ago a group of British workmen went to prison for the crime of trying to form a union, a warning will be given to take Mr. Chambers's labor history as well as his indictment of American unions with a grain of salt.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

ALL BRIDES ARE BEAUTIFUL. By Thomas Bell. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Essentially a simple love story, with the newer hard-boiled overtones, this novel takes on scope only through its background—the upper reaches of the New York Bronx in the black years of the depression. Although capable of being related to the growing literature of the proletariat, it is never aggressively earnest in its revelation of working conditions in shops and factories, of families living on $22 a week, and of sleeping and bathroom facilities in Pullman flats. It owes its quality to an unemphatic honesty that extends from the description of places and things to the recording of the vacillations of personal relationships. Unfortunately, this lack of emphasis is at the same time the book's most pervasive defect, and unless its author can bring a little more conviction to his theme his future writing is likely to suffer from general anemia.

WILLIAM TROY

COURTHOUSE SQUARE. By Hamilton Basso. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The South of Hamilton Basso's new novel is neither the degenerate culture of Caldwell and Faulkner nor the sentimental paradise of Stark Young. It is a drowsy land under whose sleepiness run the same currents of intolerance, pettiness, and bitterness which have disgusted David Baroness, a successful Southern writer, in the intellectual life of New York. When his wife leaves him, he seeks serenity in his Carolina birthplace, but soon finds himself fighting the same forces that had driven him from the city. He carries on his family tradition of following his sense of duty rather than expedience, and becomes seriously involved in an outburst of racial hatred. Mr. Basso's somewhat autobiographical book is an eloquent account of the American intellectual's battle against the corrupting forces of our civilization in both rural and urban districts.

MASON WADE

HILL GARDEN: NEW POEMS. By Margaret Widdemer. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

These new poems express sentiment neatly; they are in turn pleasantly ironic, plaintive, and lyrical in the familiar manner, but they never manage to achieve anything like emotional intensity. The aspects of modern life which bother Miss Widdemer—drugstore cures for the ills of the soul, for example—have been written about so many times before that they no longer seem contemporary at all. For contrast she offers the simple virtues, unconvincingly, because they turn out to be popular superficialities. And her lyrics recognize all the conventions; they speak wistfully of love that fades too soon, of death bringing freedom, and of God. These matters are handled with deference but without inspiration. Miss Widdemer possesses a facile technique which conceals some of the weakness of her verse. She is content with any cloudy "poetic" image, producing a succession of vague generalities without any attempt at precision or concreteness. As a result, these poems are easy, pat, and spineless stuff; they display the same mechanical skill supporting commonplace ideas and writing which is characteristic of the general run of magazine verse.

BURROUGHS MITCHELL

CHOOSE A BRIGHT MORNING. By Hillel Bernstein, Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

This little anti-fascist satire by the author of "L'Affaire Jones" is a comedy of disillusionment. An absentee American capitalist, Keets Wilber, arrives in Bidlo, a mythical totalitarian state, with the intention of pursuing the heroic life there. The propaganda ground out by the Bidlo government has persuaded the simple-minded millionaire that in Bidlo he will find all the legendary adventurousness, the nobility, the devotion to higher things that are lacking in the routine of American business. Soon, however, a series of disappointments, two stays in a concentration camp, some enlightening conversation with an American publicity man convince Keets Wilber that the real heroes are not those who govern in the name of brutality but those who, in prison, in the underground movement, oppose such a government. Regenerated, he returns to America, there to discover that through his Wall Street representative he has become a principal stockholder in the state of Bidlo and in the munitions industries which are arming it and its neighbor state for a new holy war. The first quarter of the book is dull: the naivete of Keets Wilber is smeared on a little thick, and the result is fifty pages of routine, oafish, deadpan humor. But as the disenchantment of the American proceeds, Mr. Bernstein's hand is lighter, his absurdities more delicately balanced on each other. In total effect the book is gay and deft and, at the same time, bitterly accurate.

DRAMA

Fancy That, Hedda!

ALLA NAZIMOVA'S performance in "Hedda Gabler" (Longacre Theater) is something of a triumph for both actress and playwright. It is nearly thirty years since she first essayed the role, and it is no small thing that both the character itself and her interpretation of it should remain as vital as they do.

Probably no other play by Ibsen has lasted so well, partly, no doubt, for the very reason that none of the others has a significance at once so indubitably solid and so difficult to reduce to simple statement. Those dramas where he was most explicit, "The Doll's House" for example, have tended to become almost painfully obvious. Others in which the once fascinating "symbolism" is more prominent have either dissolved into thin air like "The Master Builder" or undergone, like "The Lady from the Sea," a sort of precipitation, with the result that a certain amount of rather dreary "new thought" has separated out and sunk to the bottom. Time has, on the other hand, affected only the most superficial features of "Hedda Gabler." Here and there the dramaturgy may seem a bit old-fashioned, but the problems of Hedda's character are explored in terms which have remained perfectly contemporary.

Since Ibsen conceived her, a whole library full of relevant literature has accumulated. Frustration has been "discovered," and the term "compensation" has been invented to account for exactly such lusts for power as dominate her soul. Yet I doubt if one could find in the whole of the psychological literature produced during that time an insight not exhibited in Ibsen's play. I will not say that she is not clearer to us, that we cannot follow the pattern of her emotional processes more easily than his contemporaries could. But we know no more than Ibsen did and can see no deeper. There is no point at which our understanding seems to part company with his, and if the play were written today its author would assuredly be accused of having taken his material from a textbook instead of from life.

Dostoevski is usually cited as the most striking example of the writer whose insights anticipated those of modern psychology, but nowhere in Dostoevski, so it seems to me, is there any extended study so clear and complete. Moreover, to say this is of course to say only the less important half of what is true of "Hedda Gabler," for the play is no mere cold case history and no mere thesis. It is continuously and unescapably fascinating. To watch it is to be filled with loathing, pity, and something like fear. As a study in evil Hedda is as much more impressive than Iago, let us say, as Othello is nobler than any modern hero.

As for Madame Nazimova, I saw her first some fifteen years ago in "The Wild Duck." Even then she was, as she shook the black hair from about her eyes, less a little Norwegian girl than some almost unearthly creature who would have seemed exotic in any environment. All that might have been urged against her then might be urged with at least equal force today. If one stops to think, it is obviously impossible to assume that she could have been accepted by the people among whom she moved as a passably ordinary person, not an extraordinary phenomenon. I might even go so far as to add that, in the abstract, I prefer the conception of those who play the character with more emphasis upon a certain contrast between an outward conventionality of manner and the inner diabolism of her character. But Madame Nazimova makes one forget all this. She is both technically superb and capable of projecting a personality too strong to permit a question. I have seen Heddas who seemed more credible in retrospect; I have never seen one who imposed herself so inescapably.

Few importations since the Statue of Liberty have displayed their French postmark as prominently as Louis Verneuil's "Matrimony, Pfd." (The Playhouse) or been more expressive of that nation's unregenerate great-heartedness. From the opening curtain, which discloses an elderly maman intent upon wedlock for the first time in a career checkered with four loves and one offspring (now aged twenty-nine), to the final curtain, which returns the bridegroom to the altar after an interloping baroness (Rosemary Ames) has been diverted by the bride's son, it is a farce designed to entertain, and entertain without stint. Grace George as the maman and A. E. Matthews as the groom-at-large acquit themselves irreproachably, and are given understanding support by Sylvia Field, Rex O'Malley, and José Ruben, who is likewise responsible for the adroit staging of the whole. The largest task of thrusting out-of-sight the trifling machinery of the play and ministering to the good spirits of the spectator devolves upon Miss George; and her resultant performance should prove among the most piquant and disingenuous we are likely to view this season. RECORDS

VICTOR has released a new set of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony made by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky (three records, $6.50). The recording reproduces the tonal characteristics of the orchestra's playing with remarkable fidelity, and Koussevitsky's treatment of the first movement is flawless, but in the second his emotions escape control and produce an unsteadiness of pace that is disturbing. I hope Victor will not discard Stokowski's early set of the work, for in it a beautiful performance, such as Stokowski is no longer capable of producing, is recorded with astonishing clarity and fidelity.

The set should be preserved because today we know Stokowski only—to borrow Lawrence Gilman's inimitable words—as "that exhaustless dynamo of vital energy and creative innovation, in whose neighborhood the currents of thought and experimentation are always stirring." We know him, that is to say in plain English, as a meddler with other people's music, usually to its disadvantage—though in the present instance Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings as Stokowski has re-scored it for the entire Philadelphia Orchestra has less than the usual sensationalism in the scoring and less than the usual tension and excitement in the performance (two records, $4). We know him as a co-inventor of that nuisance, the fade-out-and-in between records. We know him as a vista-opener—in a recording of Eicheim's "Bali," which might be good music for a Flaherty film. It takes three sides of two Victor singles ($4); on the fourth side is "Etenraku," an eighth-century Japanese ceremonial prelude which at least has an authenticity that is impressive, but which might be less wearying after the first minute if it accompanied the ceremony. If only that dynamo would tire!

Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin play Enesco's Sonata No. 3 in A minor out of friendship for Enesco; it was recorded only because of the sales-value of the Menuhin name; and the sole value of the set is in the performance, which reveals again the astonishing superiority of Hephzibah over her brother. Their feeling and playing together is miraculous, and she defers to him always; but there is not a note from the piano that does not proclaim her the more vital and authoritative player and musician (Victor: three records, $6.50).

Victor also has re-pressed a second volume of Brahms's music for piano—this time the Waltzes Op. 39, with a group of Intermezzi from Op. 116, 117, and 119, most of which are, to my ears, arid formula dipped in treacle, and as such unendurable. To readers who like them I can report that they will enjoy Bachaus's playing and marvel at the recording (four records, $8). So with Bartók's Quartet No. 2 in A minor: my mind finds no path in the regions of musical thought in which his operates; but to persons who have found a path I can report that the playing of the Budapest String Quartet and the recording are excellent (Victor: four records, $8).

Elisabeth Schumann's voice is wearing thin, but her art in Lieder-singing is still exquisite; and on a single Victor record ($1.50) are Schumann's "Lorelei" and "Ständchen," and Schubert's "An die Nachtigall" and "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten."

Letters to the Editors

Murder Is Murder

[Mr. Fernsworth, foreign correspondent of the New York Times at present in Spain, sent the letter which appears below to the editor of America. At the same time he sent a copy to The Nation for publication in case America decided not to use it. We are informed by the editor of America that he does not plan to publish it in the correspondence columns although later it may be referred to editorially.]

To the Editor of America: These remarks are prompted by the fact that I have just found the time to look through an accumulation of three months' copies of America. As a Catholic boy I was taught "Thou shalt not kill." In my subsequent reading of history I have frequently been appalled to find the church has not hesitated to ally itself with those who have waded in butchery and blood and to profit by their victories. This has frequently caused me to ask myself the question whether Christianity as represented by the church—my church—does not have a double standard in the matter of the Fifth Commandment—whether killing is no longer murder when done by the champions of a holy cause.

Or can it be that when the children of God—for so from the teachings of Christ I understand all mankind to be—are put beyond the pale by being classified as heretics, infidels, forces of evil, or, as you have so elegantly stated it in the case of Spain, "sewer rats," they no longer come within the purview of the Lord's commandment, and it becomes a holy thing to put them to the sword?

This land of Spain runs literally red with blood. I need not express through your columns my horror for the crimes committed by those whom you term the "sewer rats," since you have already done so most amply, and I verily believe with exaggeration when you refer to the crucifixion of nuns and the slaying of them on the altars. My mind is open, but I want the evidence of that; from what I have seen I do not consider it probable. The situation is bloody enough without still bloodier adornments to the tale of it.

But what about those persons, the rebels or insurgents or defenders of the faith or whatever you might wish to call them, who likewise have killed their thousands upon thousands in cold blood and, may I add, in treachery? Who have systematically killed the Republican and loyal officials wherever they have gone; have packed them in a bull ring to the number of more than a thousand and mowed them down with machine-guns; have staged executions to music in the public plazas; have set up in some of the places they hold regularly established human slaughter houses where men are killed like beasts? Is that not also murder? Does the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" not apply?

Murder on the one side and murder on the other. That is the picture. Who is the guiltier? Who is the better instructed? This is no moment for the church to cry persecution, to raise an arrogant voice, to condemn. I tell you its hands are not clean in this matter of Spain. And itself stands at the judgment bar.

LAWRENCE A. FERNSWORTH

P.S.—You are misinformed when you state that nuns are no longer tolerated within government lines. I have just returned from Madrid where, in the Calle Zurbarán, I lived for several days opposite a great orphanage of the Little Sisters of the Poor, who, now in civilian garb, carried on as usual.

Ambulances for Spain

Dear Sirs: Of the thousands who have sacrificed their lives this year in the defense of Spanish democracy, a high percentage have not been killed by fascist bombs or bullets but by lack of essential medical equipment and care. The Spanish government and its official Red Cross have appealed to the American people for blood-transfusion equipment, tetanus, gangrene, and diphtheria antitoxin, disinfecting ovens, surgical instruments, and, above all, ambulances.

The Medical Bureau of the American Friends of Spanish Democracy, with offices at 20 Vesey Street, New York City, is raising funds for an American ambulance corps in Spain. Thirty-five nurses and surgeons have already volunteered. The campaign is led by Bishop Robert L. Paddock, our chairman, and John Dewey, our vice-chairman, together with such eminent medical men as Dr. Bela Schick, Dr. Walter B. Cannon, and Dr. Henry E. Sigerist, the world's foremost medical historian. The plan is to begin buying ambulances promptly so that, preparatory to shipment, they can be placed on the streets as graphic testimony to what Americans are doing for the victims of the Spanish uprising.

Any contribution your readers feel able to make, either by individual gifts or by benefits and collections, will be gratefully received by us as by the sufferers in Spain.

We All Thank You

Dear Sirs: Whatever and wherever that well of knowledge can be which floods the paragraphs of Paul W. Ward so richly, they are unreservedly the most interesting, most valuable, most entertaining, and—above all—the most reliable behind-the-news coverage in this nation.

It seemed apparent that President Roosevelt and the more liberal forces would win the 1936 elections, but it was hard to believe that Ward could be right in reserving only Maine and Vermont for Landon. The Literary Digest poll fiasco was the greatest defeat of the 1936 voting classic. The Gallup poll, while registering at least a victory for the President, failed to record even a faint tremor of the terrific indorsement that was agitating political America. Only Ward saw what was coming, and he nailed it with near precision.

There is only one thing wrong—it always takes a week for The Nation to get here.

More Bouquets—for Mr. Ward

Dear Sirs: I am writing to say that the best article in the November 14 issue of The Nation is that by Paul W. Ward, It Has Happened Before. His campaign catechism is a masterpiece and deserves far greater publicity than you can give it.

To be blunt about it, your editorial, as well as the article on What I Expect of Roosevelt, needed something like the article from Ward to make the magazine worth publishing.

We're Glad to Be Corrected

Dear Sirs: I see that you said in your estimable weekly that I came through in a "remarkably close race." Please note that I won three to one.* Also, that the Republicans bought their votes on credit and settled for 25 cents on the dollar.

They spent about $25,000 or $30,000 and had a redistribution of wealth. The only trouble was that it was not spread among the people, and the distribution was upward instead of downward. This was following the usual Republican theory of economics.

Freedom for Von Ossietzky

Dear Sirs: In the light of the announcement of the granting of the Nobel Peace Prize to Carl von Ossietzky, the International Relief Association, official representative of the Ossietzky Committee in the United States, feels it necessary to point out the implications of this victory.

Carl von Ossietzky, a world-renowned pacifist and idealist, has been suffering the hell of a Nazi concentration camp for nearly four years. He has been critically ill for a good part of that time, and yet the Nazis consistently refused to remove him to a hospital until very recently—and then they did so only because of the pressure of world indignation. Last week Ossietzky was released "unconditionally." But this was done only because the Nazi government had advance news of his receiving the Nobel prize. In other words, any concessions gained were gained because of outside pressure.

By granting the peace prize to Ossietzky the Nobel committee proclaims the caliber of the men and women who are held as political prisoners in the concentration camps of Germany. The fight for Ossietzky is partially won, but there are thousands of other political prisoners whose only crime, like his, was an effort to resist organized barbarism. The case of Carl von Ossietzky proves that this barbarism can be resisted; it should spur all liberals to join in a concentrated effort for the release of other prisoners.

Funds are urgently needed to keep Ossietzky in a private sanitarium until he is well. Funds are urgently needed to win similar victories for other political prisoners.

CONTRIBUTORS

CONTRIBUTORS to the symposium are Senator Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Investigation of the Munitions Industry and chief exponent in Congress of the neutrality legislation program; Earl Browder, secretary and Presidential candidate of the Communist Party; Thurman Arnold, professor of law at the Yale Law School; Roger N. Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union; Ernest K. Lindley, chief Washington correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune; Upton Sinclair, author and, as candidate for Governor of California, founder of the EPIC Party.

WRIGHT PATMAN, Representative from Texas, will return to Congress for his fifth term this January. He is chairman of the House Committee to Investigate American Retail Federations and author, with Senator Robinson, of the Chain Store Act.

ELLIOTT ARNOLD'S article is a sequel to one he contributed last week on the faked-accident racket. As a feature writer for the World-Telegram he has been collecting material on rackets of various kinds and in his spare time writing a novel, Personal Combat, which has just been published.

HANS HABE is a European journalist.

FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA is a Spanish poet, playwright, artist, and musician whose death at the hands of the rebels was commented on editorially in The Nation two weeks go. His translator, Rolfe Humphries, is a left-wing poet and member of the American League of Writers.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is an editor of the Partisan Review.

LILLIAN SYMES contributed an article on California politics to The Nation last spring, and shortly afterward appeared in the Modern Monthly with a none-too-complimentary article on ourselves and our contemporary, the New Republic. Her reappearance in The Nation this week suggests that she doesn't mind if we don't.

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin. He frequently contributes to The Nation reviews of new books dealing with philosophy and related subjects.

★

IT HAS BEEN A FIRE-BREATHING WEEK ALL over Europe and the Far East, with Göring shouting threats at Russia, Litvinov hurling defiance back at Germany, Japan and China exchanging insulting civilities over Suiyuan, and even Eden and Blum caught up in the contagion and putting steel into their usually diplomatic language. In every country the Foreign Office has taken on a martial air and the War Department has swollen until it occupies the entire government. Boasts about the size of the air forces sound like stock-market quotations before the 1929 crash, and man-power is measured in astronomical figures. The world is sliding down the runway to war.

★

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IS DOING HIS BEST TO peddle peace in this war-beset world. At the height of his triumph and prestige, Mr. Roosevelt has been given a popular reception at Buenos Aires that recalls the pathetic eagerness with which the European peasants and workers acclaimed President Wilson after the Armistice. We trust that the sequel in this case will not be equally unhappy. We go to press several hours before Mr. Roosevelt's speech. The President has a chance to call for a consultative pact, by which the United States and the Latin American countries would get together on their attitude toward a threatened war in the Americas or Europe. He has a chance to get common agreement on neutrality pacts by which war credits would not be extended to European nations at war and war materials would be embargoed. Since the Americas contain much of the oil, tin, copper, and manganese that the war-makers will need, and the meat, wheat, and coffee on which their populations will have to exist, they are in a strategic position to check the war madness in Europe. What makes us rather skeptical is the fact that the American countries have their full share of the tendencies toward fascist barbarism which are sending Europe to destruction. In the short run, however, the pan-American conference may do something to postpone the conflict or temper it when it comes.

THE WAR MAP OF SPAIN CHANGES EVEN AS the correspondents put their dispatches on the wires. Towns move from rebel to loyal hands; the lines of the front waver. The headlines of the past week tell a staccato story of the slow improvement in the government's position. From November 27 to December 1 the heads in the

New York Times, somewhat abbreviated, have run as follows: Rebels Attack Foes on Madrid Flank; Insurgents Appear to Realize Capital Must Be Taken Street by Street if at All. New Army Driving on Rear of Rebels; Reinforced Spanish Leftists Claim Two Villages Taken Southwest of Toledo. Loyalists Aim at Oviedo; Rebel Losses Declared Huge as Miners Drive on Northern City; Defeat of Foe in South Announced, but Rightists Clear Talavera Region. Drive on Capital of Rebels Made by Leftists; Loyalists Extend Gains; Reported 45 Miles from Burgos; New Advance Made Near Oviedo; Other Successes Noted. New Battle Outside Madrid; Rebel Thrust Checked. Meanwhile, to the embarrassment and annoyance of Great Britain and France, the Spanish government has demanded that the Council of the League of Nations meet "to examine the situation" created by the recognition of Franco by Germany and Italy and by their armed intervention. There is no denying that this demand forces an issue that the powers—fascist and otherwise—have sought to avoid. They will probably still manage to do so. But the so-called democratic states will not exorcise the acts or the intentions of the fascist bloc merely by averting their eyes.

IT IS NO ACCIDENT THAT THE AMERICAN Federation of Labor convention in Tampa pinned up a record of reaction that will stand for some time. The effective progressive forces had been suspended for insisting on organizing the unorganized, and though the delegates from state federations and federal and national unions put up an honorable fight, they were hopelessly outnumbered. The convention indorsed legislation for a thirty-hour week but shelved proposals in favor of a constitutional amendment; it rejected proposals for the formation of a labor party; it refused to allow a duly accredited representative of the Spanish trade-union movement to address the delegates; it refused to consider boycotting Hearst, but voted to boycott a union label. With respect to intra-federation questions, it did everything possible to antagonize the rank and file. It continued the C. I. O. suspensions, outlawed the East Coast seamen's strike, and moved to set up a maritime department designed to be a rival to Bridges's Maritime Federation. It moved to restrict the freedom of federal unions, state federations, and central labor unions. These bodies are sensitive to rank-and-file sentiment and therefore tend to be "radical." Apparently the "radicalism" of the Seattle Central Labor Council in backing the strike on the P. I. was the immediate cause of the proposal to restrict freedom of resolution in local labor bodies. Another reason is that they tend to be sympathetic to the C. I. O. In general the A. F. of L. at Tampa gave the impression of crawling into a hole and pulling the hole in after it.

DEVELOPMENTS IN LABOR PARTY POLITICS IN this country are none too reassuring. The decision of the Socialist executive committee to join a national farmer-labor party was an excellent first step. But the approaches made by the Socialist Party of New York to the American Labor Party of the same state have unfortunately been repulsed. The press reports that the executive committee of the American Labor Party has decided not to admit Socialists or Communists either as parties or as individuals except on condition of the dissolution of their parties. If that decision is maintained it may spell disaster for the whole American labor-political movement. Party organizations built up through years of effort cannot be expected to scrap themselves overnight. The executive committee of the American Labor Party will soon have to make definite decisions as to the party structure and organization. Since what happens in New York may have a formative influence upon the labor-political movement in the rest of the country, the committee is faced with a heavy responsibility. It must discharge that responsibility without rancor to former opponents and with a clear eye for building a broad labor-party base throughout the country. This is a problem of immense difficulty and will be discussed more fully in an editorial in next week's Nation. Meanwhile we must say that if the trade unions show themselves incapable of statesmanship, they will not only have missed a chance at political power but will have signed their own death warrants as trade unions.

THE NATION HAS BEEN MANEUVERED INTO A position somewhat like that of the Light Brigade. Cannon to left of us, of short range but great explosive capacity, have trained a barrage on our recent editorial on the methods used in the Moscow trial. This editorial, detonates the New Masses, proved that The Nation is either plain dumb or a tool of the Trotskyites, "an organ of a band of counter-revolutionary conspirators and assassins." The volleys and thunders on the right—showering grape-shot over our editorial on Joseph Shaplen's reporting of the C. I. O.—A. F. of L. fight in the New York Times—emanate from the New Leader, organ of the Socialist Old Guard. Not only were we unfair to Mr. Shaplen, according to the New Leader, but our editorial was scarcely distinguishable from those appearing in the Communist Daily Worker, which wants a split in the labor movement. Either the New Masses or the New Leader must be wrong about us; we can't possibly be Trotskyite assassins, enemies of the Soviet Union, and Communists all at once. The cross-fire from left and right, however, fails to daunt or confuse us. We shall proceed as usual through the Valley of Death, firm in the knowledge that although our adversaries cannot both be right, both can be—and are—wrong.

CHINA IS THE BEST NEWS OF THE WEEK. After four years of turning aside wrath with soft answers, it has suddenly turned and stood its ground. The capture of Pailingmiao, headquarters of Prince Teh, the Japanese-supported ruler of Inner Mongolia, is its first victory since the Nineteenth Route Army's heroic stand at Shanghai in 1932. The invasion of Suiyuan province by Mongolian and Manchoukuoan troops acting as a stalking horse for the Kwantung army was a further step in the march of Japanese expansion. Already in control of eastern Chahar, the Japanese hoped to push westward until their power extended over all of Inner Mongolia. Thus a Japanese wedge would have separated China from Outer Mongolia, that is to say from Soviet Russia, since Outer Mongolia is a Soviet province in all but name. Rudely shocked out of its complacent arrogance by the loss of Pailingmiao, Japan, which had denied that it was concerned in the Suiyuan fighting, threatened to throw the full force of the Kwantung army against the Suiyuanese. In another burst of bravery, China answered that it would permit no interference nor suffer the loss of another inch of territory and even hinted that it might itself take the offensive and push the invaders back into eastern Chahar. Two factors make the Mongolian situation crucial. Chiang Kai-shek has a more unified China behind him, and is master of more arms, territory, and public confidence than at any other time since he came to power. On the other hand, Japan cannot retreat from its policy of expansion. Suiyuan is the focus of issues greater than the fate of Inner Mongolia.

SAINT AND STATESMAN, RESPECTIVELY, ARE the recipients of the Nobel peace prizes for 1935 and 1936. Carl Von Ossietzky, convalescing with unbroken spirit from the rigors of a Nazi concentration camp and a Nazi prison, announced that he hoped in his speech of acceptance to testify anew to his pacifist faith. Carlos Saavedra Lamas, Foreign Minister of Argentina, who won the peace prize for 1936, is a quite different figure from the frail, indomitable German. For a number of years Señor Lamas has been active in the unification of the South American countries against war and has sought to establish on a firm basis the friendship of these countries with the United States. He was the author and instigator of the anti-war pact signed by thirteen American nations including the United States, as well as of the inter-American non-aggression pact of 1933; he organized mediation by six neutral nations in the Chaco war. As presiding officer this year of the Assembly of the League of Nations, Señor Lamas made an unsuccessful attempt to strengthen and reform the League's machinery for peace. Encouraged by the Nobel prize, Señor Lamas may be expected to continue his work of fortifying peace in the Americas.

THE SECOND OF THE AMAZING VAN Sweringen brothers died on November 23, before he had a chance to rebuild the family fortunes. A legend has been built around the Van Sweringens. They were the classic artists of the holding-company device; starting with about two million dollars they pyramided it into a vast railroad empire with assets of three billion. The picture of their holdings will be found crisscrossing the pages of many a treatise on the new arts of corporation finance. In a functional society their ingenuity and single-purposed drive might have been turned to better uses than to win and lose (on paper) a railroad empire. It is symbolic that Oris P. Van Sweringen should have died in harness—he was riding in his own private car on his own railroad; and even more that he should have died in the thick of a Congressional investigation—just as Senator Wheeler's committee was to penetrate the labyrinth of his business structure. The Van Sweringen properties, the key to which lay in the options to purchase the common stock of the Mid-America Corporation, which holds the railroad securities, are now left without any personal tie. And since it was the determination of the brothers that held their roads together, the Van Sweringen railroads are no longer likely to figure as a unit in the four-system consolidation plans that have been proposed for the Eastern territory. Thus ends the short-lived Van Sweringen dynasty—from shoestring to shoestring in a generation.

PEONAGE IN ARKANSAS RECEIVED A SEVERE legal blow on November 25 when Paul D. Peacher, town marshal of Earle, Arkansas, was sentenced in a federal court to two years in prison and a fine of $3,500 for violating the anti-slavery statute. Peacher was accused and convicted of falsely arresting a group of Negroes on charges of vagrancy, merely because they were "loafing" on the street at the time, and forcing them to work out their sentences on his farm. Peacher's attorney, Mr. Lamb, said in summing up that the charges against his client were the result of politics. "There had to be an investigation," he said, "with the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union sending messages to the President and to Governor Futrell and the election coming on." Mr. Lamb also said, complainingly, that he had thought "when the election was over, this lawsuit would be allowed to die out." The S. T. F. U. will no doubt gladly acknowledge its part in the affair, but there are at least two indications that the investigation was an election demonstration. Mr. Peacher was spared the prison sentence and released on bond; the commission appointed by Governor Futrell in the heat of the campaign, when he promised an investigation of farm tenancy right after the election, announced a date for its first session and then canceled the meeting. Attorney General Cummings made sure that the Peacher trial was competently and fairly handled by sending a special representative to the scene. This blow at backwoods dictatorship is to be followed by further attempts to enforce the Bill of Rights by the Workers' Defense League, if it can raise the necessary funds.

AS THE DAWN WAS BREAKING ONE MORNING in Albany last May a lone and energetic gentleman was scurrying between Senate and Assembly rousing the gently snoring legislators to awake and save the country. It was Senator McNaboe gathering votes for an appropriation to investigate "communistic and subversive activities in schools and colleges." In the closing minutes of the session the Senator got his appropriation of $15,000 (cut from $150,000), and he got his committee of three Democrats and three Republicans all set to hold their collective finger in the hole and save the dike from the roaring waters of communism. Public hearings in the inquiry were scheduled for late in October, but on the very morning they were to have opened, an indefinite postponement was announced. Now Senator McNaboe says he will dispense with them altogether and open cold at Albany with his report to the legislature on February 15. In the meantime he is conducting a one-sided public hearing by slinging charges at all the nearest targets, as in his fulminations against Cornell University, the Civil Liberties Union, and the Teachers' Union. No doubt taxpayers need some comic relief, but $15,000 is a lot of money to spend just to allow a Senator to make a spectacle of himself.

*

SIR BASIL ZAHAROFF DIED IN MONTE CARLO on November 27. Newspaper obituary notices remind us that he was a man of mystery; that he was born a poor boy; that he had more power than a king. Actually the "mystery" was a convenient cloak, purchasable only by a man of great wealth, for the unscrupulous manipulation of men and governments. Sir Basil's power resided largely in his money, which he left behind him. If he had virtues, we do not know them. His deeds are writ in gunpowder; they have made their little flash and their transient detonation. For a while we shall probably hear the echo, in romantic novels, in the histories of our era. In time even the echo will die away.

*

FOR THE SECOND CONSECUTIVE WEEK THE Nation appears without a Madrid dispatch from Louis Fischer. In that time no message of any sort has come from Mr. Fischer; and it is probable that he is no longer in Madrid. We earnestly hope that before another issue goes to press we shall have heard from him. Meanwhile we are making every effort, through the Spanish Ministry of War, to find out our correspondent's whereabouts and assure ourselves and our readers of his safety.

Bigness and the Chain Stores

REPRESENTATIVE WRIGHT PATMAN'S article in last week's Nation, defending his anti-price-discrimination measure, raised a set of issues that cut deeply at the basic structure of our industrial life. Many business men have regarded the Patman Act as the modern embodiment of the Antichrist, because it interferes with their setting their own prices. But the act must be seen historically not as an isolated measure—whether devil or angel—but as part of the third phase of the American handling of the problem of bigness in business. The first phase, after the supine laissez faire experience of the nineteenth century, was the Sherman anti-trust legislation of 1890, with its attendant trust-busting. The second was the Federal Trade Commission legislation of 1914, intermittently enforced and aiming chiefly at publicity of accounts and the maintenance of ethical business standards. The third phase began with the NRA legislation of 1933, and established the principle of the self-regulation of industry, the maintenance of price levels within it, and its internal conformity to some established principle of uniformity and discipline. The dissolution of the NRA left this third phase incomplete and left those sections of industry which had relied upon the NRA stranded and anxious for something to replace it. They saw the Patman Act and grasped for it eagerly.

How did it happen to be so handy? The fact was that the inadequacy of the existing Federal Trade Commission and anti-trust machinery for combating price discrimination had for some time been recognized. What made it the more glaring was the enormous growth of chain stores and mail-order houses. This had been going on through the entire decade of the 1920's, and was accentuated after 1929 when the depression made every saved penny loom more important than ever. The chains were obviously crowding the independent merchants out of business—in groceries, meats, dry goods, clothing, variety goods, drugs, confectionery, tobacco, shoes, and furniture—in short, over the entire range of the daily staples of life. And with every step in the growth of the power of the chains, the protest against them grew in volume and intensity. Hostility in the local communities soon was translated into hostile legislation in the state capitals. The most obvious device was the discriminatory tax, exempting the single store and steeply graduated with the size of the chain or the volume of sales. But here the legislatures were reckoning without the Supreme Court, which invalidated the tax measures. Nothing was left but direct regulatory action by Congress.

It was the last Hoover Congress that called for an investigation of chain-store activities by the Federal Trade Commission. The investigation took three years and cost the government a very considerable sum. It produced thirty-three factual reports on every phase of chain-store costs, wages, profits, prices, operation, and financial structure, along with a final report containing the commission's conclusions. While carefully done, cautiously phrased, and hemmed around with qualifications, these reports bolstered on the whole the case against the chain stores. They brought considerable evidence to indicate that the price spread between the chains and the independents was a broad one, that its sources lay in lower costs extracted from manufacturers, lower wages, and unethical and discriminatory practices, as well as in operation economies. On the basis of such a report it was not difficult to get Congressional action. The facts were there; the sentiment from the constituencies was there; a powerful lobby was there in the form of retail merchants' associations, wholesale grocers' and druggists' associations, and trade associations of all sorts; finally, a leader was there—Representative Wright Patman of Texas—with energy and tenacity, equipped with a Bryanesque populist doctrine of unusual persuasiveness, and a veteran of the lobby technique through his successful championing of the veterans' bonus. The combination of fact, sentiment, lobby, and leader was irresistible; the collapse of the NRA made the moment a strategic one; and the Robinson-Patman Act was the result.

With such a history it was inevitable that the act should have stirred up great antagonisms, and should in the end be ambiguous. In its form it supplants and supplements various sections of the Clayton Act of 1914. In its procedure it works through the Federal Trade Commission and grants that body greater powers than it has thus far exercised. In its intent it aims at chain stores and mail-order houses. In its structure it is cast in such general terms that it affects cooperatives as well, and may even limit severely the day-to-day activities of business. Its general consequence is clear. By prohibiting price discriminations, rebates, and unwarranted discounts it introduces a price rigidity into an economic structure that has on the whole had a good deal of price flexibility. It throws a lifeline to the wholesalers and other middlemen, who were on the way to becoming as extinct a race as the Indians or the bison, and might like them have ended up secure only when embossed on our coins. But above all, it gives the independent storekeeper another chance at survival in a universe that had become increasingly hostile to him.

These results will prove palatable or otherwise depending on one's economic interests and the resulting economic philosophy one has. Our own concern is chiefly on three scores: the interests of the consumer, the interests of the worker, and the revolt against bigness in business. That the chain stores sold at lower prices than the independents is admitted by both sides. Where the quarrel lies is in the explanation of this price margin. The chains claim that it arises from cutting down middlemen costs and from large-scale buying and operating economies. The independents claim that it arises, first, from the whip hand that the chains have over the manufacturers, forcing them to cut their wage payments and profit margins, and, second, from underpaying and sweating their own labor. If action had to be taken, the statistical analyses in the Federal Trade Commission reports were probably as good as any to base that action on. But a critical examination of those figures does not always leave us with clear-cut conclusions, and the later census figures often blur those conclusions further. The consumer will undoubtedly have to pay for the Patman Act in the form of higher prices. Whether he will get all or part of that differential back in higher wages and greater community prosperity is problematic. Ultimately the justification of the Patman Act will have to be found in broad social rather than in specifically economic terms.

This raises the final question of bigness in business. The nineteenth century believed in free competition, unhindered and unaided by government. That faith has vanished before the onslaught of the giant corporation and the machine process. The whole set-up of industry is now hostile to competition: we have to legislate it into existence, and the Patman Act is part of that legislative effort. Here is the paradox that strikes at the heart of our whole system of a controlled capitalism. We depend on the profit motive to organize industry, but we set bounds to it by extra-pecuniary considerations which are of course foreign to business men's minds. We personalize the hostile forces in what is probably the most impersonal economic structure the world has ever seen, and instead of fighting the profit system we fight the chain store, the public-utility magnate, the investment banker, who have learned all too well the lessons of the profit system. There is the school of thought, led by Justice Brandeis (see his vigorous dissent in the Liggett chain-store tax case), which feels that bigness in business under capitalism is developing a lopsided human race, specialized only to take in money, and that even in such terms it has outgrown our capacities to control it. For the men at the top, it calls for more capacities than they can muster; for the men at the bottom, it provides them with no chance to use the capacities they may have. With this view we tend to agree. But a close examination of the Patman attempt to break up the big chain structures leads us to feel that the remedy does not really reach the disease. The road to control would seem to lie not in seeking to enforce competition but in socializing industry.

The Fascist Front

WITH the report that Italy and Japan have reached an agreement recognizing each other's conquests, the final steps in consolidating a four-power fascist united front have now been taken. In the past fortnight the fascist international program has developed with bewildering rapidity. Before the world could grasp the full implications of the Ciano-Hitler agreement over Austria, the two great fascist powers announced their open support of the Spanish rebels. Scarcely a week later Ambassador von Ribbentrop signed an "anti-Communist" pact with Japan which is generally believed to involve a secret military alliance directed against the Soviet Union. The Italian-Japanese accord closes the last gap in the fascist front.

While these official announcements have only confirmed agreements long known to exist, they are bound to have far-reaching effects. The fascist powers have thrown away the last pretense of legality; they stand brazenly defiant of all the laws and conventions which have hitherto been acknowledged by civilized nations. There can be neither moral nor legal justification for the recognition of the Spanish insurgents. The rebels had risen against a government which had just received an overwhelming popular mandate at the polls. The fascist powers had not even the pretext of recognizing a successful de facto regime. But fascists need no justifications; they merely act. Similarly, the Italian-Japanese agreement is a clear defiance of the League of Nations, of which Italy is still a member. In recognizing the illegal seizures of Manchuria and Ethiopia it declares that force is superior to law.

As long as these alliances were secret and the glorification of force camouflaged by a sham legality, the democratic states could find pretexts for refusing to face reality. This is no longer possible. The fascist powers have come out flatly against law and have sanctioned aggression. No country desiring peace can ignore the challenge. Even groups which have been unbending in their hatred of communism have begun to recognize that fascism is the greatest immediate threat to world peace. The apparent unanimity with which this conclusion has been reached by responsible conservatives in both Great Britain and the United States is at least partly accounted for by the bad timing of the German-Japanese anti-Communist pact. While mildly skeptical, the Anglo-Saxon world has been impressed by the new Soviet constitution. Its bill of rights and its provision for a bi-cameral legislature and direct election of high officials are essential elements in democratic procedure as it is understood in this country and England. Nor can it be said that the new constitution is merely a political gesture calculated to win the sympathy of the democratic countries in the Soviets' hour of peril. Not only has it actually been in the process of drafting for many months; it is the logical outcome of economic and social forces that have been at work for years. Fundamentally, as Stalin pointed out, the new constitution is a recognition of the disappearance of the class antagonisms which have overshadowed Russian life for decades.

Other evidences of bad timing and bad strategy may be found in the fact that the fascist powers offer their new threat to British and French interests just when those countries were seeking to close their eyes to the Nazi menace and accommodate themselves to the faits accomplis in Europe. That even the Germans recognize their blunder is evidenced by the fact that their press has broken out in a rash of reassurances to Britain that the German-Japanese pact is a harmless affair. But this has not prevented Britain and France from strengthening their military ties and adopting a more aggressive tone. As for America, the entrance of Japan into the scheme of fascist power must make a vast difference in our foreign policy. However Russia may be feared by the capitalist powers in Europe, it is Japan and not Russia that is feared here, both by our military groups and by certain sections of our population. Germany could not have chosen a more effective way of alienating whatever American sympathy may have existed for its plans.

If the announcement of the new fascist international does not bring the world closer to war, it will be because the dictators have overreached themselves. The solid phalanx of fascist powers is dangerous only as long as it is directed against one or two powers. The fascist dream of empire does not involve a crusade against all benighted countries simultaneously. Both the Tanaka Memorial and Hitler's "Mein Kampf" envisage a gradual program in which the desired regions are picked off one at a time. The new alliances make such tactics increasingly difficult. France, surrounded on three sides, is likely to strengthen rather than abandon its agreement with the Soviet Union. Great Britain has the choice of surrendering all influence in Europe, the Mediterranean, and the Far East or of strengthening its ties with the anti-fascist powers. Even the United States, because of the growing Japanese threat in the Far East, is drawn closer to Great Britain and the Soviet Union. Alliances breed counter-alliances, and the necessity for mutual defense can reconcile, temporarily at least, even the deepest antagonisms.

Although there are disquieting reports from the Soviet-Manchurian border, the first real test of the fascists' new policy will probably come in Spain. Since the rebels have virtually no navy, it is evident that the threatened rebel blockade of Barcelona will be carried out, if at all, by Italian and German vessels, assisted by fascist airplanes.

Such intervention would be a gross infringement of the League Covenant as well as a violation of the Pact of Paris. Inaction in face of such provocation would not only doom the League but seriously impair French, British, and Soviet interests in the Mediterranean. No one can predict with any certainty what would happen in case such a blockade were actually imposed. If irritation could lead to a determined effort to resurrect the League, there might still be hope of establishing a mechanism for keeping the fascist powers in check. But if, as is more likely, it leads only to an intensification of the armament race, we may expect war within a comparatively short period.

Battling for the TVA

WHILE the government and the private interests wrangle and bicker over the vexed problems of power distribution in the Tennessee Valley, the consumers themselves have suddenly emerged as an organized factor in the situation—one that may produce startling results for both sides. A conference of municipalities, called by the Chattanooga Electric Power Board and attended by delegates from some 160 towns and cities in five states, is at this moment meeting in Chattanooga to consider the power problem as it affects the electricity consumers of the Valley, and to form a permanent organization to represent their interests in the future.

The idea of the conference grew out of the power-pool negotiations at the White House in September. The results of that meeting were regarded with skepticism by most of the public-power leaders in the Valley, particularly the decision to extend for three months the "hands-off" agreement between the TVA and the Commonwealth and Southern. That decision hit Chattanooga especially hard. Early in September, just before the White House conference, the TVA and the City of Chattanooga seemed to be on the verge of concluding a power contract after six months of negotiation. The city had, in fact, signed the contract, and the document had been returned to Knoxville for the signature of A. E. Morgan, chairman of the Authority. But he delayed signing, without giving any adequate reason. Then the news of the power-pool proposal broke. The local power board went to Knoxville and agreed, after talking with Dr. Morgan and David E. Lilienthal, power director of the TVA, to wait until early in February for a contract. But they were far from happy about the situation. Although convinced that Lilienthal was in sympathy with them and opposed to the truce with the C. and S., they felt that Morgan was hostile. At a meeting with Lilienthal held immediately after the Knoxville conference the idea of a meeting of municipalities was born.

Whatever may be the effect of the present conference on the TVA, one thing is certain: the public-power leaders in the Valley are backing Lilienthal in his differences with Morgan and will fight any power-pool plan that would sacrifice the TVA rate schedule or suppress municipal distribution systems.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Our Ambassador to Moscow

Washington, November 29

ONCE upon a time there was a Great Man and he was elected President of the United States. His name was Franklin D. Roosevelt, and high among the reasons that many were sure he was a Great Man was belief in him as not only a determined but also an effective peacemaker who would keep this nation out of war and, of necessity, do the same for the rest of the world. It was hard to see why they so regarded him. There was nothing in his public utterances that had not also been said at one time or another by Small Men who had occupied the White House without gaining the people's trust, and he had permitted his chief aides in the military and naval branches of the government frequently to rattle their spurs and sabers in public without reprimand or contradiction.

Nevertheless, the popular belief in his zeal and ability so increased during the first three and a half years he occupied the White House that when he recently sailed for the Buenos Aires conference he carried with him not only the hopes but also the expectations of many liberals and radicals that at the conference he would somehow produce a formula to avert the cataclysm impending in a world plainly headed toward a new barbarism. These hopes and expectations were not dimmed by the character of the delegation he sent ahead of him to Buenos Aires, a delegation including Sumner Welles, a man with a boundless lust but with little talent for Latin American intrigue who, as Assistant Secretary of State, has been largely responsible for this government's manhandling of the Cuban political situation. These hopes and expectations—surviving the fact that the Chaco dispute cannot even be mentioned in the agenda and that, though the conference must deal with forces that are world wide, Europe, Asia, Africa, and even a part of the Americas, Canada, have been excluded—refuse, it seems, even to be dimmed by the appointment of Joseph Edward Davies as Ambassador to the U. S. S. R., an event announced just after Roosevelt sailed.

The connection between the Davies appointment and Roosevelt's impending performance at Buenos Aires may seem a little obscure at first, but the link is easily revealed. The Buenos Aires conference is important only in relation to the peace of the world, and the peace of the world at the moment all too plainly hangs upon the fate of Soviet Russia and the plans of its enemies—German, Japanese, Italian, French, British, and Polish—to destroy it. It is already apparent that the ruling classes of those European nations which thus far have escaped militant fascism and retain some vestiges of democracy prefer even the German or Italian brand of fascism to communism, and to save their own skins will join Hitler and Mussolini, if necessary, in an assault upon the U. S. S. R. It is not their souls, their intelligence, or their consciences that betray these men but their vested interests and their prejudices. In such a situation it is vitally important, if the United States is to play a potent role as peacemaker and peacekeeper, that this government have at Moscow as ambassador a man profoundly conversant with the complex forces now bearing remorselessly upon that point and, above all, a man of true impartiality. Instead, Roosevelt has chosen in Davies a blood brother to the Edens, Baldwins, and Laval of this world. One might even add Blum to that list, for Davies, though never a Socialist, was at least a La Follette supporter in his youth, and during the Wilson Administration played a role not unlike that of the Landises, Richbergs, and Tugwells in the Roosevelt Administration. Davies is so far from having a profound knowledge of or interest in the Russian situation that there is strong reason to doubt that he wanted the Moscow post. For nearly a year gossip over Washington tea tables has hummed with tales of how Davies, at the behest of his immensely wealthy wife, was angling for an ambassadorship at some gayer capital—Paris, in particular. To be sure, it was gossip, but in such matters gossip has a strange veracity; Washington's society editors scooped the pants off the State Department correspondents in reporting the various steps in Davies's progression toward Moscow, and for at least part of the time their tea-table sources proved more accurate than those the Assistant Secretaries of State were able to tap either at the White House or in their own department.

It was more than a year ago that the society reporters first picked up the story that Davies, a wealthy lawyer-lobbyist, was seeking an ambassadorship. At the same time they picked up the story that he was going to marry Mrs. Marjorie Post Close Hutton, heiress of the $20,000,000 cornflake and Postum fortune, who was then in Reno divorcing her second husband, E. F. Hutton, a Liberty Leaguer and uncle to Barbara Hutton, the Woolworth princess; that Davies was simultaneously engaged in letting his wife, Emlen Knight Davies, get a Nevada divorce from him; and that his daughter, Mrs. Thomas P. Cheeseborough, Jr., was in Reno getting a divorce in order to marry Senator Tydings, of Maryland. The three divorces and the subsequent marriages came off as scheduled by the gossips, who also, according to the society reporters, listed Davies's impending ambassadorship as a sort of dowry his bride-to-be required. When Davies gave an elaborate dinner for Laboulaye, the French ambassador, the fact was seized upon as evidence that it was the Paris post he sought, and this assumption gained in strength when State Department attachés let it be known that the dinner had been so interpreted by Cordell Hull and that the Secretary of State had been exceedingly annoyed by it. When at a later stage the society reporters scrambled into their offices crying, "He's got it! He's got it!"—meaning that Davies had cinched an ambassadorship—State Department attachés pooh-poohed the report and recalled Hull's anger over the Laboulaye dinner. That was months ago, and Hull's aides were still belittling the reports up to six weeks before Davies's appointment was announced. In the interim, however, at least one Assistant Secretary of State had lost his early confidence that Davies would never achieve an ambassadorship; what changed his mind, as he said, was that "at Palm Beach they already are calling her [the new Mrs. Davies] 'the ambassadress.'" Now the talk around the tea tables is that Roosevelt expects that Moscow will prove too restricted a field for Mrs. Davies's lavish tastes in entertaining and that the new ambassador, therefore, will give up the post within a year.

Exactly what attitude Davies takes toward the European situation in general and Russia in particular cannot be determined, for the responsibilities of his new office keep his lips sealed. However, since all the important factors in that attitude are bound to have been shaped by his financial interests and past associations, what it is may be deduced from such things as the character of the group that turned out as his intimate friends to witness his oath-taking in Hull's office. The group included, in addition to Mrs. Davies and two ropes of pearls, Dan Roper, Pat Harrison, Jesse Jones, Tydings, Joe Tumulty, Merle Thorpe, mouthpiece of the Hoover era's overlords, and Harry Covington, a rich product of the Alien Property Custodian's office. Davies's attitude may also be deduced from his description of himself as "a corporation lawyer of liberal outlook" and from the fact that, in addition to being one of the representatives here of the A. T. and T., he also has been among the legal brains behind the creation of the National Dairy Products Corporation. There is something significant, too, in the fact that he has been American counsel and fiscal adviser to Trujillo, the Dominican despot, and that, though he is unquestionably one of the most successful lawyers practicing in Washington, his activities in that respect have gone almost unnoticed through the years and he is known not as a good lawyer but as a clever one. His field marshal is Alfons B. Landa, a son-in-law of one of Washington's most famous big-time lobbyists, Frank Mondel, and one of his favorite golfing companions at the Burning Tree Club is the President's secretary, Marvin McIntyre, bosom pal of nearly all lobbyists. It also is not without meaning that he appears to have clinched his new job by raising $100,000 offhand for the Roosevelt campaign at a time when Roosevelt and his aides were none too certain of victory; that he let himself be married to Mrs. Hutton in the seventy-room apartment on East Ninety-second Street in New York given her by her second husband; and that the "Angel of Hell's Kitchen"—as he would like to have his wife known for her philanthropies—bedecked the apartment for the occasion with 5,000 chrysanthemums that had been dyed blush pink at a cost of $2,000 to match the icing on the 300-pound wedding cake which the establishment's twenty-five servants, assisted by three caterers, served the fifty wedding guests. From this it would seem that the liberalism of the American embassy at Moscow henceforth will be describable only in French—not left but gauche.

Sitdown

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

IN THE last ten years or so much has been written, here and abroad, about the rapid "robotization" of labor in mass-production industries. Various alleged students of the worker "on the belt" have concluded that he was rapidly ceasing to be a normal human being. He was helpless, docile, machine-like. But this was an exaggeration. All the manhood is not stamped and squeezed out of the industrial worker—certainly not out of the rubber worker in Akron.

The rubber worker in Akron may be a so-called hill-billy from West Virginia, or a mountaineer from Tennessee or North Carolina, or a husky Negro from Georgia or Alabama, or a Pole, a Croatian, a Lithuanian, an Italian, a Hungarian, or a native Ohio or Pennsylvania farm boy, or a young man born right in Akron, with a high-school education. During the boom years, 1910 to 1929, when his productivity increased 300 per cent, he made, besides millions and millions of automobile tires and mountains of other rubber goods, 120 millionaires.

With the 1929 crash thousands of native rubber workers left Akron for the hills of West Virginia and the states further south; some of the foreign-born returned to their old countries or moved elsewhere in the United States; other thousands went into the queues in front of private-relief offices. But tens of thousands stayed. Those who retained their jobs lived in fear of losing them. When the New Deal came along, the accumulated discontent found a healthy expression in unionization, which was obstructed and inhibited by the A. F. of L. fakers in every way possible. During the NRA period, however, a militant and intelligent rank-and-file movement developed which ultimately overcame the A. F. of L. "organizers," forced them out of Akron, and took over the United Rubber Workers of America, now one of the healthiest unions in the country and an important member of the Committee for Industrial Organization.

The rank-and-file movement really got under way in a curious and peculiarly American way. The story goes that one Sunday afternoon a couple of baseball teams composed of workers employed in two big rubber factories suddenly refused to play a scheduled game because they found out that the umpire—to whom some of them objected, incidentally, also as a person and an umpire—was not a union man. The players just sat down literally, some on the grass, others on the benches beneath the grandstand, while the crowd, consisting mainly of workingmen—partly “for the hell of it” and partly in seriousness—yelled for an umpire who was a union member, cheered the NIRA, and generally raised a merry din, till the non-union umpire withdrew and a union man called the game. It is said that the expression “sitdown” was first used in the discussions that followed that game.

Not long afterward a petty dispute over a point in working conditions developed between the workers and the superintendent of a department in one of the great rubber factories. The superintendent would not yield and, annoyed, made an indiscreet remark which angered the workers in question; about a dozen in all. They had been on the verge of dropping their demand or complaint, whatever it was; now, remembering the sitdown at the ball game, one of them blurted out, “Aw, to hell with ‘im, let’s sit down!” And they sat down.

In a few minutes several other departments of the extremely complex and delicately organized production process in the factory, which employed 7,000 men, were in a mess. What had happened? The question was asked all over the plant. The answer quickly spread through the place: There was a sitdown in such-and-such a department! A sitdown? Yeah, a sitdown; don’t you know what a sitdown is, you dope? Like what happened at the ball game the other Sunday!

Hundreds of workers who did not know what the sitdown was about but who belonged more or less to the rank-and-file element experienced a thrill. A sitdown in the plant! In no time the most important departments of the factory were at a standstill. Thousands of workers sat down. Some because they wanted to, more because everything stopped anyhow.

And sitting by their machines, caldrons, boilers, and work benches, they talked. Some realized for the first time how important they were in the process of rubber production. Twelve men had practically stopped the works! Almost any dozen or score of them could do it! In some departments six could do it! The active rank-and-filers, scattered through the various sections of the plant, took the initiative in saying, “We’ve got to stick with ‘em!” And they stuck with them, union and non-union men alike. Most of them were non-union. Some probably were vaguely afraid not to stick. Some were bewildered. Others amused. There was much laughter through the works. Oh boy, oh boy! Just like at the ball game, no kiddin’. There the crowd had stuck with the players and they got an umpire who was a member of a labor union. Here everybody stuck with the twelve guys who first sat down, and the factory management was beside itself. Superintendents, foremen, and straw bosses were dashing about. They looked funny, these corporals, sergeants, and shavetails of industry. Telephones were ringing all over the plant. This sudden suspension of production was costing the company many dollars every minute. . . . In less than an hour the dispute which had led to the sitdown was settled—full victory for the men!

Walking out of the factory gates that evening, the men laughed. They told the night shift about it. The thing got into the Akron newspapers. There was no little talk about the affair, most of it perhaps, to the effect that the sitdown was a good joke on the factory management. The rank-and-file leaders, some of whom were more or less leftist, others mainly inspired by the New Deal and its Section 7-a, did their best to keep the talk going. They reiterated that, as had been demonstrated by the sitdown on the baseball diamond and the sitdown in the factory, workers could get somewhere only collectively, by sticking and working together. The thing to do was to join the unions. Many did join and new federal unions were organized.

Some of the leftist rank-and-filers realized that the sitdown might have revolutionary implications or possibilities—workers stopping production, sitting down, and taking possession of plants! So many of them, free-lance agitators without authority from any union, what the bosses called “trouble-makers,” began to encourage sitdowns. Working in various departments in the several Akron rubber plants, they subtly organized sitdowns when disputes arose. As a result of late there have been scores of sitdowns, some lasting only an hour or even less, others several hours or most of the day, running into the next shift; and a few stretching over two, three, four, or more days, thus becoming “stay-ins.”

Some sitdowns tied up production only in parts of a given factory, others paralyzed the whole plant. When the sitdowns became longer, the men sitting in their working places took to whiling away the time by playing cards or checkers, telling yarns, singing, or reading. Some of them simply stretched on the benches or on the floor and went to sleep. When a sitdown ran into the next shift, the incoming workers relieved the old shift and did the same thing—sat, talked, sang, played cards or checkers, and slept on the floor—till the dispute that had produced the sitdown was settled; or else they gave their dinner pails to the sitters-down and went home—which made the sitdown a stay-in.

Of course, like the original sitdown, several sitdowns—perhaps a majority of them—in the Akron rubber plants have occurred without encouragement from any rank-and-file organizer. They have been sudden, spontaneous affairs, springing out of immediate conditions in a department.

Nearly all the sitdowns have been effective, winning the demands of the men who started them. So far as I know, only one or two have fizzled out. The men in other departments almost invariably back the initiators of the sitdown. Why? Let me give a list of the virtues and advantages of the sitdown as a method of labor aggression from the point of view not so much of the rank-and-file organizer or radical agitator as of the average workingman in a mass-production industry like rubber.

1. The sitdown is the reverse of sabotage, to which many workers are opposed. It destroys nothing. Before shutting down a department in a rubber plant, for instance, the men take the compounded rubber from the mills, or they finish building or curving the tires then being built or curved, so that nothing is needlessly ruined. Taking the same precautions during the sitdown as they do during production, the men do not smoke in departments where benzine is used. There is no drinking. This discipline—of which more in a moment—is instinctive.

2. To say, as did a New York Times reporter, writing from Akron last winter, that the sitdown "resembles the old Oriental practice of passive resistance" is a bit far-fetched, but it probably is a sort of development of the old I. W. W. "folded-arm" strike and of "striking on the job"; only it is better, manlier than the latter, which required men to pretend they were working, and to accomplish as little as possible without being discharged, which was more fatiguing than to work according to one's capacity, as well as contrary to the natural inclinations of the best class of workers.

3. The sitdown is the reverse of the ordinary strike. When a sitdown is called, a man does not walk out; he stays in, implying that he is willing to work if——

4. Workers' wives generally object to regular strikes, which often are long, sometimes violent and dangerous, and as likely as not end in sell-outs and defeat. Sitdowns are quick, short, and free of violence. There are no strike-breakers in the majority of instances; the factory management does not dare to get tough and try to drive the sitting men out and replace them with other workers, for such violence would turn the public against the employers and the police, and might result in damage to costly machinery. In a sitdown there are no picket-lines outside the factories, where police and company gunmen have great advantage when a fight starts. The sitdown action occurs wholly inside the plant, where the workers, who know every detail of the interior, have obvious advantages. The sitters-down organize their own "police squads," arming them—in rubber—with crowbars normally used to pry open molds in which tires are curved. These worker cops patrol the belt, watch for possible scabs, and stand guard near the doors. In a few instances where city police and gunmen have entered a factory, they were bewildered, frightened, and driven out by the "sitting" workers with no difficulty whatever.

5. Most workers distrust—if not consciously, then unconsciously—union officials and strike leaders and committees, even when they themselves have elected them. The beauty of the sitdown or the stay-in is that there are no leaders or officials to distrust. There can be no sell-out. Such standard procedure as strike sanction is hopelessly obsolete when workers drop their tools, stop their machines, and sit down beside them. The initiative, conduct, and control of the sitdown come directly from the men involved.

6. The fact that the sitdown gives the worker in mass-production industries a vital sense of importance cannot be overemphasized. Two sitdowns which completely tied up plants employing close to 10,000 men were started by half a dozen men each. Imagine the feeling of power those men experienced! And the thousands of workers who sat down in their support shared that feeling in varying degrees, depending on their individual power of imagination. One husky gum-miner said to me, "Now we don't feel like taking the sass of any snot-nose college-boy foreman." Another man said, "Now we know our labor is more important than the money of the stockholders, than the gambling in Wall Street, than the doings of the managers and foremen." The sitdown technique is still in the process of development, but already one man's grievance, if the majority of his fellow-workers in his department agree that it is a just grievance, can tie up the whole plant. He becomes a strike leader; the other members of the working force in his department become members of the strike committee. They assume full responsibility in the matter: form their own patrols, keep the machines from being pointlessly destroyed, and meet with the management and dictate their terms. They turn their individual self-control and restraint into group self-discipline—which probably is the best aspect of the sitdown. They settle the dispute, not some outsider.

7. Work in most of the departments of a rubber factory or any other kind of mass-production factory is drudgery of the worst sort—mechanical and uncreative, insistent and requiring no imagination; and any interruption is welcomed by workers, even if only subconsciously. The conscious part of their mind may worry about the loss of pay; their subconscious, however, doesn't care a whit about that. The sitdown is dramatic, thrilling.

8. All these factors were important in the early sitdowns. They still are important. In addition now there is in Akron the three-year-old tradition that when a sitdown begins anywhere along the line of production everybody else is to sit down, too. And while we are explaining the men's solidarity in sitdowns, we mustn't forget also that the average worker in a mass-production plant is full of grievances and complaints, some of them hardly realized, and he knows or feels instinctively that when he and his fellow-workers get ready to act, they will need the support of all the labor in the place, and they will get it only if they back the men who have initiated the current sitdown.

9. The sitdown is a purely democratic action, as democracy is understood in America within the capitalist system.

10. The sitdown is a social affair. Sitting workers talk. They get acquainted. And they like that. In a regular strike it is impossible to bring together under one roof more than one or two thousand people, and these only for a meeting, where they do not talk with one another but listen to speakers. A rubber sitdown holds under the same roof up to ten or twelve thousand idle men, free to talk among themselves, man to man. "Why, my God, man," one Goodyear gum-miner told me, "during the sitdowns last spring I found out that the guy who works next to me is the same as I am, even if I was born in West Virginia and he is from Poland. His problems are the same. Why shouldn't we stick?"

[This is the first of two articles on the sitdown. The second, dealing with the current importance and the probable future of sitdown strikes, will appear in the next issue. A letter by Mr. Adamic pertaining to these articles is printed on page 687.]

Fascist Terror in Majorca

BY A REFUGEE

[The article which appears below was written by a German, formerly resident in the Spanish island of Majorca and now living in Switzerland. Although it describes the events of the first weeks of the Spanish revolution, it is interesting as one of the few news stories that have come out of the island.]

THE rebellion on the island started on the night of July 18. Although the Socialists had, of course, heard radio accounts of General Franco's rebellion and had been advised by a few of the older men to expect trouble at home, they were quite unprepared to defend themselves. Incredibly enough, they made no attempt to conceal party documents or to disguise party activities, much less to prepare for armed resistance. On July 19, therefore, the rebels were able to enter party headquarters without a serious struggle. There was some shooting, particularly in the early morning hours, but the Socialists were so hopelessly outnumbered that their abortive attempt at counter-revolution was quickly checked. Marques de Zayas, leader of the fascists—the so-called National Syndicalist Party of the young Spanish Workers—had been in prison with many of his followers at the fortress of San Carlos after an attack on Socialist headquarters a few weeks before. De Zayas was at once released. Later on San Carlos was used as a place of execution for the "reds." The People's House became the headquarters of the Blue Shirts; the newly established women's section was stationed at the Izquierda Republicana, the house of Azaña's party. At once a Balilla group was formed and small boys with loaded revolvers were seen everywhere. As the lists of members of the Socialist Party had been taken by the fascists, it was a simple matter to clean out the enemy. In the small towns and villages no lists were needed; everybody's political opinion was known to his neighbors. Many hundreds of men were thrown into prison and concentration camps; other hundreds were shot out of hand. Some escaped into the mountains, where they hid for a while, but later they were forced to give themselves up or commit suicide. The fascist searching parties were relentless; supported by the Guardia Civile they watched every pass and port. Fishing boats were not permitted to put out, and motor boats patrolled the island.

A railroad tunnel leads from the port of Palma under the town and up to the railway station at Soller. A number of fleeing workers had hidden in the tunnel. At the risk of their lives relatives brought food to the tunnel's entrance, and the men inside devised a little cart to draw it up by. The hiding place was discovered. The Blue Shirts manned an engine with young men armed with rifles and pistols, and sent it along the tunnel. Those inside who were not killed by bullets were crushed beneath the wheels.

The story of Manuel, the son of my washerwoman, is typical. Manuel was the leader of a small Communist cell in the little village near Palma where I lived. He was known as an industrious, thoughtful man and an idealist. At the beginning of the revolution he fled to the mountains. For weeks the fascists searched for him; for weeks his family was threatened with death if they did not reveal his hiding-place. But they remained silent. In the middle of August the fascists ordered five of Manuel's best friends to bring him in dead or alive. The friends joined Manuel to tell him the bad news and prepared their own escape. But Manuel sent them home again; he wanted to think about the whole matter and assured them that he would give them a sign. He did, the next morning. His body was found shortly after dawn by a friend of mine, a Swedish aviator, hanging from a fig tree. He had not wanted his friends to be sacrificed for him. The body was brought to Palma and buried, although his family was not permitted to know where. The women did not dare to wear mourning, except his mother, who wore black earrings. There was no express prohibition against mourning, but it was thought to be dangerous. General Queipo de Llano declared black garments for mourning to be a sin against the Holy Ghost and inharmonious with the white lily of the Virgin Mary, for whose glorification this holy war was being fought.

The prisons were soon filled to overflowing, and various fortresses and even ships docked in the port were used as concentration camps. At first the fascists guarded the prisoners, but they killed so many with bullets and castor oil that the military governor was forced to order a guard of soldiers. Families learned of the death of relatives only by accident. It was forbidden on pain of death to listen to broadcasts from the government station or from any foreign station. A small radio station founded by Captain Homar, a member of an old aristocratic family and a thorough fascist, had the exclusive right to broadcast. I met the captain in the winter of 1932, and I was surprised to see that even then the fascist salute was used by him and his associates. In the summer of 1933 Homar told me that Majorca must have its own radio station, since he was convinced that it was only a matter of time before General Franco would seize power.

In spite of the prohibition, people persisted in listening to the forbidden stations. Dozens of times I have listened in at the home of an Andalusian workman. Sometimes there would be more than a dozen persons gathered around the radio, which was under the roof in an old barn. The room was lined with blankets, and we all sweltered under a heavy rug. In Palma alone there were seven clandestine broadcasting stations, in direct communication with the Ministry of War in Madrid or with Barcelona. Six of these broadcasters were discovered and shot within a week. The seventh had not been found when we left the island. Every motor, cart, or other vehicle was searched, for it was suspected that the secret station was on the move.

The Majorcans on the rebel side were constantly stiffened by the promise of German and Italian help. Juan March, the famous Majorcan millionaire, owner of the Banca March, announced he would buy German airplanes and present them to his country. The population was heavily taxed for foreign planes, and since payment had to be in gold, gold articles were exchanged for dubious paper. Every day the papers published lists of donors, with the amount of gold or jewels they had given. The gifts were all holy. The lists read like this: For the immaculately conceived Mother of God and for the continuation of the war—a gold chain; for the Holy Friend of Children and our courageous Blue Shirts—a gold ring; for the Holy Trinity and the downfall of the heathen—and so on. There were always numerous items about the heathen. One day the island newspapers published the news that a shipload of Turks had landed at Formentor, threatening Christians with their curved swords. This opened the purses and the gold poured out.

The first plane bought with this gold flew over Palma in the middle of August, greeted with frenzied shouts by the people. The fascists cried "Arriba España!"; the monarchists cried "Viva España"; and a few of the happier ones saluted the German plane with "Heil Hitler!" Unfortunately two of the first three planes were damaged in an air attack a day or so after they appeared.

From the day of the first delivery of arms, the German and Italian sailors were the pets of the island. They were showered with flowers and presents, and were to be seen everywhere walking arm in arm with Spaniards. The Italian and German colonies relished this appreciation of the "great fascist world powers." Strangely enough, the flag of the Reich was seldom seen. I saw the swastika only three times. Almost everybody in Palma displayed the Italian flag.

On August 16 Captain Bayo, coming from Barcelona, disembarked the first troops of the anti-fascist militia at the small harbor of Porto Cristo on Majorca. The vanguard had landed the night before and the contingent was welcomed with real joy by the people. Sardanas and boleros were danced in the streets and everybody was in good humor. When the news of the "invasion of pirates" reached Palma several hours later, the people were not told that the "pirates" were 6,000 government troops with all necessary accoutrements of war. The inhabitants, therefore, joined with the troops to repulse the attackers, who were described as a few hundred criminals, mostly black-bearded Russians with Marxist literature under their shirts. Although the loyalist troops did not reach Palma the first day, a fight took place at San Severa, a nearby town, and so many rebels were killed that the Palma newspapers were forbidden to mention San Severa. Instead they assured their readers that every last red had been driven from the island—this at a time when the loyalist troops were intrenched in a line fourteen kilometers long between Porto Christo and Arta. For days the dead lay thick on the battlefields, until the soldiers burned the bodies.

For three weeks the government forces remained on the island. They had brought and stored food and ammunition for 25,000 men. They had their own newspapers, radio station, mail service in daily communication with Barcelona and Madrid, tanks, ambulances, cranes, and so on. Acting on orders from Madrid, they withdrew from the island without the loss of a single man or any material, as eyewitnesses from among the rebels later testified. The retreat was covered by planes and nineteen small cruisers. It was said that Azaña wanted to avoid further Italian intervention in Majorca. But the Italian commander, Conte de Rossi, claimed full credit for having cleaned the anti-fascists out of the island, and he was feted for it in Palma and other towns, and received the blessings of the clergy.

The fascists told me proudly that there were also Germans among them, and they invited me several times to inspect the "wonderful organization" of their Blue House. I politely declined. The German consul indignantly denied that any German citizens had taken part in the "liquidation" of the Socialists. Whether they had or not, the terror went on. Socialists who had escaped arrest told me that in one district in Palma 500 had been killed; in trucks and touring cars, twenty and thirty chained together, they had been driven outside the town and shot at a convenient spot. Another man estimated the number of executions during the first six weeks in Palma at 1,500. The clothing of the victims was heaped up in the churchyards, where the people were allowed to sort out for themselves evidence of the death of relatives or friends.

In the church of a little village near Manacor, fascists destroyed the treasures of the church, which "unfortunately" had been undamaged by the reds. They threw them all in a heap, fetched a dozen workmen out of prison, grouped them around the "robbery," took a photograph of the scene, and killed the workers as soon as the picture was taken. The photograph was published as an example of red terror. This story was told me by the priest himself, who deplored it.

When I left the island at the beginning of October, the underground terror had so affected the people that even followers of the right were afraid. A denunciation from any source meant almost certain death. Persons I knew among the workers, the Catholic bourgeoisie, and the aristocracy told me they longed for the establishment of a military dictatorship which would disarm the extremists of both sides and stop the war. There was no one, of whatever party, who did not envy me the chance of leaving the island. No Spaniard was permitted to leave. Foreigners were offered huge sums to smuggle Spaniards aboard foreign battleships.

This prohibition was especially cruel to persons who had come to Majorca for the summer holiday. They knew nothing of their relatives on the Spanish mainland and could not communicate with them. I was given more than fifty letters to mail when I left and on the cruiser I met a Swiss lady who carried a suitcase full of mail. Fortunately there was no censor at the port the morning we left.

George Peek at Home and Abroad

BY ALVIN JOHNSON

BEFORE the World War George N. Peek was a live, aggressive manufacturer of agricultural implements, a thorn in the flesh of Alexander Legge of the International Harvester. Bernard Baruch, with his uncanny instinct for key men, summoned both Peek and Legge to Washington just when their concerns were in a position to make mountains of money. They came regretfully, rather resentfully, somewhat suspicious of each other; but Baruch was implacable. They signed up for the duration of the war at a dollar a year (which they never got). Promptly they became fast friends, among the tireless hawks engaged in chasing profiteers into their holes.

As a farm-machinery man Peek knew that agriculture was desperately sick. He had been a prominent figure in an Administration that had implored the farmers to break every available acre, buy expensive machinery, overwork the land and themselves, sink deep over their heads in debt, because "food would win the war." When the war was over, the farmer was left prostrate under sacks of wheat and bales of cotton, kegs of butter and lard, fat hams and sides of beef. And so in season and out of season Peek agitated for justice to the farmer. Industry had saved its prices by combinations, open or tacit. Peek was for farmers' combinations. Industry had been safely sheltered behind the tariff. The farmers had been humbugged with tariffs that were inoperative, since farming was an unorganized export industry. Like every great American industrialist Peek knew that there is a way for even export industries to enjoy the benefits of a high tariff. Have a two-price system: high prices at home, low prices abroad.

When the McNary-Haugen scheme was evolved for dumping farm supplies at what they would fetch and working the tariff for what it was worth in domestic consumption, Peek saw a ray of real hope for the farmer. There were defects in the original plan; Peek helped to mend them. He wasted his time and substance running around the country converting politicians, industrial notables, and great merchants who wouldn't have known a lister from a tedder if they had met them face to face. Peek thought that Roosevelt was a convert to the cause. Indeed, at Kansas City Roosevelt made a declaration that seemed to look toward the McNary-Haugen plan. To Peek Roosevelt seemed like bright spring after the moldy winter of Hoover. He foresaw another dollar-a-year episode, bucking the depression as he had helped buck the war—a second generous and patriotic youth, more golden than the first.

Roosevelt was inaugurated, and Peek, as he had hoped, was invited to Washington. But this time there was no skilful and patient poker player like Bernard Baruch to stand between a forthright man like Peek and an idealistic Chief Executive. Instead, he found himself shut up in a kind of hopper with Wallace, Tugwell, Jerome Frank, and Hull, to mill themselves under their own steam. Here his bruises and his book* begin.

There were two conflicting plans for bringing about the relief that farming absolutely needed. One was Peek's plan of a two-price system, selling abroad at the world price and at home at that price plus the tariff duty. The other was what proved to be Wallace's plan of cutting production in many items to the needs of the domestic market, and in the case of cotton and tobacco, cutting production sufficiently to correct the world price. Both plans involved serious complications. In the first plan, the farmers whose products were dumped abroad had somehow to be put on the same footing as farmers who sold at the favorable domestic price. In the second plan the farmers who cut their production had somehow to be compensated. Since the American government is seldom honest enough to give a subsidy frankly, out of ordinary revenues, both plans included a processing tax, which really had nothing to recommend it over the majority of our more pernicious taxes. It looks preposterous now, but at the outset both parties supposed that they were pulling the same way. For a time there was frightful bewilderment: both teams were pulling to burst their girths and not moving an inch—something very characteristic of Washington.

Finally the whiffle-trees snapped and Peek found himself all snarled up in confusion. As his book shows, he hasn't got the straps and ropes untwisted yet, or the welts and chafings healed. George Peek simply could not work with the Tugwell-Wallace-Howe crowd. It was with the greatest relief that he found himself transferred to a job that was especially to his taste: finding foreign markets for farm surpluses. He interpreted his commission liberally, to cover not only all the foreign trade but also all other foreign transactions of the United States. A nation in its foreign economic relations, he assumed, is a unit, like a business in the circle of competitors and customers. It needs first of all a system of accounts, clearly showing income and outgo, and Peek set out to establish such a system—something we badly need. But every system of accounts must make assumptions. Peek's assumptions seemed to him axioms. If the United States buys goods, that is outgo; if it buys gold, that is also outgo. If it sells securities, that is on the income side temporarily, but ultimately on the debit side. Foreigners menace us when they hold our securities, unload their own securities on us, deposit their money in our banks. Foreigners are striking at our prosperity and independence when they sell us anything we can make ourselves—even at high cost. If with one day's American labor we buy the product of one day's foreign labor, we deprive an American laborer of a job. If with one day's labor we buy the product of two days of foreign labor, we are depriving two Americans of jobs. Logically, one might remark, the same principle should hold when it is one day's labor against ten. We ought to be raising our raw silk in the Carolinas. But then only Henry Ford and Rockefeller could afford to strut around in silks, and Japan would have nothing with which to pay for our cotton. Not to press the point, Peek is not up to himself when he plunges into general theory.

He negotiated a number of deals on a barter basis, one with Germany, for example, in which we were to exchange 800,000 bales of cotton for 25 per cent cash and the rest in goods which would not have competed with our own production. The deal fell through because in the meantime Secretary Hull had committed himself to a trade reciprocity policy that Peek considers damnable.

We may disregard the theoretical extravagances in which Peek, like many another level-headed practical man, lets himself get mired. His proposed farm and tariff solutions are not to be lightly dismissed. No matter how clearly one sees the injury to agriculture wrought by overproduction, one cannot feel complacent about the "plow-up and kill" which the Wallace party put through. Certainly the possibility of a two-price system, as a temporary expedient, should have been more thoroughly explored. We should all have preferred to see the surplus corn, wheat, meat, cotton disposed of at cut prices to the impoverished masses of Europe and Asia, rather than destroyed. The expedient could, however, have worked only temporarily. The American public would not long be content to subsidize our farmers for the sake of providing foreign populations with food and fiber below cost of production. But it is not unthinkable that we might have a two-price system at home that would develop the consuming power of the poorer strata. A multiple price system is ancient practice in the supply of electrical power. It is beside the point that this system works in favor of the stronger, not the weaker, consumers. We have long had a multiple price system for medical services in favor of the poor, and most of us are hoping to see it extended in favor of the lower-middle-class incomes. In New York we have a two-price system for milk. The farmer is paid one price for milk sold for direct consumption, another price for milk for manufacture. We could carry the multiple price system farther and make a very low price, say, for families with incomes under $1,200. The British are doing something of the kind. We are doing something of the sort when we subsidize housing for low-income groups. We could do the same thing with bread, meat, fruits, and vegetables. If the plan of multiple prices were carried through, we should see an amazing development of our domestic purchasing power.

To be sure, the system would be cumbersome and subject to many abuses. But the one-price system is compatible with social welfare and economic health only when income is distributed with substantial equality. Taking the world as it is, the one-price system leaves the producer with crushing surpluses on his hands and the consumer in bitter want of the very goods composing those surpluses. It is a matter for great regret that Peek was not permitted to carry through his experiment in the two-price system, even though the beneficiaries would have been foreign populations. It would have set us thinking about our own population.

Peek's plan for the control of foreign trade and other transactions involving foreign exchange looked to him so logical and so obviously beneficial that only some hidden and injurious principle like "internationalism" could explain the coolness of Hull and Sayre. Peek wanted to put the whole business of foreign economic relations under official control. Let nothing happen in this field except with explicit authorization. Let the government negotiate with foreign governments as to volume and kind of imports and exports, international investments, the payment of debts owing to Americans, tourist traffic, remittances from immigrants to relatives. There is bureaucracy for you, and from a man who is always inveighing against bureaucracy. He calls his plan an American plan, in contrast to Hull's "international" plan. What could be more international than a plan involving continuous negotiations between governments on the whole complex of economic relations? And as for the origin of the plan, it was first developed systematically by Soviet Russia, then taken up by Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, Austria, Hungary, and Poland, and gradually forced upon the more democratic countries of Europe.

Peek is particularly enraged by Hull's reciprocity arrangements. Why do we stick to the antiquated, unconditional most-favored-nation principle? We give concessions to Belgium on cement in return for concessions on Belgium's part supposed to be equivalent. Then we generalize the concessions, and other countries that have given us nothing enjoy the same rate as Belgium. Well, who is gypped, ourselves or Belgium? If all the world enjoys the reduced duty, it will mean precious little to Belgium.

We do give a special concession to Cuba on sugar, which Peek himself calculates as equivalent to a cash subsidy to Cuba of $32,000,000. If we generalized this concession to all sugar-producing countries, it would be worth little or nothing to Cuba. Peek seems not to note the meaning of the special concession, in spite of his clear picture of the Cuban situation. Let the goods of a particular country in at half the duty, and we are presenting to that country a bounty equal to half the duty. Let all countries enjoy the same concession and our price drops halfway toward the world price. No country gets any special benefit, though all may gain through the greater volume of trade.

There may be a reason why we should present Cuba with $32,000,000. There might be a reason for presenting a few million dollars to Belgium through special trade concessions, if we could get special concessions that yielded us net as much or more. Some very shrewd bargaining would be required, and an old-fashioned American like Hull would rather not try it. He prefers to let the individual American business man make his own bargains, under impersonal government regulations. Peek, Stalin, and Hitler are confident of their superiority to the individual business man in making international bargains. I wish Peek had been able to put his barter transactions through. We should all have learned something.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

ALL honor to the government of Norway and the Nobel Prize Committee! That government deserves the highest credit for refusing to bring any pressure to bear upon the committee; its representatives resigned so that Hitler could not charge an official governmental action, and the committee then decided in favor of Carl von Ossietzky for the 1935 peace prize without taking counsel of anybody's fears. Curiously enough, it never even asked the advice of Adolf Hitler. That was, of course, a great oversight, as was evidenced by the snarls of anguish from Berlin. It is unheard of, an official Nazi spokesman says, to give the Nobel peace prize to a man who was convicted as a traitor by the highest court in the land even before the Nazis came to power. So the Hitler government has officially protested to the Norwegian government that this is an unprecedented insult; the official statement adds that serious consequences—to be defined later—will follow. That, too, is characteristic of men in office who happen also to be bullies and braggarts. "We aren't going to tell you what we are going to do to you, but, by heck, it is going to be serious, so you look out for yourself."

Now aside from my great joy that justice has been done to Ossietzky and that this recognition of an outrageously ill-treated man has appeared in every newspaper in the world, I get the greatest satisfaction from the stupid and fumbling way in which the Nazi government has received the news. If it had said "ouch" a thousand times it could not have made clearer the deep hurt it sustained. The manner in which it has acknowledged the award confirms me in considerable degree in my belief that sooner or later the stupid, one-sided mentalities in charge of the German people are going to make a blunder as bad as that of Hindenburg and Ludendorff in insisting on the unlimited submarine warfare and thus drawing the United States into the struggle, or the Zimmermann note advising Mexico that it should fight us to take back New Mexico and Arizona. It is obvious again that one of the numerous qualities Hitler lacks is a sense of humor.

Certainly the German government has shown great stupidity in not ignoring the whole thing or laughing it off. It should have jested about the prize itself, about how happy the German government would be to receive the money intended for Ossietzky since no state prisoners could receive financial support from abroad. It should have said it had several other candidates if the Nobel committee couldn't find anybody else to give its prize to another year. But no, it had to be dead serious about it; its sacred honor was impugned; it was a slap at the whole German people, a reflection upon the sacred Nazi government. I am certain that it will yet be proved that it is an insult to the whole Aryan race, and if by this time Nazi agents are not at work to prove the Jewish ancestry of every member of the Nobel Prize Committee I shall be astonished. It might have been prepared for the announcement—at least to the considering of its policy in advance—as most other people were since its foreshadowing in the press. But it just could not conceive that any committee could hold it in sufficient contempt not to inquire what its feelings in the matter would be. Hence the cries of pain and the effort to besmirch Von Ossietzky.

Von Ossietzky cannot be besmirched in the eyes of anyone who knows the facts about his trial and punishment under Chancellor Brüning—as the latter is reported to be in this country hiding under an assumed name I hope these words will come to his attention. That action of the Brüning government was a disgrace to it; it set the seal upon the treachery and duplicity not of Von Ossietzky but of the government which persecuted him. What was Von Ossietzky's offense? Simply the publication in his honest and truthful weekly, the Weltbühne, that Germany was violating the Treaty of Versailles and secretly arming. One article brought out the fact that German fliers were being trained on the flying fields of that very Soviet government against which Hitler is now forming a new Holy Alliance! In other words, Von Ossietzky had a sufficiently honorable character to refuse to share in the deceitfulness of his government, its pretense that it was living up to the Policy of Acceptance. Nothing could illustrate more clearly the fundamental ethical lack in the character of the German people which keeps them suspect of all the world. They have for generations held up to their school children as model patriots the men who similarly tricked Napoleon by evading his limitation of their armaments. It is not merely that in their eyes the end justifies the means, but they hold that your true patriot is the man who lies and cheats on behalf of his government. They cannot see what a stain this leaves upon their honor and how it has made people believe that their solemn word is worth no more than a dicer's oath.

The Nazi spokesman went farther. He warned the world that demonstrations of approval of the Nobel award might mean serious consequences for the prisoner. Of course he was too stupid to see that this again brings into the clearest light the high-mindedness, the generous point of view, and the general nobility of the German government. I got to know Carl von Ossietzky quite well when I was in Berlin in the winter of 1930-31. I believe he would be the last to ask for any soft-pedaling upon the worldwide rejoicing that the stamp of disapproval has been put upon his government by the Nobel committee. An "unfriendly act"? Yes, Mr. Nazi Spokesman, an unfriendly act and by the righteous moral opinion of the world!

Newspaper Guild Thanksgiving

IT IS quite true that the American Newspaper Guild was not a major issue in the last political campaign. Perhaps it was not even a minor issue, and yet the result has had very favorable consequences for the union of working newspaper men and women. I hasten to add that none of these advantages would have accrued but for the increasing efficiency of guild organization.

Within the guild and outside, it is frequently said that many mistakes were made in the early days of the union. That is undoubtedly true, but fortunately none of them seems to have been fatal. On at least half a dozen occasions Editor and Publisher asserted that some policy or other was the death warrant of the guild. And yet it would be hard for anyone to deny that at the present moment the guild is better off than ever before in its history.

The first and all-important reason for progress has been and still is economic necessity. Nobody could possibly have induced reporters to depart from an ancient tradition and join a union if it had not been for the harsh conditions in the craft. I am not saying that every single man or woman in a city room was put upon or exploited. There were good bosses and bad bosses. Some bosses are always better than others. There was a good deal of romantic benevolence. Certain specialists were paid salaries out of all proportion to their work. These were few in number and I know them all. With one in particular I am intimately acquainted.

A familiar form of attack against the guild was the assertion that it was a one-man movement. Indeed, the enemies of the guild did not even dignify it as a "movement." It was rather the whim or the hobby of some fat exhibitionist who loved to get arrested in order to see his name in the paper. Nothing could be farther from the true facts. In the beginning—and now and eternally I hope—the guild was a mass movement. It began with a little group in Cleveland and spread to New York. For a time its growth was almost wholly spontaneous. No one among the early settlers had any experience in leadership or very much capacity for it. Still less was the baby union equipped with men skilled in the handling of that hard and grinding detail which is necessary for organization.

But the members educated one another. The American Newspaper Guild became a sort of combination of Quaker meeting and labor college. We sat around and spoke, each one as the spirit moved him or her. Fortunately the women were not segregated. The spirit which moved discussion was the spirit of the times in which we lived. Frequently it was said that reporters could never succeed in unionization because their training and their calling were of such a highly individual nature. But in the long run newspaper experience helped.

Even among guild members the charge has been made that the budding union tried to cover too much territory. I hope the day never comes when it covers too little. A case in point was a resolution for the freeing of Tom Mooney which was passed at the first regular convention in St. Paul. This was an easy handle for enemies to seize upon. It was said that the guild had gone mad and was attempting to dictate editorial policies to the publishers. To be sure the publishers were peculiarly thin-skinned when reporters first began to organize. I still hear that the guild made a tragic error when the then president of the New York chapter addressed a group of editors in Washington and began, "To whom it may concern." I trust that by now the publishers of America know it does concern them.

As one of the early leaders of the guild I saw my job to be that of a kind of ballyhoo man and advance agent. We are now advertised by our loving enemies, and the most important part of the guild's development has come within the last year. I refer of course to the work of organization, and here I should like to put on the record the name of a man familiar to all guildsmen but less known to outsiders. Jonathan Eddy is the person who has born the great brunt of giving form and substance to the early aspirations of the union. And there should be mention at this moment of Morgan Hull, who sat up with the Seattle strike and brought it to a successful conclusion. As an incurable romantic I must mention one man whose name I have forgotten. In those days we had a sentimental notion that a single person was sufficient to start a chapter. We had not developed far enough to avoid the making of martyrs. My assignment was to talk to a group of fifty-five men on the New York Sun. I began with insufficient background. It was my impression that they had come over to join. It developed that they had merely assembled to tell me that their boss was the finest man in the world and they wanted nothing to do with any union. Exasperated, I pointed an accusing finger at a man I knew and said, "Frankie, you're telling me that your working conditions are so perfect that there is nothing you desire. Is that so?"

"Yes," he said.

"Well then, your attitude is that your own working conditions are wholly satisfactory and that you don't want so much as to lift a little finger to help any newspaper man or woman who is not so happily situated?"

He hesitated a little longer, then answered, "Yes."

"In that case," I told them, "there's no point in going on with this discussion. The meeting is adjourned."

Up shot the thin arm of the reporter I can't remember. "How many people do you need to start a guild on a paper?" he asked.

"One," I said.

"All right, you've got a guild."

It turned out that he was correct.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE JOYOUS SEASON

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

PROBABLY no other age ever libeled itself as persistently and as enthusiastically as ours has done. If anyone doubts the fact he may begin by examining the list of "important books" published in this issue of The Nation and stopping a moment to consider how few of the works there listed, whether they be of imagination or scholarship, have anything favorable to say of human character or human institutions in America or Western Europe. Typical "Christmas books" are Mr. Farrell's "A World I Never Made," that brilliant and meticulous description of human degradation; Mr. Faulkner's rapturous fantasy on the varieties of diabolic experience called "Absalom, Absalom!" or, if one prefers non-fiction and is willing to go beyond our list, Robert Briffault's "Reasons for Anger," which so enthusiastically defends the thesis that not only our civilization but the entire civilization of the past is a damnable mistake. With our "best wishes for a happy New Year" we send books which seem to indicate little hope that those wishes can be gratified, and our favorite toast for the joyous season ought to be the one which Aldous Huxley proposed almost a generation ago. "Come fill the bowl with atrabilious liquor!"

The mention of Mr. Huxley will, moreover, serve to remind us that the habit of detraction was well fixed before the world depression came along to furnish new and solid material to feed the flames of our rage. Way back in the day when America was so prosperous that prosperity itself was regarded as an evil, "Main Street" and "The Spoon River Anthology" were commonly regarded as the quasi-official accounts of the state of the nation. Our happiest writer was Mr. Mencken, whom bile somehow exhilarated, and I think that it would be fair to say that there was a general tendency in England to regard Mr. Huxley and Mr. Lawrence as more representative of the newer spirit in letters than such relatively contented men as Arnold Bennett and John Galsworthy. Writers savage on the one hand and melancholy on the other have been common in the world's history, but it is clear enough, I think, that in few if any other epochs has spleen in its various manifestations unmistakably set the dominant tone of a literature as it sets it in the twentieth century. Satire has seldom seemed to take so little pleasure in itself, and tragedy has seldom been so unrelieved by grandeur.

Now I am far from wishing to undertake the impossible task of dismissing all this as merely the result of a persistent attack of the vapors which "could all be set right with calomel." It may be, indeed, that prophets of gloom would be justified in considering just the prevalence of this temper itself as an indication stronger than any objective fact or condition that "mankind is at the crossroads" or that some major crisis of the human spirit is at hand. But I do want to insist that one may easily make the mistake of assuming too readily the objectivity of literature itself and of concluding too hastily that human life is as much unhappier, that human beings are oppressed and mistreated as much worse today than ever before, as a mere study of the literature of this age would seem to indicate. Literature, after all, reflects interests, convictions, habitual emphases, and sensitivities quite as much as it reflects prevailing conditions. It is as much a mirror of our habits of thought as it is of our experiences; and we have today, in addition to problems and horrors enough, also the literary tradition of detraction and spleen, the habit of emphasizing the worst. The society of the eighteenth century in London could have supplied material for something like "A World I Never Made" just as readily as it did for "Tom Jones."

One result of that fact is that a writer feels an almost overwhelming pressure upon him to make out the worst case against his fellow-men that he is able to make. In its crudest form that pressure is exerted upon him through his desire for success. A mere best-seller may be cheerful, but cheerful books are almost automatically set down as best-sellers, and there is no doubt that a novelist who chose to describe whatever favorable aspects of the present social scene he might be able to discover would find an immediate tendency in intellectual circles to discount him as a writer. More subtly, even naturally optimistic or detached temperaments feel the pressure of the age. As an example I have in mind one particular talented writer who contributes frequently to The Nation. His natural tendency is to anthologize the eighteenth century or to discuss the technique of light verse. At another time he would have felt free to do just that; as it is he takes time off to denounce the social system, which is no worse than it was when La Rochefoucauld wrote. One is reminded of the gentleman in Boswell who complained, "When I was a young man I wanted very much to be a philosopher; but no matter how hard I tried, cheerfulness kept breaking through." That was because he lived in an age of optimism. Had he lived today all literature would have conspired to help him keep it back.

Perhaps we are inclined at the present moment to lay almost too exclusive a stress upon the fact that "literature reflects social conditions." Lenin I believe said that. And so literature does, but in judging any age by its literature one should always remember that even to "reflect social conditions" is not quite the same as merely to give an account of facts. We admire realism and we think of literature as a picture of our times. We tend to forget how important in it is the element of creation as opposed to the element of imitation. Literature does not reflect merely what things are like but also what we think about them. It is a record of what we see, but it is also and at least as importantly an indication of what we want or fear, what we love or hate.

Contemporary fiction is full of social injustice. Man's inhumanity to man is prominent as it has been in few bodies of fiction ever composed before. That does not mean only or necessarily that man is more inhumane to man than in any previous period of the world's history. It means rather that we are more sensitive to such inhumanity and more completely obsessed by it. It is less a proof that this is the cruelest and most unjust age that ever existed than it is that we hate cruelty and injustice more than any age ever did before us.

And what is true of the significance of our social fiction is true of all the splenetic literature which immediately preceded it. Sinclair Lewis's "Babbitt" did not prove that we were the most complacently commonplace people in the world. It proved only that we were beginning very actively to hate the complacently commonplace. A hundred years hence literary historians may perhaps conclude that the twentieth century was the worst age in which to live that the world has ever known. They may, on the other hand, conclude merely that it was the most savagely self-critical.

BOOKS

From Stars to Bones

THE OXFORD BOOK OF MODERN VERSE. 1892-1935.

Chosen by W. B. Yeats. Oxford University Press. $3.

THE "Oxford Book of Modern Verse" is, as Yeats points out in his delightful preface, a collection of poetry from the time—three years before the death of Tennyson—when poets wrote of stars to the present moment, when they write of bones. Editors of the earlier Oxford Books had a long perspective on their materials for selection. Yeats, in making this collection of modern verse, must rely on his own judgment. As the greatest living poet writing in English he was chosen editor; and he indicates, humorously, that he realizes the difficulty of his task. He must trace the development of poetry from the nineties, in which his own youthful poetry was born, down to the present, when his mature realistic poetry still to some extent dominates the scene. It is not strange, therefore, that he should allow, as he does, his own preferences their way. Thus, the Irish poets are given more than good measure of room in this book. Lyric poetry with a "lofty eloquence" is preferred; and poets with a tragic sense of life fare better than the poets of disillusionment. Only Eliot and Pound among American-born poets are included—this because of their long career as Englishmen. Realizing that he could not do justice to the storm and stutter of modern American poetry, Yeats leaves it all out.

In the last forty-three years poetry, as Yeats explains, has developed from a romantic rebellion against Victorianism and its moral discursiveness toward a more realistic approach to a concrete subject matter. England, in the nineties full of well-bred bohemianism, sobered when the century turned. The poetry of passion, or of flight from passion (aesthetic or religious), was diverted first into a poetry of naturalism, then a poetry of disillusion, and finally a poetry of social criticism. Mind came to be understood as conditioned behavior or as a flux of submerged imagery, and man, pitted against a mechanistic view of nature, was no longer envisioned as heroic. The tragedy of the human will fighting the gods, nature, society ceased to be the theme of great literature. Pathetic pantomime and the sound of small weepings filled the stage. As Stendhal said, and as Yeats repeats, all literature was for a time but a "mirror dawdling down a lane," a reflection of this or that aspect of man's private soul but no whole or designed picture. More recently man's will-to-believe has again asserted itself. It has been discovered that society is functioning according to certain laws, that human beings, also acting according to certain fundamental laws, must, of necessity, rise against such a society in order to change it. Some have held that man's force will prove greater than the social forces against him. Others hold that these social forces will win the battle and that man will return to barbarism.

It is Yeats's own belief that poets should espouse neither cause nor state. He fears that hatred confuses art. Nevertheless, as he indicates, he sees in the revolutionary poets a new intellectual passion. He rejoices that the tragic sense of life has returned. He is relieved to note again in poets a recognition that in a moment of belief any great action is possible. Therefore he admires the younger English poets who integrate their beliefs and their actions.

As a lyric poet Yeats prefers lyrics, and most of the poems included in this volume are selected accordingly. The poet-editor remarks that he dislikes the lack of rhythmical animation in Eliot's early poetry, an effect for which Eliot deliberately worked. He includes, therefore, only one or two of the early poems and The Hollow Men and Ash Wednesday, in which he finds the great manner. Pound, Yeats judges very correctly to be important chiefly as a translator. Hating war, he leaves out the war poets and includes instead Herbert Read's "The End of the War." This rather overwritten poem is certainly better than most war verse. Oscar Wilde comes in for editing at Yeats's hands. All of Wilde's most characteristic flourishes and poses are gone from his Ballad of Reading Gaol, which in this new version becomes an excellent straightforward narrative. Michael Field, the nom-de-plume for the collaborators, Katherine Bradley and Edith Cooper, is included, and the fine classical lyrics of this composite poet are worth knowing. Arthur Symonds is represented only very briefly. A. E., however, is given far too much space. Oliver Gogarty gets more pages than he deserves. Yeats admires Edith Sitwell—this is a strange affinity—and includes a good deal of her work. He speaks of her "temperament of strangeness so high-pitched that only through artifice could it find expression." Hugh MacDiarmid—by all odds the finest of the truly revolutionary poets, a poet without benefit of Oxford or Cambridge—is not allowed enough pages.

To Walter James Turner and to Dorothy Wellesley, Yeats devotes paragraphs in his preface and many pages of his collection. These two poets are evidently his own discoveries. He believes that Turner, scientifically minded, has gained control again over plastic material. What Yeats really enjoys in this poet's work is rhetoric employed to enrich abstract thought. Turner's poems are metaphysical in the seventeenth-century sense of drawing opposites into conjunction by giving thought, but they are, I think, less important than Yeats believes. Dorothy Wellesley, on the other hand, is rather exciting. She writes with a very nervous, strong rhythm and employs an unusual visual imagery. I rather think, however, that she is less important than Auden, from whose work Yeats has chosen only a cheap satirical piece which, taken out of its context, means very little.

One reads and rereads this collection, quarreling here and there with Yeats's judgment, grateful now and then for the included fine selections from little-known minor poets. It is amusing to note in passing that Robert Graves and Laura Riding refused Yeats their poems. Having written a "Pamphlet Against Anthologies" they must, one supposes, be consistent.

EDA LOU WALTON

Tragedy of a Missionary

FIGHTING ANGEL. PORTRAIT OF A SOUL. By Pearl S.

Buck. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

MRS. BUCK'S biography of her father stands rather thinly beside "The Exile," her biography of her mother. For the subject himself was thin. His children, Mrs. Buck included, knew relatively little about the tall wraith who spent most of his time in China away from the family, tramping the foul roads and preaching Presbyterianism to swarms of yellow faces. But nobody knew much about him, for the pathetic reason that there was not much to know. He was narrowed almost exactly to his purpose. There was a touch of humor in him from time to time, and in his old age he could move his daughters to pity. But through most of his eighty years he was colorlessly fanatical and drearily industrious, denying himself every pleasure of existence except the pleasure of doing his own work in his own way, decade after dogged decade. Carrie, his wife, the heroine of "The Exile," was so much more interesting as a human creature that a reader may be tempted to decide that Andrew was not interesting at all. Yet it would be an error so to decide. For if he was thin he was intense; and the book which contains all there was of his soul is correspondingly instructive.

Andrew cut a poor figure in "The Exile," being represented there chiefly through his absences from Carrie at critical moments in her life and through the indifference, if not the contempt, which each of his reappearances would express. Nor is it possible for Mrs. Buck now to say that she ever loved him. It is rather that she has settled down to saying how much he amazed her, even appalled her; and that in the course of doing so she has had to do him the justice of praising his strength. "The truth is," she admits, "that the early missionaries were born warriors and very great men, for in those days religion was still a banner under which to fight. . . . The early missionaries believed in their cause as men these days do not know how to believe in anything. . . . It is not a thing to smile at. . . . I have not seen anywhere the like of Andrew and his generation. . . . They were proud and quarrelsome and brave and intolerant and passionate. There was not a meek man among them. . . . The giants are gone." All of which explains how it is that in writing the life of Andrew Mrs. Buck has been able to write a tragedy. For if she had had less respect for her father's power she would not have known how to suggest the irony of his success.

His success was his tragedy. He did succeed in doing what he wanted to do, and for the simple reason that nothing could have stopped him. But this meant that from every other point of view he was a failure. He was feared rather than loved. His colleagues found him difficult to work with, and saw better than anyone else how badly he adjusted his effort to the actual situation before him. He never knew China, or knew that it was changing, just as he never suspected that many of his converts were converts in name only—were, in fact, more heathen than ever behind his back. He was perhaps as blind as a man with eyes can be; he saw only one thing, his goal, compared with which every other object, even though it might be a Chinese soul, was insubstantial. At seventy, forced to retire from "the field," he may be supposed to have entertained for a moment the thought that much of his work had counted for little. But he could never have entertained the unstated thesis of this book, which is that all of it counted for nothing, the world being for better or worse the same old world, unutterably unredeemed. He went through every danger to get the one thing he wanted, and got it. That is the tragedy of Andrew.

MARK VAN DOREN

Strachey on Socialism

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF SOCIALISM. By John Strachey. Random House. $3.

IN HIS first book, "The Coming Struggle for Power," Strachey gave promise of developing into a vigorous and even brilliant commentator on the contemporary social scene. At that time he had no overpowering preconceptions, and his writing displayed a real freshness of style which encouraged many of us to hope for great things from him in the future. But his next substantial work, "The Nature of Capitalist Crisis," gave rise to doubts. Strachey had evidently acquired ambitions to become a social scientist, but he had just as evidently not given the necessary time and effort to his studies in the field. He had bitten off more economics than he could chew, and the result was that his criticism of "bourgeois" economics was as feeble as his attempt to expound Marxian theory. One comes, therefore, to his most recent and most pretentious work, "The Theory and Practice of Socialism," not knowing quite what to expect.

The book justifies the initial skepticism. Mr. Strachey has by now, it seems, assumed the role of systematizer on the grand scale. The present work purports to be nothing less than a general presentation of the Marxian analysis of capitalism and socialism, together with an account of Marxism itself. The result, it must be confessed, is not a very happy one. Except for a few all too brief interludes, the style is heavy and textbookish; and Strachey's attitude toward his readers is frequently smug and patronizing.

His treatment of the various subjects touched upon is, naturally enough, uneven. On the Soviet Union, he draws extensively and almost exclusively from the Webbs. It is certainly desirable that a book on socialism should make use of the experience of the only existing Socialist community; but it is indicative of how little we know about how the Soviet Union really works, particularly in the economic sphere, that nothing more analytically penetrating than the Webbs' (in many ways excellent) two volumes is available. Again, on some subjects, such as dialectical materialism, Strachey merely repeats what have been the commonplaces of popular Marxist literature ever since Engels wrote his "Anti-Dühring." On the other hand, Strachey sometimes achieves a really original and highly stimulating treatment of his subject matter, as, for example, in his Part III, on Socialism and the Working Class, where he traces the origins and development of Socialist thought and action in the history of the British working class. This section makes one hope that Strachey will apply himself to the task of producing that full-dress history of Chartism from the Marxist standpoint the lack of which he deplors. It is in fields like this, I think, that Strachey could do full justice to his very considerable talents as historian and interpreter of social events.

Strachey maintains that the trouble with capitalism is not that it does not distribute enough purchasing power, as most currency reformers would have us believe, but rather that it distributes purchasing power so unevenly. The result is that those with big incomes can satisfy all their desires for consumers' goods with a small proportion of their income and must invest the rest, that is, purchase ever more means of production. But since the market for consumers' goods does not expand, and since these means of production must ultimately produce more consumers' goods, a contradiction arises which can only be resolved by the destruction of means of production and/or the conquest of new markets. This leads to the two phenomena of imperialist expansion and periodic crises, with the latter becoming ever more severe as capitalism develops.

Now the objection to this analysis is that a flexible—that is, fully competitive—capitalist system takes care of the problem automatically. The heaping up of the means of production leads to the lowering of the return on capital (the rate of interest), while the competition of capitalists for labor to make these means of production drives up the rate of wages. Everything seems to work beautifully; and if the process eventually goes so far as to wipe out the return on capital altogether, well, so much the worse for the capitalists! It is no answer to this argument to assert that we do not have such a flexible capitalist system; for to explain why we do not is precisely the problem which must be solved. Marx realized this, though he did not state the problem clearly. Nevertheless, he does give an answer. This, he says in effect, is indeed the tendency of capitalism, but it is precisely this tendency on the part of capitalism to wipe out the capitalists which forces them continually to revolutionize the methods of production, and by introducing labor-saving machinery to keep the natural upward tendency of wages within bounds. This elaboration of machinery makes ever larger the scale of production and leads straight out of the realm of competition into that of monopoly. In this stage capitalism ceases to be the sort of thing it used to be; in fact, it enters the stage of imperialism, the importance of which Lenin sensed, but of which he was unable to provide a satisfactory economic analysis.

The truth is that it is impossible to give a static analysis of what is wrong with capitalism, as Strachey essentially tries to do. For the nature of capitalism contradicts the attempt. It seems surprising that a Marxist should not see the point, and especially one who stresses the importance of what he calls the "Law of Motion of Capitalism" (Chapter 29). But the real reason for the failure is not far to seek. It lies in the belief that the essence of Marx's theory of capitalist development is the labor theory of value. The labor theory of value is in fact a purely static theory, and a rather clumsy one at that. So long as Marxists are not able to shake off the preconception that all wisdom flows from the labor theory of value, they will be unable to make use of and develop what were Marx's really fundamental and enduring contributions to the science of economics.

In closing, I should like to add that for those who have not yet made the acquaintance of the Marxian approach to capitalism and socialism, Strachey's book, despite its shortcomings, provides a very useful starting-point. If, as I suspect, this was one of its main functions, then it may with justice be described as a successful effort.

PAUL M. SWEEZY

The Nationalization of Business

THE NATIONALIZING OF BUSINESS, 1878-1898. (A HISTORY OF AMERICAN LIFE, Vol. IX.) By Ida M. Tarbell. The Macmillan Company. $4.

THE twenty-year period with which Miss Tarbell deals is peculiarly significant in American history. These two decades, interestingly enough, begin with recovery from the depression inaugurated in 1873 and end with the close of the depression announced by the panic of 1893. Of special importance are the years 1879-93, for they constitute, despite several lean years in the middle eighties, a major period of economic expansion.

The great advance in land occupation, the twenty-five-million increase in population, the growth of the domestic market, the striking technological advances, the tremendous exploitation of natural resources, the utilization of new sources of fuel and power, the changes in transportation and communication, the development of new business forms, the modifications in the system of distribution, and the developments in banking and finance which occurred in these years wrought profound transformations in the American scene. By 1898 an industrial capitalist order was firmly established. A once rural and agricultural land had become essentially urban and industrial.

This period was also an age of protest and revolt in which industrial laborers, farmers, and a handful of intellectuals participated. It witnessed the rapid rise and collapse of the Knights of Labor and the birth of the American Federation of Labor. It produced the pulsating labor movement of the middle eighties and bitter industrial conflicts, among which Homestead and Pullman loom large. Agrarian protest, expressing itself in turn in greenbackism, free silver, and the farmers' alliances, finally culminated in the Populist crusade. From the extreme left there came an energetic attack upon the existing order by Anarchists and Socialists, while a distinctly native radicalism appeared in the philosophy of Henry George.

All this and more falls within the scope of "The Nationalizing of Business," and it is unfortunate that the volume contributes little to an adequate picture of these developments or to an understanding of their significance and consequences. It has no real value as a study in social history, and suffers from distressing shallowness as a work in economic history. An uncritical attitude leads Miss Tarbell to repeat many half-truths and myths, most of which have been long exploded, and to create some new ones. A complete catalogue of the sins of commission and omission with which Miss Tarbell may be fairly charged cannot be undertaken here. But some of her offenses must be indicated.

She depends to an unusual degree, in a work of this kind, upon secondary sources. Recent studies not in agreement with her views are ignored. An obvious instance is her use of the material in McElroy's "Grover Cleveland" for the Pullman strike rather than the account in Allan Nevins's biography of Cleveland. She frequently suppresses essential evidence. In her version of the Homestead strike, for example, there is no mention of Carnegie's decision to make Homestead non-union, or of his complete support of Frick's actions. Her regard for the life of personal achievement leads to adulation of the "strong men" of the period—witness the saintly portraits of Carnegie and many of his contemporaries. She partially justifies the huge profits made by the "leaders" of industry in terms of the "benefits" the country "derived" from their activities. She says nothing about the development of banking and finance, and barely touches upon the house of Morgan. Her treatment of railroad and trust legislation and Populism are especially inadequate and superficial. She believes that "the conditions of the wage-earners had . . . greatly improved in the twenty years," but she offers no evidence. "On the whole," she writes, "labor issued from [the industrial] conflicts [of the period] more successfully than capital, primarily because what it sought was so often just."

But enough. The volume is smoothly written. Beyond that it has no major virtue, and it is no distinction for the "A History of American Life" series to have Miss Tarbell's work in it.

Two Kinds of Love

PAUL GAUGUIN'S INTIMATE JOURNALS. Translated by Van Wyck Brooks. Preface by Emil Gauguin. Crown Publishers. $2.75.

THE BEST OF ART YOUNG. With an Introduction by Heywood Broun. The Vanguard Press. $3.

THE antinomy between Gauguin's painting and his writing is startling: the one calm, sweeping, and static, the other tortured, myopic, and ecstatic. Had he received early recognition his life might have been more like his painting and less as it was. Actually, the attempt of his son to debunk the Gauguin myth smacks a little too much of the antics of the French Academy after the death of Anatole France. It is too late to tame the author of such pages as these.

Physiological honesty was his God, "breeches morality" his Antichrist. Perhaps no one ever more vehemently hated the professional good woman who waves her virtue and her baby as a harlot waves her breasts and hips. "Virtue!" he exclaims; "I know all about it but I do not like it." His bravado is often obvious: "I should like to be a pig; man alone can be ridiculous." There was pathos in these Timonisms, which he himself explained: "I wish to love and I cannot. I wish not to love and I cannot." He belonged to his own category of men who are "misogynists because they love women too much." So he was always an Adam looking for Eve and not finding her even in a South Sea Garden of Eden.

"Gauguin, the savage, who hates a whimpering civilization," Strindberg called him. As a matter of fact he was terribly confused by what Clarence Day called "this simian world." So he wrote. "This is not a book; it is nothing but idle chatter," he insists. He did not really want to write but he had "a great many things to say, and they must be said." The result is something of a book! His defiance was splendid, too. "Giant, you are mortal," he confesses; but "why fabricate tears in order to shed them?" Better "spend yourself, spend yourself again! Run till you are out of breath and die madly." He did.

Unlike "Noa Noa," which was tidied up and made as respectable as possible by Charles Morice, these journals are undiluted Gauguin. On reading them we are first struck with their utter modernity. They are not only post-Joycean; they are also post-Huxleyan. Gauguin's thought, however, was not colloid but crystalloid—faceted. True, one too often encounters the dangerously penetrating gems in a matrix of naive childishness, but they are gems nevertheless. And gems are always rare. Not only painting but likewise literature comes in for cruelly just comments. An example is his sly reference to "our great academician, Pierre Loti."

Reproductions of his paintings and drawings enrich the book. Though Gauguin himself remarked that we can get along "without mural paintings. One ought always to feel the wall," even his smallest canvasses have a curiously mural quality. This doubtless arises from his constant meticulous regard for every rectangular space he filled with design. "Decoration is not landscape, it is decoration," he insisted. At one time in Brittany he developed a "synthetist" formula which sometimes resulted in what might almost be dubbed emotional wallpaper! In his later paintings the color pattern grew increasingly instinctive and less formulated. His figures usually possess a semi-Egyptian calm and immobility. At his greatest he seems the avatar of some ancient and primitive magician. His compositional rhetoric, however, could easily become monotonous in the hands of one who was not a genius. At first sight his works do not seem original to us because we have seen so many pictures by artists influenced by men he influenced.

It is pleasant to record that the feral Gauguin was kind to savages and children. Perhaps he had hope for them! Of children he said: "They are my disciples, those of the second renaissance." "God never rests," he mused in his island home and worked on to the end—as strange; as wistful, as intransigent a creator as our times have seen.

The translation before us is a comfort and a joy. This reviewer has not seen the original MS, but anyone who has stood aghast while his own alchemy transmuted Gallic fire into Anglo-Teutonic smoke will know that Van Wyck Brooks has done here a beautiful job.

Art Young never fled to an exotic clime, though apparently he relishes "civilization" as little as Gauguin did. Good-tempered instead of ill-tempered, he stayed and fought. The present reviewer met him only once, years ago, and promptly evolved from the visit a very bad pun anent loving Art and keeping Young. The man is vividly human, lacking in personal rancor, richly humorous, and actually seems to believe that individuals should be happy as well as hold certain opinions. His sterner colleagues are inclined to look askance, smile with him, and even adore him.

Heywood Broun in his introduction to the present volume fears that there is concealed "in the heart and mind of Art Young something of the Utopian heresy." And, after all, a man who starts out drawing an inhuman hell and after half a lifetime winds up by drawing almost human trees must be conceded to be not only a wit and a philosopher but a poet as well. Plato would probably have found use for him in the New State.

Art Young is a challenge to smugness, whether in reactionary or radical. Whenever the writer of these lines is informed anew that the revolution is about to start he always hopes that there are plenty of Art Youngs in it. He would be a swell reconstructionist of devastated war areas.

In his youth, he writes, his entire interest was in "composition, light and shade, and all that goes with creative work." Later he adopted the current religion—and trouble began. Nevertheless, he has always retained more than a souçon of humanism, nearer in spirit to Rabelais than to Swift, to Cervantes than to Gorki.

This is not to say that he is not a doughty soldier of his convictions. He is absolutely fearless. It is not always the bitterest who fight the hardest, and Art Young is the real Happy Warrior. His present volume is fascinating. The drawing is conservative and, though he studied at Paris, in the English tradition of Rowlandson, Leech, and Tenniel. He is the worthy successor of Nast, Keppler, and Gillam in this country. His wit is Old American in flavor. It's a pity he never illustrated Mark Twain. Why not yet? His best artistic life began at forty. We have no pithier phrase-maker and no funnier satirical draftsman. His drawings of pitiful children are heart-wringing and his challenges to his opponents high clarion.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT

A "New" Rochefoucauld

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD: THE MAXIMS. Newly Translated with a Foreword by Louis Kronenberger. Stackpole Sons. $1.75.

THE aphorisms of La Rochefoucauld are a tempting morsel to the translator, since in them we have a world classic, barely twenty thousand words in length, which enjoys a survival greater even than its fame (for La Rochefoucauld is usually quoted by people who do not even know his name), and which in its original form was pondered in every detail of thought, language, and style. Strangely enough, in spite of the long list of translations, there has been no altogether adequate English version, nor do I think that Mr. Kronenberger alters that situation.

The problem of translating the aphorisms is exquisitely historical. La Rochefoucauld did such thinking as he did—never any very great amount—in the grossly synthetic terms of his day in France. He knew something that he called "passions," which he found at war with another something that he called "virtues," and both passions and virtues operated in the actions involved in living in certain ill-defined relations to a thing that he calls now "wisdom," now "skill," now "judgment." There are those who speak of a "philosophy" of La Rochefoucauld. One can only say that a philosopher who would try to get at the fact of human activity with such theoretical tools would be about as well equipped as a man who expects to chop wood with a sledge hammer. But however vague this type of thinking may be, it confronts the translator as a problem. And it is all but unsolvable. The Cartesian tradition has not contributed to the plain man's English anywhere nearly as rich a vocabulary as it contributed to the salon French of La Rochefoucauld's day. What is one to do with an expression like amour-propre? The English tradition of translations has preferred "self-love," which is perhaps as good as anything, since neither "egoism" nor much less "selfishness" will do. Mr. Kronenberger cuts the Gordian knot now with the word "vanity," now with the expression "self-esteem," and those devices yield him a number of exceedingly well-turned apothegms; but not only are they not La Rochefoucauld's—they completely obscure the philosophical theme which, after all, gives the "Maxims" a certain unity. La Rochefoucauld himself draws a consistent distinction between amour-propre and "vanity." I will not speak of actual errors, which are not infrequent in Mr. Kronenberger's version, though they do not figure in the versions of his predecessors.

On the side of style I cannot see that La Rochefoucauld made any great effort at terseness or smartness. His style is "quiet," subtle, elegant; not forceful, pointed, sharp. Mr. Kronenberger at one point reduces La Rochefoucauld from sixty-eight to twenty-eight words. That preoccupation too is non-historical and not genuine La Rochefoucauld. In general I believe that Mr. Kronenberger would have done better by following the English tradition more closely and trying to perfect it, rather than by trying to add a "new" Rochefoucauld to the many "new" ones that have been proposed in the past (the Pratt version, for instance, of five years ago, was the version of a man

SOME of Socialism's most bitter opponents agree that a Socialist experiment may ultimately be tried in England and America. John Strachey (who accurately forecast the present conflict between Communism and Fascism in The Coming Struggle for Power) now tells how such an experiment will affect us. Without criticising Capitalism, he shows what will take its place, answers clearly and in plain language many questions concerning Socialism that have troubled the minds of many Americans. Among such questions are:

Can Socialism or Communism be brought into being in America only through a violent dictatorship?

If Stalin died, would Russian Communism disappear?

If America should adopt Socialism would we necessarily follow the Russian pattern?

How would the life of an individual in New York—Birmingham—Little Rock—Tallahassee—Seattle differ under Socialism from that under capitalism?

Will the State own everything, under Socialism?

Will the people be regimented?

Will there be greater—or less—democratic rights, such as free speech and free assemblage, under Communism than capitalism?

What incentives can there be under Socialism for either a thrifty or an ambitious person?

IF THESE QUESTIONS, or others similar to them, interest you, you will find the answers in Mr. Strachey's book. It is both readable and important—and one of the most thoroughly practical books ever written on the subject. Just out, $3.00.

who was doing La Rochefoucauld after reading, I imagine, Walter Pater on Giordano Bruno). The English tradition requires plenty of perfecting. Why in Maxim VII has it occurred to no one to render les politiques by "statesmen," or to reduce La Rochefoucauld's preciousness, guerre, to the exact "struggle" in place of a generic "war"? Mr. Kronenberger's rendering of this maxim is mistaken throughout. In the end the author of the "definitive" version of the Maxims will, I predict, have to borrow to a large extent from an older English.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Outside the Persian Garden

HALF THE WORLD IS ISFAHAN. By Caroline Singer and Cyrus LeRoy Baldridge. The Oxford University Press. $5.

THERE is a considerable difference between the temper of Mr. Baldridge's drawings for "Half the World Is Isfahan" and Miss Singer's running text. The quotation from Gertrude Lothian Bell introducing the observations—"Every man carries a different pair of eyes with him, and no two people would answer the question in the same fashion"—applies to these fellow-travelers in Iran. The illustrations, graceful in line, mood, and color, might be used to advantage by the advertising department of a travel bureau beckoning customers to a picturesque far-off land. The text, although admittedly "sketchbook" in character and with an eye to the unique, leaves the impression that one may be thankful the proverb is not true, that a world half Isfahan would be just too much—both for the other half of the world and for many Iranian natives as well. The observations would, of course, not deter—they might definitely attract—students of history, anthropologists, seekers of the unusual; but in this volume of travels among the descendants of Great Cyrus one misses the infectious lively pleasure the authors seemed to experience in the Pacific countries commemorated in "Turn to the East."

In the year of time spent in Iran Mr. Baldridge and Miss Singer covered full 4,000 years of history—from the living primitives of 1936 to the buried primitives of Cyrus's reign and beyond, now being excavated layer by layer. They found a country of poverty, hard extremes of climate, and antagonistic races and religious—Moslems, Christians, Sufis, Jews, Zoroastrians, often several quarreling sects of each; slow, almost reluctant to throw off shackles of tradition, in spite of government commands. About one-fourth of the population are nomads, whose search for herbage for their flocks was recorded in the beautiful picture "Grass" some years ago. Manufacture, though primitive, reduces men to machines in an unmechanized economy—the authors watched the printing of cotton fabrics, each man printing in only one color, human Ben-Day processes. Real craftsmanship or originality of design is practically unknown. Great in the background is Anglo-Persian oil. And over all is the yellow dust of Iran, filling noses and mouths. One almost expects to hear of contests among Iranian sages who take a drink of water and see which can spit the straightest mud-pie, in the manner of American country-store champions aiming tobacco juice at the stove. But water is scarce in Iran. As in Egypt and other spots in this part of the world, the water makes Omar's rhapsodies over a jug of wine more sense than poetry. Typhoid and other unsanitary diseases are plentiful.

Neutral in the World War, "protected" by the mutual understanding between England and Russia, citizens of Iran are suspicious of Russia and England alike. At the entrance to every village and city the authors were asked by the ever-present collector of cartes d'identité, "Are you Russian?" "Are you English?" Starting rumors and spreading them is the great national pastime—rumors about the minister of the court, about other countries, about persons of humble station. Only rarely is there mention of a person of dignity or integrity, or saintliness—the Sufi dervish, a Jewish scholar, a very few others.

The volume produced by the collaboration of Miss Singer and Mr. Baldridge is a very handsome volume indeed, although probably of more interest to the collector of beautiful books than to the serious student of world problems. The really charming color pages and the marginal sketches of domed background, streets, hills, and people show pleasantly the varieties of scenes and types. The informative travel material of the text is supplemented by amusing anecdotes—the one about Mohammed and the Armenian who ghost-wrote the Koran will probably be remembered as a warning to ghost writers, "In'sh'Allah." In sum, the book supplies a lively movietone introduction to a country which for many is only a four-letter synonym for Persia in the cross-word puzzles, an introduction attractive enough to tempt abstainers from more ponderous fare.

Courage, Right and Wrong

NEW DIRECTIONS IN PROSE AND POETRY. Edited by James Laughlin IV. New Directions: Norfolk, Conn. $2.

NEW WRITING II. AUTUMN 1936. Edited by John Lehmann. The Bodley Head. 6 shillings.

THE NEW CARAVAN. Edited by Alfred Kreymborg, Lewis Mumford, Paul Rosenfeld. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.95.

THE fertile periods of literature are those of philological innovation," James Laughlin says; and in his stating of the purpose of "New Directions" he is informed, modest, open, and orderly. But modesty in the other sense does not mark the story by him, A Natural History. There is talent in it, and in his poem The Cat and Dog at Love's Door; and prudery in itself is a kind of obscenity. But it is not prudery to regret that this young patriot, helping to lead us out of the wilderness, in company with the editors of the other two books under discussion, should like them have courage of the wrong sort as well as of the right. The conspicuous item in "New Directions" is the self-reflexive essay by Jean Cocteau subtitled The Painter Chirico, in which the author, reciting as it were with eyes closed, exhibits a macabre irony and counterfeits cadaverousness with health in a way not short of wonderful. The translation by Olga Rudge is also of interest—showing that gifted intuition transcends small errors. John Wheelwright, critic and poet, contributes four Elegies of wirily obdurate rhythm. One sees by the cautiously exerted strength and effect of ulterior brilliance in The Gentleman of Shalott and two other poems by her that Elizabeth Bishop is serious and a writer. One suspects that Mary Barnard too, somewhat leanly represented by three poems, has a "future." Woodrow Wilson said we must have peace without victory, and Wallace Stevens writes sternly these days on the subject of peace with victory. He contributes to "New Directions" a group of poems distinct as usual in sound and substance, and to "The New Caravan" a poem about a triumphal statue of "gawky plaster," in a world in which covetousness is replacing patriotism, and Minerva's owl, the quaint citizen of Athens, is becoming a murderer. Kay Boyle, represented by three one-page stories, has a suicidal desire to be revenged on fate for having withheld something that she wishes; but even without it has a weapon which deserves a magnificent edge. Ezra Pound's wry wit and successfully unique use of italics appear in a tiny Canto—useful for comparison with his flock of imitators. We have a straight look from William Carlos Williams as contributor of a prose episode called A Face of Stone; and he has seldom done better than in his poem, Perpetuum Mobile: The City. Miss Stein also is present.

"New Writing," a bi-annual magazine in book form, "aims at providing an outlet" for writers whose work is held in question by "established magazines." Like "New Directions," this book does not threaten to founder through fear of prudery, but there are in it examples of deep insight and superior writing. George Orwell's Shooting an Elephant, which indelibly pictures mob power, is not only penetrating but unforgettable: "They had not shown much interest in the elephant when he was merely ravaging their homes, but it was different now that he was going to be shot." "When the white man turns tyrant it is his own freedom that he destroys." Mulk Raj Anand—contributor to "Life and Letters Today" and author of possibly the best condensed history of Persian painting that we have—has the turn of mind and the wording of a poet; creative inaccuracies of phraseology which are accuracies of meaning, impossible to any native American or Englishman; a mastering of dialect, that is to say, which preserves traces of foreignness, as in the plural for the singular, "she had touched the edges of prosperity." He has high humor and fine content: the converting of handicap into power. Martin Freedgood's Good Nigger and Leslie Halward's Boss are graphic and memorable.

"The New Caravan" set out to be "a collection of recent America's real and organic thoughts," and one hopes that Sheldon Cheney, writing of The Art Theater Twenty Years After, is typically and organically American and may everlastingly be so. "A few of us . . . believe," he says, "that the theater can be so potent . . . that it may be one of the agencies changing social environment," but "what room is there for conviction, for faith, when an author is writing . . . about the petty personal activities of unimportant faithless people?" In the work of certain co-contributors he is confronted by the very thing which he begs us to overcome—a diseased and selfish insufficiency; and when editors muddy the purity of criticism by the demure implication that we further art by presenting refuse to which cold-hearted publishers are inhospitable, the impurity under the guise of purity is doubly a reproach. Mr. Cheney, however, is not the only sound soul which the "Caravan" values. Ruth Lechlitner's group of poems has authority; Song of Starlings especially, in the rhythmic force of gravity which precedes the last stanza; and her biographical note is a model of trustworthy sensibility and firm technique. There are two poems by Anne Porter which reflect character; as, in turn, her biographical note approximates poetry. E. E. Cummings is represented by an expert biographical note rather than by his somewhat self-concealing two pages in the body of the book. To Conrad Aiken, Socrates's Greece and our cathedrals equally are shadows; social goodwill is hypocrisy, home life is lifeless. Stanley Burnshaw, on the other hand, says defeat is not defeat, and in The Driving Song bids you "Trust the dim light that drives The torrents of your blood." Marsden Hartley, chivalrous and shrewd—a painter writing about painters—has in two reminiscences given us what one hopes is part of a book. He speaks of the hands of Charles Demuth, "Chinese in character," that seemed "to be living a life of their own"; of his paintings, "harmonious, possibly to excess" but reflecting "a master of the comic insinuation"; and in the other memoir—Albert P. Ryder—says, "A great spirit was among us, finding, despite the thirteen cents a day, that he could live copiously in that world of greater experience in which . . . the only immoral act is not to do one's best work. . . . Be humble before the deep purpose of the universe, Ryder would seem to be always saying." Emjo Bashee in his play about the masses has constructed an apparent monotony which is a rivet-driver of impact at every point. Clarkson Crane and Ernest Brace are close observers. One applauds Paul Corey's description of the tractor-binder needle "flashing over the straw like a snake striking," and Philip Stevenson's ball-game lines: "When a batter slowed his swing for a curve or speeded it for a fast straight one, timed it right, met it square, and cracked it on a line for a hit—well—." The professional balance and ripely humorous humanitarianism of this latter story do a great deal for the "Caravan." In his play, The Dead Are Free, Alfred Kreymborg says "gabbling women gobble time"; and Edna Bryner in her story, Prelude and Fugue, also coins an aphorism: "Scoop away the scum and the water is still stagnant." This story has energy, verisimilitude, and charm, despite a few touches which if true to life ought not to be, and an aesthetic courage which gives the writing at times a rococo, insisted-upon effect. Eva Goldbeck's soliloquy, There Was No Time, is keenly applicable to all of us but in relation to the author's subsequent death seems sociologically both a dagger and a ghost.

Judged by our experimental writing, we are suffering today from unchastity, sadism, blasphemy, and rainsoaked foppishness; and since warnings to editors are not heeded, one would like to ask of one's fellow-writers, Is publication always better for one's talent than temporarily thwarted ambition? And since we can no longer depend upon the chivalry of editors to protect us against appearing at our worst, must we not achieve our own rigor?

MARIANNE MOORE

DRAMA

Fool of God

ACCORDING to the Group, which is producing "Johnny Johnson" at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, the piece in question is a "legend." That phrase will serve well enough in its place on the program, but it will hardly do to describe the curious fantasy, half musical and half dramatic, which Paul Green and Kurt Weil have concocted between them. The matter is as serious as possible, the manner often so broad as almost to suggest vaudeville or a revue, and yet the whole is somehow strangely effective. I am, in general, no great partisan of the experimental techniques, but "Johnny Johnson" is both amusing enough and moving enough to justify itself very handsomely indeed.

The hero is a sort of fool of God, an innocent young man who finally gets into the Great War because he believes it to be really a war to end war, and then baffles everyone from the drill sergeant into whose hands he falls first to the high command itself because he is too simple and too good to be understood by any person even normally complex or normally corrupt. Finally, he is sent to a hospital for mental cases, and

By As Little As 3/100,000 Inch

A MEASUREMENT that is finer than the one-hundredth part of a human hair. This man measures the expansion, by heating, of a piece of metal. If this expansion deviates by as little as 3/100,000 inch from the expansion of the material it is to match, only failure can result. Such precise measurements made possible the new all-metal radio tube.

Measurements of equal precision, in General Electric laboratories, are fundamental to the further development of quality in design and manufacture of all General Electric products. Careful measurements made possible the hermetically sealed G-E refrigerator, with its lifetime dependability and its low-cost operation. Precise measurements, by G-E scientists, of electric currents in vacuum tubes have led the way to present high standards of radio reception.

These are but a few examples of the contributions of scientific research and engineering in General Electric laboratories in Schenectady—contributions which have stimulated new industries, increased employment, and provided greater comforts of living.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric there, in what is perhaps the best scene of all, a psychiatrist diagnoses the case. Johnny is suffering from a rare disorder—the St. Francis complex.

Everyone will, I fancy, agree that the piece is at times ragged and uncertain. Every now and then the mood is broken, every now and then the author of the text seems to lose his sense of style, and to write a speech or a scene too realistic on the one hand or too near burlesque on the other really to harmonize with the dominant manner, which is poised at some definite point between the two. But however far short it may fall of perfection, its success in general is never in doubt, and the thing is held together by Kurt Weil's score, which seems to me not only ideal for the purpose but consistent in a way that the text is not.

Unfortunately, I am not technically competent to describe that score, much less to evaluate it. I can only say that I was fascinated by Weil's music some years ago when I first heard it at the strangely unappreciated production of "The Three Penny Opera," and that even to my untrained ear the new music is original in the same immediately recognizable way. Superficially, Weil seems to employ with almost equal facility any one of the idioms of popular music. He writes things which sound like military marches, popular ballads, or jazz tunes. But what he is really writing is some sort of mordant commentary on each. Whichever manner he seems to have adopted is always somehow subtly perverted; so that instead of lulling with the familiar it stirs one with a strange uneasiness. Sometimes the general effect is merely satiric; more often it is curiously morbid and insidiously disturbing to the nerves, filling one with an indefinable sense that all is not what it seems and not quite what one has comfortably supposed it to be. More than merely suitable to Paul Green's text, it is, I think, more perfectly realized, and serves to give a unity that the text itself is not always able to maintain.

This comic opera—if that is what it is—is very competently acted by members of the regular company of the Group, which evidently decided that a certain amateur quality in the singing was appropriate. On the whole the judgment was right, and most of the time the voices are quite adequate although there are occasional relatively ambitious passages to which the technical skill of the singers is simply inadequate. Perhaps it is worth while to add that "Johnny Johnson"—partly because it is genuinely entertaining despite its serious undertone—is likely to have a larger measure of success than is usually the lot of "experiments." I suspect that it will be genuinely popular.

So far, I have seen only the first of the three programs of short plays which Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence are presenting at the National Theater under the non-committal title, "This Evening at 8:30." Somehow or other Mr. Coward has it established as a fact that any appearance by him is a fashionable event, and I found two of the skits thoroughly amusing—especially the first one about the busy lady in the fast set who gets her engagements mixed and spends a hectic half-hour trying to discover the identity of two people whom she has apparently asked for cocktails. Miss Lawrence seems to get more expert as well as more attractive from year to year; she is superb both as the bewildered lady and as the small-time variety performer in the third piece. The middle one, a rather high-flown tragedy, was supposed to have substance but failed to come off so far as I am concerned, and the audience laughed twice when it wasn't supposed to—a pretty serious matter for a sophisticated playwright. Somehow, the less Mr. Coward has to work with the better he is. When he takes nothing he makes something out of it; but when he takes something he makes nothing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Doubtless our playwrights will have more to say on the subject of the Alaskan resettlement project, for, as "200 Were Chosen" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) is the first to point out, it is a lode too rich to go unexplored for long. Meanwhile E. P. Conkle's narrative is so persuasively argued by its thirty-two protagonists that there is some temptation to convert its flaws into virtues by reading "scope" for "diffuseness," "simplicity" for "oversimplification," "lack of pretension" for "lack of resourcefulness," and so on. The facts, however, are plain enough to undermine the play by the middle of the second act: merely, it is insufficient to compile an anthology of types and saddle them to a proposition that pioneers are as easily made into brigands by their own frailties and the bungling of those in command. The theme itself is of importance; but too much of its weight in the present case has been shifted from the context proper to the shoulders of the individual actors. It is the happy accident of its Actors' Repertory sponsorship that those receiving the burden not only are capable of bearing it well and effortlessly but supply an emphasis of their own even when the text is found wanting.

Oriental Cowboy

"SON OF MONGOLIA" (Amkino) is the only Russian film in a year which I have been able to enjoy without reservation. Even then I was uncertain during the first few minutes, when some business having to do with the introduction of Dulma's three suitors looked very much like the horseplay which has disfigured most recent films from a similar source. The Russians, I started to remind myself, are hopelessly horselike in their laughter and incorrigibly bearlike in their loves—all this, too, in an attempt to be kittenish like Hollywood. But the uncertainty was soon over. It became plain at once that the shepherdess Dulma preferred the shepherd Tseven to either of his rivals, and that the film was settling down to be something other than a wrestling match among the three. The affair of Dulma and Tseven did as a matter of fact turn out to be simple, convincing, and attractive. But this was incidental to something else: to a film packed full of fascinating and informing novelties, and to a story distinguished by the presence everywhere in it of a vast, happy, and primeval good-nature.

Producers of films should never forget the delight we take in mere information, mere novelty, and should never make the mistake of supposing that we can tire of being conducted by the camera into worlds we have not seen before. If "Son of Mongolia" were nothing but a newsreel it would still be one of the finest of current films. The landscape is of course wonderful—limitless in its distances and its dusts, and smoothed by time into the most suggestive shapes. But the people matter more. I do not expect to forget Tseven and his nomad friends; or the bald-headed lama squatting by his American alarm clock; or the other rogue of a lama who is bribed to lure Tseven into Manchuria; or the pot-bellied giant wrestlers; or the old men with wrinkled foreheads who watch them from the side-lines; or the denizens of inns and the singers of unearthly broken songs who appear for a moment in the incomparable interiors. These are obviously a great people, even to one who does not know exactly how to measure them. They have been here forever, they are very tough and wise, and there is a strength in their smiling which seems to say that they are rooted too deeply in the sour earth ever to desire the foreign sweetness of change.

"Son of Mongolia," however, is more than a newsreel. With Tseven Rabdan playing the role of Tseven, and with Ilya Trauberg doing an imaginative piece of directing, it grows into something picaresque if not epic. For Tseven travels into Manchuria on his little white horse; learns through many adventures there that his native republic is surrounded by enemies; and trots home a hero no less than a patriot. Rabdan in this role cuts a fine, merry figure; he is a plump Don Quixote who knows how to fill each landscape he crosses with human meaning, and how to sound each situation to its deepest chuckle. He is one of the best actors I have ever watched, just as this is one of the best films—an Oriental "Western" if you do not mind the contradiction in terms.

If "Son of Mongolia" had not been so good I would have spent more time praising "Song of China" (Little Carnegie) and "The Yellow Cruise" (Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse), both of which convey a great deal of information about the other side of the earth and both of which are heartily recommended. The first is a story dealing with the filial relation in China as it has been affected by the West, and is most interestingly acted by Chinese. The second is a travel picture, following the third Citroen-Haardt expedition from Beirut to Peking—that is to say, over the Himalayas and through some of the most interesting countries in the world.

After reintroducing Western literature to the pattern of classical tragedy in "Man's Fate," Malraux again concerns himself with the conflict which is waged wholly within the individual consciousness. A somewhat febrile analysis of terror whose excitement resides too much in the use of language and too little in the ordering of materials.

Eyeless in Gaza. By Aldous Huxley. Harper. $2.50. A turning-point in the career of one of our most intelligent novelists. A romantic ironist, from thinking too little of humanity, ends by thinking too much. Huxley's most serious novel.

The Earth Trembles. By Jules Romain. Knopf. $3. Volume V in the American edition of "Men of Good Will," Jules Romain's minute investigation of the social fabric of France. A great document rather than a great novel, whose intent and direction are still far from clear.

The Big Money. By John Dos Passos. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50. The concluding volume in Dos Passos's trilogy tracing the spirit and movement of American life from the beginning of the century to the end of the boom period of the twenties. With advised social analysis Dos Passos combines the qualities of a major novelist.

A World I Never Made. By James T. Farrell. Vanguard. $2.50. The life and times of the O'Neills of Chicago, but principally of Danny, aged seven, blending tenderness with toughness, and securing James Farrell's position as one of our truest historians of the American city-culture.

Absalom, Absalom! By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50. Another of Faulkner's Deep South dreadfuls, in which horror is drained of its last measure of intensity; by this right not only the author's best novel so far but one of the most formidable of our generation.

The War Goes On. By Sholem Asch. Putnam. $3. Days of wrath in Germany of the era of post-war inflation, projecting the chaos which spawned today's regime; written with power and objectivity.

The Borzoi Reader. Edited by Carl Van Doren. Knopf. $3.50. A publisher's honor roll, in which a distinguished company are represented with selections now a part of literary history. Includes Mann's "Death in Venice," Katharine Mansfield, Elinor Wylie, D. H. Lawrence, Thomas Beer, Walter de la Mare, H. L. Mencken, and a great many others.

Education Before Verdun. By Arnold Zweig. Viking. $2.50. A prologue to "Sergeant Grischa" which admirers of that novel will receive with interest, even though it fails to reach the high mark set by its predecessor.

The Works of Alexander Pushkin. Lyrics. Narrative Poems. Folk Tales. Plays. Prose. Selected and Edited with an Introduction by Avrahm Yarmolinsky. Random House. $3.50. An excellent one-volume introduction to Pushkin, edited with taste and care and selected with an eye toward presenting the great Russian at his representative best.

Stories of Three Decades. By Thomas Mann. Knopf. $3.50. Twenty-four tales representing all of Thomas Mann's shorter fiction over a period of more than thirty years (1897-1929); a handsome volume which Mann enthusiasts will welcome.

The Brothers Ashkenazi. By I. J. Singer. Knopf. $3. Perhaps the most important novel of Jewish life so far published in English, painting a double canvas of the Ashkenazi family and the city of Lodz, textile center of Poland.

BIOGRAPHY, MEMOIRS

John Reed. By Granville Hicks. Macmillan. $3.50. A biography which deals with fact rather than with legend; notable for the moving yet scholarly and restrained way in which the materials are presented and for the mastery with which the author reconstructs Reed's coming of age.

Friedrich Engels. By Gustav Mayer. Knopf. $3.50. Aims at a portrait of Engels the man; the first full biography we have had; written by the man best qualified to give it to us.

Green Laurels. By Donald Culross Peattie. Simon and Schuster. $3.75. Humanized history concerning the great naturalists' contributions; interesting, fresh, and informed with an original sensibility.

An American Testament. By Joseph Freeman. Farrar and Rinehart. $3. A bulging narrative of ideas, personalities, and events, in which an American intellectual reconstructs the influences which prepared him to espouse communism and crystallized his beliefs afterward.

Audubon. By Constance Rourke. Harcourt, Brace. $3. A carefully considered study of the life and career of Audubon, written with distinction, learning, and taste.

Letters to the Editors

Joseph Shaplen Versus The Nation

Dear Sirs: I think that the editorial "Peace" and the C. I. O. in The Nation of November 7 is a very fine analysis of the whole problem it concerns.

Washington, November 14

Dear Sirs: The Nation of November 7 carried a leading editorial on the peace moves in the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. controversy, charging me with unreliable reporting and warning readers that my stories in the New York Times on this question are not to be trusted. The argument you set up is founded upon distortions, misrepresentations, and downright suppression of fact. The record and documentary evidence available are against you.

While professing to desire peace in the labor movement, you seek to throw discredit upon the genuineness and sincerity of the peace moves and upon labor leaders involved, as part of your other objective of impugning my reportorial integrity and accuracy. According to your version, I first sighted "the dove of peace" at a luncheon attended by persons who do not seem to meet with your approval. You add that later I reported how Max Zaritsky, at the convention of his organization, "pulled the bird of peace out of a hat," as you put it. The fact that the luncheon in question was attended by an audience of representative labor men on both sides of the C. I. O. controversy and by others of influence and importance in the situation, in addition to Messrs. Woll, Cahan, and Zaritsky, is not recorded by The Nation. That would be lending weight to something The Nation finds it necessary to belittle, just as you find it advantageous for your purpose to ridicule the hatters' proposal.

Strange, was it not, that a little bird, pulled out of a hat, should have occupied the attention of the Committee for Industrial Organization for two whole days, with the entire press giving it front-page publicity? If only the editors of the country had The Nation's conception of news values! And was it not also strange that what The Nation refers to contemptuously as "rumors gathered in vague 'labor circles' of peace, compromise, and dissensions" should have been confirmed at Pittsburgh as hard, incontrovertible facts, by no means "exclusive to the Times"? I cite this not because I like dissension, but as an illustration that stories do not remain exclusive when based on fact.

For the benefit of readers who may desire more information and less bias, it should be stated that the peace idea was not born at the aforementioned luncheon. Serious talk of peace and of the necessity of peace had been in progress for months in the important labor circles where The Nation's editors are not known to move. Those truly familiar with the situation expected that peace moves would be launched as the A. F. of L. convention in Tampa drew near. Events confirmed the expectation. No one, of course, could be sure that the peace moves would be successful. No one ever said they would be. Weeks before the hatters made their peace proposal, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, David Dubinsky's organization, largest C. I. O. affiliate next to the miners, let it be known that it was anxious that peace in the labor movement be restored. At the convention of the New York State Federation of Labor in Syracuse on August 27, Luigi Antonini, first vice-president of the I. L. G. W. U., made an impassioned plea for peace. Speaking as a delegate of his union Mr. Antonini appealed to the federation to help "put out the fire," to use its good offices in behalf of peace. The Nation finds it inconvenient to record that fact. It doesn't fit into its special chronology and disturbs its thesis. It spoils its "peace dove" story.

Coupled with your suggestion that an old, highly respected, and progressive labor organization permitted itself to be used as an instrument for a sleight-of-hand performance, you suggest also that the Times permitted itself to be used as "a second-hand machine-shop for grinding Old Guard axes." It is quite clear what axes you are grinding. You underestimate and distort the events of October 4 and subsequent dates. You distort the character and immediate aims of the hatters' peace proposal, and you misrepresent the nature and purpose of the action taken upon it by the executive council of the A. F. of L. By juggling citations of some of my stories and Washington dispatches, while omitting others, you achieve conclusions directly at variance with the facts.

It is not true, for example, that the executive council of the A. F. of L. "ignored" the first part of the hatters' proposal, the part relating to the lifting of the suspensions against the C. I. O. unions. Nor is it true that this was the "crucial" part. As the authors of the proposal explained it to those willing to report the situation objectively, and in statements for publication, their hope was that once both sides appointed committees, as provided in the proposal, and entered into negotiations, a formula would be found, given good-will and co-operation on both sides, which would make possible the lifting of the suspensions. The record shows that the actions taken by the executive council and the committee appointed by the council to negotiate with the C. I. O. were clearly in the same direction.

It is likewise untrue that the executive council's committee sought to meet with "individuals" in a move to split the C. I. O. The record shows that the committee aimed at a joint conference with a committee of the C. I. O. unions.

The Nation ignores the fact that both the executive council and its committee, while undertaking no commitments, also made no stipulations—an important step forward in view of the council's previous categorical demand for dissolution of the C. I. O. as a condition preliminary to the lifting of suspensions. The "splitting tactic" charged to the council's committee is not born out by the facts. Nor is there evidence in the record that Mr. Zaritsky replied to any "splitting tactic." He merely reaffirmed his desire for collective peace. The situation as presented by The Nation on these and other points is therefore not "clear-cut" but rather a distortion of the real picture—"exclusive" to The Nation.

You have no proof whatever that I ever stated that "the C. I. O. was crumbling and begging for peace." This is pure invention on your part.

According to The Nation I was persecuting Mr. Lewis for "delaying peace by not accepting terms which would mean the end of the C. I. O. and all it stands for." The stories merely reported truthfully the dissatisfaction in C. I. O. ranks here with Mr. Lewis's delay in naming a negotiations committee after he had already accepted the hatters' peace proposal, characterized by The Nation itself as giving "whole-hearted defense and support to the C. I. O." Now that Louis Stark has reported from Pittsburgh that Messrs. Zaritsky and Dubinsky were "visibly disappointed" with the refusal to name a committee, I suppose it would be proper to state, in the language of The Nation, that "the 'peacemakers' were still irked." That Mr. Lewis had actually indorsed the hatters' proposal was reported in a dispatch from Washington in the Times of October 10. The Nation suppresses this fact. It confines itself to saying that in a New York story in the Times of October 9 I had misrepresented Mr. Lewis's position.

Two other exhibits you offer ■ introducing "a note of reality" into my allegedly false picture are spurious because you fail to give all the facts. I refer to the two Washington dispatches you cite so gleefully, the first of which was headlined "Labor Peace Move Strikes New Snag," etc., and "Move to Split C. I. O. Begun by A. F. of L.," etc. You fail to make clear that the letter to Mr. Zaritsky figuring in the first dispatch was from the executive council's committee in response to Mr. Lewis's demand for clarification, also reported in the same dispatch. You fail to mention that the letter was intended for transmission to all C. I. O. members, and that it was actually transmitted to all C. I. O. members. These facts do not harmonize with the charge of "splitting tactic," which you take pains to emphasize in your effort to discredit people you don't agree with and my reporting of developments. You also conveniently ignore the offer contained in the letter to reconsider the C. I. O. suspensions. You prefer to tell your readers that the A. F. of L. "ignored" this matter. As part of your effort to mislead on this point you ignore also the statement of William Green, president of the A. F. of L., in the Times of October 28 (first edition), in which he stated unequivocally that the A. F. of L. had abandoned its demand that "the C. I. O. be dissolved as a condition previous to peace discussions."

"We now make no stipulations precedent to a conference, because the executive council fully appreciates and understands that if a settlement of differences can be reached, both the dissolution of the C. I. O. and the reinstatement of the unions constituting it will be automatically settled," Mr. Green said. "That would follow logically."

The letter of the executive council's committee to Mr. Zaritsky and Mr. Green's statement just quoted did, indeed, introduce "a note of reality" into the situation, but The Nation chooses to suppress these facts.

Additional evidence of your unfair and colored reporting is offered in the suppression of an important detail in connection with the Washington story headlined "Move to Split C. I. O. Begun by A. F. of L.," etc. The story was based upon the letter from the executive council's committee to Mr. Zaritsky, the text of which was not available for publication in Washington when the story was filed. The actual text of the letter flatly contradicted the story, which next day, October 17, provoked a denial from the committee. The Times carried the denial, in accordance with proper journalistic practice. You ignore it completely in your one-sided picture. You print the accusation and suppress the defense. You also make much of a story in the Times of October 25, in which, according to your article, "the campaign against the C. I. O. reached a climax." The story appears to have been based upon information from steel circles. It so happens that I did not write this particular story. There never was any "campaign against the C. I. O." on my part or on the part of the authors of the peace proposal.

The story of October 27, in which I am supposed to have continued to "bait" Mr. Lewis, stood up, as have all the other stories you seek to discredit. Your suggestion that Mr. Lewis had come to New York to meet three prominent members of the C. I. O. without having any intention to speak to any of them about the C. I. O. situation is puerile. There is documentary evidence that he did come here with such intention. As a matter of fact, on his own suggestion, I was to call Mr. Dubinsky that evening to get whatever information there was available for publication after he was to have conferred with Mr. Lewis.

There remains, finally, the fuss you make about the Dubinsky speech of October 4. There is nothing in my report of that speech indicating that Mr. Dubinsky had abandoned the ideological position of the C. I. O. Mr. Lewis's views on Mr. Dubinsky's speech are irrelevant. Nor is the disagreement between Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green as to what Mr. Dubinsky said of any importance. I conveyed to Mr. Green a brief summary of the speech as it affected the possibilities for peace, and other relevant facts of the situation as it was shaping itself at that time. That was natural. He would have been a poor reporter who would have failed to get the Green angle of the story. What does matter is whether Mr. Dubinsky complained about my story. He did not. Had his position been misrepresented he would have been entitled to a correction and he would have got it. He expressed satisfaction with the story when I spoke to him on the morning of October 5. Because he speaks with unusual rapidity, making it difficult for a stenographer to follow him, he undertook—so he informed me—to correct the stenographic record and make such alterations as he deemed necessary.

The suggestion that there was no special practical significance in Mr. Dubinsky's speech is contradicted by the reception he received from the audience, the interpretation of other newspapermen present, and the consequences that followed. To cast doubt upon the validity of my report you forget to mention that three days later Mr. Dubinsky actually conferred with Mr. Green in an effort to facilitate peace. But I have already mentioned so many facts you found it convenient to forget that it is not necessary to add more.

The record shows clearly, to paraphrase your conclusion, that readers of The Nation must not take your reporting seriously. It is not reliable.

JOSEPH SHAPLEN

New York, November 10

[Mr. Shaplen fails to controvert the contentions of our editorial of November 7. David Dubinsky at the hatters' convention stated that his organization would like to have peace providing the basis of that peace was the organization along industrial lines of the mass-production industries. The Times report, which was headed "Peace Overtures Made to A. F. of L. by C. I. O. Leaders," contained Mr. Dubinsky's much milder statement that the C. I. O. would dissolve if the A. F. of L. would help organize the steel industry but omitted the underlined stipulation, thereby completely distorting the position of Mr. Dubinsky. Taken in conjunction with the headline, it clearly carried the implication that "C. I. O. leaders" were ready to recede from a position the C. I. O. has consistently held and continues to hold until the moment of going to press. The fact that Mr. Dubinsky did not complain is irrelevant. Neither did he complain about Mr. Lewis's correction which was contained in a dispatch from Washington the next day. On this score one of Mr. Shaplen's own defenders proves our case. In a letter to The Nation, which we shall not publish because it has already appeared in the Socialist New Leader, Richard Rohman, a labor reporter, who was present when Mr. Dubinsky spoke, testifies, in defense of Mr. Shaplen, that he [Mr. Rohman] reported Mr. Dubinsky's speech "in virtually the identical words employed by Mr. Shaplen." Then Mr. Rohman continues: "Mr. Dubinsky did say that he was prepared to give up the C. I. O. provided the A. F. of L. agreed to undertake a campaign to organize workers in the mass-production industries on an industrial-union basis"—which is exactly The Nation's contention.

The fact that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Green disagreed as to what Mr. Dubinsky said was obviously of the utmost importance since the industrial organization of the mass-production industries is the central issue in the controversy between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. We did not criticize Mr. Shaplen for getting the "Green angle" of the story. We criticized him because, from all indications, he gave Mr. Green the impression that Mr. Dubinsky had deserted the position of the C. I. O.

The "peace overture" of the hatters' convention, which was, to speak more accurately, a plea to the executive council that it reverse its position, was carefully quoted in our editorial. After a long introduction giving whole-hearted support to the C. I. O. and rebuking the executive council, the resolution (1) called upon the executive council to permit the organizations affiliated with the C. I. O. to be represented in the next convention; (2) proposed that "pending the rendering of judgment by the convention" the council name a subcommittee to meet with a like subcommittee of the C. I. O. "for the purpose of jointly exploring the possibilities of reconciling the existing differences and finding a formula by which the hopes of all workers for the unity of the labor movement and the organization of the workers in the mass-production industries may be realized." Since the C. I. O. could not be represented in the convention unless the suspensions were lifted, these two recommendations, if they mean anything, mean that the hatters were recommending that the suspensions be lifted and that the question whether or not to suspend be decided at a convention at which delegates from the C. I. O. unions as well as those from the other unions would be present and voting.

For the C. I. O. to have appointed a subcommittee without first having the suspensions lifted would have been to acknowledge the legality of that action, which the C. I. O. has so far refused to do. When, therefore, the suspensions were not lifted, the C. I. O. did not appoint a committee. We rest upon the text of the resolution, not on what its authors are reported by Mr. Shaplen to have thought they meant by it. The fact that Mr. Zaritsky hotly defended the C. I. O. in Tampa and that the C. I. O. interpreted the proposal as we have indicated must also be noted.

We did not state that the "peace idea was born" at the luncheon for Mr. Cahan. It was at that time that peace began its career in the Times.

We based our editorial comment on the text of the hatters' resolution. We maintain that "the part relating to the lifting of the suspensions" was crucial. The executive council ignored this section in that it did not lift the suspensions. If Mr. Shaplen prefers the phrase "refused to accept" we have no objection. The end result is the same.

We did not say that Mr. Shaplen "ever stated 'that the C. I. O. was crumbling and begging for peace.'"

Whereas Mr. Shaplen accused us in an earlier paragraph of distorting the character and immediate aims of the hatters' resolution, he later quotes with evident approval our description of the hatters' resolution as giving "whole-hearted defense and support to the C. I. O." Of course Mr. Lewis indorsed it since it restated his own position, but he accepted the two sections together and in order—(1) the lifting of suspensions, and (2) the appointment of a subcommittee. The executive council accepted only the second part. Large headlines reported Mr. Lewis as "joining" the peace move when he said that if the executive council would lift the suspensions the C. I. O. would be willing to negotiate. Is that "joining"?

The fact that the letter was sent to all C. I. O. members supports our opinion that it was a splitting tactic since it offered conferences with individual unions. Naturally the executive council denied that it was a splitting tactic. The executive council also denies that industrial unionism has anything to do with the present controversy.

We missed the first edition of the Times. We are glad to see that Mr.

Green was willing to relent on the suspensions. The Tampa convention was not.

We in no way suggested that "the authors of the peace proposal," if Mr. Shaplen means Dubinsky and Zaritsky, were making a campaign against the C. I. O. We suggested that reactionary A. F. of L. leaders were trying to split the needle trades away from the C. I. O. through bearing down on the value of an A. F. of L. affiliation. That campaign has now become overt.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Norman Thomas and the C. I. O.

Dear Sirs: Heywood Broun defends his unwarranted statement that Norman Thomas has not dared to indorse the C. I. O. by writing in your columns on November 21 that "if Mr. Thomas is lending support, I think he ought to notify John L. Lewis, the chairman of the committee."

If the C. I. O. leader does not know of Thomas's support, he doesn't read his own official organ, the United Mine Workers' Journal, which on September 1, 1936, reported the following: "Backs the C. I. O. Norman Thomas Takes Stand for Industrial Unions." The story begins: "Norman Thomas, Socialist candidate for President, has placed himself behind John L. Lewis and the industrial-union forces ordered suspended by A. F. of L."

Mr. Broun has the inalienable right to be ignorant of the most publicized of facts, but he has no reason to claim that John L. Lewis shares his ignorance.

The Sitdowns

Dear Sirs: My two articles on sitdowns—of which the first appears in this issue—are somewhat tentative. I have a strong suspicion that I do not know nearly all about them; and since I intend to have a chapter on the subject in my next book, which will deal with America, I wish to ask The Nation's readers who know, or think they know, more than I do to communicate with me. I am particularly eager to get reports on actual sitdowns, or occurrences which may resemble them, in other industries than rubber; and to be corrected on whatever may be wrong with these articles. My address is in care of The Nation.

"The Stones Awake"

Dear Sirs: Permit me to correct the mistakes made by Leigh White in his review of my book, "The Stones Awake," in your issue of October 31.

1. "Black River" was not my first but my second novel.
2. "The Stones Awake" is in no sense an attempt to relate the history of Mexico through the characters in the novel.
3. The lover of the heroine did not go off to join the Zapatista revolution.
4. Except by loose Communist definition, Francisco Madero was not an "aristocrat."
5. The heroine, Esperanza, was not brought into contact with "the decadence of Mexican officialdom and the Gringo influx"—God save us! until she had become literate.
6. Esperanza and her brother did not found a public school but a cooperative school after a public school had been denied to them.
7. Not the bulk or even a small part of the experiences of Esperanza can be found in "Mexican Maze."
8. It is a gross misapprehension of historical fact, as well as doubtful English, to speak of the "venal succession of Huerta, Carranza, Calles, Gil, Rubio, up to the pseudo-socialism under Cárdenas."
9. Mexico had no Presidents named "Gil" or "Rubio." White probably refers to "Portes" and "Ortiz."
10. Only three minor incidents of my own life, which apparently Mr. White knows better than I know his, were utilized in "The Stones Awake," though he categorically states that "scarcely an exploitable incident" of my life was overlooked.
11. Mexico has had no "bourgeois revolt" in this century, except possibly in the fantasy of American Communists.
12. It is technically incorrect to speak of the "Six-Year Plan of President Cárdenas." It is the "Calles Six-Year Plan."

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS ADAMIC contributed to our issue of May 6 an article on Harry Bridges and the San Francisco waterfront which provides excellent background for the present deadlock there. He has just returned from a trip to Akron, Toledo, and other mass-production centers. His account of the sitdown, which was invented in Akron, is particularly interesting in view of parallel developments in other countries.

ALVIN JOHNSON, since his boyhood on a Nebraska farm and through many years as professor of economics at various universities, has been a student of agricultural problems. He is now director of the New School for Social Research and president of the American Economic Association.

EDA LOU WALTON is a poet and critic whose next book will be a study of modern American poetry in relation to social problems.

PAUL SWEEZY is instructor in economics at Harvard University and a writer on economic theory for English and American periodicals.

HENRY DAVID, author of "The Haymarket Affair," and coauthor with Harry Elmer Barnes of "A History of Western Civilization," is an instructor in history at the College of the City of New York. He is now writing a book on the origin of women's rights.

CYRIL KAY-SCOTT, formerly dean of the School of Art at the University of Denver and curator of the Denver Art Museum, is now one of the directors of the Federal Art Project in New York.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON, translator of Pareto and of the plays of Pirandello, is associate professor of Romance languages at Columbia University.

B. E. BETTINGER, at one time on the editorial staff of the New Freeman, is now with the New Republic.

MARIANNE MOORE was one of the editors of the Dial when that monthly was the organ for many of the writers represented in the anthologies under review. She is one of the most distinguished of contemporary American poets, and her "Selected Poems" have recently been published with a preface by T. S. Eliot.

THE POWER OF A STATE TO ENACT A FAIR-trade act whereby a manufacturer may control the resale price of his branded product by the retailer was upheld on December 7 by the United States Supreme Court, passing on the constitutionality of an Illinois and a California act. Justice Sutherland, who delivered the unanimous opinion of the court, was careful, however, to limit the scope of the opinion to the protection of brands and trade-marks, and to point out that this does not make state price-fixing of unmarked products constitutional. Following upon the validation of the New York social-insurance law, this decision indicates a new strategy on the part of the conservative majority. The Tipaldo minimum-wage decision last year created a no man's land in which both the state and federal governments were powerless to act. Our guess is that the court will now be careful to preserve state power so that it may continue to restrict federal power over our economic life. One fact about the present decision is interesting. It will be recalled that last year the New York Court of Appeals, in the case of Doubleday, Doran vs. Macy, invalidated the very same fair-trade act as passed by New York. By a peculiarity of New York procedure the decision could not be appealed to the United States Supreme Court. But with the present decision from Washington on the Illinois law, it is up to the New York Court of Appeals to grant a rehearing in the Macy case.

WHAT DOES THE BUENOS AIRES CONFERENCE thus far add up to? There has been good-will galore; a determination to lower trade barriers, at least in quarters where competition is not acute; and a proposal to create peace machinery in the Western Hemisphere through a consultative pact and a common neutrality policy. In addition Mr. Naft, writing elsewhere in this issue, counts President Roosevelt's speech as a direct challenge to the dictators whose representatives applauded his demand for democracy, and as an invitation to action on the part of their oppressed populations. But good words are often spoken for liberty in the worst tyrannies. It's an old Spanish-American custom. We should be less skeptical of the effectiveness of Mr. Roosevelt's words if we did not know that Nazi influence is growing throughout Latin America; that 17,000 political prisoners lie in the jails of Brazil; that the government of Peru has just illegally set aside the election of a Social-Democratic President; that in Cuba the military regime of Batista completely dominates the weak civil power of President Gomez. It would be easy to argue that President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull cast their words for peace and democracy before men to whom they could carry no echo of reality. But we are glad they made the attempt.

WITH THE WITHDRAWAL OF CITIZENSHIP from Thomas Mann, first German man of letters, the Nazi government on December 3 brought to a climax a fortnight of official acts, which, if they were not stern reality, would sound like a burlesque of a Gilbert and Sullivan operetta. On November 9 a decree was issued compelling the owners of foreign securities in Germany to deposit them in the Reichsbank or its agent banks, which thereby become exclusive brokers for these securities. On November 27 Propaganda Minister Goebbels announced that all criticism of works of art, including drama, films, literature, painting, and sculpture would be prohibited in the Reich except "on the basis of the National Socialist view of culture." On November 30 Minister of the Interior Frick ordered all civil servants to abandon the terms Christian, Protestant, and Catholic in documents designating a citizen's religion. On December 1 the German Cabinet and General Göring jointly delivered themselves of a decree ordering (1) the death penalty for Germans discovered to have smuggled money or other property out of the country, and (2) all boys and girls to join the National Socialist youth organizations. This tightening up of the Nazi traces is more than an exercise in tyrannical ingenuity on the part of Chancellor Hitler. In spite of alliances, actual or promised, with other fascist states, world pressure against the dictators is threatening. And the clouds of war grow steadily thicker. A united front at home, by the mailed fist if need be, and the accumulation of funds and goods, by lawful or unlawful means, are imperative if the war chest is to be ready when needed.

A TOTALLY UNEXPECTED SHORT CIRCUIT blew out the Tennessee power consumers' conference whose projected meeting was mentioned in The Nation of December 5. It had been called to protect the interests of the Valley consumers in the face of suspicions that the TVA was about to compromise on rates with Commonwealth and Southern, the holding company that controls the Tennessee Electric Power Company. Delegates from all over the Valley seemed to mean business when they cheered Representative Rankin of Mississippi, who came out flatly against any partnership between TVA and the private utilities. Yet the next moment one of them jumped to his feet, declared the conference was an insult to the President because it implied lack of trust in his administration of TVA, and stampeded the delegates into voting an adjournment "forever." Behind this seemingly inexplicable incident is the feud between A. E. Morgan, chairman of the TVA, and David Lilienthal, its power director. Lilienthal is opposed to any truckling to the private utilities, while Morgan is said to be ready to compromise with them to a considerable extent. Whether actually suggested by Lilienthal or not, the consumers' conference was certainly designed to strengthen his hand. The untimely end of the conference will increase the pressure on the President to make the final choice between the Morgan and Lilienthal policies which he has been sidestepping for the past year.

IT IS A PLEASURE TO RECORD THAT AVERY Brundage, who was such an admirer of the Führer at the Hitler Olympics last summer, has been replaced in the presidency of the Amateur Athletic Union by former Judge Jeremiah T. Mahoney. Mr. Mahoney, it will be recalled, was forthright in his opposition to the Berlin games, and one of his first official acts as incoming president was to appoint Commodore Ernest Lee Jahncke as a delegate at large to the A. A. U. for the coming year. Commodore Jahncke was dropped from the International Olympics Committee because he openly expressed his anti-Nazi sentiments and Mr. Brundage was appointed in his place. The issue of Nazism will not arise in the games to be held in 1940. But it is highly desirable that the American A. A. U. be not controlled by Mr. Brundage or any of his friends who might share his appreciation of Nazi ideals of sport.

FOOTNOTE TO THE TUGWELL RESIGNATION: at the forthcoming session of Congress there is likely to be another sharp battle in the long war between the domestic beet-sugar producers and the refiners of imported raw sugar—a battle over tariffs and quotas. The beet-sugar interests look upon Mr. Tugwell's impending departure to join the American Molasses Company as merely one move by the enemy. Their Washington lobbyists busied themselves this week in calling attention to the fact that Tugwell is only one of several officials who have recently been put on the pay roll by the refining interests. John E. Dalton, former chief of the AAA's sugar section, is now working for the National Sugar Refining Corporation. Charles F. Boots, who was the Senate's legislative counsel at the time the Jones-Costigan Act was passed, recently joined the American Sugar Refining Corporation. James A. Dickey, who was an AAA sugar expert, is now attached to the Association of Sugar Producers of Puerto Rico. All these gentlemen may have been hired because of their expertness as technicians or executives. But they have enlisted in an industry without a peer as a seeker of legislative favors.

TROTSKY HAS FOUND ASYLUM IN MEXICO after a search for refuge which began when the Norwegian authorities notified him that his permit to remain in Norway would not be renewed. We congratulate President Cárdenas on his adherence to a great principle, the right of political asylum, which has become, even in Democratic countries, little more than a legend.

Mrs. Simpson and the Constitution

MERRIE ENGLAND is, as we write, in gloomy confusion. The sudden emergence of a constitutional crisis as a result of the stalemate between the King and Mr. Baldwin over the proposed royal marriage with Mrs. Simpson has left the world bewildered and fascinated. That the fate of an empire embracing one-fourth of the world's surface and population should hang so perilously on a woman's attraction for a man is an undreamed-of triumph for the romanticists and a vindication of the "Cleopatra's nose" school of history. Amid the array of consequences, however, two must be singled out—the light that has been shed on British mass psychology, and the problems presented to the British Labor Party.

The role of the press has been almost as disconcerting as was its role in the American Presidential campaign. To judge from the almost unanimous support the respectable press gave Mr. Baldwin, one would have thought that the British people would allow a narrow religious and nationalist outlook to dominate their democratic sympathies. Instead they have rallied to the King in what seem like overwhelming numbers. There can be little doubt that if a general election were held now, the party supporting the King would win by a Roosevelt landslide. The British monarchy, in so far as it rests on the attitude of the people to the king, has been democratized—we might almost say Americanized—as thoroughly as have the tabloids and the cinema.

It does credit to the political sagacity of Winston Churchill and Sir Oswald Mosley that they have been quick to back up the King and translate that backing into political advantage, the latter for his fascist party, the former for the new centrist party that he is reported on good authority to be forming. The Labor Party on the other hand is in a cruel dilemma. It confronts at once an opportunity and a danger. Never before has British labor had a chance to come out for so popular an issue as the King's freedom of choice in his private affairs, go to the country, and be overwhelmingly returned to power. Never before has such a tantalizing chance been so fraught with grave danger for the party and the whole nation.

The strength of the British Labor Party is rooted in two traditions. One is the tradition of the democratic way of life, with all that it implies for social equality, religious tolerance, personal freedom. Without tapping these democratic springs of conduct and sources of strength, the Labor Party could never hope to win power. But as Harold Laski pointed out in an article in the London Daily Herald and another in the New York Times, without the English constitutional tradition of ultimate ministerial responsibility it could never hope to retain what power it won. The Labor Party leaders therefore have deliberately shut their eyes to several facts—that Edward is a popular monarch, that the privilege he is fighting for is a democratic privilege accorded to all people, that he is a king far more sensitive to the economic plight of the unemployed and the population in the derelict areas than any other monarch is likely to be; and have kept in mind one fact—that once you establish the principle that the king can act without his ministers, you have broken down the chief constitutional protection of a future Labor Cabinet; you have established not only a constitutional but also a psychological precedent whereby a very different sort of king may some day be used by reactionary and fascist groups to overthrow the socialization program of a Labor government.

Whether or not the King abdicates, it is an unenviable dilemma in which British labor is placed. Not only the question of a possible future labor government but the more immediate question of fascism is involved. The hostility with which the King's expressions of sympathy for South Wales were received by Cabinet members shows that, from one point of view, he is far more liberal than they. Nevertheless, a paternalistic king with a reactionary group behind him pulling the strings, both successful in overthrowing the principle of Cabinet responsibility, might provide the exact formula for British fascism. The fact that the Young England Toryism of Winston Churchill and the open fascism of Oswald Mosley are the only organized groups solidly behind the King is extremely disquieting. In such a dilemma it would be ungenerous to say that the leaders of the British Labor Party have erred in giving Mr. Baldwin their support. One can only implore them to keep their eye as much on the psychological realities of politics as on its constitutional forms.

Don't Sell Out Relief

WE are dismayed by the speed and brutality with which the Administration has begun lopping off WPA workers and the relentlessness with which Aubrey Williams, in the significant absence of Harry Hopkins, points to cold figures and insists that he can do nothing about it. On the very day when WPA artists in New York were fighting with the police in a strike against impending dismissals, President Roosevelt was uttering utopian sentiments in Buenos Aires:

Men and women blessed with political freedom, willing to work and able to find work, rich enough to maintain their families and to educate their children, contented with their lot in life and on terms of friendship with their neighbors, will defend themselves to the utmost but will never consent to take up arms for a war of conquest.

The President must also know that men and women willing to work and unable to find work, too poor to maintain their families and to educate their children, will defend their meager relief jobs to the utmost even against an Administration reelected in a landslide greased with promises of adequate relief.

"We will provide useful work for the needy unemployed. We prefer useful work to the pauperism of the dole." So said the President at Madison Square Garden on October 31. A little while before, Harry Hopkins in his book "Spending to Save" recounted with justifiable pride the record of the WPA; at the same time he admitted its inadequacy. The reader had every reason to look forward to a permanent program which would not only provide the workless with a dry bed and three meals a day, but also use their talents in such a way as to raise their own and the nation's cultural standard of living.

The excuse for the lay-offs, of course, is absorption of the unemployed in private industry. But though the newspapers have blown the horn of plenty so loudly as to drown out dissent, private industry has somehow been able to find all the workers it needs among the unemployed not on relief. And the hollowness of the Administration's excuse is demonstrated by the fact that the ax has fallen with special ferocity on the art projects, whose workers will be the very last to be absorbed by private industry. Eleven mayors, including Mr. LaGuardia, have cabled the President, now en route from his good-will mission to South America, to protest against the drastic cuts.

Meanwhile it is an ironic commentary on the state of our civilization and on the high-sounding words of President Roosevelt that when prosperity comes in at the door, however fleetingly, an important cultural development is thrown out of the window. In cutting down the number of non-relief workers on the art projects, the political executioners are cutting out mainly the supervisors and administrators who have been responsible for the high standards to which these projects have been held. If these non-relief workers were "rich enough to maintain their families and to educate their children," we could have no just complaint. The fact is that the great majority of these people are so close to the edge that within a few weeks or months they will find it necessary to apply once more, as paupers, for relief. By that time, however, the project's administration and morale will have been wrecked and relief will deteriorate into mere made work, while the much-needed cultural outposts that have been established throughout the country will have been laid waste.

A Broad Base for a Labor Party

IT TAKES courage in these days to believe in the success of an American farmer-labor party. Long, long ago, back in the campaign of 1936, an almost solid labor phalanx joined forces with middle-class progressive groups, the Democratic urban machines, and the South to defeat the Republican reactionaries. It was a curious role for the militant worker. With his right hand he pressed the hand of the Democratic Party stalwart and said "Roosevelt." With his left he clasped that of his fellow-worker and whispered "1940." Despite this strangely ambidextrous performance his logic was good. Without Roosevelt in 1936 there could be no chance in 1940. But now after November the fluttering labor-party pennons seem as far away as ever. The trade-union ranks are deeply split. The Tampa rump convention has left the most reactionary elements in the A. F. of L. saddle. As for leadership in 1940, Olson is dead, Lewis is rapidly gaining enemies, and the La Follettes are still wrapped in their Hamlet-like indecision as to whether they are to be or not to be for a farmer-labor party.

But the unkindest cut of all is that of the American Labor Party. That, it will be remembered, was to be the New York spearpoint of a permanent national labor-party movement. "This campaign is to test our strength," everyone said, "but just wait until after the election." Their 300,000 votes in New York were a pretty fair confirmation of that strength. And now what has happened to the high hopes that burgeoned in November? They are in danger of being crushed in the hot and stuffy air of a committee room. And let it be noted that committee rooms do not gain sanctity by being stuffed with trade-unionists rather than ordinary machine politicians.

During the campaign the American Labor Party was a loose federation of various trade unions and political groups. After the election the executive committee of the American Labor Party appointed a subcommittee of seven to draft a plan of constitutional structure. While this committee was deliberating, a report appeared in the New York Times of November 30 saying that the executive committee had "adopted a resolution making ineligible for affiliation with the Labor Party any other political party or any member of any other political party." This would clearly exclude any member of the Socialist, Communist, or Peoples' Party unless the party organizations were first to dissolve. The New York Sun, with a somewhat different perspective, ran on December 2 a sensational story of a rift within the Labor Party, saying that the Peoples' Party group under Louis Waldman had outmaneuvered the left and center, "and the fervent young radicals who did most of the organizing of the movement are on the outside looking in." The next day the Times—but not the Sun—published a vigorous denial of this story. But the original Times story was never repudiated.

A bit confused in this maze, The Nation patiently made inquiries among various members of the executive committee to determine what had actually happened. It emerged that no meeting of the executive committee had been held for several weeks, nor had any definite action on the question of structure ever been taken by the committee. But at the meeting at which the subcommittee on structure had been appointed, and in order to guide the subcommittee in its deliberations, the executive committee had held an informal discussion to ascertain the general opinion on the question of admitting Socialists and Communists. The general drift had been that the resolution of the Atlantic City conference of New York trade unions, which had declared against such affiliation, should be followed. This consensus was of course not binding on the subcommittee, which had still to deliberate on structure and constitution and report back its findings.

We cannot urge too strongly how crucial the coming decision is. What confronts the American Labor Party is the choice between a narrow trade-union party and a broad and inclusive party built on a trade-union base but including every other element of strength. The dangers that confront American life are ultimately the dangers that European cultures have had to meet—lowered living standards, the smashing of trade unions and liberal organizations, the extirpation of civil liberties. To grapple with them nothing short of a popular-front organization will be adequate. In America this must take account of four principal sources of strength: the organized trade unions, the masses of unorganized workers, the farmers, the middle-class progressive groups. A plan of organization that excludes any of these must prove tragic for all of them. The Socialists have taken the lead, in the true spirit of a popular front, and have indicated their willingness to join an inclusive labor party. It is our fervent hope that the final action of the committee will be to recommend a broad, democratic base for the party. It must be remembered that while the New York labor situation is in many respects unique, what New York does may prove formative for the rest of the country.

All this would seem to lend point to a letter written to The Nation editors by Alfred M. Bingham, editor of Common Sense, and published on page 716. Mr. Bingham, who is well known for his advocacy of independent labor action based on the insurgent middle class, chides us for our consistent support of a farmer-labor party. He cites the tragic record of trade-union political action in Europe, and ends by an appeal for middle-class American radicalism. While we have been arguing in this editorial against a narrow trade-union party, we want to make a sharp distinction between Mr. Bingham's position and our own. The core of a farmer-labor party or of a popular front must be workers—the organized workers and those capable of being organized. Without them so-called independent political action becomes either wishful thinking or potentially fascist. Without their economic strength the party would be helpless in any political crisis. Without their discipline in action it would become chaotic.

We are aware of the number of instances in which labor reformist parties have surrendered to the cruel drift of history. What Mr. Bingham overlooks is that such is not the case today in Spain, where the workers are meeting heroically a situation of unparalleled crisis. Nor is it the case in France, where the Popular Front government, although weak in its international policy, is pushing through a program of important domestic reconstruction. The real point about Spain and France is that both steel and discipline are being injected into national policy by the combination of trade-union groups and the radical parties. What distinguishes our labor situation, however dark it is now, from the English is that the A. F. of L. has not yet written the last chapter of our labor history. The vast numbers of those still to be organized in the mass-production industries are potentially the best political material in the country. If a farmer-labor party can be built broad enough to include them, and to include as well the native populist tradition of the middle-class groups which Mr. Bingham rightly stresses, we can look forward to the future with stout heart.

Under Fire in Madrid

BY LOUIS FISCHER

[The following cable was received after an interval of three weeks in which we had no word from Mr. Fischer, and were alarmed for his safety.]

Madrid, December 6, by Cable

A MONTH ago today the siege of Madrid commenced. Judged by territory, the enemy has gained very little during these four weeks. On November 16 the Anarchist column fled in front of a small Moorish force and allowed the rebels to enter the university suburb. Since then government soldiers have fought stubbornly against odds for every bloody meter of Madrid soil, and Franco hasn't much to show for his heavy losses of men and materials.

Until six days ago the rebels attacked vigorously every day. The Loyalists held their line or retreated short distances to straighten it. Recently, however, the fronts around Madrid have been quiet. Quiet is a relative term. Every evening when the noise of the city traffic ceases, I hear from my hotel window the incessant boom of cannon and the sharp firing of machine-guns, which sounds like cavalry galloping over cobblestones. Nevertheless, in general enemy pressure has been somewhat relaxed. This may have been due to a regrouping or to waiting for reinforcements. Certainly the brilliant work of the Loyalist aviators has played an important role in checking General Franco's offensive. The government has lately had placed at its disposal a considerable number of so-called tank airplanes, which fly low and bomb troops of the supply-transport airdromes.

It is expected in military circles here that Franco, with the help of two or three or five thousand German soldiers who arrived this week at Cadiz with their arms and officers, will probably resume the offensive at the earliest opportunity. Indeed, it has already been launched. Yesterday afternoon I went for a Saturday stroll, walking from the hotel toward the Gran Via, Madrid's Broadway. A loud noise—"Puncture!" I said to myself. A similar noise, whose solidity and violence set me wondering. I entered a fashionable men's furnishing shop to buy some woollen socks (the stores in Madrid still have heavy stocks of winter underwear, warm blankets, and flannel garments while four kilometers away the men who are defending the city sleep lightly clothed in frozen trenches). Several customers were discussing the noise. "It's our artillery," a man suggested. But I couldn't imagine why the government would place guns in the center of the city. I returned to the street. People were hurrying, looking around, puzzled. The noises multiplied; smoke rose from above the roofs of the skyscrapers. Franco was bombarding the heart of Madrid. This morning the cannonading recommenced, and as I write I hear projectiles crash into buildings a few blocks away. How does one behave under these conditions? At seven I was awakened by artillery fire. I thought of getting dressed, then I decided I could do nothing anyway, so I turned over and slept until eight-thirty. Then I bathed, shaved, had breakfast, and now I am at the typewriter. Of course, my hotel may soon become a gunner's target. One thinks of traveling to safety, but one is ashamed to run away.

General Franco, the supreme Christian ruler of reactionary Spain, is not inexperienced at this strategy of attacking a defenseless civilian population. He has registered many victories over the women and children of Madrid. Air bombings of the residential quarters have become so regular that one looks at one's wrist watch and says, "Four o'clock, hm. They haven't been here yet." I've heard many raids and seen the machines which were making them. I have visited the spots where bombs had fallen. I have watched the rescue work in the smoking ruins. But on Friday I was in such a raid and I can declare that there is nothing so harrowing and so criminal in all the world. I was riding in an automobile just before two o'clock in the afternoon when I noticed people running. Soon the streets were empty. I could now detect the roar of airplane motors. Suddenly there was a crash, and before one could think a mountain of smoke rose above a five-story building down the street. We turned the corner; there was another deafening bang, and the bricks of the cornices mixed with wood and glass separated from a huge apartment house and fell across our path about three hundred yards ahead. We stopped the car and rushed into an entrance. A bomb whistled as it approached the earth. It made one cold all over. "Where will it hit?" I tried to force the door open to seek better protection, but a column of air struck the door and made me recoil. The bomb had crashed into the third house from the one where we had sought refuge. At the same moment another bomb landed. From the low pitch of the report I guessed it had fallen on the pavement. Half of a granite block blackened by the explosion came vaulting over a roof and fell into a narrow court to which the doorway where I stood led. A woman opened a door and called to us to come in. "Such barbarians!" she exclaimed.

For several minutes there were no bombs. We opened the door. There was no hum of propellers. We returned to the street. A military motor cyclist asked for my car to transport the wounded. He was commandeering all automobiles for this purpose. Presently they began to return with people who had lost limbs or parts of their faces. In such moments one hates violently; the hate remains.

From the lower floors of bombed houses women, old men, and little children started to creep out. All was white; white hair, white faces, white clothes—powdered by crumbling plaster. A girl of thirteen retrieved a canary bird in its cage. She carried a milk bottle under her arm. A woman with a nursing baby, both howling, the mother's dress black where she held the child. A wrinkled old woman wrapped in a blanket, every feature on her face trembling uncontrollably, stood on the pavement dazed and asked repeatedly, "Where can I go?"

I walked back. Streams of homeless strayed through the streets, carrying now an overcoat, now a bundle of clothes, now a child's mattress. Women stood in groups wringing their hands and swaying from their waists in the rhythm of despair. This has gone on for weeks. I went through streets where not a single window pane was left intact. Whole sections look like an earthquaked city. Yet people go on living there. "Where can they go?" The Spanish government, with every resource absorbed by war, hasn't the trucks or buses, or food or money enough, to evacuate the civilian population of Madrid, and from outside comes no help. Where is the world which answered the call of Belgium? Where is the humanitarian heart of the millions who go to church and pray to God, or of the millions who call themselves idealists yet go about their business signing letters, having manicures, seeing cinemas, while a city of culture and beauty is being ground into dust?

I later learned that the raid had been carried out by twenty-eight Junkers and two Capronis. Those heroic aviators know that they killed innocent women and children and noncombatant men. They've been doing it for weeks; they are well practiced by this time. They take their orders from Berlin and Rome. Their dictator masters have made a cult of frightfulness. When the Abyssinians didn't yield, gas was used. The cultural level of the enemy is immaterial. The people which produced Cervantes, Velasquez, Goya, and El Greco are treated with the same ruthlessness as were Selassie's black warriors. Western Europe must expect no better fate.

In Spain two vast world forces are testing each other out. So far the fascists have displayed more initiative and greater daring. They were the first to send airplanes and equipment. Now they are the first to ship troops. Their submarines and other naval craft spy on and interfere with the operations of the loyal Spanish fleet in eastern harbors. Their impudence is unequalled because England and France showed them in a score of situations—Ethiopia, the Rhineland, and so on—that he who dares wins. Democratic diplomacy is no match for fascist arrogance. If Franco conquers, Europe will be black or Europe will go to war as soon as Mussolini and Hitler are ready. Madrid may or may not fall. That cannot be the end. The government is scoring important military victories in Navarre, the Asturias, and Aragon. A loyal force is threatening Talavera, in the heart of the enemy territory. Franco's rear is eaten away by revolts, peasant sabotage, and workers' resistance. Prisoners taken show that he is employing untrained Moorish tribesmen because his reserves are exhausted and Spaniards won't fight for him.

The die is not yet cast. This affair may last longer than anybody now believes.

Hamstringing Federal Investigations

Washington, December 7

THE opening of the annual season for federal investigations is at hand. In the coming week the long-pending examination of American railroad finance will begin, and the F. C. C.'s investigation of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, in recess for several months, will be resumed. The S. E. C. has an important investigation of investment trusts already under way, and a few weeks hence the La Follette committee inquiring into the business of union-busting and strike-breaking will convene for a few more dramatic revelations designed to get from Congress the funds the committee needs for a bona fide investigation.

All these things combine to make pertinent at this time a few generalizations on Congress's power of investigation, which always has been among the most vital of federal powers if not the most vital, and now takes on additional importance in view of the patent waning of moral indignation among the tired New Dealers. Nearly all Roosevelt's young men are anxious to believe that the groups that hated them prior to November 3 now adore them and mean to mend their ways. They are eager to yield to the losers' pleas for no reprisals, for a peace without victory; peace—and rest—is what they want. The danger is that in their resulting languors they will be easy marks for groups seeking to avoid exposure at the hands of investigating committees.

It would not be necessary for their seducers to persuade them to call off or otherwise completely prevent investigations. That is too dangerous a course; there are other and better ways of crippling an investigation, ways that are subtle and conceal the maiming from public view. One of these is to persuade the investigating committee to suppress or soft-pedal certain lines of inquiry, avoid calling certain witnesses, leave untouched or undeveloped certain themes and deals. Attempts toward these ends already have begun in connection with both the railroad and telephone inquiries. For example, certain Senators in the most intimate and friendly fashion are urging members of the railroad investigating committee, headed by Senator Wheeler, to "let these railroads recover; go easy."

Another method of stifling an investigation is by inserting in the investigators' credentials a trick clause which has no apparent significance to laymen. Here, too, we may point to the railroad investigation as an example. In order to get the Wheeler committee's credentials released by the Senate Audit and Control Committee—a tight little group of three reactionaries and one pseudo-liberal—it was necessary for the resolution's backers to accept a compromise in phraseology restricting the investigation to a sampling list of railroads to be picked by Joseph B. Eastman, then Federal Coordinator of Transportation. The Audit and Control Committee—Tydings, Townsend, Byrnes, and Bachman—took advantage of their sole responsibility, supervision of the Senate's purse, to see to it that there should be no sweeping investigation of American railroad finance as a whole; and its stratagem remains a successful one to this day, although Eastman did the best he could within the resolution's limits and picked eighteen roads for Wheeler's committee to probe. The committee's investigators have found their digging blocked time and again as their subjects smirkingly commanded them to stop and pointed to the Senate resolution for their authority. Wheeler's investigators have found, as they and the Audit and Control Committee's prompters knew they would, that though the Senate may draw lines of demarcation through the fields of railroad finance, Wall Street draws no lines, and that deals they must investigate in the eighteen roads on their list are inextricably interwoven with deals in roads and firms beyond their reach because they are absent from the list. In short, they have found themselves charged with investigating conspiracies in which they dare concern themselves with only one conspirator and therefore cannot touch the conspiracy itself.

Mention of the Audit and Control Committee brings up the third and most effective method of choking off an investigation, and that is to starve it to death for want of funds. The La Follette committee is a case in point. It got only $15,000 to investigate that most difficult of subjects, an industry whose trade is secrecy, and with its investigation less than well begun, the committee's funds have been virtually exhausted. Given many times less than Congress frequently has voted to bring a W. C. T. U. or Elks' convention to Washington or to aid an Arkansas or Texas centennial celebration, the La Follette committee has had to borrow staff members from other agencies and in the few hearings held to date has had to confine itself to fragmentary presentations of evidence because it could not afford the fees and travel allowances necessary to bring witnesses to Washington for long enough to tell a coherent story. The Wheeler committee is a victim of the same kind of niggardliness, though in lesser degree, for it managed to wheedle $75,000 out of the Senate at the start and an additional $25,000 a year later. But contrast that total of $100,000 with the magnitude of the committee's task. It is embarked upon long, dreary, and painstaking research by highly skilled lawyers and accountants (to whom under a 1933 statute designed to curb investigations it can pay no more than $3,600 a year), and it is dealing with a $20,000,000,000 to $27,000,000,000 industry that presents one of the most convoluted structures in the national economy. The Federal Trade Commission spent $1,800,000 just to investigate the relatively new and simple electric-power industry, a $12,000,000,000 enterprise, and devoted more than six years to the task, which laid the groundwork for the Wheeler-Rayburn bill.

That a similar bill applied to railroad holding companies is in the offing and that the railroad investigation will lay the groundwork for it was foreshadowed in an announcement a few days ago by Senator Wheeler that when the committee opens public hearings on December 7 it will focus at once on holding-company control of railroads. The names of the witnesses subpoenaed for the initial hearings suggest that the committee will lead off by showing how it is possible through the holding-company device to pick up a vast railroad empire with a shinplaster, if one can get the proper Wall Street house or houses to superintend the feat. The list also suggests that the part that corporation lawyers play in these feats of financial legerdemain is at last going to come in for the currycombing it deserves. Leading the list of witnesses summoned were the two septuagenarians, George A. Ball and George A. Tomlinson, who last year helped keep the late Van Sweringen brothers at the top of a $2,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 railroad empire by putting up a few millions and taking off the hands of J. P. Morgan and Company the controlling stock interest in Alleghany Corporation that the Morgans held as collateral on a $40,000,000 loan to the Van Sweringens. Before the week is out this deal will have been stripped of most of its mysteries.

You would not be far wrong if you had jumped to the conclusion that the Presidential order giving the Secretary of State regulatory powers over the matrimonial inclinations of American diplomats, consuls, and their staffs was inspired by E. Phillips Oppenheim. This venture in what Jack Herling calls nationalization of passion turns out to have been inspired by William C. Bullitt, until recently Ambassador to the U. S. S. R. and now Ambassador to France. Bullitt's imagination is at least on a par with Oppenheim's. He signalized his arrival at the World Economic Conference by insisting that the rooms of the American delegation at Claridge's immediately be searched for concealed dictaphones, peepholes, and cameras. Later he interrupted a luncheon at the American embassy by suddenly jumping to his feet and dashing to a window outside which the end of a wire dangled. The cry of "spy" died on his lips when his dash to the window ended in a discovery that the wire was attached to a humble telephone repair man. The romantic Mr. Bullitt has for some time been lobbying for just such an executive order as the one which was signed by President Roosevelt on November 17 but not made public until a few days ago.

The order, as you know, forbids foreign-service officers to marry aliens without permission from the Secretary of State, and to submit their resignations along with their requests for such permission. There is a story going around Washington that connects the order with our embassy at Rio; according to this tale, the Belgian wife of Ambassador Gibson is a Rexist, and he has grown steadily more reactionary since marriage. It is a yarn that overlooks many things, including the fact that the order is not retroactive. Bullitt, on the other hand, has not concealed his passion for a prohibition such as the order lays down. He used to complain bitterly to friends here that at dinner with his staff at Moscow he could not discuss official business without risk of the whole diplomatic set of Moscow being made aware of that business the following morning through the alien wives of his aides.

Behind the Pan-American Front

BY STEPHEN NAFT

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S speeches in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires in connection with the opening of the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace have broken with all American diplomatic precedents. He did not offer the customary condescending promises of protection or concessions to the little fellows by the big brother. Instead he made a virtual appeal to solidarity and mutual assistance among equals in view of the forthcoming European cataclysm, which cannot leave America unscathed. His address in Buenos Aires was a challenge against the implantation of European fascism and a warning to non-American nations to keep hands off this continent.

It was not merely a tactful departure from the usual haughty interpretation of the hated Monroe Doctrine, implying the right to intervene in the affairs of other American countries. Roosevelt's idea of mutual protection is actually foreign to the original idea of Monroe. And a new inter-American multilateral declaration or covenant is expected to result from this conference as a joint warning and affirmation of American solidarity and mutual defense.

The changed attitude must not, however, be ascribed to the enlightenment of President Roosevelt alone. Technically and economically the United States today needs the help of other American countries almost as much as they need the United States. No longer is America protected, as during the last World War, by those two great moats, the Atlantic and the Pacific. Submarines and airplanes now easily negotiate oceans. General Balbo arrived here with two dozen airplanes from fascist Italy in military formation. Japan and Germany have huge airplane carriers from which they can loose their bombers to spread death and destruction over New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, as well as over Buenos Aires and Rio.

The President's reception during his visit to South America leaves no doubt that the former hostile attitude of almost all Latin American countries has undergone a great change in the last few years. The popular demonstrations in the streets, the ovations given him by deputies and senators and by the usually nationalist and anti-imperialist students, cannot be dismissed as just another polite exchange of diplomatic amenities. True, young Liborio Justo, the son of the Argentine President, interrupted Roosevelt's speech in Buenos Aires with the traditional shout, "Down with imperialism!" However, his outburst may be explained by the fact that he is a quite recent convert to the Communist Party. Having probably reached only last year's line in his required reading, this young man appears still to believe that to prefer the lesser evil is counter-revolutionary opportunism, though the present solution adopted by his party lies in the united front with all non-fascist parties to the right of the Communist Party.

It may safely be said that the United States has abandoned the idea of expansionist militarist imperialism in the Western Hemisphere. The abrogation of the Platt Amendment, the withdrawal of the marines from Haiti and Nicaragua, the abandonment of financial control in the Caribbean and in Central America were practical and undeniable demonstrations of this tendency. The United States now has all the territory it needs at the strategic points for the military protection of the Panama Canal. The Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, Guantanamo Bay, the St. Andrews and Providence Islands are outposts in the East, while the naval stations in Fonseca Bay, Hawaii, and Guam play the same part in the West. No Latin American government visualizes at present any invasion or intervention on the part of the United States.

Some pessimists may not be fully convinced that President Roosevelt's statement, made on December 28, 1933, before the Woodrow Wilson Foundation in Washington, to the effect that "the definite policy of the United States from now on is opposed to armed intervention" will be forever binding on all future policies of the United States. But at least they believe in the more realistic assurance of Secretary of State Cordell Hull, made a few days before at the close of the Montevideo conference, that "no government need fear any intervention on the part of the United States under the Roosevelt Administration." That conference ushered in the new Administration's "good neighbor" policy. The United States approved a convention on the rights and duties of states, according to which "no state has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another." This policy marked a complete reversal of the attitude the United States had taken during the previous Pan-American Conference held in Havana in 1928. At that conference all attempts to vote similar conventions or resolutions were strenuously opposed and prevented by the American delegates and by their Latin American satellites, Cuba, Nicaragua, and Peru, whose dictators remained in power only because of the military or financial assistance of the United States.

Sentiment against the United States ran so high during the Havana conference that Argentina even opposed the plan of building a pan-American road between Washington and Buenos Aires for fear, as the delegate from Argentina put it, such a highway might lead from Washington to Buenos Aires rather than from Buenos Aires to Washington. The hostility was based on very concrete economic reasons—the refusal of the United States to admit Argentine meat products in competition with the American meat industry. The pretext or reason given for this embargo—precaution against transferable plant and animal diseases—did not console the Argentine cattle raisers. Nothing could have gone farther toward reconciling the Argentine than President Roosevelt's virtual promise, during a luncheon with President Justo, that animal diseases in one region would no longer be used as a reason for excluding exports of meat products from the entire country. Sick sheep and ailing cows will no longer stand between the friendship of Argentina and the United States.

The United States no longer faces a hostile and pro-German Mexico in the south, as during the World War. As in former years, Brazil relies on the United States as its best customer for coffee, its main export product. There was never any serious friction between the two countries. Colombia, for many years bitter, has been reconciled by a $25,000,000 compensation for the loss of Panama, separated from the mother country by the "revolution" so skilfully engineered by Theodore Roosevelt. The present Colombian government under President Lopez has a united-front regime of all leftist elements. At the May 1 celebration this year, both President Lopez and the leader of the Communist Party, standing side by side on the balcony of the presidential palace, addressed the demonstrating crowd.

None of the Central American countries now has any grievance against the United States. Though these countries defaulted all dollar loans, the United States waived all its claims and rights on the revenues of the custom duties which were pledged for the payment of loans made to these governments. During the Chaco war the United States was not accused of siding openly with either of the belligerents. At the time of the Arica affair a sensible solution for the conflict between Peru and Chile was proposed from this country: to cede Arica to Bolivia—against compensation to Chile and Peru—and thus to give this landbound country an access to the sea. Had this proposal been followed, it probably would have prevented the subsequent Chaco war. Thus it may be said that the United States has at present no enemies on the American continent.

Certain points of dispute still remain among the nations below the Rio Grande. There is the rivalry between Brazil and Argentina for South American hegemony, the unsettled frontier problem among Ecuador, Peru, and Colombia, and the unfulfilled aspiration of Bolivia for an access to the sea. By far the most dangerous and the most immediate threat to the peace of South America is the unsettled dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay over the Chaco Boreal. Yet in the face of the possibility of a renewal of the Chaco war, this item has been expressly excluded from the agenda at the Conference for the Maintenance of Peace.

What was the real purpose behind the calling of the conference? Roosevelt's speech in Buenos Aires provided the clue. He stressed not less than fourteen times his advocacy of the principles of democracy, constitutional regimes, democratic government, individual liberty, personal freedom, and social and political justice. To a large extent his address was an emphatic warning against fascist adventures, and particularly against the danger of foreign—that is, European—fascist intervention or invasion. The South American brand of frankly military dictators and unconstitutional or semi-constitutional presidents who do not enjoy mass support is somewhat less dangerous to peace than the overseas brand of popular fascist dictators. Yet Roosevelt's speech was apparently also a warning to those Latin American countries which flirt with the idea of aligning themselves with the European fascist countries.

Already Salvador and Nicaragua have recognized Italy's conquest of Ethiopia and the Franco regime in Spain. It is reported that Chile's President, Alessandri, originally elected as a liberal, is likewise inclined to recognize Franco. With the exception of Mexico, Colombia, and Costa Rica, almost all Latin American governments have expressed, directly or indirectly, their sympathies with the Moorish, German, and Italian invaders and destroyers of the mother country, by harboring and protecting the fascist refugees in their embassies.

Bolivia and Paraguay have at present totalitarian dictatorships headed by militarists. Bolivia's new dictator, who a few months ago obtained power as a result of a military coup, is the chief of the country's "National Socialist Party." One of the forerunners and founders of this party was Captain Ernst Röhm, who until 1932 was instructor of the Bolivian army in preparation for the war against Paraguay.

The fascist movement is growing in most of the South American countries. The Integralistas in Brazil, the Nacistas in Chile are being organized and instructed by Germans and Italians. Only Colombia and Mexico have leftist governments. Venezuela is still groping to establish political parties and labor unions after the death of the dictator, Gomez. Chile, Ecuador, Peru, Argentina, and Uruguay enjoy constitutions which are innocuous adornments for the semi-dictators who wield all the power.

However, in a number of these countries the fascists are still badly divided. There are no less than eight fascist groups or parties in Argentina, and four in Chile. Not everywhere does the army sympathize with the fascists, as it fears their competition and does not relish the idea of being superseded by civilian upstarts and armed ruffians. Moreover, united fronts, left blocs, and popular fronts of anti-fascist parties are springing up in every country. The trade-union movement, hitherto divided along ideological lines, shows everywhere a tendency toward unification. Notable electoral successes have been obtained in Argentina, Chile, and Peru, as a result of which some of these governments were forced to yield political rights and reforms. In Argentina the candidates of the united front obtained the majority of all seats in the Chamber of Deputies during the last congressional election, and in Peru the presidential candidate of the left bloc won a few months ago the majority of the votes—whereupon the elections were promptly invalidated.

Strong native radical and leftist movements and parties are being formed in some of the South American countries. These movements have greater mass appeal than do those left parties which receive their inspiration from abroad. Among these new parties which speak the language of the natives and are, as a rule, concerned with the specific interests of their respective countries, are the Uniristas of Colombia, the Apristas of Peru, the Alianza Libertadora Nacional of Brazil. Each of these parties has a greater following than any previous leftist movement in South America.

While at present peace prevails among the various Latin American republics, serious conflicts are brewing within almost every one—the final contest between fascism and democracy. These struggles will hardly be decided at the polls. The danger will come if, following European examples, the fascist countries rally to the assistance of South American fascists or, worse still, if the latter ask or accept assistance from European fascists. It is on this point, perhaps, that the Monroe Doctrine, old or new, will have to be again invoked—but this time for the defense of the liberties of American peoples.

Whatever their platonic and sometimes even practical sympathies for fascism and fascists, several American countries seem to be apprehensive of the possibilities of aggression from Europe. America's apparent intention of obtaining from this conference merely a pan-American declaration of neutrality, and of preventing shipments of arms and munitions to belligerents in case of a world war, seems not to satisfy at least one-third of the countries represented. According to a recent dispatch, the five Central American republics, as well as Panama and Colombia, want the proposal of the United States strengthened by the inclusion of a declaration of solidarity to a point where non-American aggression against any one of the twenty-one republics would be considered aggression against them all. As aggression from abroad could come only from fascist countries, such a declaration would be in effect a promise of mutual assistance against fascism.

Whether actual treaties will be concluded for the prevention of war in the Americas, whether real neutrality will be established and maintained during the coming world war, and whether plans for mutual assistance would work, only time will tell. However, the danger of a world war in which the entire Western Hemisphere might be involved and the warning speeches of Roosevelt and Hull will greatly contribute toward strengthening the anti-fascist parties in Latin America.

Europe's Eleventh Hour

Geneva, November 19

MUSSOLINI'S speech at Milan on November 1 has to some extent modified the European situation; at least that has been the effect of the encouragement he gave to Hungarian "revisionism," that is to say, the aggressive designs of Hungary against the countries of the Little Entente. It has been reported that the passage about Hungary was inserted at the last moment at the request of the German government. I have been unable to verify this report, but it is at least a possible hypothesis. For, coupled as they were with compliments to Yugoslavia, Mussolini's remarks about Hungary looked like an attempt to split the Little Entente. He can have no particular reason at this moment for wishing to do so. On the other hand, the partition of Czecho-Slovakia among Germany, Hungary, and Poland is a permanent aim of German and Hungarian policy. That aim would be facilitated by the disruption of the Little Entente.

In any case Mussolini's declaration about Hungary was a diplomatic blunder. When he made his speech, the countries of the Little Entente had to some extent been drawn into the German-Italian orbit. The influence of France on the European continent had steadily declined since Barthou's death in October, 1934, and five months of the government of the People's Front had reduced it to nil. It had become more and more evident that England would do nothing to prevent Central and Eastern Europe from passing under German control and that in all probability it was the deliberate intention of British policy to give Hitler a free hand in the east in the hope of keeping him off the west until the rearmament of England was complete. The unconditional abandonment of the "sanctions" against Italy terrified the smaller European countries, which realized that they had nothing to hope for from the League of Nations and saw themselves sharing the fate of Abyssinia. It failed, moreover, in its purpose of bringing Italy back to the "Stresa front." So the British and French governments got nothing out of their betrayal of Abyssinia and the League of Nations and were the dupes of their own treachery. The prolonged negotiations with Germany about the "new Locarno" increased the anxiety of the Little Entente, especially since those negotiations were made a pretext for holding up everything else and for preventing the League Assembly from dealing with collective security or any other important matter. But for Litvinov, the British government would have succeeded in postponing all discussion of the "application of the principles of the Covenant," that is, of collective security, until next September. Then came the German-Italian agreement, which was all to the advantage of Germany, for it is evident that Mussolini had to sacrifice much in return for German recognition of Italian sovereignty over Abyssinia. It may turn out that he has sacrificed Italian influence in Austria and Central Europe generally.

In these circumstances the states of the Little Entente had begun to think that their only hope was to make the best possible terms with Hitler and Mussolini. In Yugoslavia a pro-German government had come into power and Germany had acquired increased influence, both economic and political. The German-Italian agreement, which seemed to put an end to the complete domination of Austria by Italy, made better relations between Yugoslavia and Italy possible. In Rumania Titulescu had been dismissed by King Carol, and his dismissal had been followed by a change in Rumanian policy, which also became pro-German. It was Titulescu more than anybody else who held together the Little Entente and also the Balkan Entente, which was his creation, and nobody else did as much to bring about cooperation with Soviet Russia. For that reason he was hated by the British Foreign Office, and the hatred was intensified by the isolation and consequent capitulation of the British delegation at the Montreux conference, which was due to the diplomatic skill, the loyal cooperation, and, above all, the firmness of Paul-Boncour, Litvinov, and Titulescu. The fall of Titulescu was a triumph for Hitler and a disaster for Europe.

By a sinister irony the French government of the People's Front was unwittingly responsible for it. When Schacht visited the Balkans, King Carol and the majority of the Rumanian government proposed to invite him to Bucharest. Titulescu successfully withstood the proposal, and one of the reasons that he gave for opposing it was that a Rumanian invitation to Schacht might make a bad impression in France. When the news came that Schacht had been received in Paris with extraordinary consideration and that the Prime Minister of France and half a dozen other members of the government had attended a luncheon in his honor, Titulescu's enemies seized the opportunity to get rid of him. They represented to King Carol that whereas, thanks to Titulescu's exaggerated consideration for France, Rumania had lost what might have been a profitable opportunity, the French government was treating Schacht with obsequious respect. King Carol was so angry that he dismissed Titulescu on the spot.

Thus Yugoslavia and Rumania came to some extent under German influence. It remained to win over Czecho-Slovakia, and King Carol went to Prague for that purpose. Not that he cared much one way or the other. He is not interested in politics and is not pro-German or pro-French or anything else. So long as he can amuse himself, he is willing to adopt any policy recommended by those under whose influence he happens to be, of whom Madame Lupescu is one of the most important, for her influence is permanent. Carol urged the Czecho-Slovak government to denounce its pact with Soviet Russia, but without success. Indeed, it seems to be thought at Prague that he became convinced of the desirability of maintaining it, but if that is so, there is no guaranty that he will remain of the same opinion. Carol's mission, however, succeeded to a limited extent. At the end of his visit it was officially announced that the Little Entente would cooperate with Germany, Italy, Austria, and Hungary. The drift away from France was manifest.

Mussolini's blunder has, temporarily at any rate, made this cooperation almost impossible. The reaction in Czecho-Slovakia against the Milan speech was immediate. Krofta, the Foreign Minister, made a firm declaration in which he said that Czecho-Slovak policy was unchanged, and that Czecho-Slovakia would remain true to its alliance with France and its pact with Russia and would defend its territory against all attacks. In Rumania the semi-official press tried to explain the Milan speech away, but the rest of the Rumanian newspapers vigorously attacked it, and some of them even said that the new policy inaugurated by King Carol and his present advisers had now been shown to be a failure and that the sooner Titulescu was sent for the better. The Yugoslav press gave the speech a disconcerting welcome, but official declarations have since shown that the Yugoslav government will join with Czecho-Slovakia and Rumania in resisting Hungarian demands.

Thus, thanks to Mussolini, France has another opportunity—perhaps the last—to recover its lost influence. One can but hope that the French government will take advantage of it, but the chances seem against it, for before anything can be done France must be freed from the domination of the British Foreign Office. And that would probably involve the resignation of Delbos and certain other Radical ministers, although it would not mean estrangement from England. On the contrary, as Barthou's short experience showed, an independent France with a policy of its own gets more out of England than a dependent France, because independence is respected and England needs France as much as France needs England. The session of the commission for the application of the principles of the Covenant, which will meet at Geneva on December 7, will offer France an excellent opportunity of taking the initiative in the organization of collective security on the lines already laid down by the present French government.

Léon Blum made a speech on foreign policy three days ago at Soissons. He said nothing about collective security, he made no reply to the Milan speech in which Mussolini repudiated the whole idea of collective action and expressed the hope that the League of Nations would disappear, but he announced that, on the initiative of the French government, the assembled nations at Geneva would shortly begin a discussion of disarmament! A man as intelligent as Blum must know that in the present condition of Europe such a discussion can be nothing but window-dressing. One asks oneself whether this talk about disarmament is not a diversion intended to cover the helplessness of the French government and its lack of policy on anything that matters.

The situation is heartrending, for there is no time to lose. The enemy is at our gates. While politicians prate about the undesirability of the division of Europe into two hostile blocs, the fascist bloc is being formed, whether we like it or not, and it is not confined to Europe. Germany, Japan, and Italy are perfecting what is in fact an alliance against Russia. This is intended to be the nucleus of a larger combination which other states will be cajoled or bullied to enter. Hitler, encouraged by the impunity he has been given by the poltroonery and the successive capitulations of the British and French governments, has indulged in another repudiation of international engagements. Clearly, he intends to coerce the countries injured by his act, in particular Czecho-Slovakia, by threatening to deprive them of their access to the sea. Yesterday Germany and Italy officially recognized Franco and his gang as the government of Spain. And this is not the end. It is only the beginning. The next step will be repudiation of some territorial provision of the peace treaties, probably that concerning Danzig and Memel.

Never since 1918 has Europe been in such imminent danger of war. Until quite recently I have not thought that war was likely in the near future, but the danger has been brought nearer by the efforts that have been made to avert or postpone it by concessions to the aggressive nations. It has been increased in the last three months by the policy of "non-intervention" in Spain, which has played into the hands of Germany and Italy and encouraged them to risk war to get the control of Spain. And the government that shares the responsibility for all this with the Tory government of England is the government of the People's Front—the coalition of all the forces of the left in France. I have long since ceased to expect much from any political party, but I would never have believed such an abdication, such a betrayal, to be possible. There is no hope for Europe unless at the eleventh hour France can recover itself and take the lead in forming a defensive bloc against the aggressive fascist bloc of the fascist hordes. And it may be that the eleventh hour is already past.

Barcelona: An Anarchist State

BY LOUIS F. GITTLER

Barcelona, November 16

THE manifestations of last week on the occasion of the nineteenth anniversary of the Russian Revolution magnificently demonstrated the solidarity of the People's Front. For more than five hours the procession of workers, peasants, employees, and intellectuals filed by in enthusiastic acclaim of the "Russian example." The demonstrators carried the banners and slogans of every Catalonian organization; the flags of the republic, of Catalonia, of the Anarchists, of the Communists, and of various dissident groups waved endlessly in the brilliant sun. Plasterers and foresters, civil guards and cavalrymen, marines, clerks, artists, laborers from factory and field walked in the never-ending ranks, singing the Marseillaise, the Internationale, and Catalonian and Spanish revolutionary songs. Few uniforms were visible; police were not needed to keep order.

Notwithstanding its atmosphere of solidarity, the demonstration clearly revealed the political limits of a popular front. The Republicans did not flaunt proletarian slogans ■ did the Communists behind them. They were content to appeal to all anti-fascists for unity in the civil war. The Catalonian Separatists (Estat Catala) were mild in applauding the Soviets. The Anarchists saluted their "Russian brothers" but emphasized the need for unity, complete revolution, complete liberty, and the intransigent will necessary for victory. The tremendous ovation which greeted the Catalonian anthem and the hundreds of yellow and red Catalonian flags showed the fiercely patriotic spirit of all Catalonians, whatever their politics.

The Anarcho-Syndicalists proved again their superior political strength. Their adherents comprised two-thirds of the paraders. Their success is attributable to the high quality of their party leadership and their talent in organization and propaganda; it is also due to the fact that Anarchist thought is peculiarly indigenous to Spain, although outside Catalonia and Aragon the movement is not yet in an advanced stage. Through the two organizations, the C. N. T. (National Confederation of Workers) and the F. A. I. (Iberian Anarchist Federation), they dominate Catalonia and guide its revolutionary destiny. The C. N. T. serves as the organizational framework of anarcho-syndicalism; it would be reduced to a sort of futile red syndicalism were it not for the aid of its brother organization, the F. A. I., which furnishes the C. N. T. mechanism with surging revolutionary fervor.

When rebel contingents of the local garrison—variously stated to have been Carlists, innocent lambs, and soldier mercenaries—drew up their artillery pieces on the boulevards and squares of Barcelona in the early morning hours of July 19 at the command of their superior officers, the fearless young workers of the F. A. I. commandeered automobiles and, unarmed, crashed through the cannon at strategic points. At their victorious cry of "Viva la República!" the soldiers, half-dazed and really not knowing whom they were shooting at or why, turned over some of their arms to the revolutionaries. With the help of the Civil Guard, which remained loyal to the republic, the F. A. I. workers, now joined by the Socialists and Communists, suppressed the revolt in two days. Then it was "On to Saragossa," which had fallen into the hands of the rebels. It may be admitted that without the aid of the Civil Guard it would have been a question whether the Anarchists could have won the city, at least without weeks of terror and bloodshed. In Saragossa the Civil Guard had gone over to the Fascists, and the rebels could not be ousted from control.

With the suppression of the military insurrection hundreds of Barcelona's wealthy fled to the French Riviera and Italy. I saw them there in late October, huddled about radios in cheap hotels, breathlessly listening to the rebel stations at Rabat and Seville, and triumphantly declaring, "Well, mañana, mañana—tomorrow, tomorrow." Business and industry came to a standstill after those July days. The various left parties installed their headquarters in the luxurious houses and modern office buildings. They ripped out the rugs and sumptuous furnishings and prepared to carry through their revolutionary program. The C. N. T. stepped in and in an orderly but firm manner requisitioned abandoned property, banks, factories, communications. The railroads, autobus lines, taxis, tramways, and subways were coordinated under the Anarchist banner. A collectivized economy was set up.

Power has been invested in the various councils that have been formed. These are jointly controlled by the left parties, with the Anarchists wielding the big stick of influence. The Council of Economy, headed by a C. N. T. man, has finally established fixed economic measures. These measures actually followed direct action by the workers themselves. The council has collectivized on a syndicalist basis all enterprises which (1) have more than 100 workers, (2) have under 100 workers but whose owner has been condemned by a court for connections with the Fascists, (3) have under 100 workers but whose owner has left the country, (4) have under 100 workers if these have concluded a mutual pact of agreement with the owner, (5) have between 50 and 100 workers who have agreed by a three-fourths' vote to collectivize their factory. The undertakings are controlled by workers' committees of five. In some cases the owner is retained as director at a nominal salary. Wages will not be raised and hours will not be shortened—but lengthened when necessary—until the war is over. Banks are under control of the Generalidad. All automobiles have been confiscated and are under control of the Generalidad and party committees, except in the case of physicians, who may retain private cars. The restaurants and hotels have been collectivized. No tips are allowed; no employee will accept them. Most of the land and buildings are in the hands of the Generalidad. The large estates have been collectivized, but the small holders are not touched. In the cities most of the smaller merchants have been left intact. Retail shops are open for business as in normal times. The social and commercial life of Barcelona is quasi-normal and surprisingly disciplined for such a tense period of revolution and civil war.

The left parties will see to it that in the event of victory Spain will never return to a remade "bourgeois democracy." Only the Republicans believe in such a chimera. But today all factions are united in the anti-fascist front, as was admirably demonstrated on this anniversary of the Russian Revolution. Despite their earlier apathy toward the war, they are now helping Madrid with troops and supplies. The general feeling is one of extreme optimism and confidence in ultimate victory. The possible fall of Madrid is discussed lightly. That Franco's hirelings will one day enter Catalonia is rejected as the wishful dream of deposed Barcelona capitalists. Catalonia will never fall under a dictatorship. The Anarchists, who represent the majority of the people, would never allow their liberties to be taken away wholesale.

Sitdown: II

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

THE effectiveness of sitdown and stay-in strikes both here and in several European countries during the last two or three years—but especially during 1936—cannot be overemphasized, and it is very probable that their importance will rapidly increase.

So far as I am aware, the first European stay-in—that is, since the sporadic "revolutionary occupations" of factories by Italian workers between 1919 and 1922—occurred in a coal mine in Yugoslavia in July, 1934; I described it in The Nation for August 29 of that year. It succeeded. So did the stay-in in a coal mine in Poland a few months later. But the first brief sitdowns are said to have occurred in the highly mechanized rubber factories in Akron, Ohio, nearly a year before that. They all ended in prompt victory for the workers. Only a few of them were extended into short stay-ins, which also succeeded. In this country the majority of sitdowns have been in Akron, although many have occurred in other industries; in Europe stay-ins—which of course begin with sitdowns—have become one of the central realities in the socio-political life of at least one country, France.

The sitdown situation in Akron reached a kind of climax last February with the sitdowns and stay-ins in two of the big rubber factories which resulted in a prolonged and bitter strike that closed two of the plants for weeks. These events were extensively reported in European labor papers, especially in those that circulate among rubber workers; and it is believed that these reports at least partly inspired the great sitdown on March 22 in the Semperit rubber works at Cracow, Poland, which led to a bloody strike—six killed and twenty wounded—that received wide publicity in Europe, particularly in France. The Akron dispute of last winter ended in a kind of agreement between the management and the newly organized United Rubber Workers of America, but sitdowns continued. As the rank-and-filers put it, "They put teeth into the agreement." During the spring—or, to be exact, between March 27 and June 13—there were nineteen known sitdowns in the Goodyear plant alone; how many others that never received notice, no one knows. These frequent sitdowns in the American rubber capital continued to interest the European labor press; and it is not to be wondered at, perhaps, that among the first workers in France to greet the Front Populaire with sitdowns and stay-ins late last May were the men in the French plant of the Goodrich Company at Colombes, in the Seine district, and that one of the toughest nuts the Blum government had to crack last June was the stay-in at the Michelin rubber works.

I do not mean to suggest that the sitdown and the stay-in are inventions of the Akron rubber workers which have since been picked up by European labor, but rather that they are weapons mutually or, shall I say, elementally invented by industrial workers here and abroad who were confronted by the same or similar problems. Be that as it may, just now the use of the sitdown and the stay-in is more widespread here than in Europe, and I shall here restrict myself to this country.

In Akron a week seldom passes without one or more sitdowns. The local newspapers notice only the more serious ones, those which develop, or threaten to develop, into stay-ins and close-downs. The most recent one of which I have detailed information took place on November 17 in the huge Goodyear No. 1 plant. After an inconclusive argument with the management over an adjustment in wage rates, about 100 men in one of the departments sat down, stopping the work of 7,000 men for a day and a half, at the end of which period the company promised speedy action on the adjustment. This was a typical Akron sitdown.

Officials of rubber companies are frantic in their attempts to stop them. They blame them on "trouble-makers" and the union movement in general. They try to terrorize union sympathizers. The Goodyear management, for instance, lately assigned two non-union inspectors to a department with instructions to disqualify tires produced by known union men. After pelting them with milk bottles for a while, the men sat down and refused to work till the inspectors were removed. The company officials rushed in forty factory guards with clubs, but a sixty-five-year-old union gum-miner met the army at the entrance and told them to get the hell away. They went—and the non-union inspectors were replaced.

Akron sitdowns have been provoked by various other causes. Recently S. H. Dalrymple, president of the United Rubber Workers of America, was beaten by thugs employed by a rubber factory, whereupon the factory workers sat down in protest, forcing the company to close for a day. When work was resumed the next night, a fiery cross blazed up within view of the plant. This caused the men to sit down again—and to dispatch a squad of "huskies" to extinguish the cross.

In the automobile industry the earliest known sitdowns, called "quick strikes," occurred in the Auto-Lite plant at Toledo after the 1934 strike. The idea is said to have come from Akron, for the rank-and-filers of the two towns were in close contact. Most of these sitdowns were settled quickly and in favor of the workers.

Lately sitdowns have been frequent in and around Detroit, most of them in unorganized plants or unorganized departments of partially organized plants. Ordinarily, although many of them are well executed, they are not planned in advance. Some "just happen." Even where the workers are organized, the sitdowns have an element of spontaneity; they seem an instinctive revolt against some particularly vexing condition—too much speed-up, too low wages, or the like. They are usually organized on the job or during lunch and represent the crystallization of weeks or months of dissatisfaction. A noteworthy fact is that most sitdowns in the automobile industry occur in body plants, where the nature of the work—painting, polishing, sand-papering, heavy lifting, and so on—is more disagreeable or arduous than in other shops, and the wages are lower.

During the first three weeks of November sitdowns were pulled almost daily in different departments of the Briggs Manufacturing Company, where conditions of work are notoriously poor and irregular. Two or three groups of welders sat down on different occasions for more wages and received raises. The trim division sat down one night around midnight demanding a ten-cent-an-hour boost. Then other departments joined in asking raises, till about 1,500 workers were involved; increases ranging from five to thirty cents an hour were granted.

In the partially organized Fisher Body plant at Atlanta, Georgia, union members staged a sitdown to force the management to meet their committee to negotiate an adjustment in wages. They would not resume work till the committee went into the office.

In mid-October the Chrysler plant in Detroit was the scene of an interesting sitdown staged by the metal finishers in protest against the speed-up. The company pacified them by eliminating seven "jobs" per hour and adding four men to each of the two production lines in the department. Within the last two months similar sitdowns have occurred also in Packard, Hudson, Dodge, and General Motors plants.

In the Hudson plant a rather amusing and significant thing happened on the hood line. One day, by placing the hoods closer together on the line, the management increased production from 140 to 160 an hour. The men figured that the increase of twenty was one-seventh of normal production and, amid laughter, skipped every seventh hood, which immediately messed up production ahead of them. The hood-line superintendent raged at first, then, helpless, went back to 140. This sort of partial sitdown—similar things have occurred in other plants—is beginning to be called a "skippy." There is a rumor in Detroit that a few successful skippies have been pulled even in the Ford plant.

Sitdowns are most effective in mass-production industries with the conveyor system, but we find them also in other industries. The current seamen's strike began—at least on the East Coast—with sitdowns on scores of ships, which extended into stay-ins, which in turn developed into a big strike. On the Pacific Coast Harry Bridges's longshoremen's union has been using for a couple of years now a highly effective job-action method for enforcing its demands called "quick strike" or "quicky."

In Hollywood a group of extra girls sat down because casting directors were hiring Santa Barbara and Pasadena society girls at "scab wages." They were supported by such well-known players as Jack Benny, George Burns, and Gracie Allen, and the directors found themselves forced to restrict their hiring to legitimate extras.

On December 1 there was a sitdown at the Libby-Owens-Ford glass factory in Ottawa, Illinois. A few days before that a long stay-in began at the Midland Steel Products Company in Detroit, which affected production in the Plymouth, Chrysler, and Ford plants. See your daily newspaper for other sitdowns and stay-ins.

The sitdown and the stay-in are most significant as extremely practical devices invented or adopted by labor to promote unionization. Both the United Rubber Workers of America and the United Automobile Workers of America doubtless owe their growth partly to them. Two or three years ago the rubber rank-and-file organizers brought many a federal union into existence or to numerical strength with the aid of sitdowns, which, as I hinted last week, were more eloquent arguments for organization and collective action than any speech by the best labor leader. The federal unions were subsequently for the most part destroyed by A. F. of L. fakers whom William Green sent to Akron for that purpose, and in September, 1935, when the newly formed United Rubber Workers held its constitutional convention, there were only about 3,000 organized rubber workers in America out of a possible 100,000. The strikes last February, however, and the numerous successful sitdowns and stay-ins during the spring shot that number up to 30,000 by June. At the last convention President Dalrymple announced the union to be 40,000 strong, and nearly every serious sitdown in the past six weeks has boosted the membership by as much as 500.

Within the last two months sitdowns have begun to play a major role in the organization of automobile workers. Here is a report and analysis of a sitdown on November 13 at the Fisher Body Plant No. 1 in Flint, Michigan, given to me by an organizer.

There was no organization in the plant. Flint is a General Motors center, once well organized but organization has disintegrated. This, plus the fact that the town is thoroughly controlled by G. M. and full of stool-pigeons, has made it particularly difficult to organize. Organization was carried on quietly through home meetings, personal contact, and contact with the key men in the plant, but with no real success.

On the thirteenth five men who had been working actively though quietly for the union were discharged. They found their cards "pulled" when they came to work. These men were in the body-building department, employing about 700. The most active union man, not among the five dismissed, had been prepared for this and had other workers interested in organizing posted at strategic places along the line.

One man questioned a foreman about the five discharged men. There was an exchange of words. Then the foreman took the worker by the arm, saying if he didn't like it he could leave, too. The above-mentioned leader, seeing this, stopped the foreman, told him if anybody went everybody went, gave the signal to his key men, and within one minute all work ceased.

A committee went to the management, demanded the return of the five men, refused to accept promises that they would be returned on Monday, insisted they be re-employed before they themselves would resume work. The management had some difficulty in locating all the men, and the division was "down" four and a half hours before they were finally returned.

The leader of the sitdown, an excellent strategist, dramatized the incident to the utmost, using it not only as an instrument to protect workers against discrimination but as an organizational weapon. In the manager's presence he took a vote of the men on whether or not they would resume work before the men were returned. The vote not to resume work was unanimous. After the five men had been located, he asked each of them to stand on a bench and testify in the presence of all that the union was responsible for getting their jobs back.

This sitdown cracked Flint wide open. That night and the next day 500 workers joined the union. Since then they have been signing up at the rate of 150 a day.

At about the same time the unionized workers in the Bendix plant at South Bend, Indiana, started a sitdown to overcome the threat of a company union. The sitdown became national news. It overcame the threat.

For reasons suggested or implicit in these two articles many of the rank-and-file automobile and rubber workers, as well as many of the organizers in the field and some of the people in the offices of the rubber and automobile unions, think the world of the sitdown. The top leadership of these unions, however, like the responsible leaders of the C. I. O., seem to view it with misgivings and, so far as I know, have as yet no very definite working policy with regard to it. None go so far as to try to fight it, but to some of them it looks like a dangerous thing in the long run even if now it helps them to organize unions. They at once like and fear it. Some fear it, perhaps, because it deprives the regular labor official of much of his authority; others because the sitdown is too spontaneous and seemingly haphazard. It threatens to play the devil with the collective-bargaining idea.

John Brophy, director of the C. I. O., sent me the following careful, politic statement with permission to quote it in this article as his view:

We do not condemn sitdown strikes per se. We consider that various kinds of labor activity will be used to promote organization of workers and establish collective bargaining. Sitdown strikes, under some of these conditions, may be a very necessary and useful weapon. In the formative and promotional stage of unionism in a certain type of industry, the sitdown strike has real value. After the workers are organized and labor relations are regularized through collective bargaining, then we do urge that the means provided within the wage contract for adjusting grievances be used by the workers. It is only in those instances when there is a failure of the workers to exercise the means for adjustment provided in the agreement that we disapprove of sitdown strikes. Sitdown strikes, in my opinion, occur when the employer fails to meet in full the requirements of collective bargaining.

It seems to me that the leaders of the C. I. O. and its member unions have not yet clearly thought out, in all their aspects, either the current importance or the future possibilities of the sitdown. Certainly they are not yet using the weapon as they could and, I think, should use it "to promote organization . . . and establish collective bargaining." Fearing it, some of them (I need mention no names) are trying not to destroy it but to dull it. There is even a C. I. O. representative in Akron who has been giving interviews about "disciplining" workers who have a tendency to use sitdowns.

This weapon appears to be an elemental thing, a manifestation of the modern industrial worker's rebellion against the existing economic system's plot to turn him into a machine less important than the actual machine he operates. The weapon should be sharpened by the C. I. O. and used fully; not only now "in the formative and promotional stage of unionism" but also later, when it could put teeth into agreements won through unionization and collective bargaining; and not only "in a certain type of industry," rubber and autos, but—with revisions to suit—also in steel and other non-conveyorized industries. The weapon is elemental and dangerous, but can be controlled by sincere, intelligent leaders. Now it is occasionally used irresponsibly, "for the hell of it," by vaguely discontented workers. It can be made to promote labor's responsibility and to organize the discipline which workers get from their job into an instrument for progress. Attempts to dull it will in the long run only make labor more distrustful of labor leaders than it already is.

[Mr. Adamic's first article on sitdown strikes appeared last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST plainly realizes how the tide of public opinion has been running against him. Perhaps someone told him how the election crowd in Chicago shook their fists at his building and that of the Chicago Tribune, and shouted, "We beat that ——— anyway." Two more things demonstrate this change of attitude on the part of the world's worst newspaperman, our Public Enemy No. 1. There are well-founded rumors that the Hearst newsreel is hastily changing its name to disguise its ownership. The other is even more significant. Hearst has appointed John Boettiger, son-in-law of President Roosevelt, publisher of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, his Seattle paper which was out of business for more than three months because of a strike of its editorial employees called by the Seattle branch of the American Newspaper Guild. Of course, the most important sign of Hearst's fright was his sudden discovery immediately after the election that Mr. Roosevelt was perhaps another Andrew Jackson and probably a proper representative of the American people.

These moves are characteristically Hearstian. His sudden toadying to the President brought him only additional contempt, especially among the newspaper fraternity. Even the newspaper owners and managers who shared his views as to Mr. Roosevelt during the campaign must have felt that the old man of San Simeon was losing his grip, and fumbling pretty badly. The appointment of Mr. Boettiger is so obviously another effort to curry favor with the President that it can certainly deceive nobody. Heywood Broun may be right in saying that "a son-in-law is just about as remote a relative as a fifth cousin," but evidently Mr. Hearst does not think so. For there is nothing whatsoever in Mr. Boettiger's record which would warrant his appointment by Mr. Hearst to the important position of manager of the Post-Intelligencer if Mr. Boettiger had married anybody other than Anna Roosevelt Dall. Mr. Boettiger's sole experience in journalism has been at the news-gathering end. He ably worked his way up to the position of assistant chief at the Chicago Tribune, another vicious newspaper, and then gave up newspaper work in order to become assistant to Will Hays, the sanctimonious head of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America. Now being a good newspaper reporter is one thing and conducting a newspaper as a money-making machine is something entirely different. It is by no means true that experience on the news side fits one to be a good advertising and circulation manager and efficient in handling the labor problem of a daily journal.

The simple truth is that John Boettiger is merely another man who has fallen for the lure of Hearst money offered to him to lend some shreds of respectability to that utterly discredited man. Plenty of others have yielded to this temptation. The list is long and includes people as distinguished as the Reverend Charles H. Parkhurst, so long a preacher of Christian morals in New York and a tower of strength in the fight against municipal misgovernment, and David Lloyd George, the war-time Prime Minister of Great Britain, who as such helped to exclude the Hearst newspapers from England during the war. Years ago I wrote of this procedure of men who privately tell you that they hate and despise Hearst and yet work for him in these words:

It is, of course, the old, old ethical fallacy that the end justifies the means. You abhor this man Hearst and then this Mephistopheles comes to you and says, "See, I shall turn over to you part of the garden in which I work. You shall spade it as you please and draw golden ducats for doing so," and behold Faust yields as readily as ever ■ Faust did. So the minister of the Gospel preaches his sermon between the sex-appeal and murder "mysteries," the cheap gossip and tales of a beautiful maiden lured to her destruction, that sell the paper to multitudes.

This quotation is the more apropos because Mr. Hearst promptly announced that Mr. Boettiger would be allowed to "spade" the Post-Intelligencer as he pleased, that he would have complete and absolute control of the paper in every detail. So Mr. Boettiger jumped at it without the slightest thought as to the real purpose of his selection. He really believes that he will have a free hand—I haven't found a newspaperman yet who thinks that he will for very long—and he has forgotten all about those dirty, below-the-belt attacks made by William Randolph Hearst on Franklin D. Roosevelt during the campaign which so disgusted right-minded people everywhere. Oh yes, I am well aware that Elliott Roosevelt has also taken Mr. Hearst's pay and that brings the President much closer to the Hearst money. I am sure, too, that James Roosevelt, the new lieutenant colonel of Marine Corps Reserves, would not hesitate to insure Hearst properties if he could get the business for the company with which he has been affiliated. But that doesn't affect my feeling as to Mr. Boettiger's action; it only makes me the sadder that relatives of so fine a pair of parents as Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt could be so lacking in loyalty and in pride. It seems to me that Hearst was the last man in America from whom they could afford to take money. Whether he seeks to control their opinions is beside the mark. He who touches pitch will be defiled, and if there is anything pitchier than Hearst's money I wish someone would tell me what it is.

The Man Who Would Be King

THE present British revival of "All for Love or the World Well Lost," isn't funny any more. It is extremely difficult for an American to understand the entire range of consequences which have followed Edward's attachment for a visiting lady. Apparently kings did this sort of thing more cleverly in days gone by. To be sure, English monarchs have always had a tendency to bungle affairs of the heart and mix them with affairs of state. A distinguished predecessor of the present ruler, himself the eighth of his line, managed to alter the course of world history by his passion for quick and immediate divorce. It may be that Edward's ardor will have results as sweeping as those which came from Henry's lustiness.

The Simpsons of that earlier day quite unwittingly were responsible for the decline of churchly power in Great Britain. And now a belle from Baltimore may be the instrument through which the crown will pass out of the picture in the empire. My English friends are fond of telling me that the monarchy acts as a stabilizer in the imperial scheme of things. But since I have no faith in empires I would just as soon see the arrangement ended. Other observers have maintained in the past that it was a matter of no moment whether someone reigned in Buckingham or abdicated. They could point to the fact that England's constitutional monarchy provided a government more truly democratic than our own. That is not to be denied. England knows no oligarchic power such as that of our own Supreme Court. Obviously a responsible ministry which goes back to the country for a new mandate when its wisdom is questioned provides a greater scope for the voter than is known in the United States.

But it seems to me that some of these conceptions falter now and fall by the wayside. The king does count. I am all for a responsible ministry, but there should be some limit to the extent of its obligations. It is worse than tragic, it is silly, that Stanley Baldwin should find it necessary to confer at length with the monarch as to his matrimonial intentions or lack of them. If a passing passion on the part of the ruler can shake the empire to its toes, then there is something wrong with the set-up. It is well enough to say that Edward should know better and give up the girl for the sake of his country's welfare, but since kings are not really divine but only human, any successor of Edward's might behave in precisely the same manner. There is always the possibility of another Mrs. Simpson. Indeed, I gravely suspect that her family name is Legion.

When Kipling's hero in "The Man Who Would Be King" went to a far country and got himself crowned he prospered mightily until he sought winter companionship with a woman. It ended his claim to divine rights, and as I remember, the lass concerned cried out of Peachey and his comrade, "Neither gods nor devils but men!"

Somewhat in the same fashion, British radicals are saying that the King should be allowed to marry wherever his heart inclines, but this is less than a compliment. When the lone Communist in Commons rushes to the defense of his King, he does so in an effort to reduce him in stature. He would let the King make a marriage in the face of tradition because he hopes that the event will help to disestablish prevailing custom. A king in England can exercise more political power than is generally conceded, and it cannot be denied that he is an important cog in a highly stratified society. If England is to become a cooperative commonwealth, it will have to get rid of the monarchy, and surely it is more civilized to allow a ruler to step aside through a marriage service than by the grace of a firing squad. It is better to marry than burn.

For my own part I hope the commotion can hasten on to its logical conclusion. I would like to see Edward and Wally safely established in a villa of the better sort. They have lingered too long in the headlines of our native press. I could almost wish for some touch of the tacit British censorship. Of course it is impossible to deny that here is a magnificent story for general circulation. It is almost as if some tabloid editor had prayed his heart out on Christmas Eve and awakened to find Mrs. Simpson in the toe of his stocking.

Perhaps America should be grateful to a girl who has inspired so much good clean reading matter, but I have a sneaking suspicion that many another lady in the same position could have done as well and quite possibly would. As yet I have seen no full-colored portraits of Mrs. Simpson given away with the Sunday sections. I know her only through black and white and on ordinary newsprint. Until I see her on glazed paper it might be better to withhold judgment. As yet I cannot catch "the haunting beauty" which is so often mentioned.

The charm and wit of Mrs. Simpson are celebrated in American news stories, but unfortunately none of the dispatches supply samples. One is even provoked to play with the fantastic notion that the whole thing is a gigantic publicity plot which will end in a national radio hook-up devoted to announcing that Maxwell House coffee is good to the last drop.

The only Mrs. Simpson story which I know comes from a friend of a friend's friend. The gentleman in question, being in England on a short visit, called up the lady, whom he had known in Baltimore. After passing the time of day he said quite tactlessly for want of an idea, "Well, how are you getting along in England, Wally?"

And the lovely lady replied, "Well, what do you think?"

This appears to me less than a mot, but the answer might have run, "My dear, you're making history."

Left and Right

By IRWIN EDMAN

And right meant right—not simply bad;
These terms both simple and geographic
And principally used in directing traffic,
Were each of them spelt with a quite small letter;
Not even the teachers knew any better.
Now each has become a Moral Sign
Dividing the race by a bitter line:
A stands a little to the Left of B,
While C stands just to the Right of D,
So that each of us knows who is good and bad,
Which none of us knew when I was a lad.

And the same holds true of red and white,
Once the names for lovely forms of light,
The red of lips, or of skies at dawn,
Or geraniums glowing near a deep green lawn.
Woe for a world of peace bereft!
I sigh for the years when left meant left,
For an age when red meant ■ summer rose,
And white meant a mountain clad in starlit snows.

Knopf Cargo

THE BORZOI READER. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by Carl Van Doren. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THE editor's claim that there has never been another anthology like this is, so far as I know, justified, and it is no mean achievement in this era of collections to have thought up ■ new kind. For twenty-one years Alfred A. Knopf has been publishing books, and from them Mr. Van Doren has made ■ "rigorous selection," excluding of necessity the long novels of Hamsun, Undset, and Mann, as well as longer works not fiction, and confining the material to what has been written or translated in the twentieth century. His own taste and his own judgment of what is excellent—that is, "surpassing"—controlled his choice. He mentions no other restrictions, and that fact may lead curious readers to do a bit of research into Mr. Knopf's publishing list to see whether they would have made Mr. Van Doren's selections. Without being quite enterprising enough for that, I did wonder why André Gide, who is certainly one of the very specially marked European lions bagged by Mr. Knopf, was unrepresented in the collection. "Strait Is the Gate" would have lent far more distinction to the short novel group than Mr. Hergesheimer's "Tubal Cain." But since M. Gide's ways with his own works are erratic, nothing of his may have been available for a miscellany like this; and on reflection it is difficult to picture him descending from his ivory tower to climb into an omnibus. A group of short novels written by Willa Cather, Thomas Mann, Elinor Wylie, and David Garnett has variety and beauty enough for anyone. This reader is especially grateful for the inclusion of Elinor Wylie's "Venetian Glass Nephew," which needed to be made easily accessible along with other fine examples of the petit roman, and for the felicitous biographical-critical introduction by Mr. Van Doren which precedes it. "Few novels so short and smiling can ever have been so learned," he says, analyzing the "lovely, amused formality" of this Venetian fantasy. It is placed in the collection after Thomas Mann's "Death in Venice"—with the result of making Venice seem at once the most fatal and the most fantastic of renowned cities.

Less satisfactory as a group are the short stories, in spite of the promising roll-call of distinguished names: Beerbohm, Coppard, Forster, Machen, Mansfield, Lawrence, Walter de la Mare, Zona Gale. Individually each story—with the exception of Arthur Machen's, which compared to those of Lawrence or Forster seems thoroughly "faked"—has beauty and its own kind of wisdom. But as a group they offer a surfeit of the fanciful and the remote. For this emphasis Mr. Van Doren offers an explanation that makes one wish to start an argument with him—a tribute, that, to the stimulating quality of his introductions. Most short stories, he says, are handicapped by the lack of something large about them; this something large is very difficult to achieve through pure realism; the use of fancy in one way or another gives this enlargement. Very debatable, surely. Coppard's weakness, for example, is for fantasy, however charming; his strength and his wisdom are in the beautiful realism of "A Field of Mustard" and other stories of the English countryside, which achieve more "enlargement" than any half-dozen of the fanciful tales like "Adam and Eve and Pinch Me." There is a kind of downright taste, remarks Mr. Van Doren, that can find reality only in the blunter forms of realism. One can only retort that there is a kind of delicate taste that refuses to find reality in realism, where it resides rather more frequently than in fantasy. "Escape into fantasy" isn't just a catch phrase.

This leads to one other comment inspired by a collection that with its fiction, its poetry (including its translations from the chronologically remote but humanly contemporary Chinese poets), its one play ("Of Thee I Sing"), its essays, and its excellent sample of biographical skill (Thomas Beer's study of Stephen Crane), offers a thousand pages of exceptionally absorbing reading. It was in 1915 that the Knopf ship, as H. L. Mencken records in an entertaining "memorandum" imbedded in the center of the book, put out to sea "with ■ jury mast, sails out of a ragbag, and a crew of one boy and one girl." Now in 1936 it is an ocean liner of the latest model, navigating a tranquil sea, decks crowded with passengers and hold full of books. 1915-1936: a quiet interlude in the world's history. To that surprising conclusion some future scholar might come, supposing a catastrophe destroyed all records of these twenty-one years except "The Borzoi Reader." A quiet interlude; an urbane civilization, with leisure to indulge its fancy, to play with its scientific ideas, to smile ironically at its amusing politicians, to distill a slow wisdom. That future scholar, it is true, would note a few puzzling intimations of less agreeable things. From the humorous portrait of a writer named Dreiser, he would learn of committees formed to combat child labor and lynching. From the monologues of a person called Sinclair Lewis (recorded by Nathan) he would suspect a rather low level of culture. From the satirical slogans of a musical comedy, he would gather that citizens of the United States in those quiet years sometimes voted for prosperity and peace—and see what they got! But these intimations would scarcely ruffle the pleasant impression created by a study of his documents.

Probably Mr. Van Doren was well advised in employing his rigorous selection in the interest of a harmonious whole. For the total effect of urbanity must be due to the editor's selection, not to the limitations of Mr. Knopf's list of publications. Even one story by Langston Hughes ("Ways of White Folks," Alfred A. Knopf) would disturb the peace; one short novel trafficking as delicately with realism as Robert Nathan's "Road of Ages" (Alfred A. Knopf) would introduce a contemporary social convulsion. As it is, the next anthologist to celebrate some other publisher's anniversary is free to take us on a stormier voyage, where a voice speaks now and then from the whirlwind.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

John L. Lewis as Phenomenon

JOHN L. LEWIS, LEADER OF LABOR. By Cecil Carnes. Robert Speller Publishing Corporation. $2.50.

LAST summer Benjamin Stolberg wrote of John L. Lewis at length and approvingly in The Nation. About the same time Dorothy Thompson speculated about him, in her syndicated column, as "a man of destiny." Early this autumn Fortune, giving nineteen of its spacious pages to a minute and on the whole fair and respectful examination of his background, record, personality, character, and mind, and of his new movement for the organization of labor along industrial and political lines, announced that Lewis was "a looming force." Full-length articles about and by him have appeared during the last half-year also in many other more or less important periodicals. The daily press has been full of him and his actions since last June. Sinclair Lewis, who probably has a more accurate feeling about America and Americans than anyone else, recently said in an interview printed in the Daily Worker that "Cousin John [they are no relation] is going places." Here is the first book-length biography of our outstanding labor leader, and it is written by a reporter on the New York World-Telegram who seems to believe that his subject is likely to be elected President of the United States in 1940.

There is no doubt that Lewis is a very important and formidable man—perhaps one of the two most important men in America today; in fact, his potential importance may conceivably be greater than that of the present tenant of the White House. A good, careful study of him would be in order at this time. Unfortunately, Mr. Carnes's biography is a hasty job, obviously thrown together between telephone calls from his publisher, who wanted to bring the book out before the Tampa convention of the A. F. of L., which he knew would put Lewis once more on the front page all over the country. But by this I do not mean to discourage anyone from buying and reading it. It is the most complete superficial picture of Lewis so far available. First biographies of men who suddenly jump into the limelight—which is so bright it blinds the biographer—generally aren't better than this one. Eventually, if Lewis continues to grow in importance, the volume will be useful to some more thoughtful and critical writer as a handy collection of source material.

Mr. Carnes devotes twenty-one chapters, or 295 pages, to Lewis's past, with long quotations from his speeches, one running to nearly thirteen pages. Some of the chapters make interesting reading; none fully illuminate the phases of John Lewis's life with which they deal. One comes upon wide factual and interpretative gaps. One visualizes sections of Mr. Carnes's script as strips of newspaper clippings pasted neatly together.

The twenty-second chapter (the last), entitled An Impartial Appraisal, contains much journalistic excitement and little else. On the jacket the publisher tells us, also very excitedly, that in his present job Mr. Carnes "has managed to scoop one after another of his colleagues. He was the first reporter at the scene of the Shenandoah dirigible disaster; the first to find the Lost Chance Mountain American airliner that crashed; the first," and so on. One can't help thinking that he wanted to be the first to do something or other in connection with John Lewis. He makes much of the rumor that four years hence Lewis means to be candidate for President, but says next to nothing about the vastly important and interesting problem involved in the organization of the steel, rubber, and automobile industries now in progress, on the success of which the realization of any political dream that Lewis may have will ultimately depend. I do not say that Lewis cannot or will not be the next President; I only wish to indicate that Mr. Carnes's excitement is premature and unconvincing.

But that may be blamed as much on Lewis as on his biographer. Lewis, with whom I had two rather long sessions last summer, impresses and excites, but somehow does not wholly convince. There is something about the man that is vaguely tremendous. But when one asks him questions reaching toward the fundamentals of the human problem in America, he shrugs his vast shoulders and does not answer. One wonders about him. Not that one mistrusts him. One merely feels very uncertain. There is nothing really finished and complete about him as a big leader in this day and age. He is a man in the process of becoming something or other; conceivably a great man, but—

The book contains sixteen excellent photographs of Lewis in various interesting poses and situations. Parts of page 297 read almost word for word like some of Mr. Stolberg's paragraphs in The Nation last summer. Mr. Stolberg receives no credit, but the omission in all likelihood is only another manifestation of Mr. Carnes's haste in writing the book, for he makes other acknowledgments.

The Violent Mind

IDEAS OF ORDER. By Wallace Stevens. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

OWL'S CLOVER. By Wallace Stevens. The Alcestis Press. $10.

THOUGH the poetry of Wallace Stevens has not lacked themes of commanding contemporary stature, these have not, until recently, constituted his major concern. His problem has been a curious one: moved to formal discourse in the quest for order and certitude, his art has not up to the present permitted him to pursue such discourse or his temperament to accept it. Instead, in an essentially evocative medium, he has continued to qualify definitions to their fractional parts, reducing ideas into images and images into sounds—and then neglected the full circle which returns both sound and image to experience and unites the fractional with the definitive insight.

In "Ideas of Order," his last volume but one, now re-(Capital-Relief-Tax)CAPRETAX

BULLETINNumber
3The Middle of the Road

These bulletins, together with the little book entitled "Safeguard Productive Capital," have been timed for three purposes: (1) to point out the only avenue of escape from the fast approaching breakdown of tax policies in all nations; (2) to stress the Fiscal Power of the State, not only as a means of revenue, but as an instrument of democratic social reform; and (3) to indicate the middle ground on which the extremes of Marxism and Fascism can be liquidated.

Marxism Draws Red Line Across Confused World

Asserting that privately owned capital is contrary to public welfare and against the rights of Labor, Marxism draws a red line of conflict through society, and impels toward class war. Revolutionary overthrow of existing order was the purpose of Marx, as revealed by his "Communist Manifesto" and by his volume "Capital." (See also, Hook, "Toward Understanding Marx," pp. 68, 287). According to this doctrine, bloody revolution to end private capital will probably come as a reaction against universal fascism; and for this purpose the ballot "can hardly be used" (Niebuhr, "End of an Era," pp. 52, 54, 59, 180.—Deprecates violence, but regards it as practically inevitable).

Marxist Metaphysics Confuses All "Unearned" Income

Assuming that privately owned productive capital is an aggregate monopoly which enslaves wage earners and guarantees unearned income to the "master class," Marxism regards every species of such income as being in the same economic category by the mere fact of its unearned character. And on the ground of this postulate Marxism declares that the logical measure to remedy the evil is to make productive capital common property.

Marxist Metaphysics Confirmed by Henry George

By stressing the social problem as turning around land; by putting utopian emphasis upon exclusive taxation of land value as an economic panacea; and by strenuously emphasizing land rent as unearned income; Henry George drove Marxists into still sharper assertion that every kind of unearned income falls into the same category. In this way, George provided ground for the unjust, but not wholly inaccurate, verdict that his "Progress and Poverty" is good journalism but poor social and economic science.

Marx and George Cancel Each Other

Georgian over-emphasis on land is equalled by Marxist over-stress on capital. Neither of these influential writers understood that the modern parliamentary, democratic state has evolved a political compromise between the economic energy of Capital and the prestige of Land.

Since Marx failed to envisage this compromise, and proclaimed the modern state as a categorical bourgeois victory over medieval groundlordism, he was unable to perceive that the resulting fiscal exemption of ground rent has a double effect (1) by creating a vested interest which is a liability on productive capital, and (2) by throwing tax burdens mainly upon productive effort while incidentally promoting speculation in ground values.

On the other hand, Henry George, by stressing "the denial of individual right to the use of the earth," which is involved in private appropriation of ground rent, approached economic problems from the ethical, rather than the functional, standpoint. His tactics are out-moded as a method of assault on today's industrial situation.

Powerful Social Forces Unleashed by Great Depression

On a scale never before witnessed in American history, the great depression has let loose forces of revolutionary nature and incalculable power. The mass of the nation is awake, but is illiterate on the subject of economics. And in this very difficult situation, with no intelligent public opinion as yet available, the government seeks to control the unleashed forces of society in legal ways.

Short "Breathing Spell"
Now Possible

With productive capital jammed between mounting taxes and heavy ground rents; and with an awakened but confused electorate; the national authority is doing all that can be done, for the time being. The President speaks the language of real democracy; but he seems to lack the outlook and the implements necessary to accomplish fundamental democratic progress.

issued, the movement toward a poetry of statement was first discernible. From the initial Farewell to Florida, it is a volume almost wholly transitional, telling off again and again a theme of halt and change and voicing a determination to abandon one aesthetic climate for another—to withdraw from "Floridian" self-indulgence and calm and "live by bluest reason in a world of wind and frost," to "return to the violent mind." With a melancholy by turns bemused and ironic yet wholly lacking in truculence, Stevens recasts his theme in image after image, affirming, inferring, surmising—reticently as in "There is no such thing as innocence in autumn, Yet, it may be innocence is never lost"; somberly as in "Bare night is best. Bare earth is best. Bare, bare"; ironically as in "Poet, be seated at the piano. Play the present, its hoo-hoo-hoo, Its shoo-shoo-shoo, its ric-a-nic"; and humbly:

No more phrases, Swenson: I was once
A hunter of those sovereigns of the soul . . .
These lions, these majestic images.
If the fault is with the soul, the sovereigns
Of the soul must likewise be at fault, and first.

The method, however, continues to be no less oblique than that of the earlier "Harmonium," even though the labor of pruning is already under way. Like Decorations in a Nigger Cemetery, the long sequence of three-and-four-line notations furnishes a convenient pattern of his approach in general: here we have, impinging upon a general mood, a series of epigrams, cryptic till the reader feels the centrifugal pull of mood fusing the fragments into proper focus.

With "Owl's Clover," Mr. Stevens's most recent volume, the edifice of a new technique begins to take shape amid the wreckage of the old. Essentially a blank-verse sequence of five soliloquies strung together on a prevailing symbol, it attempts to explore the "violent mind" to which Stevens is now apprenticed, and weighs the consequences which an art like his own, "manqué and gold and brown," must be prepared to accept if it is to provide equal room for "plowmen, peacocks, doves." Unfortunately, however, the key symbol—here a statue representing a group of winged horses in flight—is neither felicitous, nor consistently employed, nor readily translatable in terms of its various contexts. In The Old Woman and the Statue, for example, the physical details of the marble are too vividly underscored to permit of symbolic analogy. In Mr. Burnshaw and the Statue, where one is compelled to acknowledge a symbolic function, it is only very painfully that the meanings can be narrowed down from vaguely political contexts to an unclear gospel of living "incessantly in change" in the stream of contemporary experience. And in The Greenest Continent, the most complex section of the five, one is gratuitously presented with a companion symbol—that of "the greenest continent," Africa—which one pursues through numerous levels of reference until one comes to rest in a discussion of art, the art of Wallace Stevens, and the ordeal of rediscovery that awaits the poet in the wilderness in which he has newly set foot.

It will not be necessary to inform Mr. Stevens's admirers in passing that "Owl's Clover," like its predecessors, abounds in the kind of orchestrative cunning of which he remains our most knowing purveyor. The music is, moreover, as Stevens intended, of a somewhat more toughened sort, pruned of bravura and merging the logical with the lyrical. Yet it is also the least fluid which his instrument has given out so far. Doubtless, the same incongruities which induce him to address political reflections to imaginary "mesdames" in terms of statuary and the pastoral dance recur to clot his rhetoric with gingerbread and stand in the way of a thoughtful wiriness. His position, at present, is not unlike that of the conductor Basilewsky of his poem, who performs concertos for airplane and pianoforte; and it is perfectly obvious that no one surmises the fact more than Stevens himself. Yet his pact with "the violent mind" is one which is deeply felt, and has been sealed in somber good faith, in the hope that

The charts destroyed, even disorder may,
So seen, have an order of its own, a peace
Not now to be perceived yet order's own.

It remains to be seen, however, whether such a doctrine does not cut the Gordian knot with a sword of two edges: one to save and one to destroy.

De Quincey Disinterred

THOMAS DE QUINCEY. HIS LIFE AND WORK. By Edward Sackville West. Yale University Press. $4.

MR. JAPP'S "De Quincey" (1877) presented some unbecoming information. The good people of the eighties must have sighed with relief when Mr. Masson's new monograph (1881) drew only the more edifying lessons. De Quincey was now suitably preserved; he belonged among the masters. But at last, after fifty-four years, stirs again De Quincey's disturbed spirit, with its quart of laudanum, its flaming hair.

Three important De Quincey biographies have recently appeared. Horace Eaton's exhaustive collection of source material supplants Japp; Malcolm Elwin's monograph will replace, as a popular text, Masson; and now Edward Sackville West attempts to interpret more fully the enigmas of this strange life. And this needed to be done—since Mr. Elwin's little volume could not accomplish this, and Professor Eaton's large one would not.

Mr. West's biography stresses the childhood tragedies that De Quincey himself felt, though obscurely, to be the root of his disturbances. The death of his sister Elizabeth (Mater Lachrymarum, the first of De Quincey's three fateful muses) becomes the center of his dark obsessions. The perplexing relationship with the immortalized prostitute of Oxford Street, and the later, less significant bond with Marguerite are traced back, joined to this basic love-death pattern. Here then is the psychological origin of De Quincey's recurrent visions of destruction, his dread of impending retribution? ("I had done a deed which the ibis and the crocodile trembled at.") Is this the source of De Quincey's retreats into the slums of London, his flights from one set of dwellings to another, his "perfect craze for being despised," his passion for stage coaches? Does this explain De Quincey's "attack of nervous horror" at the death of the Wordsworth child, the opium crisis after marriage, the laudanum sieges which intersect his life: four great cycles of disintegration?

No; Mr. West, more concerned with the fundamental motivation of De Quincey—and more perceptive—than any previous biographer, fails to be convincing. There is too much left unexplained. What lies beneath the relationship with Elizabeth—beneath the image of death becoming "enthroned within the child, mingled with the prestigia of all life as he knew it"? The essential meaning of De Quincey's hallucinations, the unity of this life-long catastrophe, is still to be found.

But the analysis of the writings is the most intelligent, the most honest we have yet had. The biographer grasps the underlying as well as the manifest limitations of De Quincey: the insularity of his point of view, the prejudices of his highly analytic intellect, the absence of standards of value, the remoteness from the life of his day—the remoteness, indeed, from any life.

It is only when he is faced with his final estimate, the necessity for a definitive statement, that Mr. West uneasily takes refuge in apology or eulogy. Realizing the formidable aspect of De Quincey at his worst, the biographer does not wish to realize the emaciated mien—beneath the rotundity of phrase—of De Quincey at his best. For no matter how much we are caught by the splendor or brilliance of a De Quincey passage, it is a broken splendor, the brilliance of a tour de force, and it is only a passage. Dreaming to be philosopher, economist, theorist, historian, De Quincey is tragically narrowed down—a “master of impassioned prose,” a painter of fantasias, a creator of striking imagery, a famous (but dubious) “self-confessor,” an unusually imaginative critic (but too often of minutiae). One suspects that for all his talents De Quincey was almost as thwarted in his writing as in his living; that just as De Quincey’s spirit, passing its days in a “deep syncope and suspension of earthly passion,” walked dreamlike along the fringe of life, so De Quincey’s tortured, stricken genius must be assigned to the fringes of literature.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

More Journalists Speak the Truth

I FOUND NO PEACE. THE JOURNAL OF A FOREIGN CORRESPONDENT. By Webb Miller. Simon and Schuster. $3.

AND FEAR CAME. By John T. Whitaker. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

OF BOOKS by journalists no end. And why not? Certainly no men lead more interesting and few more useful lives—when they take their work seriously and remember that it is “affected by a public interest.” Here, following hard upon the reminiscences of Walter Duranty and Negley Farson, come these autobiographies by Webb Miller, of the United Press, and John T. Whitaker, of the New York Herald Tribune.

These are the books of two utterly disillusioned men. They have been behind the scenes, at times even part of the works. They have traveled widely, have watched each perhaps a half-dozen wars and seen men shot, stabbed, hung, and guillotined, and have spent days and weeks and months in attendance upon the leaders of various countries and the proceedings of the League of Nations. All this has left them almost completely hopeless. The hypocrisy and utter selfishness of the leaders of the democratic nations still surviving have made them think better of dictators—not because they wished to, but because other leaders are so incompetent and almost as dishonest. Having all but sacrificed their lives in Ethiopia, both have come back revolted by the degradation of the natives and thinking that their lot cannot be worse under Mussolini. Certainly the countries of some of his present critics have been just as cynical, just as thieving, and just as bloody-handed at other times in other backward regions. Mr. Whitaker cannot forget that the British Draft Disarmament Convention, dictated by “the pacifist-democrat” Ramsay MacDonald, proposed to prohibit bombardment from the air “except against native populations.”

Mr. Whitaker thinks that Webb Miller is the greatest living reporter, and I am not sure that Mr. Miller would not say the same of his friend. The latter’s volume is a shade the better; although it was pounded out in a brief six weeks of

"rest" between the Ethiopian and Spanish wars, the style is better, and the book is more effective because the author pours out his grief over the state of the world with less restraint. It is notably excellent in its analysis and discussion of the collapse of the League of Nations and gives us the fairest and ablest treatment of Henry L. Stimson's conduct of the State Department in Washington that I have seen. The whole volume is addressed to the Italian boy, Francesco, who drove Mr. Whitaker's car in Ethiopia and could not understand what it was all about. "Tell me, Signor," he would say, "why is there war? The priest says war is bad, but Mussolini says war is good. . . . Why am I in Africa?" To this Mr. Whitaker's final answer is:

You became a Fascist because we Americans did not believe, really, in democracy, and you armed yourself because we believed in disarmament conferences, not disarmament; and you went to war because we believed in peace pacts, not peace. But America is a great country, Francesco. The American business man and his wife have a great tradition of liberty and freedom. . . . But they must begin to think soon whether democracy and peace are worth the price. The longer they think that democracy was bought and paid for in 1776, the sooner we will exchange our hats for gas masks and cut our clothes to the pattern of the militarist. If they become afraid for democracy and peace so that they are willing to pay the price, then you and I can live some day in an organized world community where there is justice for all, and peace, and human dignity.

Webb Miller's book is packed with interest and excitement and illuminating revelations of human folly. It is the odyssey of a farm boy with only country common-school and high-school education. It contains much history—for example, the first full story of the false Armistice Day, contributed by Roy W. Howard. He, incidentally, believes that the man who rang up the American Embassy over its private wire to the French Foreign Office and said that he was a French official and that the armistice had been signed was "very probably" a German secret agent located in Paris who, knowing the desperate condition of the German army, thought that if a false report of the armistice were put out, there would be such rejoicing among the Allied and American forces that the diplomats would have to go through with it promptly.

One reads these pages of Mr. Miller's adventures and wonders how anyone could survive them without becoming either a physical or a mental wreck. When one reads what he has to say of the utter brutality of human beings in power toward those who have fallen into their hands, one is tempted to ask how civilization has lasted as long as it has. There is nothing worse in the book than his story of how the police, on the order of British officials, beat into a "bloody pulp" the non-resistant Indians at Dharasana in May, 1930.

Mr. Miller, too, sees that what is going on is a desperate struggle between economic government and political government, that human beings are being forced in unexpected directions by the "mysterious economic, financial, and political forces released by machinery and science." He is not certain what these relentless forces will do to us in the period of transition. He hopes that the United States "will make the necessary economic and political readjustments gradually and without conflict, but [is] not convinced that this will happen." My readers must not be frightened away from these extremely valuable, realistic, and truth-telling books. They deserve the widest reading. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

PROPHET OF AMERICA: EMERSON AND THE PROBLEMS OF TODAY. By Newton Dillaway. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

This popularization of Emerson's "Essays" is praised in a preface by Bliss Perry because it is the work of neither a scholar nor a critic; Mr. Perry's assumption being that Emerson still has something to say to the plain man and that Mr. Dillaway knows what it is. If both of them are right, then Emerson deserves all the charges which his worst enemies bring against him. His optimism is fatuous; his opinions cancel one another in a mist of vaguest meaning; and when he does emerge with something to say it is the sort of thing that has been said better, because still more vulgarly, by the success-writers who are supposed to have learned their lingo from him. It would appear after all that Emerson belongs to the scholar and the critic, for he is still a fine writer and he still has something to say on the rather rare level which he was finding for himself exactly a hundred years ago when he published his first book, "Nature." MARK VAN DOREN

SPELL AGAINST TIME. By David Morton. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Mr. Morton's recent volume of verse exhibits all the traits of its predecessors—rhythmic facility, mildness of diction, a talent essentially feminine in its concern with minor themes and in its method of dealing with them, and, it must be confessed, a good deal of monotony. The verses abound in pretty fancies happily expressed, some of them manage to capture a mood of gentle wistfulness, and there are occasional effective lines. But nowhere do we come upon an arresting idea or an emotion forceful enough to demand its own language. Despite their preoccupation with pastoral subjects, many of these

DRAMA

Love—Profane and Profaner

"PRELUDE TO EXILE," the play about Richard Wagner at the Guild Theater, did not receive too warm a reception from the critics of the daily press. I myself happen to have found it pretty continuously interesting, and in one respect at least a good deal more satisfactory than biographical plays usually are. Instead of following the outline of a life and thus allowing the form to degenerate into that of the mere chronicle, William McNally, the author, has chosen one compact episode which not only is manageable in dramatic form but has, as a life story so often hasn't, a unified theme.

What we get is not so much a chapter from the biography of Wagner as a comedy on a theme which he happens to illustrate—namely, the gulf which may lie between the "inspiration" of a great romantic artist and the end product of his imagination. There is not the slightest reason for supposing that there was anything especially remarkable about Wagner's passing infatuation for one Frau Wesendonck, the wife of his benefactor. He got over it quickly enough after it had served to give to his mind the fillip that was necessary if he was to compose a certain work. But who dares to say that the affair was trivial or vulgar if it led to the writing of "Tristan and Isolde," which certainly isn't. Or rather, since Wagner himself was only half-convinced of the importance of Frau Wesendonck, what are we to do about our feeling of indulgent superiority when the passion of the music so completely confounds it. It is easy enough to see through Wagner. We can all do that. But as he himself remarks of his wife in the play, to see through is not the same as to understand. His love for the lady of the moment was not "sincere," but the music his hypocrisy enabled him to compose certainly was.

I must confess that I know nothing of the historical accuracy of the play, but there is a technical reason why a composer is a better subject for such a drama than any other sort of artist—you can exhibit his work. There are few things less convincing on the stage than a novelist rushing off to compose a masterpiece or an artist leaping from the arms of an inspiring model to a waiting easel or canvas. Both scenes have been tried on the stage and screen without ever convincing anyone that the artist was achieving more than a daub or the writer writing anything more important than that well-known call for party solidarity so beloved of the typewriter manufacturers. But music can be demonstrated, and on the Guild stage it is, very effectively indeed. One cannot doubt that Wagner composed "Tristan" because one hears it. Where the Guild production is weak is in the acting and to a lesser extent in the direction. Wilfred Lawson, remarkable actor though he has shown himself on previous occasions, is a bit heavy and a bit obvious as Wagner—almost farcical at times when the impression he should convey is rather one of irony. None of the other performers is obviously miscast, but neither Lucile Watson nor Eva LeGallienne seems to be actually caught up in her part.

There is also one point at which I think the author definitely missed an opportunity. Though Cosima von Bülow is on the stage, little is made of her character, and one misses what might have been a very effective irony if the audience had been permitted to see in her what Wagner was at the moment too obtuse to perceive—namely, that she was the most charming as well as the most suitable of the ladies available. But the author has, I think, very neatly and very amusingly stated his main question. How much of a genius really partakes of his genius; how deep does it go, or rather how near to the surface does it come? Your romantic is impressed by everything. Even what appear to be the trivialities, the follies, and the vulgarities of his hero are "different" and sublime. Your comic intelligence, on the other hand, has its doubts. Genius is, half the time, confined to a small corner of the whole man. The rest of him is no better than anybody else. He doesn't even have deeper feelings. He merely knows how to make better use of them.

At Westport, Connecticut, two summers ago, Lawrence Langner presented Ruth Gordon in a production of Wycherley's "The Country Wife." Supported by a different company and in a somewhat different version of the same play, Miss Gordon at last reaches Broadway (Henry Miller's Theater) by way of a previous London engagement, and the first thing to be said is that she is repeating an extraordinary personal triumph. As the country bride, ignorant but far from innocent and eager for the pleasures of the town, she is the show. When she is absent from the stage—fortunately not much of the time—the play creaks and wheezes along, partly because it is a good deal of an antique, partly because no other member of the company seems able to achieve more than an acceptable style of playing. But whenever Miss Gordon appears, it leaps into extravagant life; in fact, I can remember few examples of pure bravura in acting which equal her performance. It is a very fat part, of course, but Miss Gordon romps through it with unflinching comic inventiveness. I have heard it objected, or maintained, that she modernizes the part, and it is inevitable that an actress should modernize to some extent any part in a play of another day; but if the objectors mean to suggest that the role was ever intended to be played in a straight or realistic fashion, then they have, I think, a strange idea of what the Restoration stage was like. Personalities were at least as important as they are now; many of the roles were written to show off the personal charms and personal talents of individual actresses; and Miss Gordon plays in the only way that she could play successfully. "The Country Wife" is, of course, the most outspokenly bawdy of all the plays by the major Restoration comic writers and is not for the squeamish. But Miss Gordon makes it an unforgettable delight.

RECORDS

THERE are people who can enjoy a set of records without a booklet, and there are others who would find the right kind of booklet a help. By the right kind I mean the one that accompanies Columbia's new set of Bach's Organ Music, as opposed to the general run of rubbish that Victor and Columbia hand out. The set is Columbia's second release in its higher-priced series of re-pressings of foreign subscription recordings (seven records, $14), and the booklet is a reprint of the original booklet. For this the English company went to someone who was an authority on Bach's organ music and could write well—Harvey Grace; and it is he who describes the relation of Bach to the organ and to the fugue, and then discusses the particular organ fugues that are recorded in this volume. And that is the procedure which should be followed in all instances.

The booklet is only one of the things that give this set unusual importance. The records were made by Albert Schweitzer, whose book on Bach's music is a classic, who took the trouble necessary to discover an organ to play on that had less than most modern electrical organs to do with Radio City Music Hall, and whose playing has as little to do with Stokowski. A recent article in Today disclosed the fact that 60 per cent of the enormously increased sales of records are in classical records, and that Bach leads all other composers. This becomes less surprising when one recalls that Bach on records means for the most part Bach-Stokowski. I am aware of the argument that Stokowski's performances of his transcriptions are valuable in introducing Bach to many people who would not otherwise listen to him. My answer is to question whether Bach has really been introduced to these people, and whether they will listen to him—whether many of those who know the Toccata and Fugue in D minor from the recording of Stokowski's sensational performance will now find the work interesting as it is played by Schweitzer.

The recording of the organ is unusually clear, which in itself would make the set noteworthy. Excellent recording is also to be found in Columbia's new set of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, in a performance by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under Selmar Meyrowitz that I find good except in the second movement (six records, $9). On the other hand, the recording of the performance of Brahms's Trio in C, Opus 87, by Myra Hess, Yelley D'Aranyi, and Gaspar Cassado is so bad that I cannot understand its having been released in England and re-pressed here (four records, $6). Columbia's set of Verdi's "Falstaff" has not arrived in time for comment.

On a Columbia single ($1.50) is a superb performance by the London Philharmonic under Beecham, superbly recorded, of Sibelius's Festivo (Tempo di Bolero), an early and very enjoyable light piece in which one is astonished to hear, somewhat misplaced, the dramatic explosions of the brass and other stylistic mannerisms of his symphonies. On another single ($1.50) is exquisite playing by Gieseking of Händel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" and Mozart's Rondo alla Turca. On still another ($1.50) Georges Thill sings in the French manner—somewhat nasally resonant—arias from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Tauride" and Cherubini's "Les Abencérages." And finally Nathan Milstein plays quite well a little inconsequential Sonata in A by Vivaldi ($1).

Letters to the Editors

Mary McCarthy and Her Critics

Dear Sirs: Mary McCarthy's article, Circus Politics in Washington State, is an example of what to expect from a traveling reporter who stops a few days in one place, sees a handful of people, and then considers herself competent to write a survey of the local situation.

The whole tone of the article was reactionary, playing up details of no significance, with the general effect of belittling the whole progressive movement out here. There was no inkling of the strength of the Washington Commonwealth Federation. You may be interested in knowing that every one of the thirty-six candidates indorsed by the W. C. F. in the primaries who passed was elected in the finals, except one minor judicial candidate. Stanley Atwood in the race for State Superintendent of Public Instruction (an important job) dislodged the Republican incumbent, Noah Showalter, who survived the Democratic landslide of 1932. Also the lieutenant governor, Vic Meyers, four Congressmen, including Warren Magnuson, who replaces Zioncheck, and John Coffee, who replaces Wesley Lloyd in Tacoma, several county commissioners, twenty-seven state representatives, and two senators were all W. C. F. candidates. All progressive initiatives and amendments were defeated, however, including "Production for Use," by a consistent vote comparable in size to that for ex-Governor Hartley, the Republican candidate. Democrats seemed interested chiefly in the candidates.

The article missed the significance of the Post-Intelligencer strike, which was a final showdown with Hearst on the question of editorial organization, and which has made history in that the guild published its own daily paper in place of the suspended P.-I. This strike united the labor movement, and with it hundreds of sympathetic business and professional groups.

The Washington Industrial Council will be interested to hear that they have raised $15,000,000 to break strikes; the highest figure quoted hereabouts is one-one-hundredth of that amount.

John C. Stevenson was not abandoned by the W. C. F. just before the primaries; he has not cut himself off from the W. C. F. because most of the state's progressives, including his followers, are in it; the W. C. F. did not run a third-party ticket.

Dave Beck is a "labor czar" only to the reactionary Seattle Times and Miss McCarthy. His teamster delegates comprise at least 20 per cent, not 3 per cent, of the Central Labor Council vote; but these teamsters are becoming more and more militant.

SELDEN C. MENEFFEE

Seattle, November 7

Dear Sirs: Of many letters received by The Nation from readers in the state of Washington, I have chosen Mr. Menefee's as the archetype for a full reply. Mr. Menefee touches on all the important points brought up by his fellow-correspondents.

Taking up Mr. Menefee's list in the order in which he has presented it, I must begin by denying that "the whole tone of the article was reactionary." How Mr. Menefee or anyone else could have actually read the last page of the article and in honesty have drawn that conclusion is to me utterly baffling. I was undoubtedly critical of certain aspects of the progressive movement in Washington, but my criticism was aimed from the left and not from the right. It is my opinion that the progressives and pseudo-progressives of the state are too opportunistic, on the whole too much concerned with office-grabbing and office-holding, and too little concerned with the genuine organizational problems of the labor movement, whose complete confidence they must gain if they are to progress toward a planned society.

As to the Commonwealth Federation, I wonder what Mr. Menefee considers its real strength is. Its main objective in the primaries was the nomination of Stevenson, and Stevenson took a licking. To say that it elected thirty-six candidates simply because it indorsed them is like saying that the American Labor Party elected Governor Lehman in New York State. Surely, Mr. Menefee does not believe that Vic Meyers, whom he mentions, owes his reelection as lieutenant governor to the fact that the Commonwealth Federation put its hallmark on him. Mr. Menefee gives the show away when he says, "All progressive initiatives and amendments were defeated, however, including 'Production for Use.'" Since Production for Use is the slogan, the raison d'être, of the Commonwealth Federation, the defeat would seem to tell something of its strength.

Mr. Menefee's second citation is no rebuttal. If he will turn to the last paragraph of my article, he will find the following sentence, "The P.-I. strike has demonstrated to labor its own strength," which, in its context, says all the things that Mr. Menefee has gone to the trouble of saying again. Since the article concerned the election, I could not be more expansive about the strike.

With Mr. Menefee's third point I am in complete agreement. One-one-hundredth of that amount would be much more like it, though other correspondents set the figure as high as $500,000. The $15,000,000 was a stupid slip which I should have caught in proof and didn't.

In reference to the Commonwealth's sticker ticket, I am told that both the Commonwealth and the Townsendites met in caucus on primary day and nominated new party slates for the general election, the Commonwealth leading off with Howard Costigan, and the Townsendites with W. B. Pemberton. Since this meeting must have been to some extent premeditated, it seems to me to constitute an acknowledgment of Stevenson's forthcoming defeat, and therefore, ethically considered, an abandonment of him. I understand that some time after I wrote the article the Commonwealth people decided to conform, and gave up the notion of a sticker ticket for the sake of party solidarity. If Mr. Menefee will read the article more carefully, he will discover that I did not say that Stevenson had abandoned the Commonwealth Federation, but that it was thought that he would do so. With the next major elections two years off, he still has time.

Dave Beck, as vice-president of the Teamsters' International, and president of the Teamsters' affiliates, should control at least 20 per cent of the Central Labor Council vote. (Another correspondent calls it 33 per cent.) However, as Mr. Menefee says, the teamsters and their affiliates are becoming more and more militant; Dave Beck, increasingly conservative, could not now in a crisis count on more than 3 per cent of the vote.

Finally, I must tell Mr. Menefee that it is "grossly inaccurate" to describe me

■ a "traveling reporter." I am no mere tourist in the state of Washington. It is my own, my native land.

MARY MCCARTHY

New York, November 25

Against a Labor Party

Dear Sirs: With the extraordinary lift The Nation has taken in the last few months—format, style, editorial direction, content—which has brought liberal journalism in America to a new peak, it is a pity that at one crucial point you should be so unrealistic. I refer to your uncritical advocacy of a labor party as the sound political course for progressives.

In your last issue the first editorial paragraph speaks of the folly of liberals in hoping that Mr. Roosevelt will some day lead a labor party—as though that were the criterion of statesmanship today. In the preceding issue, the Task for Progressives is outlined by Max Lerner as the achievement of unity—in what?—in a labor party, of course.

This is a strange and inconsistent reversal of the position only recently taken by at least the Marxist wing of the liberals, and still taken in the discussion of European prototypes of an American Labor Party. In your own columns, less than a month ago, appeared a scathing and brilliant analysis of the British Labor Party by Harold Laski. Words are seldom wasted any more trying to defend the German Social Democratic Party's role in permitting Hitler to come to power; that party of course was a "labor party," resting solidly on organized labor, and led, like the British Labor Party, by the leaders of organized labor. But in swinging away from the grandiose "infantile leftism" that considered the coming American revolution to be only just around the corner, the intellectual left is falling back into even older mistakes.

Let me put down a few relevant facts challenging your present position:

1. The German Social-Democratic Party (a "labor party") failed to achieve socialism or prevent fascism.

2. The British Labor Party's outstanding contribution was Ramsay MacDonald.

3. The best that other Continental labor parties have been able to produce are the people's fronts. If Spain wins, it will be a special case, similar to Russia. France is on a desperate defensive with no hope of moving on to socialism, unless, likewise, by a bloody revolution à la Russe.

4. In America labor has been as militant as it ever was in Europe, but even less radical. Witness the Knights of Labor, Gompers, Green, etc. Lewis and the C. I. O. are also to the right, even of Ramsay MacDonald.

5. American labor's outstanding contribution to independent political action up till now has been the American Labor Party of New York—better than supporting Tammany or the Republicans to be sure, but a poor imitation of insurgency.

6. Where there were radical candidates or measures on the ballot, labor's support was even more uncertain than that of middle-class groups.

But can we not learn the lesson of the mass movements of discontent that the depression has brought out in this country, both as to potentialities and dangers? The Wisconsin Progressives, the Minnesota Farmer-Laborites, the California Epics, the Washington Commonwealth Federation—yes, even the deluded following of Dr. Townsend, Huey Long, Father Coughlin, and their ilk—show that radicalism is not confined to the working class in this country. Often quite the reverse. Radical leadership will come from middle-class elements fully as much as from labor during the coming years. Whether those elements take us into fascism or into an economy of abundance through the introduction of production for use will depend to no small extent on our present intellectual leadership.

REPORTS FROM MADRID INDICATE THAT THE rebels have little chance of capturing the city without additional foreign troops. The Moors and foreign legion, who have borne the brunt of the fighting, have suffered such heavy losses that they are believed incapable of further attack. Faced with the danger of annihilation if the Loyalists should attack their exposed flank with sufficient force, the rebels have been forced to look abroad for reinforcements. Neutral reports from various sources indicate that several thousand German and Italian troops are already in Spain, and more will be needed if the rebels are to break into Madrid. Legally and morally these troops are in a sharply different category from the international brigade serving with the Loyalists. The international brigade is composed entirely of volunteers—Frenchmen, anti-fascist Germans and Italians, and a scattering from the various democratic countries. In most instances they have made their way to Spain in defiance of the wishes of their governments. The rebel mercenaries, on the other hand, consist of regular troops which have been dispatched by the German and Italian governments to fight against the government of Spain. This involves nothing short of an act of war against Spain and properly comes under the jurisdiction of the League. Meanwhile, neither France nor England can afford to sit back and permit Spain to be occupied by German and Italian soldiers.

THE LACK OF REALISM WHICH HAS AFFLICTED the democratic countries since the outbreak of the Spanish revolt has never been better illustrated than in the British-French proposal for a plebiscite to settle the Spanish conflict. Thus far General Franco has ignored the proposal, and he is unlikely to change his mind. But even if he agreed to a plebiscite, is there any reason to suppose that he would accept its result more willingly than he accepted that of the election of last February? On that occasion, it will be recalled, the republican victory was gained despite wholesale terrorism and corruption on the part of the incumbent reactionary government. In any case a fair plebiscite could not be held without the presence of large bodies of foreign troops. General Franco would doubtless demand that a substantial proportion of these be drawn from Germany and Italy, a demand that could hardly be acceded to without laying the basis for an immediate world war. It is true that the Saar plebiscite was carried off much more smoothly than was anticipated, but this was because the vote was overwhelmingly one-sided. No one would suggest that the results in Spain would be nearly as decisive. The most unfortunate aspect of the proposal is the fact that it has served, as was possibly intended, to distract attention from the Spanish plea at Geneva. While there has never been much hope that the League would act under Article XI to prevent fascist intervention in Spain, the airing of the situation at Geneva might, under more favorable circumstances, have served to rally world opinion to the side of the legitimate government.

THE PEACE PLAN OF THE INTER-AMERICAN Conference represents about the only possible compromise between the principle of collective security as espoused by the Latin American countries and the isolationist neutrality proposals of the United States. Under the compromise formula the twenty-one American republics have agreed to hold consultations whenever the peace is threatened, whether by inter-American controversies, attack from without, or a general world conflagration. In addition, a protocol has been introduced—aimed primarily at the United States—outlawing intervention in the affairs of any American republic by any other. The proposal to set up a permanent commission composed of the foreign ministers of each country was lost, but the more general consultative machinery is expected to have the same result. The advantage of the projected accord over the neutrality pact suggested by the American delegation lies in the fact that it is more flexible and less likely to align the American countries against any collective action taken by the League. Consultation offers no assurance against war, but it may lead to a peaceful solution of difficulties in many instances where war is threatened. This may be set down as a definite achievement, although a very minor one in view of the gravity of the international situation. In sabotaging all efforts to establish collective security on the American continent, the United States has rejected the positive elements in the Monroe Doctrine while continuing to demand its economic fruits.

HARRY BRIDGES, OF WEST COAST FAME, HAS come to New York by airplane. It is reported that he will try to get the help of Eastern longshoremen, who are not on strike, in preventing the sailing of ships bound for West Coast ports. He is also scheduled to speak at a mass-meeting of seamen engaged in a strike outlawed by Joseph P. Ryan, his superior officer in the International Longshoremen's Association, and by the A. F. of L. He has come, in a word, to challenge Ryan in Ryan's own territory. Mr. Bridges officially opened the campaign some weeks ago in an open letter to Mr. Ryan. Writing in the name of the Pacific Coast District of the I. L. A., Mr. Bridges said that it was "regrettable and nauseating" to the longshoremen of the West to see longshoremen in the East and in the Gulf working struck ships. He further reproached Mr. Ryan for attacking the picket lines of "seamen who are on strike against miserable wages," adding that "your salary of $1,250 per month is more than a seaman earns in an entire year." In the East the rank and file has been making genuine headway in discrediting the self-perpetuating officialdom which has ruled over it in the past. Bridges's open attack on Ryan, followed by his public appearance in New York as a champion of the "outlaw" strikers, marks an important development in the movement for a National Maritime Federation. It reflects the strength of the Pacific rank and file, which has shown amazing solidarity and discipline in a massive and long-drawn-out strike. Finally it is definitely connected with the split in the labor movement sustained at Tampa. The C. I. O. obviously offers to the Maritime Federation, which is essentially an industrial union, more congenial associates than it could find among the crotchety craft-union diehards of the A. F. of L.

THE SUBSTANCE OF ALBERT VITON'S ARTICLE in this issue is also the substance of the stormy hearings in progress in Palestine under the auspices of the British Royal Commission sent out to study the background, economic and political, of the Arab uprisings. The Arab leaders are boycotting the commission but their views were well known in advance. Primarily they want an end to Jewish immigration and the sale of land to Jewish settlers—a demand that really implies the end of Zionism itself. The representatives of the Jewish Agency have presented a mass of statistics and opinions designed to combat these views. They emphasize the progress Zionism has brought to Palestine, especially in the form of economic improvement shared by Jews and Arabs alike; they demand that Jewish immigrants be accepted to the full absorptive capacity of the country, and that its saturation point be raised by large-scale reclamation projects. But behind this clear-cut conflict lies a whole maze of complexities, including the imperial policy of Great Britain in the Near East, the ravages of anti-Semitism in Germany and Eastern Europe, and the mounting flood of pan-Arab nationalism—deep-seated impulses desperately at odds. Other royal commissions have gone to Palestine and reported on the same problems; but the problems have persisted. They will continue as long as imperialism uses nationalist passions to support its ends, as long as race and religious prejudice are organized into movements by aspiring politicians. But meanwhile this particular commission is confronted by a definite set of circumstances. It must find an immediate solution so that life may somehow go on in Palestine. In the article published this week, and in others to follow by Mr. Viton and Rabbi Bernstein, we hope to present facts and opinions which will help to clarify the issues. On the basis of this material we shall reexamine and restate The Nation's position on the whole problem of Palestine.

THE FINAL OFFICIAL RETURNS FROM THE Presidential election show a distressingly low vote for the candidates of the minor parties. Norman Thomas received only 187,000 votes as against 885,000 in 1932, a loss of nearly 80 per cent. Earl Browder, the Communist nominee, did slightly better with 80,000 as compared with Foster's 102,000 four years ago. Lemke, for all his ballyhoo, got almost exactly the number of votes that Thomas polled in 1932. It would be dangerous to conclude that better times have destroyed all possibility of independent political action. The chances are that the improvement in economic conditions had little to do with the result. President Roosevelt undoubtedly obtained many votes from persons who would normally support a minor-party ticket because of the widespread but mistaken assumption that it was to be a close election. The 300,000 votes cast for the President on the American Labor Party ticket in New York indicated a healthy desire to break away from the old-party labels where such action could be taken without seeming to aid the Tories. The same might be said of the success of the La Follette Progressives in Wisconsin, the Farmer-Labor Party in Wisconsin, and Senator Norris's remarkable victory on a non-partisan ticket in Nebraska. But no one will deny that the independent progressives now face a long, uphill fight.

A MILLION TONS OF WHEAT IS THE AMOUNT, as announced by General Göring at the Peasant Congress at Goslar, by which the German crop this year falls short of German needs. The rye crop is short by the same amount. Overconfident estimates on the part of the government based on the two record crops of 1932 and 1933 accounts in part for the discrepancy between the actual harvest and what was hoped for; in part the shortage is due to a similar shortage in meat and fats which has resulted in an increased consumption of bread. But whatever the reason, grain will have to be imported; money to pay for it will have to be diverted from the amount spent for buying munitions. In other words, the Day—when the confident Nazis will set forth on their great adventure in international pillage—will have to be postponed a little. A nation which cannot find enough for its citizens to eat cannot risk the dangers of blockade. Göring also reported that peasants were withholding grain from the market in the hope of a higher price or simply to feed it to stock, and he uttered the usual Nazi threats for this failure of patriotism. But threats will not make bread. It is evident that Hitler's Four-Year Plan, which was to make Germany economically independent of the world and at the same time able to attack it, is not running on schedule.

INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION IN THE EVENT OF war is the high-sounding objective of legislation which has been drafted by the War Department in cooperation with the Navy Department for presentation to the next Congress. The Nye committee revealed that this plan, as it existed at the time of the munitions investigation, contemplated the establishment of a military dictatorship over the country in the event of war. The original plan called for the conscription of industrial workers. The present draft does not contain this section, but it provides the machinery and the justification for putting such a decree into effect. "The objective of any warring nation is victory, immediate and complete," states the document; it confers on the President and the War Resources Administration, which it contemplates, vast powers over the industrial life of the country. The price-control feature of the plan, designed to "take the profits out of war," has been put into the forefront, although experience in the World War shows that attempts to control prices have only slight success. The ordinary man will find much more realistic the provision that in the event of a super-war—and it will be a super-war—"an additional operating function" according to the Times, "will be that of supervision over the industrial education and mechanical training of labor required by industry for necessary expansion or in replacement of men taken into the armed forces."

THE REAL REASON THAT CARDINAL PACELLI came to America no one has quite been able to figure out. Among the many ingenious suggestions advanced have been that he came to curb Coughlin, to gather funds to relieve the Vatican's supposed financial embarrassment, to obtain American cooperation in the three-cornered drive against communism led by Hitler, Mussolini, and Pope Pius, or to establish diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Washington. To these explanations must be added the one offered by the French weekly, L'Europe Nouvelle. The Pope is old and ill and his throne will soon be vacant. Leading candidates who at present appear to have equal chances are Cardinal Pacelli and Cardinal Della Costa, Archbishop of Florence. When a Pope dies, the College of Cardinals which elects his successor meets almost immediately and thus a candidate must be forehanded in vote-gathering. In the majority of twenty-five necessary to elect, the seven votes of the Americas (United States four, Canada one, Latin America two) are not to be neglected. So occupied were we at the time of the Cardinal's visit with our own election campaign that it escaped our notice that His Eminence, who had previously visited the Argentine and Brazil, might be doing some astute campaigning of his own.

JAPAN'S THREATENED CABINET CRISIS HAS died down but not out. The fall of the government as a result of Foreign Minister Arita's proffered resignation appears to have been staved off for the moment. But a sorry record of diplomatic failure has been revealed. The pact with Germany directed against Moscow will probably cost Japan invaluable fishing rights as well as the Sakhalin oil concessions from Soviet Russia and may push the Russians into closer cooperation with China. It has seriously alienated England, and gained Japan nothing but ephemeral advantages from Germany plus dissatisfaction at home and ridicule abroad as a result of Arita's foolish invitation to the democratic countries to join the pact. As for the negotiations with Italy, there Japan jumped into the water while Mussolini ran away with its clothes. It recognized the conquest of Ethiopia and unaccountably came away without Italian recognition of Manchoukuo. Moreover, the withdrawal of the demands on China, mentioned on another page, is an admission of diplomatic defeat more humiliating than any Japan has suffered since it was forced to give up Port Arthur after the Russo-Japanese war.

Love and the Governing Class

TO the countless millions of words, oral and written, that have been spilled over the King, Mrs. Simpson, and the abdication, what can now be added? Ours has become the most self-conscious age in history. Its dramatic scenes, its public and private tragedies, are enacted in front of a microphone and a camera. H. L. Mencken has called the love and abdication of Edward the biggest news story since the Resurrection, and the significant thing is that everyone knows this is true. It is not only the rulers, pundits, society leaders, and middle classes of the world that have been following the amazing sequence of events packed into a week. Even the lowliest have followed the story of the man who gave up a throne for love, and have identified themselves with the actors in this high drama.

The theme that quickens all pulses is of course the dilemma of love. It is not merely that the story of Edward and Mrs. Simpson combines, in a hitherto unparalleled mélange, sex, glamor, politics, and royalty. At the core of our interest is what the story has in common with the great Greek tragedies—the theme of personal desire running counter to the inexorable demands of the social structure. And the effect we get here, as in the Greek tragedies, is the purging effect of pity and terror. All our lives we have seen such personal conflicts around us. Every day we have watched in newsprint the heart-break of the millions who ask for advice to the lovelorn, or who unwillingly furnish the staple of newspaper stories. But when a monarch is caught in the same fate, when the stakes are a throne and an empire, we find ourselves confronted with the problem as though it were the newest and freshest thing in the world. And quite naturally, even apart from Edward's moving radio address, our sympathy goes to him—to the man who always rebelled against the stuffy trappings of monarchy, who captured the imagination of his people, and who withal was desperately unhappy and neurotic until he found a woman who engaged his whole being. One thing is clear, and that is that the masses of men and women in the world feel with Edward and with Mrs. Simpson rather than with the Mrs. Grundys of church and Cabinet who not so much allowed him to choose as thrust a choice upon him. And sad as everyone professes to be about Edward's abdication, there is—so sentimental is the world even in a machine age—a general satisfaction that it was not love that abdicated.

But this has been more than a love story. It has been a political drama of wide and deep implication. We are happy to present elsewhere in this issue the comments of two seasoned political observers, Harold Laski and John Gunther, who are acquainted with the actors in the drama and who know England. Their judgments differ in important respects, and ours differs somewhat from both of theirs. The constitutional issue has to our mind been given unnecessary emphasis. Once raised, of course, it became of enormous importance. But need it ever have been raised? Granted that a morganatic marriage is somehow repugnant to the English tradition, it is still clear that the fate of Cabinet government was not at stake until it was pushed into the picture by Mr. Baldwin. A Cabinet and a Prime Minister who wished to avoid making a fracas of the whole business could have waited until a marriage was possible and then introduced an act to change the succession. A press with the Mrs. Simpson taboo removed could eventually have prepared the popular mind for a sensible solution of the whole affair.

One cannot avoid the suspicion that at the center of the whole controversy has stood Mr. Baldwin, playing politics with a Tory mastery of the English mind. Just as in the fall of 1935, feeling his political fortunes ebbing, he maneuvered a general election right after the Jubilee and at the strategic moment when the British people, after taking a general peace ballot, were reluctant to change a government that had given its pledge against rearmament; just as last winter, after the Hoare-Laval fiasco, he repaired his damaged prestige by using the death of George V to broadcast a touching eulogy of Queen Mary and the sanctity of British family life; so with a Cabinet again shaken by the vacillations of British foreign and internal policy, he has used Edward's personal dilemma to show himself again the champion of British morality and above all of the tradition of Cabinet government. How he translated the first into terms of the second can be read between the lines of his truly masterly speech in the House of Commons on the day of the abdication. Note the earnestness with which Mr. Baldwin repeatedly assures his Parliament that it was not he but the King who at each point except at the very beginning broached the problem of Mrs. Simpson. But on the question of who it was that introduced the idea of a morganatic marriage he is beautifully indefinite. "The suggestion had been made to me," he says. But by whom? This is a startling omission in a supposedly candid statement. If the suggestion had been made by the King, Mr. Baldwin would have been eager to say so. No, Mr. Baldwin saw that the morganatic marriage was something on which he could base the issue of Cabinet responsibility. And once that was intruded into the picture, Mr. Baldwin was clearly and inevitably the victor.

Mr. Gunther ends his article with a witty and skeptical query as to what the Marxians can make of Mrs. Simpson. Like any complex historical event, the story of Edward's yielding of the throne has ramifications that go beyond any single school of thought. But to connect Edward's love and abdication with the whole position of the English governing class is by no means fantastic. In fact, it is the only analysis that cuts through the tangle of perplexities that trouble Mr. Gunther. The reason we have attached no special importance to the reputed pro-Germanism of Edward and Mrs. Simpson and the group around them is that the whole ruling class in England is riddled with pro-Germanism. What the episode clearly shows is the weakness and indecisiveness of the governing groups in England, the alliance of Church of England hypocrisy with the political ends of the Tories, the deep splits within the governing class itself at the very moment in the European chaos when a vigorous and decisive government can alone insure British survival. Mr. Baldwin has now for at least the third time been able to give his waning party a new lease on life, and each time he has leaned on the traditions of the monarchy and the hold it has on the people. But as Mr. Laski points out, it is the monarchy itself as an institution that has suffered the severest blow. For many of the British people this is the first time the trappings of the monarchy have been torn away. A symbol is always weakened by exposure. One wonders how much longer this one can be used to enable the Baldwins of Britain and their allies in the hierarchy of church and finance to conceal their incapacity to govern except in their own interest.

Kidnapping a Dictator

[As we go to press an unconfirmed report from Shanghai announces the execution of Chiang Kai-shek. The consequences of this act will be discussed next week.]

CHANG HSUEH-LIANG'S coup d'état and the kidnapping of Chiang Kai-shek should not come as a surprise to those who have been following Far Eastern affairs closely in recent months. For some time it has been evident that China was preparing to challenge Japan. The most influential sections of Chinese public opinion—the students, intellectuals, and business interests—have been bitterly anti-Japanese throughout the past year, and the only question was whether Chiang Kai-shek or some other militarist would assume leadership of the movement. Since his capitulation to the Kwangsi clique in September, Chiang has taken a somewhat stronger stand against Japan. He was influential in rejecting the ultimatum presented to Nanking after the killing of six Japanese in the late summer and had co-operated in the defense of Suiyuan. Nevertheless, the recent arrest of the leaders of the national liberation movement in Shanghai indicated that Chiang was still playing a middle-of-the-road game, and that he had no intention of openly attacking Japan except as a last resort. He had repeatedly spurned the Communists' invitation to a united front against Japan and had recently declared that he would resume his perennial anti-red campaign. It is even suggested that he had planned to arrest Chang Hsueh-liang for alleged red sympathies.

Chang Hsueh-liang is far from being a Communist.

He is one of the wealthiest men in China, having inherited tens of millions from his father, the notorious Chang Tso-lin. But he has fallen in with the Communist program in so far as it places primary emphasis on the eradication of the Japanese. Chang is not likely to forget that it was the Japanese who deprived him of his position as overlord of Manchuria. Possibly he is astute enough to see that history has a place for the man who assumes leadership of the great mass movement which is demanding the liberation of China from Japanese domination. And he may be wise enough to know that such a goal can only be achieved with the backing of a united China—including the Communists, with their vast armies in the northwest close to the Japanese area.

If the "Young Marshal" succeeds in uniting the country under his leadership, the Japanese will be placed in an intolerable position. The military clique is already under strong criticism at home for arousing Chinese opposition. As a result, two of the most important of the recent Japanese demands have been dropped. Japanese troops will not now be sent to the interior "to fight communism," and the plan for a five-province buffer state in North China will be temporarily shelved. The recent victory of the local Suiyuan troops over the Japanese-supported Mongols from Chahar doubtless contributed to this decision. Success of the Chang revolt would leave Japan with a choice between an ignominious retreat, accompanied by a complete loss of face, and open hostilities. The events of the past few weeks have suggested that Japan wishes above all else to avoid war with China. Although the superior equipment of the Japanese should assure an ultimate triumph, such a struggle would strain the resources of the islands to the limit. And Japan has its eye on bigger game than China.

The alliance between Chang Hsueh-liang and the Communists is a direct result of the Third International's "united-front" tactics. It is an attempt to restore the status of 1926, when the Kuomintang with Communist support came very near creating a modern, independent China. The fact that the Communist Party has taken leadership in the anti-Japanese movement gives that party a prestige which may later be of tremendous importance in determining the trend of social change in China. For the moment, however, there can be no thought of revolution. China will have its hands full checking Japanese imperialism.

Ordinarily there would be little danger of a Sino-Japanese conflict developing into a world war. The nature of the present controversy, however, gives cause for anxiety. Japan has already blamed the Soviet Union for the part played by the Chinese Communists in Chang's coup d'état. Although this has been denied, Russia cannot but be seriously concerned in the outcome. Further Japanese penetration into Inner Mongolia and North China would constitute a direct threat to the Soviet defenses. Sooner or later a clash between the two countries is inevitable; in which event Germany is committed to the support of Japan. Thus the future of Europe as well as that of Asia may be decided by the events of the next few days in far-off Sian-fu.

Boom—for Whom?

THE financial pages of the newspapers have made much cheerier reading in recent weeks than any other section. From the standpoint of the stockholder, November was the most satisfactory month on record. During this brief thirty-day period American corporations declared dividends aggregating $883,000,000, which exceeded the best previous month by practically 50 per cent. An additional $300,000,000 in dividends was announced during the first ten days of December, bringing the total since the end of October to approximately $1,200,000,000. This amount is equal to about 3 per cent of the national income of the United States as it was in 1932 and 1933 and to at least 2 per cent of the present income. In addition to receiving nearly a billion and a quarter in cold cash, stockholders had the satisfaction of knowing that the value of their holdings increased by more than a billion and a half during November. And if they were philanthropically inclined, they doubtless derived additional satisfaction from the thought that the workers of the country had shared in the melon to the extent of at least a quarter of a billion dollars in increased wages and bonuses.

Although the flood of extra dividends can be explained largely by the desire on the part of directors to avoid the higher ranges of the recently enacted tax on corporation surpluses, there can be no doubt that business is good. The Federal Reserve Board's index of business activity is well over the 1923-25 average and at its highest point since the boom years. Holiday retail sales are estimated to be running 15 per cent higher than last year and only about 10 per cent under 1929. Employment and pay rolls have shown steady improvement. Despite the drought and elimination of AAA payments, the 1936 farm income will doubtless surpass that of any recent year. Commodity prices have risen even more steadily than the stock market in recent weeks, and wheat is at the highest point in years. In the industrial field the index of steelingot production has reached 79 per cent of capacity, and November's output is believed to have been the largest for any November in the history of the iron and steel industry.

Business sentiment for 1937 is exceptionally optimistic. Although European difficulties and the spread of the "sitdown" strikes have troubled the stock market recently, no one really expects a serious relapse at this time. A much greater danger is the possibility of a runaway inflation. In its earlier stages inflation can scarcely be distinguished from general business revival. The 1936 business boom has been an inflationary boom which has not as yet got beyond control. The test, of course, lies in the purchasing power of the dollar. During the 1928 and 1929 stock-market boom there was no general increase in prices. On the contrary, commodity prices showed a slight tendency to decline. A certain increase in prices and the cost of living was inevitable in the recovery period. But with wheat at $1.35 a bushel in Chicago and copper selling at 11 cents a pound, there are indications that price increases are already going farther than is quite healthy. Perhaps the most disquieting element in an inflation is the fact that speculators, stockholders, and entrepreneurs obtain an ever-increasing share of the national income. The recent orgy of melon cutting and the continuous increase in commodity prices suggest that this process is already under way. It is true that wages have also been boosted, but wages are by no means keeping pace with dividends, and it is doubtful whether the wage-earner will receive as large a proportion of the 1936 national income as he did either in the depression years or in 1929.

That the Administration is aware of the dangers inherent in the situation is evident from the apprehension which has been shown over the continued increase in the excess reserves of the member banks of the Federal Reserve system. While a seasonal decline in these reserves is expected between now and the beginning of next year, they are certain to rise again unless a further cut is made in reserve requirements. Ultimately, two billion dollars of excess reserves means twenty billion in new purchasing power if the present expansion in business and financial activity continues. This would result in feverish business activity, but it would also mean prices far higher than those of 1929. Instead of recovery from the depression, we should be confronted with a perilous boom, supported by the new purchasing power created by the devaluation of the dollar, and swollen by our huge imports of gold and silver. The excess reserves might be drastically reduced if the Reserve Banks would sell their holdings of government bonds, but such action is unlikely because it would seriously impair the government's borrowing power. A further increase in reserve requirements is also possible, but there can be no assurance that the state banks will remain in the system if the terms become too onerous. The chances are that any action that the Reserve Board takes will be insufficient to prevent a further inflationary rise in prices.

Such a development would virtually make it impossible to stabilize economic activity at a high level. It would involve a further redistribution of income from the wage-earning and salaried classes to the already wealthy owners of the means of production. At first this would result in a tremendous expansion in the capital-goods industries, but eventually the country would face the old question—where are the masses going to obtain the money to buy the increased production? The Administration would have to decide between a cessation of spending with a contraction of credit which would precipitate another depression, and increased spending with a consequent runaway inflation. Fortunately, this tragic dilemma can still be avoided by diverting the tide of unearned income into the channel where it is certain to be used to bolster consumer buying power. This may be partly achieved by an increase in the income tax on individuals in the high and moderately high brackets and the use of the funds thus obtained to create genuine social security for the unemployed, the aged, the sick, and other victims of the tragic insecurity of our times.

The King's Abdication

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

By Radio from London, December 13

AT THE week-end it looked as though the possible abdication of the King might be attended by grave consequences. There were some signs in London of mass emotion. The millionaire press was hinting that the Cabinet was trying to force King Edward from the throne because of his supposed liberal views. Mr. Churchill and the fascists were, it appeared, threatening to form a party of the King's friends. Some left-wing opinion was urging the Labor Party to use the opportunity to attain office, win a general election on a wave of sentiment, and drive through a socialist program.

All opposition to the abdication collapsed by Tuesday night. This, I think, was due to a number of reasons. (1) The idea of a morganatic marriage was everywhere unpopular and did grave harm to King Edward's popularity. (2) The unity of the dominions with the Cabinet's view immediately strengthened its hands. (3) The opinion grew rapidly among labor that a King's victory would mean sooner or later a reassertion of his independent power in politics that would make him a tool in the worst kind of Tory hands. (4) The solid press, especially in the provinces, was overwhelmingly on Mr. Baldwin's side in regarding the marriage with Mrs. Simpson as impossible. (5) The King's allies, especially Sir Oswald Mosley, did him great harm. It was felt that dark forces were irresponsibly seeking to exploit his prestige for their own ends. By Thursday the nation was not only prepared for abdication; it was ready to accept it as the best way out of the situation, for any alternative, unless the King renounced marriage with Mrs. Simpson, would sooner or later have raised the issue of King versus Parliament. No one except the fascists wanted that issue raised.

The abdication is above all the assertion of the principles (1) that the King must act on the advice of his ministers; (2) that the place where issues of policy are decided is and must be the House of Commons. By reason of these the result is an important blow to those who sought to get this issue decided by non-parliamentary action.

But there is no doubt that it has done serious damage to the monarchy. For the first time in sixty years the validity of the monarchical principle itself is being widely discussed. That is a novel departure in English life. It is clear, also, that the abdication removes a great deal of the prestige from the throne. This has been emphasized by the wide sense of royal irresponsibility in the matter. People have seen through the magic which screens the throne as they have not done since the time of George IV, and the wholesale indignation of the Tories at the very idea of marriage with Mrs. Simpson has shown the man in the street that in fact the roots of the system are far more fragile than he had been led to suppose. As always when a mystery comes into the public view it is quickly discovered that it is not a mystery at all.

I do not believe the theory that conservatism forced Mr. Baldwin to get rid of the King for fear that he would prove an inconvenient radical influence. I believe it profoundly disliked the marriage, in part for snobbish reasons; but what determined the national attitude lay much deeper than the marriage itself.

On the whole the effects of the change will be good. The palace will resume its normal dullness. Exploitation of the crown will be more difficult. That is something for which labor can be grateful. It is clear too that fascist influences cannot use the prestige of monarchy as an instrument in their hands. The country will go on as if nothing vital had occurred, for the one certain thing is that King Edward will not be able—if he were inclined—to form a Jacobite movement.

Notes on the Simpson Crisis

BY JOHN GUNTHER

THE whole stupendous business is full of puzzles, paradoxes, and contradictions. Contradiction Number One: The person of the King is so unimportant that the transition from Edward to York proceeds apparently with the utmost smoothness; yet the person of the Queen is so critically important that it cost Edward the throne.

Another is that the Church of England, which forbade this marriage on the issue of divorce, was itself founded by Henry VIII ostensibly to make divorce possible to a monarch.

Another is that England above all things prides itself on a free press; yet a ruthless censorship of the greatest story of a generation helped Edward to lose the crown. A subsidiary irony is the position of Mr. Hearst, who destroys all he touches. It must have been the early Hearst stories, whooping for marriage, which reached Baldwin and helped to blast it.

Incidentally, the American press was not so wild as many people uncritically imagine. No breath of scandal about Mrs. Simpson was ever unearthed. She was simply a lady who had had two husbands. Our papers went in for formality and abbreviation, which is a form of fondness. The worst that happened was that we called them Wally and Davey and that Mr. Luce of Time invented "snuggery" to describe Fort Belvedere.

Why, why, why did it all have to happen? Old Family Doctor Baldwin said that growing publicity made him go to the King. But everyone who counted in England had known for at least six months that Mrs. Simpson's special position greatly improved the character and happiness of the monarch and made him a better King. The issue of censorship is of great importance. If public opinion had been allowed gradually to form a favorable opinion of Mrs. Simpson and her excellent influence on the King, there might have been very little scandal. If Mrs. Baldwin had had her to tea or if Queen Mary had taken her out shopping, the results might have been very different.

I have no means of knowing, but I imagine that Mrs. Baldwin had a considerable lot to do with shaping her husband's mind.

Of course Edward must have made up his mind absolutely for marriage with Mrs. Simpson. Otherwise the story doesn't make sense. He gave up the throne not just for a woman, but for a wife, which is something quite different.

This brings up another terrific contradiction. Edward did not want to live a loose life. He could have had plenty of mistresses. But he wanted marriage and a family, as he movingly explained in his broadcast. Mr. Baldwin, the moralist, denied him this. He misused a moral position to deny the king a moral solution to the problem. It was not immorality but just the opposite which provoked the Church of England's wrath.

The case attaches a stigma to all divorced persons in England. Mrs. Simpson's one and one-half divorces were strictly conventional and proper. Her ex-husbands "now living" admire her greatly. Supposing she had been twice widowed. Would that have made a difference? Suppose both her ex-husbands should die next week. Would this whole crisis have been in vain? Ridiculous!

Mr. Baldwin said that no precedent existed for a morganatic marriage. But none existed for an abdication of this kind—something infinitely more iconoclastic.

Laertes's speech to Ophelia, quoted by the Prime Minister, was striking. Has Mr. Baldwin forgotten how Hamlet ends?

I wish the poor old Labor Party had not been so glacially "constitutional." Constitutionalism in England is, after all, what is done. If Mr. Attlee and his advisers had had more push and sting and farsightedness they might, from January to October, have got much closer to the King than they did get; the King was not unsympathetic. If, thoroughly warm relations having been established, the Labor leaders had not been quite so stick-in-the-muddish over divorce, they might have been in a position to tell Baldwin that they were willing to go to the country on the issue. Perhaps the Labor Party is too hopelessly bankrupt for revival. But a lot of us over here thought that in this issue they missed a grand chance for resuscitation. Again the business of censorship comes up. The people, the bulk of them, knew nothing of the crisis until it was splashed into their faces on December 3, and Baldwin certainly never gave them a chance of expressing an opinion.

I do not think that Baldwin, the Archbishop, the Times, and so on formed a cabal to squeeze Edward off the throne. Things don't happen that way in England. I do not think that Edward's visit to Wales was more than a minor embarrassment to the Cabinet. No one important in the ruling classes wanted an abdication, by choice, even though they might have been willing to see Edward put in his place rather sharply perhaps, and even though they have swallowed the business with almost unseemly grace.

Baldwin's speech was an authentic masterpiece. Its strength derived from the curious Puritan mysticism in his character. I think, though, that he left some things out. Edward's speech was a masterpiece too, and also with great quality of emotion.

If Parliament is going to interfere with the private life of a king—even a king cursed with inability to love anyone except a woman who belongs or belonged to someone else—then Parliament should be responsible for his education and upbringing.

The whole thing is an imperial as well as a personal tragedy. Edward's position may be tinged with a certain neuroticism, but surely his abdication represents a tremendous wastage of human material. And the political consequences must be considerable. Already Mr. De Valera has squeezed out from under with the governor general's head. What are the people in India and Africa and the South Seas going to think—if they get a chance—about the value of the crown as a symbol of imperial unity, when a king in the full spring of his reign tosses it into the junkpile like a can of soup? The political value of monarchy is the assurance it gives—or should give—of fixity, dignity, stability, permanence.

When I was in England there was a good deal of talk about Edward's alleged pro-Germanism. Most members of the royal family are not, perhaps, so much pro-German as anti-French. They are, after all, first- or second-generation Germans, and the French have always irritated and puzzled them. I do not think that Edward's "pro-Germanism" could have become a very important political force. It was based not only on heredity but on a sort of good-fellowship feeling that the Germans had had a raw deal after the war and deserved some sporting aid. The new King probably has much the same basic impulses and ideas. So one might conclude that the shift from Edward to York will not mean much difference on this tremendously important issue. York, however, is a much less vivid character than Edward and will doubtless be more under the influence of his advisers.

People wonder if Edward, like Carol of Rumania, will be a political source of trouble during exile. There will certainly be trouble-makers anxious to capitalize his position, for instance Mosley. But it is doubtful in the extreme that Edward will pay any attention to them. If he was too fed up to keep the job, he will be too fed up to try to get it back.

Edward, the world knows, wants to marry Mrs. Simpson. Will he be able to? Can the King's Proctor make trouble? Has the matter been "arranged"? It would be a heart-break if the marriage were to be made impossible. It would also, it seems clear, smash utterly British reputation for fair play. It was Baldwin himself who first announced officially the King's intention to marry. If he utilized this pronouncement not only to get Edward off the throne but to prevent the marriage in perpetuity, the storm of disgust among decent people might be enough to make Edward a political issue once again.

Finally, I am curious to hear the Marxist interpretation of all this. What do the economic determinists say of Mrs. Simpson?

The Fate of Zionism

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, November 2

THE Arab strike, which lasted six months, is over; violence, too, has temporarily subsided. The 30,000 soldiers whom Britain has dextrously slipped into Palestine will maintain order as a side duty—until something happens. A leading Arab said to me: "Either a European war will break out in a year or two or it will not. If war comes, we shall have our chance because England will not be able to keep so many soldiers here. If it doesn't, we shall have another chance because England will withdraw some of the troops anyway." A Royal Commission will soon arrive to investigate the last outbreak and suggest a solution that will prevent bloodshed in the future. But Palestine has had commissions in the past. They have issued voluminous reports but they have not brought peace. Neither Arabs or Zionists are optimistic about the results of the new commission. British commissions are designed to safeguard British interests, not to help the country. Only an Arab-Zionist understanding, with or without Britain, can heal the ills of the land.

Some fifteen months of study on the spot have convinced me that to make a report on Palestine one must begin at the beginning, even though no land has rated so many words per square foot. Palestine is very small.

Its total area is approximately 10,000 square miles, not much larger than the state of New Jersey, and it has less good agricultural land. The exact area of cultivable land is unknown—after nineteen years of British rule. Guesses range from 1,500,000 acres to more than double that amount. A conservative estimate, I believe, would set it at 2,500,000 acres. The Jews are constantly discovering new sources of underground water, and a hydro-geologic investigation might disclose abundant water in what is now considered desert. No such investigation has been made, though the government is enjoined by the terms of the mandate to "encourage close settlement by Jews on the land."

Since the Zionists want to settle tens of thousands of Jewish families as farmers, the question whether there is sufficient land is of paramount importance. According to the latest census 54 per cent of the population derive a living from agriculture. But the Arab peasants own only 60 per cent of the land they cultivate; 29 per cent of the peasants own no land at all; and about 47 per cent depend for their livelihood on secondary outside occupations. Consequently the poverty of the Arab village is almost unimaginable. The low and windowless one-room hut, made of mud and dried dung, is shared by the whole family and its few emaciated animals. There is no sign of furniture; all sleep on the ground. A long cotton dress resembling the old-fashioned nightshirt lasts the fellah for years. His diet is poor and monotonous. Thin cakes of bread made of impure flour, together with a few radishes or onions, make up his morning and evening meals; his main meal, taken in the afternoon, consists usually of a thick vegetable soup. Sickness is constant, blindness is horribly frequent, and the rate of infant mortality is 147 per 1,000 births.

The miserable condition of the Arab fellah, however, is not due to the scarcity of land. First of all, he does not like to overwork himself; second, he is totally ignorant of modern methods of agriculture and his implements are extremely primitive; third, he is weighed down by a burden of debt on which he pays interest that is rarely lower than 30 per cent, frequently 100 per cent or even more. The prosperous Christian inhabitants of Nazareth and the Moslems of Nablus owe their wealth to the usury they practice on the fellaheen of the neighboring villages. When the debt burden becomes hopeless, as frequently happens in all Oriental lands, the interest sharks take over the little farm, and one more fellah becomes landless. This, and the Turkish custom of endowing court favorites with large estates, has given rise to the fourth and worst evil—feudal landlordism.

In this land of poverty and death the Zionists have done a great work. They have drained tens of thousands of acres of deadly swamps; they have reclaimed at tremendous human and financial cost land which was worthless for centuries. They have planted orange groves where there was desert yesterday. The two colonies of Petakh-Tikvah and Hederah are typical. Until the coming of the Jews both were malarial marshes, inhabited by a few half-starved, disease-ridden Bedouin families. Today Petakh-Tikvah supports a population of 18,000, Hederah of 5,000. Thousands of acres of orange groves surround both colonies. In Hederah eucalyptus trees are the only remaining signs of the once deadly swamp. A railroad station and a large modern orange-packing house now stand on the site.

During a walking trip through Palestine last spring, my companion and I traversed in the Jordan Valley thousands of acres of excellent agricultural land. "And one could get water from the Jordan for irrigating it," my companion remarked. Small patches here and there were cultivated, but the Arabs had not even removed the stones which littered the fields. During a good ten-hour walk we did not see a single village; only a few friendly Bedouins grazing their sheep as Abraham's ancestors used to do. Suddenly, around four in the afternoon, we saw in the distance four bent figures. We found them to be four settlers. After giving us water and preparing seats under their wagon—which cast the only shade within miles—they told us their story. The Jewish National Fund bought here about 750 acres, on which 150 families will eventually settle. These four had been sent to prepare the land. For the last year they had been picking up stones; with pride they pointed to piles of stones that dotted the fields. In the summer the Jordan Valley is a burning furnace. There are scorpions, black and red, under the stones; as a result of their bite men have gone crazy from pain, which lasts about two weeks. In the few days we remained there, I insisted on helping them pick up stones, and I saw for myself those ugly little venomous creatures. The stones will be used eventually for building. Meanwhile, day after day and month after month, four men are picking up stones in the Valley of the Jordan.

What irrigation and intensive cultivation have done for the Jewish colonies could be done for the whole country. Not only is there enough land to allow the present agricultural population to enjoy a decent standard of living, but there is enough to support additional Jewish settlement. While the Arab fellah starves on thirty acres, the Jew prospers on five. As long as the Arab waste of land continues, however, there is little if any land for new settlement; moreover, if Jewish settlement continues on its past scale, there can be no doubt that it will spell the ruin of an increasing number of Arab peasants. A. Granovsky, of the Jewish National Fund, claims that only 688 peasants have been displaced in the plains of Esdraelion and Acre, but evidence presented before the commission which investigated the 1929 disturbances showed that about 2,000 had been so displaced. At least a few hundred more were forced off the land around Jaffa. What is likely to happen unless a fundamental agricultural revolution is carried through is indicated by the bloody fights in Wadi Hawareth between the new settlers and the Bedouins, and more recently at El Hartiyah near Haifa, where an Arab was shot dead by the police who were carrying out a court order for eviction.

With fundamental changes in the agricultural set-up, a certain number of Jewish families could be settled, though the cost would be extremely high. The exact number of families is of course unpredictable, but it would not run into six figures, as Zionists claim. E. Volcani, head of the Agricultural Experiment Station at Rehovoth, who undoubtedly knows more about Palestine agriculture than anybody else, said to me last winter: "I used to speak of settling 100,000 families here. I now recognize that hope to have been a sin of youthfulness." Possibly room could be found for 25,000 families. Settling even that many would be a gigantic task involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. So far, after half a century of intensive effort, not more than a third of that number have been settled at a cost of $6,000 to $12,000 per family. The cost of land in Palestine is prohibitive. Around the Jewish settlements land cannot be had for less than $600 an acre.

For political reasons, however, many Zionists are opposed to any scheme which would further Jewish settlement and at the same time cause the non-Jewish inhabitants to strike deeper roots in the soil. "Every new Arab house, every additional acre of Arab orange plantation, scares me more than all their political demonstrations and speeches," a Zionist leader once said to me as we passed the Arab orange groves around Jaffa.

Just as the Zionist ambition to settle millions of Jews on the land could not be realized even if the Arab fellah were squeezed out entirely, so also is the project of developing industries which will give employment to millions doomed to failure. Not only is Palestine small, but it is extremely poor in natural resources. It has no coal, no iron, no timber—none of the raw materials with which modern industry is fed. The Jordan River supplies a certain amount of electricity, but its capacities are very limited and the cost of production is excessive. The only important natural resources are the chemicals of the Dead Sea, for which a British-Jewish company now holds a concession.

The industry so far developed by the Jews, though unprecedented for the Near East, is small-scale industry serving mainly the local Jewish market. Its index of production has risen from 100 in 1920 to 380 in 1935, and it is giving employment to about 30,000 workers. About $40,000,000 is now invested in industry, compared to about $12,000,000 in 1930. Consumption of electricity increased from 8,707,917 kilowatt hours in 1931 to 34,385,515 kilowatt hours three years later. But this rate of development, while revealing tremendous progress in a short time, cannot be maintained in the future. In fact, it would appear that most of the industries have already reached the peak of development. It is certain, at least, that an industrial slump has set in, although at least $100,000,000 in local banks is awaiting productive investment. Nearly all the factories now in existence have had extremely checkered careers. The large Nesher cement factory, the Lodgia knitting mills, the chocolate factory, and the sole iron foundry in the country went bankrupt and were reorganized by creditors at a quarter of the original investment.

The only factories which have had even a moderate success are those connected with construction and those dependent upon raw material locally available. The tremendous immigration of the last few years has caused an exceptional boom in the building trade and has given employment to tens of thousands. But this cannot continue indefinitely; a serious slump has already set in. The healthiest industry is citrus-growing, and the area under cultivation can probably be doubled. This will make room for a few thousand families. But markets have first to be found for the excellent Palestinian oranges; this is not easy, and land prices will have to go down before citrus-growing becomes profitable again. A number of canning and preserving establishments have fared well. And that is all.

If this review of Palestine industry is somewhat disappointing, the fault is with the Zionist ballyhoo that has surrounded it. Palestine has been a very costly venture for the Jewish people. Between $600,000,000 and $750,000,000 has been invested in this desert during the last quarter of a century. That is a lot of money. The life of the Jewish worker is not easy, and the wages of Arabs, even in government work, are about half those of Jews. Wages of $25 a month for men and $15 for women are above the average for Jews. Prices are high; food costs here from two to three times as much as in the United States, and rent is as high as in New York City. Thousands of employed workers live on a pound of bread and a few uncooked vegetables each day. Very few know the meaning of steady employment; the vast majority come at least once a week to the union office in search of work. The much-advertised prosperity of the last two years was due entirely to a vast influx of capitalist immigrants, who did not know what to do with their money, and to land speculation. Land prices rocketed sky-high, and by transferring unpaid-for land from one buyer to another everybody thought that he was making money.

Faced with the country's inherent industrial limitations, the Zionists have tried to save every available job for Jewish immigrants. Not out of wickedness did the system of kibush avodah, "conquest of work," arise, but out of strictly economic and political considerations. Zionists do not like to picket establishments employing Arabs, and it is not hatred that drives them to eject, often violently, Arab laborers from their places of employment. One of the leaders of the Jerusalem Federation of Jewish Labor once put their case very clearly:

Jewish capital has created here new sources of employment. And there is no lack of workers here and in the neighboring countries. It will take years and years, in fact, to abolish the tremendous unemployment in this part of the world. The native workers are cheap; their standard of living is so low that the Jewish worker cannot possibly compete with them. The tendency of the capitalist is therefore to hire cheap, unorganized native laborers. But we are not building the country either as a refuge for Jewish capitalists or to provide work for unemployed Arabs. We want here a large Jewish population, which means Jewish workers, and this we can achieve only by safeguarding every Jewish-created place of work for Jewish workers. We do not want to place Jewish workers in Arab enterprises, but we will fight to the last for every Jewish-created job.

While the Zionists are right from their point of view, the Arab worker who has been expelled from his job by Histadruth pickets does not become friendlier to Zionism. No doubt kibush avodah is responsible to a large extent for the latest disturbances. One of the first Arabs I met when I came here more than a year ago was a doctor who spoke bitterly against Zionism. I enumerated to him the blessings the Zionists have conferred on them. "Who denies it?" he replied. "But do they do it because they have our interests at heart or because they want to bribe us to keep quiet as long as they are the minority? Even now they are trying to push us out of our jobs to make room for additional immigrants. Do you know that not a day passes without Davar campaigning for '100 per cent pure Jewish labor' in all Jewish enterprises? Here"—and from his drawer he pulled out a pack of clippings—"here are some of the items Davar has published during the last few days. On October 26 it came out with an editorial asking the government why no Jewish laborers were employed in building the new military airport at Lydda; in Petakh-Tikvah [the largest Jewish village] the efforts of the Histadruth to conquer for the Jewish worker a place in agriculture have borne fruit, and letters have been sent to Jewish orange-grove owners demanding the employment of pure Jewish labor. The following day Davar reported a battle between Histadruth pickets and the Arab laborers, and Davar could not understand 'why the government had to warn the Histadruth leaders against disturbing the peace.' In a front-page editorial on the same day it declared, 'The attempt to smuggle in Arab laborers at Ranaana . . . has indeed been nipped in the bud successfully, but only after our workers lost time and strength, after arrests and trials!' I cannot find the clippings for the following three days," he continued, "though I am certain that I had some, but on October 31, under the heading 'Juice from Jewish Fruit,' it took up the gauntlet and went into raptures about kiosk owners who decided 'to use for their juices fruit from groves employing Jewish labor only.' On the following day the paper reported the arrest of two members of the communistic settlement 'Makhar' for driving Arab workers from a Jewish grove against the wishes of the owner."

Can Palestine's industry be developed sufficiently to absorb new immigrants? That is the central question. The answer is that millions of immigrants cannot be absorbed; thousands can. Industries depending on locally grown fruit—that is, industries in which labor plays a paramount role in creating values—can be further developed. So far Palestine industry has not been able to compete on the foreign market. Industrial exports have hardly increased during the last ten years. The growing antagonism of the surrounding Arab countries to Zionism does not help Palestine industry to capture the vast Arab hinterland. In fact, the Arabs have launched a boycott which is very much felt. Also industry is developing in neighboring countries in which even lower wages prevail. And it should not be forgotten that Palestine is already one of the most densely populated countries in the world. Argentina has a population of 3.6 persons per square kilometer, Canada 1.5, Australia 0.8, New Zealand 0.5. In Palestine there are 85 persons to each square kilometer! Even highly industrialized Europe does not have such density: France has a population of 73 to every square kilometer, Poland 70, Austria 78, Rumania 58. The United States has 15.

The present population of Palestine is around 1,300,000, of which 950,000 are Arabs and about 400,000 are Jews. Unless science discovers a method of making butter from sunshine and bread from rocks, the saturation point will soon be reached. I know of no reputable economist who believes that the country can support many more than 3,000,000 souls, while some put the figure considerably below that maximum. The Arab population, though the death-rate is very high, increases at the rate of 27 per 1,000; it has increased by about 32 per cent in the last fourteen years. At this rate of increase there will be about 1,000,000 Arabs by 1955. At best, then, there is little hope for a significant Jewish majority. Even if all political barriers were removed, and immigration unrestricted, it is likely that during the next twenty years about a million Jews would immigrate, bringing the total population of Palestine to about 3,000,000. This, I am convinced, is the most optimistic prognosis that can be made.

[This is the first of two articles by Mr. Viton: They will be followed by a discussion of the Zionist position by Philip S. Bernstein and by a group of letters representing various points of view.]

Missouri's Boss Pendergast

BY IRVING DILLIARD

THE most powerful personality in Missouri politics has lately retired in favor of his nephew, but the retirement will not be a renunciation of power, for Boss Tom Pendergast will still be consulted in all matters affecting the machine. Before the election Pendergast lay critically ill in New York with a grave heart ailment brought on by "excessive work." Newspapers in St. Louis, Kansas City, and other Missouri cities and towns carried frequent front-page reports of the sick man's condition and the prospects for his recovery. The reason for this widespread concern over the health of Thomas Joseph Pendergast of Kansas City is known to every Missourian and to many followers of contemporary politics outside the Show Me State. For Mr. Pendergast is much more than a citizen of Kansas City who engages in the ready-mixed cement and wholesale-liquor businesses. Whatever changes his "retirement" may make, he has been for years the all-powerful Democratic boss of Jackson County, and his sway over the party of Cleveland and Wilson lately became state wide. Since Missouri has been heavily Democratic in recent years, this means that he now pulls the strings of a sovereign commonwealth known for such diverse public men as Thomas Hart Benton and Francis P. Blair, Carl Schurz and George Graham Vest (eulogizer of the dog), Champ Clark and William Joel Stone, James A. Reed and John J. Cochran. Pendergast is or was—for his illness has considerably reduced his heft of 240 pounds—a roly-poly, ruddy-faced man. Bright blue eyes look out positively from a large head which is joined to a prize fighter's shoulders by a short, muscular neck. Sandy hair that is growing gray and thin is a reminder that he is well along in his sixty-fifth year. He has a heavy voice which emphasizes his plain, direct manner of speaking and his simple, ready answers to questions. He wears well-made clothes that run somewhat above the subdued in tone.

Absorbed as Boss Tom has been in the development of his essentially local political machine, he has managed none the less to keep abreast of the times. He may be a ruthless spoilsman; he is no ignoramus. Michael Pendergast, his Tipperary-born father, drove a team for a dry-goods store in St. Joseph, Missouri, where the future political boss was born, but the boy went to what was then the Christian Brothers' College in St. Joseph and to

St. Mary's College in nearby Kansas, where he upheld the school name in sports. He might have been a baseball player of renown, for he rejected a contract as a professional. His conversation can reflect a substantial reading in current affairs. His hobby, however, is horse racing, and as owner of a stable of blooded horses he has regularly attended the Kentucky Derby and other race meets.

Pendergast was Street Commissioner when James A. Reed, later Senator, was Mayor of Kansas City and about the turn of the century he served a short term as Marshal of Jackson County. Still later he was an alderman. But all that was in the long ago—before Pendergast really got into politics. Some political bosses like the limelight. Pendergast is not that sort. At the Democratic convention in Philadelphia he was out of the public view in a New York hotel. It is true that he was not well at the time, but the fact remains that he cares nothing for public notice. When reporters sought him out on his return from Europe on the first crossing of the Normandie he protested bluntly: "I am not a national figure and I never want to be. I can't see what all this fuss is about."

Pendergast built his organization on the proved machine principle of personal favors. As he has expressed it, his method was to function year in and year out, not to wait until three weeks before election. The Pendergast headquarters are in the Jackson County Democratic Club, the Kansas City counterpart of Tammany Hall. People go to the ordinary two-story brick building at 1908 Main Street for a load of coal, an order of groceries, or clothes. They go to get jobs, to get streets repaired, or to keep them from being repaired. They go with a complaint about taxes or a policeman. They go to have domestic troubles straightened out. They are never turned away without the satisfaction of an answer and, whenever possible, of a promise that will be kept. For years Pendergast rose at five in the morning in order to be at his roll-top desk on the second floor at six, ready and eager to meet the morning's run of callers. As many as 400 individuals have climbed the stairs by noon to ask him to do something for them. More than four years ago the Kansas City Star described the Pendergast organization as more powerful than Tammany, "proportionately speaking."

Pendergast did not launch the organization which he came to head, but he extended it far beyond the most roseate expectations of his older brother, James, who was the founder. The Pendergast boys ran a saloon on Kansas City's lower Main Street in the 90's and, as was frequently the case in those days, began to mix in politics on the side. James was elected alderman and in time set himself up as controller of the riverfront First Ward. When James died, Tom took over his organization and succeeded him on the City Council. Joseph B. Shannon, now the leading Jeffersonian orator in Congress, was then the most influential politician of the city. But it was not long before Pendergast's "goats" were contesting with Shannon's "rabbits" in primaries, and the challenger had begun to enlarge his operations so as to include the residential sections of the city as well as the riverfront.

From 1912 on Boss Tom has been a factor in Democratic politics in Missouri, but the state as a whole did not come to know him until four years ago. With one of his old local rivals, Shannon, happily shelved in the national House of Representatives, and the other, the late Casimir Welch, at last won over, the portly boss was in complete control in Kansas City. His patronage powers had grown greater under the city charter of 1922, thanks to the omission of any reference to civil service. Still other patronage fell into his hands when a ruling of the Missouri Supreme Court ended state control of the Kansas City Police Department. But his greatest stroke of good fortune came in 1932 when it was necessary to nominate and elect candidates for the national House of Representatives in a general vote of the entire state. On the basis of the 1930 census the Missouri delegation in the House was reduced from sixteen to thirteen members. Consequently a redistricting was in order. The legislature and the Republican Governor disagreed on a bill, with the result that none was passed for the 1932 primary and election. All candidates therefore, though they were perhaps known only locally, were forced to undergo the test of a statewide vote, and the bloc of more than 100,000 votes which Boss Tom controlled was eagerly sought after. Only one Congressional candidate supported by Pendergast failed to be chosen. Four Democratic incumbents who did not have his backing were defeated for renomination.

Pendergast's candidate for the Senatorial nomination that year, Charles Howell of Kansas City, lost the nomination to Bennett Champ Clark, son of the late Speaker of the House and one of the organizers of the American Legion, but the boss's choice for Governor, Francis Wilson, a party veteran, won easily in the primary over a promising state senator, Russell Dearmont, who raised the issue of political dictatorship. A few days before the election Wilson died, and the Democratic State Committee, working behind closed doors and under Pendergast's control, picked an obscure circuit judge from the Pendergast section, Guy B. Park, to fill the vacancy on the ticket. With Missouri joining in the revulsion against the Republicans in 1932, the hand-picked candidate went into the governor's seat with a sweep.

Two years after he placed Park at the head of the state government, Pendergast picked a United States Senator in a manner not likely to inspire confidence in our democratic institutions. One of the minor cogs in his machine, Harry S. Truman, grew restless as County Judge of Jackson County and made up his mind that he would like to be county Collector of Taxes, an office which paid handsomely on a fee basis. Boss Tom had other plans for the collectorship, but the nomination for United States Senator was open so far as he was concerned. So he sent the machine down the line for Truman to give him a plurality of 130,000 in Kansas City, with the result that the virtually unknown candidate won out in the statewide contest over two veteran Congressmen, John J. Cochran and Jacob L. Milligan, the latter supported by Senator Clark. The subsequent election was only a formality, Truman defeating the archaic Roscoe Conkling Patterson by 260,000. Thanks to T. J. Pendergast, Harry S. Truman does not collect taxes in Jackson County but sits in "the greatest deliberative body in the world," charged with such responsibilities as voting on treaties with other nations and appointments to the United States Supreme Court. In the same year Pendergast put another unknown candidate in the primary against the able and thoroughly experienced state Superintendent of Schools, Charles A. Lee. Notwithstanding his satisfactory service, Lee was defeated.

Pendergast was barred from active work in the recent campaign by his physicians. Back in Kansas City after a long sojourn in New York, he is reported to be improving slowly. But even when he was ill, the machine was in perfect running order. When the primary was held in August, Pendergast was flat on his back in New York. Yet his candidate for Governor, Major Lloyd C. Stark, of the self-styled "world's greatest family of nurserymen," far outdistanced the other Democratic candidate, William Hirth, long president of the Missouri Farmers' Association. And Stark was elected by a tremendous vote.

The accusations made against him in the election campaign are old stuff to Boss Tom. Newspapers and reform candidates have been after him election after election. Such movements never worry him. His procedure has been to register all possible voters and get them to the polls on Election Day. How intensively the Pendergast organization cultivates Kansas City can be judged from the recent registration of more than 263,000 in a population which in 1930 numbered 399,000. These figures mean that approximately two out of every three human beings are listed as eligible to vote. Baltimore, with a population of nearly 805,000 at the last census, enrolled only 373,700 voters at its last registration—less than half the population. There is a strong suspicion that an investigation of registration and voting in Kansas City such as St. Louis has been undergoing would reveal shocking irregularities. It is no secret that Pendergast's henchmen in the state senate have steadfastly stood in the way of a permanent registration law which would improve the election machinery.

A fifth federal judgeship in Missouri, created by the last Congress, will be filled one of these days. As long ago as last June Pendergast gave out the names of his first, second, and third choices, namely, James P. Aylward, a successful Kansas City lawyer, Circuit Judge Daniel E. Bird of Kansas City, and Governor Park. There can be no question as to the real reason for Boss Tom's support of Aylward. It is not any knowledge Aylward may have of the law; it is his loyal work as chairman of the Democratic State Committee, as Democratic national committeeman for Missouri, and as chairman of the Democratic County Committee for Jackson County. This is the Pendergast way.

Boss Tom believes in loyalty. When he gives his word he keeps it, and he expects the same of others. There is the amusing case of the Brickey brothers. The one who lives in Festus, Missouri, fought James A. Reed for reelection in 1922; the other, a resident of Boonville, supported Reed that year. When the Festus Brickey asked Pendergast to support him for the nomination for Lieutenant Governor in 1928 the boss wired Reed. Reed thought Pendergast was inquiring about the Boonville Brickey and replied that the applicant had supported him in 1922.

On the basis of this information Pendergast pledged his support to the Festus Brickey. When Boss Tom found out that he was behind a candidate who had opposed Reed with all his strength, he was chagrined but resolute. "I told Brickey I would be for him and I will go through with it," he said. And he did.

One of the complaints about Pendergast in Kansas City is that he has linked his business enterprises with politics to reap a double profit. The boss has taken no public notice of this complaint, but to friends he has said that he has just as much right to sell ready-mixed concrete to the city and engage in other city contracting as any other business man if his bids are low and his materials stand the test. His wholesale liquor business was flourishing when prohibition became effective. Believing that the ban on alcoholics would not last, he kept thousands of barrels in government warehouses, and as soon as the Missouri dry law was repealed, revived his distributing company. Soon after the company began operations again, Federal Judge Reeves at Kansas City ordered the United States Marshal to seize some 900 cases of whiskey in Pendergast's warehouse on the ground that it was adulterated and misbranded and failed to meet pure-food-and-drug tests. The boss's warehouse manager said the adulteration had been discovered before the court order and that preparations were being made then to return the whiskey to a Kentucky distillery. Pendergast himself has been almost an abstainer for years.

The Missouri dictator took part in the conference of Democratic bosses held in conjunction with the Democratic national convention, but the convention itself was little more than a big show to him. Not that he disapproved of the ballyhoo and demonstrations. He looks on such tomfoolery as entertainment for the politicians and their constituents. But the real work, as he long has known, has to be done back home in the precincts.

Let the Mexicans Organize!

BY FRANK STOKES

Kickapoo Ranch, Covina, California

CALIFORNIA citrus-fruit growers have joined the legions of the exploiters of labor. They have taken over at the same time the whole vicious machinery of vigilantes, strike-breakers, night riders, tear gas, and prejudiced newspapers. This appears strange considering that there was a time when these citrus-fruit growers themselves were so sorely oppressed that they were driven to create one of the first, and certainly one of the greatest, cooperative organizations ever formed by tillers of the soil. Because they were being exploited and robbed by brokers and shippers, the California citrus farmers were forced to organize or perish. Their object was to obtain a greater return for their sweat and labor. Yet now they are determined that others shall not be permitted to organize for the same purpose.

Oppression was the father and desperation the mother of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange. It has become a mighty organization with 13,500 grower members. There are in California approximately 309,000 citrus-growing acres valued at close to $618,000,000, and more than 75 per cent of this acreage and value are represented in the exchange. Its headquarters are in the new Sun-Kist building, which it owns, in the city of Los Angeles. All this is the result of the banding together of an exploited group of citrus-fruit growers. It is this group which recently crushed ruthlessly an attempt by Mexican workers to organize a union of citrus-fruit pickers.

The Mexican is to agricultural California what the Negro is to the medieval South. His treatment by the vegetable growers of the Imperial Valley is well known. What has happened to him in the San Joaquin has likewise been told. But for a time at least it appeared that the "citrus belt" was different. Then came the strike of the Mexican fruit pickers in Orange County. In its wake came the vigilantes, the night riders, the strike-breakers, the reporters whose job it was to "slant" all stories in favor of packers and grove owners. There followed the State Motor Patrol, which for the first time in the history of strike disorders in California set up a portable radio broadcasting station "in a secret place" in the strike area "to direct law-and-order activities." And special deputy badges blossomed as thick as Roosevelt buttons in the recent campaign.

Sheriff Jackson declared bravely: "It was the strikers themselves who drew first blood so from now on we will meet them on that basis." "This is no fight," said he, "between orchardists and pickers. It is a fight between the entire population of Orange County and a bunch of Communists." However, dozens and dozens of non-Communist Mexican fruit pickers were jailed; 116 were arrested en masse while traveling in automobiles along the highway. They were charged with riot and placed under bail of $500 each. Twice their preliminary hearing was delayed on motion of the district attorney. After fifteen days in jail the hearing was finally held—and the state's witnesses were able to identify only one person as having taken part in trouble occurring on the Charles Wagner ranch. Judge Ames of the Superior Court ordered the release of all but the one identified prisoner and severely criticized the authorities for holding the Mexicans in jail for so long a time when they must have known it would not be possible to identify even a small proportion of the prisoners.

For weeks during the strike newspaper stories described the brave stand taken by "law-abiding citizens." These stories were adorned with such headlines as "Vigilantes Battle Citrus Strikers in War on Reds." During all this time, so far as I know, only one paper—the Los Angeles Evening News—defended the fruit pickers. In an editorial the News said:

Be it known that the "heroic band of vigilantes," twenty-eight in number, who last Friday with clubs and tear-gas bombs stole up on a peaceful meeting of 150 Mexican fruit pickers in Placentia, fell upon the dumb-founded workers without warning, smashed jaws and cracked heads, dispersed the group save for one striker smashed into unconsciousness and left lying on the ground, were exactly this:

Twenty-eight Los Angeles bums, recruited from streets and beer-halls through a detective agency and paid eight dollars a day by the citrus growers to foment violence and terrorize the striking Mexican pickers.

I have not mentioned all the iniquities perpetrated upon these humble, exploited Mexicans by citrus-grove owners and packing-house operators along with their various aides-de-camp. I have mentioned only enough to show that in this respect the strike was exactly like all other strikes. What differentiates it is the fact that the strike was directed against an employing group that knows what it is to be exploited, against an employing group that has carried cooperation to the highest degree of perfection.

These Mexicans were asking for a well-deserved wage increase and free transportation to and from the widely scattered groves; they also asked that tools be furnished by the employers. Finally they asked recognition of their newly formed union. Recognition of the Mexican laboring man's union, his cooperative organization formed in order that he might obtain a little more for his commodity, which is labor—here was the crucial point. The growers and packers agreed to furnish tools; they agreed to furnish transportation to and from the groves. They even agreed to a slight wage increase, which still left the workers underpaid. But recognition of the Mexican workers' union? Never!

I have been an orange grower and a member of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange for twenty years. I have also had connections with other types of ranching less efficiently organized or not organized at all. Only in the citrus business is the producer free of all selling worries. My job is merely to grow the fruit. The exchange picks it, packs it, pools it, according to grade, with the fruit of other members, ships it, sells it, and sends me the proceeds. I have often borrowed money from my packing house, secured by my crop, thereby saving interest at the bank. Through the Fruit Growers' Supply Company (owned and operated by the associations within the exchange system) I can buy automobile tires or radios, shotguns or fertilizer, generally at a very substantial discount. I can pay for it at the end of the season.

The Fruit Growers' Supply Company provides other benefits. Because the company owns vast acres of timber and its lumber mill at Susanville, my fruit is shipped in containers furnished at cost. More than one hundred million feet of lumber are required each year for the making of exchange box shooks. Cooperation even extends to the maintenance of a group of pest-control experts whose services are free to exchange members. In many other ways the citrus-fruit growers of California have profited by cooperation. I irrigate my orchard with water delivered by a non-profit combination of growers. My trees are sprayed or fumigated by a non-profit partnership. Because of cooperation I can sleep through the winter nights or until a voice on the telephone informs me that my thermometers have dropped to the danger point.

One would think that California citrus people, at least those belonging to the exchange, would not be adverse to organization by others, especially since the directors of the Fruit Exchange at a meeting held on December 4, 1935 (only a few months before the strike), voted substantial salary increases in the higher brackets. The general manager's salary was increased from $18,000 to $22,000 yearly; the general sales manager's "wages" were raised from $16,200 to $18,000; and the advertising manager's "pay envelope" contained an additional thousand, or a total of $10,000.

It has been said in defense of the exchange that it should not be blamed for the trouble in Orange County, for, as Sheriff Jackson stated, "the entire population of Orange County" was opposed to the Mexican fruit pickers. Nevertheless, more than three-fourths of all citrus growers are steadfast cooperators. If these cooperators had raised their voices to protest against the unjust treatment of the Mexicans, the affair might have ended with honor to us all.

The fact is, however, that Jack Prizer, manager of an exchange packing house in Orange County and a member of the exchange board of directors (the very same board that voted substantial increases in salaries at the top), was one of those most active in crushing the strike. The entire population of Orange County did seem to oppose the strikers, with the exception of Judge H. C. Ames, who dared to go against intense public opinion.

During the strike I made several excursions into Orange County. I found scab pickers, often high-school boys, "glomming" the "golden fruit" in the beautiful California sunshine, while mocking birds sang on the house-tops, snow-covered Mount Baldy glistened in the distance—and armed guards patrolled the groves behind long rows of "no trespassing" signs. Trucks came to the groves with empty boxes and went away with full ones—trucks with rifle barrels protruding from their cabs. Men in uniforms, mounted on motorcycles, dashed back and forth. Sirens screaming, everybody jittery, everybody damning the reds—and the Mexicans!

One day I decided to have a look at the record of the Covina (Los Angeles County) packing house through which my fruit is shipped. I learned that during the boom period of 1928-29, from the middle of December to the ninth of the following October, Francisco Lopez, our top picker, was called to labor 225 days. He only missed two possible working days in those eleven months. For that period he earned $830.41. And this man is with his clippers what Kreisler is with a violin.

During the season of 1934-35, Francisco Lopez, still a "top hand," earned only $637.44. The yearly income of the other pickers ranged from this figure down to starvation wages. And most of these men have families. Also, it must be remembered that conditions in the San Gabriel Valley are far better than in many other places.

I have said that the Mexicans are to agricultural California what the Negro is to the medieval South, exploited and despised. Before the day of the CCC camps Spanish was the language most frequently heard on every mountain fire-line; and those Spanish-speaking people were taken to the fires by force, even though the burning mountains, with their high peaks stopping rain clouds and their dense brush storing water, were vastly more important to white men than to Mexicans. Towns and cities, farms and orchards, valley springs and deep sunk wells, all depend upon those mountains.

Not only in the fields are the Mexican people exploited. Not only as earners but as buyers they are looked upon as legitimate prey—for old washing machines that will not clean clothes, for old automobiles that wheeze and let down, for woolen blankets made of cotton, for last season's shop-worn wearing apparel. Gathered in villages composed of rough board shanties, or drifting with the seasons from the vegetable fields of the Imperial Valley to the grape vineyards of the San Joaquin, wherever they go it is the same old, pathetic story. Cheap labor!

Usually these people are patient and yielding. But occasionally a leader appears—he is always said to be a Communist—and then they rise up in their righteous wrath and strike. They struck in the Imperial Valley—and they lost. They struck in that glorious land north of the Tehachapi—and again they lost. They lost because of tear-gas bombs, special deputies, and unfriendly newspapers. Lastly, they struck in Orange County. And once more they have lost.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

RETURNING to my office recently after several days' absence I found my desk covered with calls for aid from every kind of organization. Every one of them appealed to my sympathies, for each represented a worthy cause. All were couched in moving language, and not a single one failed to state that the existing emergency was great and that if help was not forthcoming immediately the work must cease or be gravely hindered. There was a telegram as well as a letter from the American League Against War and Fascism stating that the emergency situation "requires immediate response to Dr. Harry Ward's letter regarding funds. . . . Vital work for Spanish democracy hangs on keeping our organization going." There was an appeal from the American Friends of Spanish Democracy, of which Bishop Paddock is the able head. From Helen Eklund and the Friends of Spain came an invitation to lunch, which meant, I suppose, a call for more aid for Spain. The Women's Peace Union begged me to "stick something into this rather tragically empty envelope." The People's Mandate to Governments to End War declared that a contribution "would help us immeasurably to take advantage of a great opportunity to make a real advance toward peace." From Reinhold Niebuhr came a plea for the Committee on Economic and Racial Justice pinned to one from the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, and there was another from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Of course the anti-Nazi movements were well represented, notably the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League. Freda Kirchwey wrote in behalf of Angelo Herndon, and Edward Kern for the New Film Alliance; Benjamin Marsh put in a word for an old friend, the People's Lobby, Tucker Smith doing the same for the Brookwood School, while the National Civil Service Reform League did not forget me. Nor did the American Association for Social Security, over the signature of the indefatigable Abraham Epstein. The Foreign Language Information Service wrote: "Please do not fail. However small the contribution you can send, it will bring both the moral and the practical assistance that we need." The National Child Labor Committee was of course represented, and there was a new one begging for the Debs Labor School. As for local charities and philanthropies, there were the Children's Aid Society, the Workers' Defense, the Charity Organization Society, a hospital, the Citizens' Union, the American Civil Liberties Union, a cancer committee, and the American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born. Finally I must not omit the National Student Federation and the Milwaukee Leader Sustaining Fund.

Now this sort of thing has been going on for years, but it seems to me that never have so many begging letters come to my office and to my home. I am not exceptional, I am sure. Anybody whose name appears in a list of contributors to any organization immediately becomes the target of every other. It would be, of course, impossible to give to one-third, even if one were a multimillionaire. The result is that those friends whose appeals are not answered feel hurt and think me stingy, especially if they happen to remember that they once responded to some of the appeals I have myself sent out in the course of a long begging career. It all raises the question of what is going to happen to our philanthropies and charities. Many of them could be ended if the government did some of the jobs it ought to do, if our courts of justice functioned, if our officials, state and national, lived up to their oaths of office, if our whole economic system were revised. But that is a long, long way off, and what is worrying people who have to raise these large sums is where the money is to be found. They fear that even with the return of prosperity people will not be as generous as formerly, but in view of the prophesied coming of a worse depression within five years, will insist on putting by as much as possible or living up to their income fully, and refuse to give to charity.

Meanwhile there could be, of course, a tremendous improvement effected by the amalgamation of numerous activities. There are at least six or eight anti-fascist and anti-Nazi organizations all appealing to the same people for help. There should be one strong and powerful one, including within its activities the special fields of propaganda, relief for refugees, care of scholars and exiles, and so on. There must be at least three or four pro-Spanish organizations by this time where there should be but one, and so it goes. This, too, is not a new problem. Many other people for years past have called attention to the duplication of philanthropic effort. But surely there is a limit to the amount of private benevolence; surely the state must be driven to do more and more for the wrecks of our capitalist system, for the undernourished, the overworked, the child victims of the machine, the hapless prisoners of a blind justice and wilfully blind officials.

The managing editor of The New York Times, Edwin L. James, has kindly called my attention to the fact that in my Issues and Men of November 21 I misstated some circulation figures which I received over the telephone. Instead of the Times having a daily circulation on October 1, 1936, of 460,054, I should have said 482,429. Its Sunday circulation averaged for the six months 737,475, which made an average figure for Sunday and week days of 518,665. I am glad to make this correction.

The Hearst Two Shillings

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD raised some interesting points in The Nation last week in regard to Mr. Hearst and Mr. Boettiger. Mr. Villard finds it tragic that the son-in-law of President Roosevelt should take the job of publisher of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. Any discussion of the ethical issues involved must depend upon some definition of the premises. If I reduce Mr. Villard's argument to its logical conclusion I think I have a right to say that in effect he is contending that nobody should work for Hearst. And yet I imagine that for some practical considerations this would not be an altogether desirable situation. I can hardly blind myself to the fact that a complete and successful boycott of William Randolph Hearst would mean that thousands of people would be thrown out of work, including some of the most useful members of the American Newspaper Guild.

The P.-I. unit frankly hailed Boettiger's appointment with joy. To that extent at any rate the young man has done a Boy Scout deed. And I think that Mr. Villard is a little less than fair in saying, "There is nothing whatsoever in Mr. Boettiger's record which would warrant his appointment by Mr. Hearst to the important position of manager of the Post-Intelligencer if Mr. Boettiger had married anybody other than Anna Roosevelt Dall."

Now I will admit that Mr. Villard knows and that I know and that probably Mr. Hearst knows that the appointment was one dictated by newspaper political strategy. But it is possible that Mr. Boettiger doesn't know. Or even if he does he would have the right to say, "Mr. Hearst may be giving me this chance because I'm the President's son-in-law, but I'm a good newspaperman in my own right and on this job I can prove that I'm my own man and not either Mr. Hearst's or Mr. Roosevelt's."

It seems to me that Mr. Villard stresses too much the fact that Boettiger's experience has been entirely reportorial and that therefore there is something very strange in his being jumped into the job of publisher. In the first place, the P.-I. post does not seem a particular plum at the moment. During the course of the strike Mr. Hearst was quoted on several occasions as saying that the paper had not been a money-maker and that he was thankful to the guild for shutting it down. Moreover, the practice of taking a good reporter and sending him out to take charge of a chain paper is not in the least unusual. It has been done in the Scripps-Howard organization many times.

But this debate may well go on a little beyond the problem of how close a relative is a son-in-law. I have written a good many columns against Hearst and made speeches too. Probably I shall do so again, although I have no desire to rake up old criticisms at a time when Mr. Hearst seems to be sitting, rather perkily to be sure, on the mourners' bench. However, there is a real danger in using any single publisher as a horrible example.

I have heard the view expressed that it was a mistake for a commentator to go into hot and heavy criticism of Hearst because, as the advice ran, "It only serves to advertise him." That never seemed very pertinent counsel so far as I, personally, was concerned. Mr. Hearst is a very good advertiser himself, and I have not felt that I could add very much to his publicity for good or ill. But when a number of commentators and publicists seize upon William Randolph Hearst, or any other single newspaper owner, and begin to belabor him, they not only advertise but compliment the other members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. Save in a few instances such compliments are not deserved.

I believe it would be wholly unfair to say now that Hearst is the guild's Enemy No. 1. A few months ago he announced that his attitude toward the guild was precisely the same as that of Scripps-Howard. At the time he claimed too much. Unfortunately Mr. Howard was out of the country on Election Day and may not have had an opportunity yet to study the returns quite as closely as Mr. Hearst seems to have done.

The working newspaperman in this country is somewhat limited in his field of choice. Jobs are scarce, and should he be asked to starve until he finds a paper which in every way lives up to his own journalistic ideals? I think not. After all, if he did find such a paper he would undoubtedly discover that every other newspaperman in the country wanted to be on it, too, and that the waiting list was one mile long. I do not think that this side of starvation any newspaperman should stick to a job where he is personally called upon to do things which seem to him dirty and despicable. But I must admit that I would be frankly puzzled by a baseball writer who came to me and said, "Heywood, I think I'll have to give up my job because the boss is printing such vicious editorials about the League of Nations."

I don't think I'm cynical. He hasn't asked me recently, but I would not work for Hearst. I almost did once and I think the reason I sheered off may have been less an ethical urge than a sense of fear. I was afraid of being swallowed up. I will admit that the subject is academic on both sides because if I worked for Hearst we would both look like plain fools.

But all this depends on a special set of circumstances. I hope I'm idealistic. I would like to see a permanent newspaper or a chain of newspapers run cooperatively by newspapermen for newspapermen. But as things stand now, most publishers are pretty gray in the dark and a Boettiger should be pardoned if he doesn't look a gift contract in the mouth.

BOOKS and the ARTS

"ART FOR ART'S SAKE"

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"ART FOR ART'S SAKE" was a phrase conceived in irritation and adopted as a slogan by men more anxious to startle than to explain. It was directed at the Philistine (Victorian model), and it was not ill suited to the moment which gave it currency. Taken out of its context the phrase is, however, dangerously near to nonsense, and it is a pity that so flip a formula should have become fixed as the accepted designation of an aesthetic doctrine much more persistent and much more meaningful than the formula suggests. The curse of eighteen-ninetyism is heavy upon it, and nothing could be more unfortunate when the enemy happens to be not the Victorian bourgeoisie but the grimmer utilitarians of this sociological age.

One might, I suppose, attempt a rehabilitation through formal definitions of art and its function, but in a companion volume* to his "Literature and Society" Professor Albert Guérard has chosen a method possibly more effective and undoubtedly more entertaining. Even he, I think, gives the paradoxes and perversities of fin-de-siècleism rather more prominence than they deserve, but in what is really a long and witty essay he passes in review the various forms assumed by the artist's protest against the world and by the inner conflicts between his own standards of value and his own motives for writing. One may, if one likes, attempt to formulate the whole thing in terms of Hebraism versus Hellenism—even though, as Professor Guérard is well aware, the Hellenes themselves were very imperfect and hesitant Hellenists. But that formula is almost too general, and there remain related questions like the question of what a writer writes for—money, fame, or "art." And even writing "for art's sake" assumes various forms. Sometimes it implies poetic ecstasy; sometimes it means no more than writing for the sake of Ciceronian correctness or Gongoresque ingenuity. And the same sort of thing may be said of the worship of beauty versus the worship of utility. Utility may mean high morality, political or religious dogma, or merely the rules of prudence. The worship of beauty may imply the doctrine that the Good is Beautiful and the Beautiful Good; but it may also imply no more than the rather childish diabolism of the eighteen-ninety aesthetes or the artist's claim to the right of bohemian living.

Professor Guérard offers no simple solution of all the problems he suggests and arrives at no dogma. But thanks to an astonishingly wide familiarity with world literature and to a genial, common-sense mind he is able to explore the field both thoroughly and wittily. And what he concludes is this: Great writing has not usually been purely "for art's sake," and great writers have not usually proclaimed any purely aesthetic doctrine. Among the motives of these same great writers there is, on the other hand, something which is neither the desire for fame, the desire for money, nor the determination to advance any moral or social good. And in this same great writing there is usually something besides doctrine on the one hand and mere craftsmanship on the other. When everything else has been analyzed out of the writer or the writing, there is a residue which remains, and that residue represents whatever substance there is in the conception of art for art's sake.

Dickens and Thackeray, to take difficult cases, were determined to supply a salable commodity, and both were interested in sound conventional morality; but the two things together do not exhaust the list of their motives. Milton was pious and desired to exalt the glory of God; but Milton toyed with the idea of a pagan subject for his epic and chose as he did choose at least as much because he perceived the artistic advantage of a legend drawn from his own culture as because the story of Adam and Eve was a more edifying story. The artist becomes more aware of the claims of art as opposed to the claims of one or another kind of utility when a conflict between the aims—whether it be a conflict between art and salability or a conflict between art and morality—becomes, for one reason or another, acute. But the conflict is always there even when it is solved by harmonizing the two aims.

Said Paul Valéry, "The most manifest characteristic of a work of art may be termed uselessness," and this phrase seemed to trouble Professor Guérard a good deal because it seems inevitably to suggest some sort of diletantism. Yet no one is shocked by the statement that "virtue is its own reward," and I humbly suggest that to say that is the equivalent of saying, "Virtue is useless"—which is itself only another way of saying that virtue, like art, is an end in itself, a final good. And that is all that can really be meant by the phrase "art for art's sake," namely, that the aesthetic emotion can be a self-justifying pleasure, good in itself, not good because it leads to something else; that though certain forms of it may be justified on the ground that they produce a better society, one of the justifications of a good society may just as well be that it produces good art. Uselessness and valuelessness are not the same things.

One might, I think, solve in somewhat the same way another fact which Professor Guérard seems to find more or less troubling—the fact that the doctrine of art for art's sake usually comes into prominence in epochs when men have suffered some disillusionment with a hope—moral, religious, social, or economic. But that does not necessarily mean that art for art's sake is trivial. It may mean only that of all the goods men may pursue and of all the blessings they may hope to gain, the joy of art is the one which least often fails them, which is there when the others have eluded their grasp. Nor can I conclude without remarking that a phrase of my own about the contemplation of tragedy as one of the highest of human pleasures is not so dangerous as Professor Guérard seems to think. It does not lead to the conclusion that we ought to encourage calamities in order to enjoy them, for a "calamity" is by no means the same as a tragedy. Confusing them was Nero's mistake.

History Without Pattern

A NEW AMERICAN HISTORY. By W. E. Woodward. Farrar and Rinehart. $4.

READERS of Mr. Woodward's "George Washington" and "Meet General Grant" will know what to expect in his new book. Mr. Woodward is a skilful debunker; he puts our traditional notions under the bright light of fresh inquiry and cuts away the parts that are rotten with the quick, incisive strokes of a master surgeon. He is honest, plain-spoken, courageous. He names names. He strikes often and hard. His books are never dull.

In the present volume, his most ambitious work to date, he set himself the task of writing a history of America for the man on the street. The book begins with the reign of Henry VIII and ends, 875 pages later, with the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt—"The way was open for the New Deal."

In the technique of writing for the common man Mr. Woodward has few equals. He has mastered to perfection the use of the short pithy sentence, the apt phrase, the colorful word. In addition he has a genuine flair for story-telling, and one juicy tale after another makes his narrative vivid and exciting. He frequently employs the clever device of illuminating the past by tying it up with the present. His simple dynamic style is just the right dish for the average man.

Turn the pages at random and you will find abundant evidence of his awareness of social realities made plain in hard-hitting, succinct phrases. ". . . Harding's idea of normalcy was to give a free hand to money-getters, sharp-witted tricksters, stock manipulators, and other bandits who lived by raids on the national income." "That is called 'individualism' in the American language, a high-sounding term for money greed transfigured and parading as a virtue. . . . In an individualistic civilization the ability to get money is the ultimate standard of merit."

Unfortunately, however, keen insight, a pungent style, and refreshing candor are not enough. Mr. Woodward has not written a New American History. He has written an Old American History in a new and engaging way. It is amplified, debunked, more thrilling, more plausible—but it is not new. In the old American history important happenings were often explained as being due to the ability, desires, or whims of important individuals; in Mr. Woodward's history personalities again occupy the center of the stage. In the old history the topics were bewilderingly unrelated—an assorted conglomeration whose only sequence was chronological; in Mr. Woodward's history there is again no connected story with political, social, and economic events woven together into a definite pattern—one Administration still follows another, and the major events in each are recorded primarily in time sequence as before.

What Mr. Woodward lacks is a coherent view of history. Time and again his absorption with personalities takes him off the track; repeatedly his interest in story-telling per se shunts him here, there, and everywhere away from a central theme. One inevitable result is that he contradicts himself in several places. On page 186, for example, he writes, "His [Lafayette's] coming accomplished more for the American cause in France than all the efforts of diplomats and commissioners." But six pages later we learn that this was not really so. "It should not be understood that Lafayette evoked single-handed the formidable military aid which France gave the colonies during the last year of the war. Benjamin Franklin was the prime mover." And finally, in the very next paragraph, we get the real truth, "Neither Franklin, nor Lafayette, nor anybody else could have persuaded the French to send an army to America if the move had not been in direct line with French policy." (My italics.)

It is a pity that the author did not have in front of him, as he wrote, his own correct observation that "no man, or group of men, can hold back the movement of collective social and economic forces." If he had, then he would not have made the mistake of devoting nine pages to Lafayette and only three to Shays' Rebellion. Nor would he have given as much space to the feelings and activities of Mr. Coolidge after his failure to get the nomination for a second term as he gave to Debs, Altgeld, and the Pullman strike.

In this connection it is to be regretted that Mr. Woodward's interest in personalities did not extend as much to labor leaders and revolutionists as to politicians, statesmen, and generals. If it had done so, then he would, in truth, have been well on the way to writing a New History. And he would have turned the trick entirely if only he had stuck to his own definition, "History is not a succession of semi-detached episodes, but a sequence of events so closely intertwined that they form a definite pattern." One searches in vain for the definite pattern. It isn't there.

LEO HUBERMAN

Well, Not So Deep

NOT SO DEEP AS A WELL. By Dorothy Parker. The Viking Press. $2.50.

RHYME AND PUNISHMENT. By Leonard Bacon. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

AT THE risk of provoking one of those quiet murders by repartee for which Dorothy Parker is notorious, I must say that I judge, purely from the internal evidence in these poems, that her life has been terrible—terribly monotonous. This poetry of a smart lady Wordsworth, recollecting her emotion in acidity—and asking for more—got terribly monotonous to this reader, too. I should think this, I believe, if I had lived all my life in Cripple Creek and had never heard the gossip of the wits at the Algonquin.

As revealed in these poems, Mrs. Parker has always been falling in love: too much, too little, too foolishly, too deeply, too tentatively, and with a succession of lovers who have reciprocated in one or another of these ways, at the wrong time. The poet knows at the beginning of each new rapture how it is going to end, and how soon. She thinks love is a liar and a cheat, and cannot help falling in love just the same. Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose. Love continues, the same delusion, only the lovers change—frequently. The summary of this sad situation appears on page 84 in a quatrain whose last two lines are:

The third love was his, and the fourth was mine;
And after that, I always get them all mixed up.

So does this reviewer, who is provoked by the collection to inquire a little querulously into the extraordinary legend concerning Dorothy Parker's poetic powers. Various critics noted on the jacket of the book attribute to her the joint virtues of half a dozen different writers. Her poems have seemed to a great many women the terse, brilliant summary of the tragic situation of all woman-kind, doomed pitifully to fall in love with a succession of lads who turn out to be unfeeling louts, whose devotions they know in advance are writ in water or in cocktails. They have liked her cries of anguish because the tears are always crossed with self-mocking laughter at the end. Women have even liked her contempt for women, and have adored her vituperation for virgins.

Men have liked her poems because of the half-bitter, half-wistful tribute to their indispensability and their irresistible, fatal charms. A different kind of lover, the lover of light verse, has admired her extraordinary technical competence and the way in which her verse constantly veers over into the domain of genuinely lyric poetry. The wits of the town have been delighted to see a Sappho who could combine a heart-break with a wisecrack.

For years she has sobbed in accents at once ribald and melodious, always or nearly always trenchant, and occasionally with just that touch of vulgarity ("a sock in the eye," "And though to good I never come—Inseparable my nose and thumb!") which makes the reader feel that he could have said that himself. One might say in a mixed and hopefully not misleading metaphor that Mrs. Parker has been the Mrs. Ernest Hemingway of her generation, hard as the nails which repeatedly, we are told, break her repeatedly mendable heart.

Now that her collected poems have appeared, it is worth considering what one may expect to outlive the legend and the popularity. When Mrs. Parker deserts the theme that has become her spécialité de la maison, she can write sonnets that have the authentic note, in cadence, in tenderness, and in truth. She has the gift of the exactly timed, self-mocking glint to the recital of a lover's woes. She has a lyric way with words, and a craftsman's exactness in their arrangement. But there is no evidence throughout the volume that there is more than one kind of heart-break, and one hears so much about the one kind that one begins to think that it is in the character of an advertising slogan, like the toasting of one cigarette or the mildness of another. The depression in this book dates; it is the depression of a boom era; when days were less troubled, the troubles of lovers' nights may have seemed a more central theme of melancholy than they do now. As for the permanence and poignancy of her theme that love is both acute and transient, Sappho said it more briefly in a fragment that is really a whole poem:

I loved you, Athos, once
Long ago.

If Dorothy Parker's theme is limited to the troubles of a lady with a succession of lovers, no such narrowness of inter-

MAN'S WORLDLY GOODS

THE STORY OF THE WEALTH OF NATIONS

By Leo Huberman

Author of WE, THE PEOPLE

"We, The People" immediately proved Leo Huberman an able popularizer of history. Now with "Man's Worldly Goods" he consolidates his position as one of today's foremost interpreters of liberal economics. This story of how man has earned his living since feudal times explains history by economic theory, making it easy to see behind the catchwords, "free trade," "rack-renting," "Marxism," and so on, the living mass of human beings whose wants and needs brought about changes in the economic system. Many illustrations.

MAX LERNER, Editor of The NATION, says:

"Mr. Huberman has achieved an authentic miracle. He has traced the development of economic thought in the framework of economic history, and he has done it simply, clearly, and fluidly. His book is a brilliant piece of work and blazes new paths in historical synthesis and the art of exposition. It is at once clear writing and sound scholarship, and a reading of it should serve to orient anyone in the muddle that we call the contemporary world."

est can be attributed to Leonard Bacon. "Rhyme and Punishment" (the modulation of Gilbert is an unfelicitous title) takes the world for its subject, indeed two worlds, the realm of the great humanistic tradition, which Mr. Bacon obviously knows and loves, and the world of contemporary follies, tyrannies, and pretensions which he obviously hates. Many of these verses are excoriations of Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, of the "strange coition" in the head of Marxist-Anglo-Catholics, and the "Shelleys of the New Incompetence." Many others are paeans to beauty remembered, or cries at something lost and gone out of our time, or out of our time's estimation.

Mr. Bacon's volume consists really of conversation pieces of a pleasant, cultivated mind which is "tired of the admired and unadmired" in current winds of doctrine. The indignations and enthusiasms are, many of them, such as many enlightened people share. But it is never precise, edged light verse, or, where lyrical in intent, genuinely lyrical in effect. The verse is such as one might write rather hastily for an occasion, perhaps an academic dinner. Sometimes Mr. Bacon does turn a really neat epigram or a tender, true line. But the author does not seem to be able to make up his mind as to what note he would strike, nor does he strike any with exactness.

If somebody with Dorothy Parker's sharp tools could deal with Mr. Bacon's wider and deeper themes, or if he would sharpen his tools, we should have satiric verse that would constitute commentary at once entertaining and important. But Alexander Pope has not yet been born again.

IRWIN EDMAN

Pushkin in English

THE WORKS OF ALEXANDER PUSHKIN. Selected and Edited, with an Introduction, by Avrahm Yarmolinsky. Random House. $3.50.

IT IS a joy for the student and teacher of Russian literature to have at last this neat, compact, and quite representative volume. The need of such an edition has been too obvious. The fragmentary translations of Pushkin's poetry failed to give the English reader a clear idea of why Pushkin is considered so superb by his compatriots, from Gogol, Turgenev, Dostoevski, and Tolstoy to Bolshevik poets and generals in our own day. In the Random House one-volume edition we may sample Pushkin's lyrics, narrative poems, folk-tales, dramas, and prose stories. Mr. Yarmolinsky's lucid introduction helps us to understand the personal life of the poet against the background of early nineteenth-century Russia. Thus Pushkin is for the first time properly introduced in English.

The volume includes Pushkin's masterpiece, "Eugene Onegin." It has taken one hundred years and more for this work to be adequately translated into English. Babette Deutsch has performed a remarkable feat in rendering the original meter without losing the conversational directness, fancy, and raciness of the Russian. I know only one other poet capable of such a performance—Max Eastman, whose version of "Message to Siberia" is one of the gems in this collection. "Eugene Onegin" may explain Pushkin's unique place in Russian letters: aside from its tonal beauty, the poem is a novel of manners which has served as a model for the best Russian fiction. The hero is a forerunner of the "superfluous men" of Turgenev and others, the misplaced and restless Russian gentlemen who have no normal outlet under state regimentation and repression. You will find Tatiana, the heroine, a prototype of many Russian women characters, irresistibly charming in their simplicity, spontaneity, and fearless honesty with themselves. In general, Pushkin's sublimation of the commonplace in that narrative poem struck the dominant note in Russian fiction.

The editor has done well in selecting pieces that help gauge Pushkin's talent as much as his versatility. It may be regretted that he has omitted such sparkling early works as "Ruslan and Ludmila," and such allegedly Byronian long poems as "Gipsies." One might wish for a larger dose of lyrical poems if only for the sake of proportion. Miss Deutsch should not have overlooked such a jewel as "Hymn to the Plague," suggested by the Song in John Wilson's "City of the Plague." But whatever strictures one may voice, the volume is a treat, a meal for the literary gourmand.

With all the joy I feel at the appearance of this book, I have some misgivings about the reaction of the non-Russian reader. In translation, however adequate, Pushkin may too readily bring to mind certain Western models. There will be many a finger pointing at his indebtedness to Shakespeare and Voltaire, to Parry and the Lake poets. Even "Eugene Onegin," as authentically Russian as his fairy tales, may suggest Byron's "Don Juan." The original aroma loses its pungency in a secondary medium. Mr. Yarmolinsky asserts that Pushkin's verse "singularly resists translation, since it is lacking in imagery and is innocent of intellection, relying for its magic on precision, clarity, and a verbal felicity as palpable as it is difficult to convey." The words I have underlined seem to me unfortunately chosen. There is abundant and profound "intellection" in Pushkin's lines; one must not be deceived by their graceful ease and lack of laboriousness. Frankly, I find it difficult to name a genuine poet who is "lacking in imagery and intellection," and yet has something to say. What is true is that Pushkin's style is as inornate as Doric architecture. He suggests images by the right choice of noun and verb, reducing his adjectives to a minimum. When the translator tries to convey the polysyllabic Russian into monosyllabic English, he is tempted to pad, and is apt to employ clichés. Herein is the danger of Pushkin sounding "ordinary" in English. As an example I may refer to the little masterpiece, I Loved You Once (page 68), in which the words "oh, my dear" are not only absent in the original but are offensively hackneyed and out of place.

To a Russian, Pushkin may be as unreasonably precious as a first love. Yet there is good reason for the enthusiastic acceptance of this "gentry poet" by the U. S. S. R.: unlike most of the pre-revolutionary Russian authors Pushkin has sounded a potent affirmation of life, and is therefore nearest to the view of militant optimism now in vogue among the Soviet citizenry.

ALEXANDER KAUN

In Dubious Battle

NOT UNDER FORTY. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

MISS CATHER, explaining her title, says that this book of literary comment "will have little interest for people under forty years of age" because "the world broke in two in 1922 or thereabouts." Reading on, one finds this note stressed again and again, until one feels it has acquired an excessive significance in Miss Cather's mind—as though 1922 stands for one of the Ten Decisive Battles of the World, and people must greet one another, even today, with a peremptory "Friend or enemy?" As a result, the book has a propagandist smell, and one's first job is to discount its overtones—overtones of smugness springing from uncertainty, of an odd feeling of guilt, of a deep feeling of regret for the past and a self-righteous loyalty in going to the past's defense. But if Miss Cather is writing, as at heart every good writer must, for her equals and not for her classmates; if she is trying to say what is true and not what is comforting, it is scarcely for her to name her audience in advance.

Of course this book is a confession of what needs no confessing. Every American reviewer who asks for more in a novelist than charm of style and responsiveness to atmosphere has attacked Miss Cather in recent years for running out on the present to hide in the past and for rejecting even such portions of the past as had the poor judgment to be unsavory or ungovernable. That the author of "My Antonia" and "A Lost Lady" should have turned squeamish and at length genteel, that she should have broken with the vibrant tradition in which she achieved so much, is a great misfortune; it is perhaps an even greater one that she should regard her defection as a virtue, and be somewhat holier-than-thou concerning it. Faced with the choice, I think most of us would have preferred having her deal with life as she used to, even if she stopped from time to time to recoil in ladylike fright, to her refusing to deal with life at all. But it is presumably too late; the only noise of battle with which Miss Cather chooses to be concerned is its cadenced echo.

When Miss Cather comes to sum up a lifetime of reading, she reverts to Sarah Orne Jewett and Katharine Mansfield, to a niece of Flaubert's, whom she met at Aix-les-Bains, to the widow of James T. Fields, whom she visited at Manchester-by-the-Sea. To these she adds a curiously intense paper on Mann's "Joseph and His Brothers" and an essay entitled The Novel Demeublé. The pieces on Mansfield and Jewett do not rise from appreciation to criticism, and must be dismissed. The memoir of Flaubert's niece makes delightful reading—one shares in the excitement of casually encountering a remarkable old lady who revivifies a great and brilliant period. The memoir of Mrs. Fields, on the other hand, is just too, too delightful, assuming you care for those great ladies whom certain playwrights are always creating along with mellow, middle-aged art connoisseurs from Vienna.

In The Novel Demeublé Miss Cather, still fighting the Battle of the Books, gets down to saying something. She argues forcefully against the use of so much unimportant baggage in the modern novel: so much cataloguing, so much parading of mere observation, so much displaying of physical sensations for their own sake. What she argues for is the sovereign play of the emotions, the restitution of the valuable and lasting elements in the human drama. She is perfectly right of course; literature always needs to be decoded from a passing jargon into a universal language; consequently it needs what Miss Cather implies it lacks—a sound sense of tradition and cultural integration. But need she sniff and purse her lips though the fate of literature lay with her alone? And dare she think that all we mean by tradition is more important than all we mean by experience? She meanwhile has become a little too fond of high-sounding, evocative words; a little too prone to imbue her work with the sense of good breeding. Much the same thing has happened to her in her way as has happened to T. S. Eliot in his. Each has mistaken a hothouse for a garden; each has forfeited much power, much understanding, in exchange for the consolations of a measured, formal attitude toward life. The critic may lack the right to question such decisions, but he cannot help commenting on what harm they have done, artistically, to those who made them.

France in the Far East

FRENCH POLICY AND DEVELOPMENTS IN INDO-CHINA. By Thomas E. Ennis. University of Chicago Press. $3.

MR. ENNIS has turned on the light in a dim alley of history and a far-off corner of the world. Indo-China has not become a tourists' treat like Java and Bali, or a recognized figure in world affairs like China and Japan, or an explorers' stamping-ground like Tibet or Mongolia. This French colony that was once five independent kingdoms is one of the least-known countries of the Far East. Few are aware that it has an exciting history of its own, a civilization as old as the Chinese, and a present unrest that is causing its French masters as many headaches as India is causing England. Mr. Ennis has done an expert job in reconstructing the story of French penetration and conquest, as brazen a piece of imperialism as the modern world has witnessed.

Expert also is his study of French colonial administration beset by the clashes of race, culture, and customs that are the result of the effort to superimpose a European individualistic social structure on an Eastern collectivist structure. As opposed to the British and Dutch colonial policy of indirect rule, or rule by "association," the French have tried direct rule, or rule by "assimilation." That is, instead of allowing local native rule to continue under central direction by the French, they have attempted to make a clean sweep of both native laws and native officials, substituting French administrators down to the smallest village magistrate. Havoc has been the result, as well as a mutual antagonism produced by the inevitable misunderstanding of Occidental and Oriental. Nationalism and agitation for independence have followed as in India. In the hope of preventing these movements from growing into a real threat, the French, eminently realistic as always, have been substituting by degrees indirect for direct rule, putting the natives back into official positions and abandoning the Code Napoléon where it was obviously irreconcilable with Indo-Chinese custom. But Mr. Ennis sees this as a vain stop-gap. Any acceptance of the principles of "association" means, he believes, the granting of concessions until independence can no longer be forestalled, whether the Colonial Ministry in Paris likes it or not.

Beneath the author's cold facts runs a passionate undertone of sympathy for the independence movement. In 1924-27 when the Chinese Nationalists were organizing the sentiment which ultimately burst into civil war, Mr. Ennis was managing the Nationalist (Chinese-American) News Agency in Peking. His contacts with Korean and Indo-Chinese nationalists undoubtedly aroused his interest in the Asiatic fight against foreign domination and prompted the present book.

Discussion of his belief that European colonies in Asia will ultimately win their freedom would be fruitless, for "ultimately" is a word without horizon. As far as Indo-China is concerned, it may be that the Front Populaire government of France, once it feels more firmly established on domestic ground, will turn its attention to genuine reforms in the colonies which will hold off agitation for independence for some time.

BARBARA WERTHEIM

A Literary Autobiographer

SWINNERTON: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Frank Swinnerton. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

THE chief impression derived from reading Mr. Swinnerton's account of his first fifty years is that he is a very kind, tolerant man. This is in spite of the fact that several times he takes the trouble to describe himself as cruel, cold, and harsh. But he is only boasting. As adviser to London publishers for many years, he has had to exercise literary judgment. He counts among his friends most of literary London as well as many writers in the United States. And he has a good word to say for every one of them.

Perhaps the most important portraits in his book are full-length verbal drawings of Arnold Bennett and H. G. Wells. When he was a young man and a comparatively unknown novelist, both of these men became his good friends, and Bennett in particular continued to be so until the latter's death. Bennett has been described by other men as mercenary, boorish, calculating. Swinnerton found him unfailingly kind and generous, both with his money and with his time, ready to help young authors who showed talent. If Bennett counted the number of words he wrote every day, and faithfully totaled his 365,000 every year, it was because he was above all else a writer and a worker; if he was short and blunt of speech, it was because he had always to take account of a stammer; if he seemed to live beyond his means, it was not ostentation but the result of generosity to others. In the same way the incredible week-ends at the Wellses, in which the hours were crowded with games and charades and dancing and exercise, with Wells always refusing to play unless he was sure he would win, are regarded by Mr. Swinnerton with a kindly eye. Shorter portraits are bewilderingly numerous: there are the great editors—Massingham, Clifford Sharp, Spender, A. G. Gardiner; there are writers in plenty—Hugh Walpole, Osbert Sitwell, Compton Mackenzie, Sir Harry Johnston, Somerset Maugham, Allan Monkhouse, Edgar Wallace, and many others. If there is an edge to any of these descriptions, it is for Galsworthy. One suspects that in so far as he could dislike anyone, Mr. Swinnerton disliked Galsworthy. But the worst he can say of him is that "for all his humaneness and readiness to pardon faults he was socially conventional." By which Mr. Swinnerton means that he was an unconscionable snob.

Whatever his talents as a writer—and he is amiably modest about them—there is no question that Mr. Swinnerton has a great talent for friendship. And whether it was because of his own happy gifts or partly as a result of his professional position, he moved freely and acceptably among the greatest conversationalists and wits of his day. Of George Doran's last London dinner party he says: "It proved a truly farewell party—consisting of Max Beerbohm, Arnold Bennett, C. B. Cochran, John Drinkwater, Philip Gibbs, A. P. Herbert, Somerset Maugham, and H. G. Wells, which was the most amusing party I ever attended." One may easily imagine that it was; and the fact that Swinnerton was included tells a great deal about Swinnerton.

Mr. Swinnerton writes of famous men and women pointedly and with a lively, engaging style. If he refuses to join in the modern literary sport of debunking the great, it probably does not matter. He liked them; they quite evidently liked him. He is willing to leave criticism to others.

FILMS

"Winterset" and Others

"WINTERSET" (RKO-Radio) has been praised as better than the play from which it was taken. It can be praised, but not as something better than Maxwell Anderson; for it bears only the most superficial resemblance to the tragedy which won prizes last year. There is of course the "happy" ending, but that is not the point. The escape of Mio and Miriamne from Trock's bullets as they go to inform the police about the Romagna case is merely incidental to a larger change, and is in fact an appropriate ending to a story which has never concerned itself with anything except "the truth" about the case—the identity, namely, of the murderers. For Mr. Anderson the truth included a great deal more; as much, indeed, as the meaning of justice in a world of accidents and court trials. Mr. Anderson may not have got to the bottom of this question, and he may not have written a first-rate tragedy; but any comparison of the film with the play is misleading if it ignores the omission of metaphysics from the former. Mr. Anderson's central figures are clearly Mio and the judge, and the deepest question he asks is whether any demonstrable good can now be done, either to these two or to society as a whole, by revealing the truth about Trock. Can the damage which has been done be undone? And will not some new damage ensue among a people which until now has trusted its judges? The question is not answered neatly; it is not that kind of question, nor is Mr. Anderson that kind of playwright. Rather it is allowed to spread its meaning through the play as the mind spreads through the body, giving it character no less than movement.

WALLY FOR QUEEN!

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF ROYALTY

BY UPTON SINCLAIR

The editors tell me this is "unprintable." Nothing indecent; just that a writer may not "kid" the Royal Family. If you want a merry laugh, send 25 cents for one copy, or $1.00 for six.

Upton Sinclair, Station A, Pasadena, California

The film keeps to the detective level, beginning as "The Prisoner of Shark Island" did with a sequence proving that a certain man had nothing to do with the crime for which he will be punished. Thus we are never in doubt concerning the man's innocence, so that our entire attention is fixed upon a series of events which will, we hope, demonstrate it to others. Such a hope can be very urgent, and the interest of "Winterset" on the screen is by no means to be denied in view of all that has been done by the camera to make the setting physically impressive and to convince us with close-ups that Mio is a marked young man. But it is a different interest from that aroused by the play; not necessarily shallower, but certainly simpler. A film can be complex in its own terms. No film made from a play, however, seems able to achieve the virtue; doubtless for the reason that it is talking in other terms.

"Rembrandt" (United Artists) was a great disappointment to me. Or rather it wasn't, since I have long been convinced that stories cannot be made out of the lives of artists. The characteristic activity of an artist is invisible; it is the activity of his mind, and as such is undramatic. He may be in love, but then he becomes a lover like any man—though the attempt is usually made to deprive him of his manhood by dressing him up as poets and musicians are fabled to dress. Charles Laughton and his director in the present case, Alexander Korda, avoid the vulgar error of showing us Rembrandt in front of an easel; but the ingenuity with which they have kept him behind it is at best a negative stroke, and out of the man's life they have presented us with nothing more than a few isolated tableaux, counting on our interest in Rembrandt to pull the film together. Our interest in Rembrandt, however, can do no such thing; for it is an interest in the painter whom nobody ever saw, even in the seventeenth century, and even Mr. Laughton cannot bring that man to life. The result is a film which comes as near as any film can come to standing perfectly still.

"Once in a Blue Moon," written by Hecht and MacArthur and directed by them for Paramount, should be seen wherever possible within the next few weeks, since it is something of a fugitive from the limelight, having proved in certain mechanical ways a failure. Its clown, Jimmy Savo, is nevertheless a diminutive genius at pantomime, and the whole venture into frolic is really and touchingly free.

Holiday Recommendations

PLAYS

D'Oyley Carte Opera Company. Martin Beck Theater. Excellent company in Gilbert and Sullivan repertory.

Idiot's Delight. Shubert Theater. The Lunts in a play by Robert Sherwood. Probably won't abolish war but is exciting and funny.

Johnny Johnson. Forty-fourth Street Theater. Kurt Weil's exciting musical setting for Paul Green's play about a soldier so normal they thought he was insane. "Serious" but also entertaining.

On Your Toes. Majestic Theater. A revue held over from last season but still funny. With Ray Bolger, Luella Gear, and Tamara Geva.

Prelude to Exile. Guild Theater. How Wagner turned a little love into great music. Some singing and piano-playing prove he really did do it.

Red, Hot, and Blue. Alvin Theater. Cole Porter writes another musical for Ethel Merman on a text by Russel Crouse. Of course it's not so good as "Anything Goes," but it's good nevertheless.

Stage Door. Music Box Theater. George S. Kaufman and Edna Ferber provide some good gags in a play about young girls in a theatrical boarding-house.

The Country Wife. Henry Miller Theater. Ruth Gordon being irresistibly funny in Wycherley's very bawdy play.

Tonight at Eight-Thirty. National Theater. Repertory of short plays written by Noel Coward and acted by him with Gertrude Lawrence. The funny ones are very funny in Mr. Coward's own manner.

Tovarich. Plymouth Theater. An international success about two exiled Russian nobles in Paris. Superbly done and amusing if you don't mind the thick sentiment.

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Victoria Regina. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scene from Laurence Housman's drama, stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others.

FILMS

As You Like It. Twentieth Century-Fox. Engaging, and good Shakespeare as far as it goes. Elisabeth Bergner is Rosalind; Leon Quartermaine is Jaques.

Come and Get It. United Artists. The logging scenes—hypothetically in Wisconsin—redeem an otherwise coarse-grained drama derived from Edna Ferber's novel.

The Devil Is a Sissy. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. First-rate child acting by Freddie Bartholomew, Mickey Rooney, and Jackie Cooper; particularly by Mickie Rooney. Brilliant directing by Van Dyke.

Dodsworth. United Artists. Walter Huston and Ruth Chatterton in a convincing translation of the play.

La Kermesse Héroïque. Filmarte. Generally considered the best film of the fall. An exquisite piece of comic art.

Les Misérables. Cinéma de Paris. Harry Baur is Jean Valjean, and as always is overwhelmingly credible.

Libeled Lady. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. There should be at least one William Powell picture on the list, and this is it. A very laughing matter.

Nine Days a Queen. Gaumont-British. An excellent if rather sober historical film about Lady Jane Grey.

The President's Mystery. Republic Pictures. Interesting as being an American propaganda film. The doctrine is co-operation, and the art is good.

Romeo and Juliet. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Continues to hold the screen, partly because it is good Shakespeare and partly because of Norma Shearer's very appealing Juliet.

Winterset. RKO-Radio. A simplified and less philosophical version of the play, but powerful in its own right.

Son of Mongolia. Amkino. The best Russian film in a year; achieves the note of folk comedy against a contemporary Mongolian background.

The Yellow Cruise. Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse. One of the best travel films to date. Follows the Citroën expedition from Beirut to Peking.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Carney and the Times

[This letter was addressed to the New York Times, which informs us that it has already published several letters objecting to Mr. Carney's Spanish dispatches and plans to publish no more. Mr. Manuel's letter did not appear.]

Dear Sir: William P. Carney in Paris can disseminate propaganda against the legally constituted government of Madrid with more freedom than was allowed by the censors of the republic.

Carney was a representative of the New York Times in Madrid for many months prior to the outbreak of the rebellion, and the republic had occasion to watch his methods of reporting. One of the wireless dispatches from Spain, which you printed on the front page of the issue of June 17, announced that thirty-six churches had been burned within forty-eight hours. When this issue of your newspaper was received in Madrid about a week later, newspapermen in the offices of the United Press were astonished to read of incidents which had not come to their attention. The files of the two days mentioned were examined but no references to these church burnings were found.

The dispatch seemed to have been inspired by a speech of the reactionary leader, Gil Robles, who was then orating in the Cortes about all the incidents which had occurred since the People's Front Republican government had come into power, not about the events of the previous two days. Naturally, Spaniards were outraged by such an attempt to defame their country and to impose upon Americans the impression that their regime was one of chaos.

What may be pardoned in times of peace cannot by any standards be allowed during the fever heat of a civil war. The long dispatch which Carney sent from Paris on December 6 depicts the anarchy and communism prevailing in Madrid; it intimates that the city is ready for the pacifying arm of General Franco. The reader's attention is drawn away from the massacre of workers in Badajoz, the fifth column of fascists in Madrid over whom the government must keep an ever-watchful eye, and the ravages of the Moors. Instead, the account abounds in details concerning the unhappy lot of a reporter in a country torn by civil strife. I naturally have no knowledge of the intimate facts reported by Carney, but it has been possible to check on one vital section of his uncensored report, the cinematographic account of the murder of Admiral Salas.

The vice admiral, according to Mr. Carney, was taken into a prison courtyard by an irresponsible militiaman and shot in a haphazard manner. There is no intimation of any regular court procedure. The affair which he thus reveals with all the manner of a diligent spy who has made a discovery in reality had nothing clandestine about it. Newspapers from Madrid have been coming through regularly until a few weeks ago, and the issue of Claridad for November 6 carried a full-page account of the trial of Salas. This man held the responsible post of chief of staff in the Ministry of Marine. He absented himself from his office during July 18, 19, and 20, the crucial days when the rebellion of the army officers was first spreading from Morocco to the peninsula, when fascist military men in Madrid and Barcelona were attempting to capture these cities by a putsch. Had he been loyal to the republic during these trying days, he would have remained at his post, in communication with naval officers in Mediterranean waters, prepared with all the forces at his disposal to impede the transport of Moors across the Straits of Gibraltar. His behavior was enough to lay bare his treason; inactivity alone, at that moment, was equivalent to collusion with the enemy. But there was more positive evidence. At the trial sailors reported incriminating conversations between Salas and Franco in the Canary Islands during a cruise. Minor officials in the ministry testified to the long period of time which elapsed early on July 18 between the receipt of a personal telephonic message to Salas from Franco and its transmission to the Minister of Marine.

Evidence was carefully weighed and Salas was condemned to death under Article 128, paragraph 2, of the Penal Code of Marine and War. He was judged not by a group of Communists and Anarcho-Syndicalists but by the members of a tribunal who had long served in the judiciary and were fulfilling their normal functions.

Occasional errors in reporting may be committed by newspapermen; they should be pardoned. But the reports of the Times correspondent are outright falsifications which cannot be condoned.

FRANK EDWARD MANUEL

Boston, Mass., December 7

Señor Unamuno Loses His Job

Dear Sirs: Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler has released to the press a letter from Miguel de Unamuno in which the noted philosopher, who has been rector of the University of Salamanca for many years, upholds the fascist rebellion in Spain. The letter was written in Latin and has been sent to universities throughout the world. Although he does not mention the Madrid government by name, Señor Unamuno ascribes to it all the acts of vandalism and destruction which have taken place in Spain since the civil war began. He does not mention, either, the brutal bombardment of Spain's capital city and its civil population by that army of Spanish generals and African Moors which he pictures as defending "Western and Christian civilization" against "an Eastern fantastic scheme."

Perhaps the merciless destruction of Madrid had not set in when Señor Unamuno declared himself to be on the side of the angels. And obviously President Butler, in releasing the report, was not aware of the latest event in the life of Señor Unamuno. This event postdates the Latin letter—which can best be described by that familiar Latin gerundive, propaganda.

President Butler knew, of course, that at the time the letter was written Señor Unamuno was no longer legally rector of Salamanca, the Madrid government having removed him from his post when he declared his allegiance to the fascists many weeks ago. But Dr. Butler apparently did not know, when he released the letter, that Señor Unamuno is no longer rector even under fascist auspices. The story was told recently in the Claridad of Madrid. On Columbus Day, known as "the day of the race," an elaborate celebration was held at the university, which was already more than two and a half centuries old when America was discovered. General Franco and his staff were honored guests at the ceremony, in which the distinguished rector, of course, took part. There were also present high officials of the church and many priests and soldiers.

Among others, General Millan Astray, a veteran of the Moroccan wars, was called upon to speak, though, like others, his name has been besmirched by parliamentary investigations of graft and corruption. General Astray, unlike most Spanish generals, has always been a fighting man. In Morocco he lost an eye and an arm in the service of his country. He has presumably been serving Franco with the same devotion. Who had a better right to speak in honor of the Spanish race at Salamanca?

He spoke. And the theme of this defender of Western culture ran as follows: The Basques and the Catalonians are the Jews of Spain. They must be exterminated to the last man, woman, and child.

The words of General Astray falling athwart the history of the University of Salamanca match the bombs of Hitler and Mussolini now raining in Madrid. At Salamanca, which was noted in the Middle Ages for its code of civil law, Columbus lectured on his discoveries in the New World, and the Copernican system was taught long before it had been generally accepted. Salamanca's name is venerated wherever learning is respected.

The fate of the German universities is indication enough for the ordinary man of what a fascist government might accomplish at Salamanca. But Señor Unamuno, being a noted philosopher and having faith in established institutions like the army and the church, was not impressed. It took the crude words of a Spanish general to make him feel the damp penetrating chill of impending fascism. When the General had finished, the Rector rose and briefly spoke. If the General's plan were carried out, he said, if the Basques and the Catalonians were exterminated, then Spain, like the General, would be mutilated.

It is reported that General Franco and his staff left the scene in high anger and that the meeting broke up. According to the Claridad, on the following day Miguel de Unamuno was again removed from his post as rector of the University of Salamanca.

I await Señor Unamuno's next communication.

Christmas Gifts Wanted

Dear Sirs: Every year the Prisoners' Relief Fund of the International Labor Defense conducts a special Christmas campaign to provide holiday cheer to the labor and political prisoners and to their families. We know that Nation readers are aware of the plight of labor's prisoners and of their families deprived of their breadwinner. There are now eighty prisoners serving terms of a year or more, in addition to hundreds serving shorter terms in the prisons of this country.

Through pledges and donations from individuals and organizations, we provide help for these prisoners every month during the year. To express the practical sympathy and solidarity of those "on the outside" we urge you to give generously during the holiday season toward our $20,000 campaign.

Funds, good warm clothing, and toys for the children should be sent to the Christmas Relief Fund, International Labor Defense, 80 East Eleventh Street.

Dear Sirs: Four Harlan, Kentucky, miners are still serving life terms for the death of a mine guard killed at Evarts in 1931. William Hightower, Elzie Phillips, and William Hudson, convicted on the same charge, have been released.

Forty of the forty-seven living jurors who served in the various trials have signed petitions urging Governor Chandler to pardon the four remaining lifetermers. Judges Kaufman and Hurst, who presided at the trials of Chester Poore, Jim Reynolds, and Al Benson, have written to the Governor saying they have no objections to pardons for these men. Former Judge Prewitt, who sentenced W. B. Jones, while declining to write a letter, said he would not object if a pardon were granted to Jones.

Today, after months of effort and travel through many parts of Kentucky, we have strong reason to believe that the four prisoners can be liberated before Christmas if an intensive campaign is carried on within the state, supplemented by widespread publicity outside. Further important investigation must be completed quickly to obtain additional evidence of the prisoners' entire innocence of the crime charged, and of their ruthless frame-up by agents of the coal interests. And we must organize speedily delegations of influential individuals who will press the Governor for action on these cases before December 25.

For these purposes we need funds at once. Will you help make this Christmas a happy one for the four prisoners and their families by sending a contribution to the Joint Committee to Aid the Kentucky Miners' Defense, 75 Fifth Avenue?

IT SOUNDS TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE. MAYBE there is a new Supreme Court in the national capital. The latest decision—upholding the constitutionality of the 1934 American arms embargo in the Chaco dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay—is not only a blow at the munitions profiteers and an aid and comfort to existing and future neutrality legislation. It is also a vindication of the traditional view that has obtained both in legislative tradition and constitutional law, of the scope of the Congressional right to delegate its power to the executive. Justice Sutherland, in writing the opinion of the court, has been careful to limit the very reasonable interpretation of delegation of powers to the field of foreign affairs. There, presumably, the President has access to a range of information denied to Congress to a degree that does not obtain in internal policy. There also lack of freedom of action would prove embarrassing to the government. But a similar generous attitude projected into internal affairs may well validate the sort of delegation involved in the Truth in Securities Act. Perhaps we are growing over-optimistic. But it does seem good to have at least the constitutional cloud removed from the grant of discretionary power to the President in neutrality legislation—a grant which we consider superior to the mandatory legislation. And it seems good also to have the court continuing in its new chastened mood. The earlier decisions this term were either based on technical points or limited to state powers. This decision is on a clear issue of constitutionality, and although it does not involve a New Deal case it involves vast economic interests. And it is good to have the decision seven to one. Justice McReynolds's dissent adds just the touch of reality to make us feel that it is not all a wish-fulfilment dream.

SPAIN'S "LITTLE WORLD WAR" HAS REACHED a point where it is becoming increasingly difficult to limit operations within its boundaries. The first few thousand German troops—"Aryan Moors" as they are called in Madrid—proved as ineffective as their African predecessors, and more are reported on the way. In addition, several thousand Irish fascists led by General O'Duffy have reached Spanish shores. While the number of Italians has mysteriously diminished in recent weeks, Italian pilots are still to be found in Franco's ranks. But the most serious complication has arisen out of the sinking by a rebel cruiser of a Soviet freighter bound for Belgium with a cargo of manganese ore. According to international law, a non-belligerent which attacks another vessel on the high seas ranks as a pirate and may be sunk on sight. Yet if the Soviet sought to enforce the law to this extent, Germany might precipitate a war by rushing to the support of the rebels. The only hopeful element in the situation is the fact that England appears to have thrown its influence definitely on the side of the anti-fascist forces. Captain Anthony Eden's warning to Von Ribbentrop against the dispatch of further German troops may be taken as an indication of an important shift in policy. British influence is said to account also for the sudden chilling in Mussolini's enthusiasm for the rebel cause. Since every day that Madrid holds out makes it more difficult for Germany to aid Franco secretly, the next few weeks may provide a test of Germany's willingness to precipitate an open conflict.

*

TO GO HUNGRY IN WAR TIME MAY IMPLY courage and patriotism, even strength. To go hungry in time of peace is merely depressing—a source of irritation and disaffection, a cause of fear. This is the dilemma that Germany's rulers face at this moment: war still in the offing; hunger right now; and only slogans to bridge the gap. ("Cannon before butter" is one of the favorites.) Germany faces a general economic crisis of which the food shortage is merely the most important symptom, and no solution has been produced even by prestidigitator Schacht except that contained in his repeated demand for colonies. But colonies, if they were granted tomorrow, would not feed Germans this winter. So the leaders of the Third Reich have undertaken the unhappy task of issuing food cards, exhorting the people to endure their hardships patiently, offering as substitutes for butter and lard a submarine fleet twice as strong as that of 1914, and even depicting hopefully the "bread lines in America" and the needy in London's East End. Meanwhile Hitler and Göring have warned the industrialists that they must maintain armament production even though the food shortage, with resulting increases in food imports, will decrease the supply of needed raw materials. These are the tactics of desperation. The fallacy of autarchy has caught up with the Third Reich. It is possible that outside financial aid may be offered to postpone collapse or war. But Britain is said to have refused help unless the vast rearmament program is checked, and Germany to have replied that a suspension of the program would bring immediate disaster. So the dilemma remains.

*

BEHIND A VEIL OF LEGISLATIVE REGULARITY so thin that the gleam of bayonets shows through, Colonel Fulgencio Batista, Cuba's military dictator, has moved to force out of office President Miguel Mariano Gomez, who was installed with democratic ceremony last May following the first elections to be held since the fall of Machado in 1933. The issue which brought about the crisis, like the other points on which the President and the Colonel have differed in the past few months, is clearly that of civil versus military rule in the island. The crime of Gomez consists in his having opposed a law inspired by Batista which puts a tax of nine cents a bag on raw sugar for the purpose of establishing 2,300 rural schools staffed by the army. Seven hundred such schools have already been put in operation. Gomez calls it fascism; Batista calls it a measure to benefit "the poorest classes in the island." At the same time Batista has won the support of the mill-owners in the usual fascist way. "The National Sugar Mill Owners," reads a laconic dispatch, "which first opposed the sugar-tax bill, reversed its stand because army leaders told them plainly that troops protecting their mill property from strike damages would be withdrawn forthwith. They came to the conclusion that nine cents a bag was cheap insurance." Batista has learned well the language as well as the methods of the modern demagogue. "The armed forces," he declaims, "created by a revolution of the people are always behind the legislative power. . . ." They are so close behind the legislative power, in fact, that a majority of legislators have voted the impeachment of President Gomez for exercising his right to veto what he considers a vicious law.

THAT THE NEW HOLY WAR OF THE CATHOLIC church upon communism is no mere caprice on the part of Nation editors—as several of our correspondents have implied—is indicated by an Associated Press dispatch from Vatican City. "Thousands of speeches, lectures, and debates are given daily in all parts of the world," so the dispatch runs, "by Catholic priests and laymen . . . illustrating the dangers and ambushes of the Communist program and propaganda." Moreover, the Holy Father himself is described as the director of the worldwide fight against communism. Plans for a "special universal organization" composed of Catholics and Protestants to fight the Communist "menace" are under way. Liberals all over the world must recognize this fight for what it is—a campaign against democracy. For in the present world the anti-Communist fight is a pro-fascist one.

"A GENERAL WAVE OF SYMPATHY IS PASSING from one plant to another when labor trouble develops." Thus Ward's Reports, a coldly statistical news service of the automotive industry, takes account of the C. I. O.'s industrial-union drive, which since the election has been speeded up in every field. The Steel Workers' Organizing Committee has just celebrated its conquest of the company union at a meeting in Pittsburgh where "employee representatives" of forty-two plants strung from Cleveland to the Atlantic Coast bit the hand of the steel companies that have been feeding them. They formed the "C. I. O. Representatives' Council," proposed a national convention of all steel workers, and demanded $5 minimum pay for labor. The automobile industry faces serious stoppages as a result of strikes in various auxiliary plants, and John L. Lewis has announced a forthcoming test of union strength against General Motors. He charged the corporation with discrimination against union men, and the La Follette committee has received similar charges which it plans to investigate. One of the tightest tie-ups in honor of recovery and the C. I. O. now obtains in the glass industry, thanks to the Flat Glass Workers, affiliated with the C. I. O. and one of the most interesting labor groups in the country. Its president, Glen McCabe, was formerly an official of a glass workers' union whose members were so skilled and so few that it approximated a guild. Now Mr. McCabe, in spite of his long craft-union past, has become the militant leader of an industrial union whose strike has closed down 90 per cent of the country's production of flat and safety glass. Meanwhile John L. Lewis faces a possible strike in his own industry. The owners are proposing to increase hours, and we may be sure that one of their objectives is to administer a defeat to the man who is directing the present union offensive.

GOVERNOR EARLE OF PENNSYLVANIA HAS embarked on a tour of the bootleg coal areas of his state. Five years ago the coal companies, seeing their market halved by the depression and the use of other fuels, and unable to produce coal at a profit for the prices they could get, started closing many of their collieries. Thousands of workers were thus thrown on their own—non-existent—resources. Widespread bootleg mining was the result. Firmly organized into a sort of union called the Independent Anthracite Miners' Association, the bootleggers have become a power in their communities. Local politicians compete for their support, business is grateful to them, the local press upholds them, and when the coal owners try to have them arrested, local juries refuse to indict or convict them. Time and again Governor Earle has refused the demand of the companies that he call out the state militia to clear the bootleggers off their property. But seeing the 1940 Presidential nomination out of the corner of one eye, he cannot continue to wink with the other at an admittedly illegal situation, no matter how justified. The bootlegging is clearly the result of price chaos in an industry that cries aloud for regulation. Though the Guffey Coal Act is still fresh in its grave, Earle has said that nationalization, which he defines as "federal regulation and control," may be the only solution. We agree on the ultimate need for nationalization, but—unlike Governor Earle—we should prefer to call a spade a spade.

"HERE, WHY DON'T YOU SIT DOWN AND read the pictures," says the manager of the dumb wrestler in "Swing Your Lady" as he thrusts a tabloid into the illiterate's hand. That pretty well sums up what has long been the general opinion concerning the function of photographic journalism. But the recent appearance of such periodicals as the new Mid-Week Pictorial and Life, as well as the popularity of the various photographic annuals that have been offered for the Christmas season, shows that the pictorial technique is no longer limited to the tabloid audience but is reaching the sophisticated as well. It makes us wonder if the phenomenon may not have consequences more important than has been imagined. There has, for example, just reached our desk a copy of the "Leica Annual" which contains, among other things, a now famous picture of Herbert Hoover sunk in an ignoble doze during an academic ceremony at the University of California. It reminds us of another we have seen of F. D. R. eating a hot dog, and it suggests the firm conviction that a past documented in this fashion can never become heroic in the sense that the past now is. Willy-nilly we see Washington crossing the Delaware in terms of the famous Lutz canvas. Had a candid camera been on the spot we should think very differently of the event. And today a candid camera always is on the spot. In a sense the limits of the "romantic past" have been fixed by the popularization of photography. Nothing which happened after the year 1925 can ever be truly "glamorous."

THE BLACK CORPS, EDITORIAL ORGAN OF THE Hitler Special Guard, has come out for nudism so long as it is Nordic, Nazi, and national, as opposed to the international, Social Democratic, and Communistic brands which formerly prevailed. This left nudism, which is denounced by the Black Corps because it functioned through "secret leagues," was wiped out in 1933 as a cultural aberration and a threat to public order. The new nudism will not be an underground movement; and the article in the Black Corps indicates that its main purpose is to make possible "a racial choice in the interests of races in the future." Moreover, it is not to be confined to city slickers as in former days but is to be recommended to the peasantry, "to prevent their suffering from a wholly one-sided physical development." The advantages of a nationwide nudist movement for the Third Reich are obvious. It would save work for the Gestapo, since it would cut down the search in search and seizure; it would mean a saving in the material used for clothes; and it would prepare the people for the glorious day when their diet will consist of one look at a new submarine and a crust of ersatz. Psychologically, however, it might have disastrous effects. What will happen when the average German, come to the public square to make his "racial choice" from among the candidates assembled there in Nordic nakedness, notices the unhappy effects of a lack of butter in the national diet?

DOROTHY VAN DOREN'S RESIGNATION LEAVES The Nation poorer in many ways. Her long association with the journal, continuing with brief intermissions from the first year after Mr. Villard sold the Evening Post and established The Nation as an independent weekly, gave her work a degree of perspective and sophistication that only long experience can supply. In addition she was versatile, with the trained journalist's capacity to accomplish smoothly and expeditiously the whole range of editorial tasks. Her abilities will be missed. Happily, in the intervals of her independent work, she will continue to contribute to The Nation—chiefly to the book pages.

Tempest in Wisconsin

WE PRINT elsewhere in the issue a report by Paul W. Ward and an article by Oswald Garrison Villard on the tempest which the Glenn Frank case has raised in Wisconsin. American university life may not always contribute much to building a great culture, but it always makes excellent politics. Mr. Ward points out conclusively that no question of academic freedom is involved on either side. But charges of politics fly thick as hailstones. Since President Frank is a Republican and Governor La Follette a Progressive, the issue is seen as reaching beyond the Madison campus or the state-house. In fact, there is even a suggestion, since the two men concerned have been mentioned for the next national election campaign, that what is happening in Madison may be but a dress rehearsal for a struggle of Titans in 1940. It is this aspect, perhaps, rather than any deep concern for educational policy that has brought the Newspaper Publishers' Association to Mr. Frank's defense.

The broad general question the episode raises, however, is the relation of politics to education. First of all, we must remember that in the nature of the situation there can be no complete divorce between the two. Whether for good or ill, we must accept the fact that state universities have by their very set-up a political responsibility and are likely therefore to have a measure of political responsiveness. We may not like this, and we may, and should, strive to minimize it. But the fact remains. This responsibility should never touch the faculty or the student body; as soon as we begin to coerce them into expounding or holding particular political views, we have taken a step toward a totalitarian society. But just as in an endowed university the administration is subject to the control of the trustees, who in the main—let us not forget it—are responsive to the weight of opinion in the financial community, so the administration of the state university is subject to the people's representatives in the state government. This means legislature, governor, regents. It would be less than fair to the whole state to take the control of university administration out of the hands of the regents, and since the regents are appointed by the governor, this means that the governor has a definite place in the set-up.

Whether Governor La Follette has abused that place is not entirely clear. If he has he should be criticized severely, but the weight of the evidence does not seem against him. His legitimate function was to appoint the regents. To accuse him of "packing" the board is as idle as to accuse Mr. Roosevelt, in his next appointment to fill a Supreme Court vacancy, of "packing" the court. But, once appointed, state regents, like Supreme Court justices, are best left to their own devices—although neither should be immune from public criticism. The function of the regents is clear enough. They must appoint, reappoint, or fail to reappoint presidents in the light of the best educational standards and their duty to the state and the people.

This brings us squarely up against the principal—in fact, the only real—issue in dispute. How fit is Glenn Frank to continue as president of the university? This, we submit, is a question for the regents to settle. They may settle it well or ill, but the job is theirs. A wrong solution may imply misjudgment, but it involves no martyrdom. We are glad the regents will hold an open hearing, if only because it will cut under the charge that they are embarked on a conspiracy. But essentially this will weaken their position. The very nature of a hearing is such that the more tangible—and therefore the more trivial-sounding—complaints are pushed forward. But the real grounds for firing Glenn Frank can no more be threshed out in open hearing than could the grounds for hiring him—or the grounds for breaking up a marriage. This is a divorce case, and we all know that divorce cases as they are fought out in open court never do justice to the final operative cause: the parties just don't love each other.

That's it. Wisconsin just doesn't love Glenn Frank, and it is even doubtful whether Glenn Frank loves Wisconsin. He has lost the confidence of a majority of the regents. The legislators can't stand him. The younger men on the faculty feel that he gives them no chance for advancement or real effectiveness. The community—and in a Western state the community is the college—thinks him uppish. There is a widespread mistrust of his judgment. Add to all that the paradox of a candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination as the university head in the most progressive state in the Union, and you complete a picture of discord. If the regents wish at this date to correct an original error, that is their privilege.

Behind the Scenes in China

IN THE week which has passed since the kidnapping of Chiang Kai-shek it has become evident that Chang Hsueh-liang miscalculated if he thought he would immediately capture the leadership of the national anti-Japanese movement. Only one general, and he a former subordinate of Chang's, has openly rebelled against Nanking. Even those who approved most heartily of the Young Marshal's pronouncements have been alienated by his methods. For though Chang's tactics have been identical with those employed on several occasions by Chiang Kai-shek, they have not served to inspire confidence in him as a national leader.

The Young Marshal's position has been made even weaker by rumors of international intrigue which have received wide credence as explanations of the incident. The Japanese have insisted that the kidnapping was planned by the Chinese Communists at the instigation of Moscow. The Soviets, on the other hand, have insisted that Japan was responsible for Chang Hsueh-liang's coup. Both offer fairly convincing evidence in support of their contention. The rank and file of the Young Marshal's army have undoubtedly been in close contact with the Chinese Soviet forces, and have been influenced by their anti-

Japanese activities. Yet there is plausibility in Moscow's contention that Japan has the most to gain from the disintegration of the Nanking government. Moreover, as Mr. Stewart points out on another page, certain of Chang Hsueh-liang's subordinates are known to be affiliated with Wang Ching-wei, who was forced to relinquish the premiership because of his open Japanese sympathies.

Both interpretations ignore the very great possibility that Chang Hsueh-liang may have invented the coup himself. This is not the first time that the Young Marshal has resorted to intrigue and gangster tactics to achieve personal ends. The anti-Japanese and pro-Communist items in his demands on Nanking are significant chiefly as a concession to public opinion. During the past few months the All-China National Liberation Association has made startling progress in its campaign for a united front against Japan. There is no evidence that Chang Hsueh-liang was in any way connected with this movement. But it is reasonable to suppose that he hoped to win its support by seizing the man who was most inimical to its program.

Every day that Chiang Kai-shek is held in detention increases the possibility that a genuine anti-Japanese bloc may be formed. While none of the left-wing leaders wish to be involved, even indirectly, in the kidnapping and possible assassination of the dictator, several, including Li Tsung-jen and Pai Chung-hsi, are already urging immediate action against Japan. It is possible that Chiang may win his release on the promise to lead an anti-Japanese war. No one could command more general support. But Tokyo has already warned Nanking against such a compromise, and Chiang's recent decision to intensify the anti-Communist campaign makes that outcome extremely unlikely. China has waited in vain for more than five years for Chiang Kai-shek to lead the resistance against foreign aggression. If his hand is removed from the helm for another few weeks, there is a strong possibility that the country will turn to a new leadership.

The Van Sweringen Empire

NOT since the days of Teapot Dome has the American public been afforded an intimate view of the refinements of high finance such as has been revealed in the recent investigation into the financing of the Van Sweringen railroad system. Beneath the complex structure of holding companies, super-holding companies, dummy corporations, and a myriad of semi-legitimate business interests lay one single purpose: the desire to evade state and federal legislation for the curbing of monopolies. Even with the mass of information which has been revealed, it is difficult to reconstruct the financial structure of the Van Sweringen interests in detail. The Vaness Company was the key to the Van Sweringen empire. It controlled the Alleghany Corporation, which in turn held a controlling interest in seven railroads operating more than 23,000 miles of track, together with coal mines, office buildings, bus lines, and other enterprises with an aggregate value of approximately three billion dollars.

There are many amazing features of the story, but none more inexplicable than the manner in which the Van Sweringen brothers regained control of their empire after having apparently lost it to the Morgans. Having no money themselves, the Van Sweringens persuaded George A. Ball and George Tomlinson to bid for the possession of the Alleghany stock which the Van Sweringens had forfeited to the Morgan banks. After hastily incorporating as the Mid-America Corporation, Ball and Tomlinson obtained this stock, carrying controlling interest in all the Van Sweringen enterprises, for just $274,682. Thereupon Ball drew up a contract permitting the Van Sweringens to buy a controlling interest in Mid-America for $8,250 at any time during the next ten years and to vote the controlling shares in the interim.

The bargain prices which Ball and the Van Sweringens paid for control of the system contrast sharply with the vast sums sunk in the enterprises by the public during the boom period. In 1929 alone $147,000,000 was invested in bonds, preferred stock, and common stock of the Alleghany Corporation. The corporation charter contained a clause permitting the Van Sweringens to spend or borrow without limit, both of which they proceeded to do without regard for the stockholders. Most of the borrowed money, like the original investment, disappeared during the depression.

But the investing public was not the only victim of these financial manipulations. Officials of the R. F. C. testified before the committee that the Missouri Pacific, a Van Sweringen railroad, had obtained $17,100,000 from the government under false pretenses. In applying for R. F. C. assistance, the railroad presented a financial statement in which it conveniently forgot to list an obligation of $20,000,000 to the Terminal Shares, another Van Sweringen enterprise. The Missouri Pacific also carried on its books a substantial deposit with the Guarantee Trust Company which did not exist, and this was shown as an asset in the annual report to the stockholder. Evidence was presented to show that the Interstate Commerce Commission was not notified of the transaction between the Missouri Pacific and the Terminal Shares, despite a ruling that such transactions must be reported, and that the transaction violated the laws of Missouri.

Perhaps we should not be shocked at financial irregularities in high circles. They undoubtedly exist in every phase of our business life. But it is distinctly discouraging that they should be so flagrant in the one field where government control has been developed to the highest degree. Additional legislation might eliminate some of the more serious irregularities but could not obviate them entirely. As long as financial manipulation is profitable, means will be found to evade even the strictest legislation. In an enterprise which is as clearly imbued with the public interest as the railroads, the only solution would seem to be the elimination of private profit.

1936, Farewell

IT IS not hard to say farewell to 1936. It is the custom in leave-taking to speak one's friendliest word, and at the bedside of the dying to cast a final lingering glance. But in these waning days of 1936, as we look back over the now ghostly procession of events, there can be no regret at the year's passing. Every age, of course, has a sense of having passed through a more severe crisis than the previous one, and every year seems to add to a mounting crescendo of doom for the world's culture. But one need not be merely sensitive or humanitarian to feel the terrific impact of the year that is now ending. Even the most hard-boiled political observers bear witness to the stern stuff of which it has been fashioned.

This is the mood in which we make our none too reluctant farewells to 1936. Farewell to a year in which civilization was sustained by the war in Ethiopia, the army coup in Japan, the massacre of Jews in Palestine, and the barbarity of the civil war in Spain; in which international obligations were upheld by the remilitarization of the Rhineland and the rearming of Germany, international honor by the Hoare-Laval treaty, international law by the use of poison gas and the bombing of hospitals in Abyssinia, and by the air raids on women and little children in Madrid, international justice by the abandonment of Ethiopia to the mercies of Mussolini, and international sportsmanship by the farce of the Berlin Olympic games. Farewell to a year of fire-breathing, armament-building, and insult-slinging among statesmen and diplomats—a year in which Sir Basil Zaharoff died but his work went on, a year notable in business annals because airplane stocks soared to a new high and in education because boys and girls were taught to wear gas helmets. Farewell to a year in which the League of Nations sputtered and died, and for it was substituted as the Cerberus of international welfare the armed alliance of Germany, Italy, and Japan. Farewell to a year in which faith was chiefly blind devotion to a Führer, hope was the longing eye cast at the rich grain fields of the Ukraine, and Christian charity was the Spanish priest fighting side by side with mercenary Moors, and the Pope's devoted efforts to set up a united front against "communism."

Narrowing our perspective to our own American boundaries we say farewell less grimly but still without much reluctance. Farewell to a year of floods and drought. Farewell to the Black Legion, with its hooded death that sent a tremor of the future through us. Farewell to the Tampa trials, the Arkansas floggings, and Terre Haute's greeting to Browder. Farewell to a year of record army and navy appropriations, plus the pan-American peace jaunt and Mr. Roosevelt's vision of himself putting peace over by chatting casually with the great ones of the earth. Farewell to the bonus melons for past wars and to the Veterans of Future Wars. Farewell to the Black committee telegrams, to the barons of industrial tear gas, to Chowderhead Cohen and the gorillas of the elevator strike. Farewell to the annus mirabilis of the Supreme Court—the year when six learned men in robes, Atlas-like, shouldered the American universe and saved the farmer from benefit payments, the coal industry from a measure of stability, and women laundry workers from having to surrender their liberty of contract to the temptation of a living wage.

Farewell, in a different mood, to a year of convention oratory, clogged radios, and Mr. Hearst's campaign wisdom. Farewell to the peculiar American alliance of bourbons and crackpots. Farewell to the Four Hoarsemen—Lemke and his bicycle cap, Dr. Townsend and his lieutenants washing their old-age pensions in public, Gerald Smith booming away and raising Huey Long from the dead three times a day, Father Coughlin sweating unquietly on the platform at Cleveland. Farewell—lest we forget—to Alf M. Landon and the American Way, to John Hamilton my jo, John, to Mrs. Preston Davie and her Women Volunteers, to the Sunflower Special and its entire cargo. Farewell to Mr. Roosevelt dashing around the country with a new repertory of campaign smiles. Farewell, ruefully, to American labor and American radicals dashing after Mr. Roosevelt to save an election that was in the bag. Farewell—and an extra fond and hopeful farewell—to Mr. Funk and the wizards of the Literary Digest. Farewell to an election victory followed by WPA lay-offs, and to a business boom that leaves ten million unemployed. Farewell to Ambassador and Mrs. Davies and their oceans of frozen cream. Farewell, finally, to a year in which the most important American export was love and the most beloved American figure a king of England.

But 1936 is more than just a confused jumble of memories. As one looks back on it, it seems (like most years) a year of minor triumphs and major disasters. But, cutting across triumph and disaster, it has been a year in which the human spirit itself has been tested. The heroism shown at the trials of the Austrian Socialists, the agony of the German concentration camps summed up in the broken body and the unbroken spirit of Ossietzky, the unheroic but no less real daily crucifixion of the spirit outside the concentration camps—these have not been lost on the world. The pattern of forces which in Germany led to Hitler have been turned in France into a People's Front. Japan, seeking to follow Mussolini's pattern of conquering first and explaining afterward, has met a formidable opponent in China's millions, for once politically conscious. Soviet Russia has shown that even in the international sphere a nation of workers can act with a decisiveness not given to our own democracies. In America the common man has shown that he is not merely newspaper fodder, and that however far he is still from the political awareness that will lead to a successful labor government, he is no fool. Above all on the battlefields around Madrid the workers have shown the stuff they are made of, and the men of all nations who are helping them reveal that the real International is of those who care for the human spirit.

Which leaves us looking toward 1937 with the same overfond hopes with which we once looked toward 1936. Such, foolish or not, is what Nietzsche calls the "eternal recurrence."

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Frank vs. La Follette

Madison, Wisconsin, December 18

WHEN a governor who may some day be the Presidential nominee of a truly liberal and democratic party is accused of trying to oust from the presidency of his state university a man rated as a possible Republican Presidential nominee in 1940, the nation's newspapers at once display an interest in the controversy far greater than they ever exhibit when some obscure pedagogue is fired for preachments discomfiting to the plutocrats on whom his college depends for funds. So it is with the current movement to oust Glenn Frank from the presidency of the University of Wisconsin, a movement blamed by Frank's friends upon Governor Philip F. La Follette, who with his brother, Senator Robert M. La Follette, holds the Progressive Party reins passed on by their father, "Fighting Bob." Newspapers whose columns to date have contained no mention of the Jerome Davis case at Yale have given liberal and even front-page space to the Frank case and its developments here at Madison.

Those developments, as reported in the daily press, raise three questions, and the first is: "Does the attempt to oust Frank represent an attack on academic freedom?" It is the only one of the three questions that I feel safe in answering categorically after several days' investigation of the situation, an investigation that has included lengthy talks with Dr. Frank, Governor La Follette, faculty members, students, alumni, local politicians, and business men. There is no question of academic freedom involved. Frank is not under fire for any ideas he has expounded or for any theories of education he has propounded. The anti-Frank faction, which is in the majority in the university's board of regents, does not find fault with anything that Frank has said or written, and his foes readily grant that he, in turn, has never attempted to curb the academic freedom of the faculty or student body over which he presides. The academic-freedom issue, in fact, has not even been raised by Frank's partisans except by the indirect route of charging that the move to oust him represents political interference in the affairs of the university and that if it is permitted to succeed, the university will come under political domination, and academic freedom will be tossed out the window.

This line of argument leads straight to the second question at issue: "Is the attempt to oust Frank a piece of partisan politics?" The pro-Frank faction charges, of course, that the whole business is political. It asks you to believe that the La Follettes are after Frank's scalp for criticizing the New Deal and for threatening to overshadow Phil and Bob as national figures through the prominence he has attained by his lecture tours and radio speeches. It also asks you to believe that the Governor wants the university presidency for himself or for Rexford Guy Tugwell or for Lloyd K. Garrison, dean of the law school and former National Labor Board chairman. But the pro-Frank faction offers not a scintilla of evidence that these things are true beyond pointing out that the regents opposed to Frank are all La Follette appointees and that the move to oust him began last spring when Frank was being mentioned as a possible 1936 Republican Presidential nominee. The anti-Frank faction counters by asserting that the ouster movement is much more than a year old and that while it is true that Frank's foes on the Board of Regents are all La Follette appointees, some of the pro-Frank regents also are La Follette appointees. The La Follette group also points out that it would be anything but politically astute for the La Follettes to attempt to control the university. Persuasive arguments are offered to the effect that the university can never be anything but a political liability to the La Follettes and that the less they have to do with it the better for their political fortunes in Wisconsin.

Then the anti-Frank faction comes through with a counter charge of its own. It asserts that if there is any partisan politics in the ouster movement it has been injected by Frank and his supporters. Harold M. Wilkie, president of the Board of Regents and leader of its anti-Frank faction, has charged formally and in writing that Frank has spread about the country propaganda designed to enlist outside support for himself founded in the belief that he is being made "a martyr to Progressive intolerance," as one young professor scoffingly phrased the case for Frank. A nation-wide propaganda campaign of the sort described has been under way for some months but as yet it has not been visibly linked to Frank. The closest approach to a link of which I have knowledge is that, when the writer of a nationally syndicated newspaper column visited Madison to address the campus journalists, Frank went out of his way to make contact with the visitor, with the result that the visitor devoted his speech the next night and subsequently a column to a thinly disguised defense of Frank and an attack upon his foes as men seeking to inject politics into the university's administration. It is suggested by the anti-Frank faction that Frank had something to do with the fact that Landon during the campaign devoted a rear-platform speech to the university and the necessity for keeping politics out of its affairs.

Frank's foes ask you to note, too, that his chief defenders within the state at the moment are newspaper editors and politicians who have always fought the La Follettes and who until now have been hostile to Frank as well. They point out that the leader of the pro-Frank faction on the Board of Regents is a Democrat, Daniel H. Grady, who formerly was intensely critical of Frank. Wilkie charged at Wednesday's meeting of the regents that Grady for a long time had been the leader of the anti-Frank faction and, in fact, had been one of the first regents to propose that Frank be ousted. Grady did not deny the charge but said he had changed his mind. It appears that he changed it this summer at about the time he became a candidate for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. Grady is a La Follette appointee on the Board of Regents and a lawyer. The rest of the pro-Frank faction on the board is made up of a physician, a housewife, a lawyer, a paper manufacturer, a Lutheran fundamentalist clergyman, and the State Superintendent of Public Education, John Callahan, who is an ex officio member of the board. The clergyman and the physician, in addition to Lawyer Grady, are La Follette appointees. The pro-Frank group contains two Democrats, two Republicans, and three Progressives. The anti-Frank group, composed entirely of Progressives appointed by La Follette, is made up of two lawyers, a housewife who was formerly a teacher, the business manager of the Superior Telegram, the president of the Wisconsin Farmers' Equity Union, a Milwaukee labor leader, a farmer who used to be chairman of the Education Committee in the legislature, and a mill hand whose boss is the manufacturer member of the pro-Frank faction on the board.

No discussion of the part that partisan politics may or does play in the ouster controversy would be complete without citation of three other facts. One is that when the university and Frank were being attacked by Wisconsin's home-made Hitler, John B. Chapple, it was not Frank's new-found champions but the La Follettes who defended Frank and the university. It was also the La Follettes alone who defended Frank, while his new Democratic and Republican friends remained silent, when the Hearst press loosed a red-baiting campaign against him. The second fact that needs to be noted is that though the university faculty has always been quick to resent and resist outside meddling in the institution's affairs, at this writing not one member of that faculty has protested against the ouster proceedings. The third fact that needs to be noted is that the ouster movement found its way into print long before the November elections; yet in those elections La Follette carried every ward in Madison by record margins, including the so-called Faculty Ward. It should be noted, too, in this connection that the faculty has never been markedly inclined toward the La Follettes; probably three-fourths of the members of professorial rank are conservative Republicans.

The chief support of the charge of political partisanship was removed on Wednesday when the Board of Regents voted to defer action on Frank's tenure until he has had opportunity to appear before them in a public hearing and answer the charges made against him. Until this vote was taken, the pro-Frank faction had been able to charge that the movement was being carried forward in secrecy to hide the fact that it was a piece of spoils politics. And that brings us to the third question at issue:

"Has the ouster movement been secret and has secrecy been necessary because there is no justification for firing Frank?" The answer involves questions of personal veracity. There are no documents available by which one may determine which side is telling the truth on crucial points.

The story of the La Follette camp—which is to my mind unconvincingly contradicted by the opposition—is that such secrecy as was practiced was solely out of consideration for Dr. Frank and at his request. It is, in fact, formally stated by Wilkie that as long ago as last February Frank was warned that his appointment probably would not be renewed at the end of the school year and that he accepted his critics' offer to keep the whole matter secret so that he might get another job, resign the university presidency, and escape dismissal. It is certainly true that Frank was warned last February, and that he was given a list of reasons why his administration was considered unsatisfactory. Whether it is also true that he indicated that he would take the tip gratefully and resign involves one of those questions of personal veracity to which reference has been made. The strongest point in his favor is that, when he carried the issue before the full Board of Regents in March, his foes did not press it. The best reason given for their retreat at that time is that they were afraid of getting the Frank ouster mixed up in the political campaign, especially in view of the fact that Frank was being hailed in New York as a likely Presidential candidate on the strength of his Lincoln's Birthday speech before the National Republican Club. The reason given for the revival of the ouster movement at this time is that the legislature is about to meet and the university will fare better in the presentation of its budget requests for the next biennium if the legislature knows when it takes up those requests that Dr. Frank will not be the one who will direct the spending of the money.

The written charges that Wilkie filed against Frank at Wednesday's meeting of the board were concerned solely with Frank's alleged shortcomings as an administrator. They make little impression on one who is not close to the university's affairs. The indictment they present is that Frank has been a weak and vacillating executive; that his indecisiveness has from time to time brought down upon the university unsavory publicity; that he has tried to play both ends against the middle and in so doing has lost the confidence of his faculty, the regents, and the legislature; that he has promised fiscal and administrative reforms and failed to keep his promises; that he has been so busy with outside activities that he has not had time to master university affairs; that he has broken his contract with the university by continuing to write a newspaper-syndicate column; that he has been extravagant in the maintenance of his household at public expense; and that he has tried to lift the university out of financial troubles at the expense chiefly of the student body and the lower-paid faculty members. There seems to be quite general concurrence within the faculty on the accuracy of these charges, but there is division as to whether they are sufficient grounds for a refusal to renew Frank's appointment as president.

Harry Bridges Comes East

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

FOR two and a half years now Harry Bridges has been a Pacific Coast figure whose honesty, strength of character, intelligence, and general competence as a rank-and-file labor leader have aroused much national and some international interest. Last week, on December 13—the date may be historically important—he stepped into a plane on the West Coast and flew East, and in three days became a national figure.

Bridges's decision to come East was evidently a sudden one, influenced by immediate developments in the maritime-strike situation, and there was no advance publicity. His first meeting was on Monday, December 14, in the Olympic Arena at Philadelphia, where some 1,500 striking seamen, longshoremen, and sympathizers with the maritime strikers gave him a rousing welcome. His coming simultaneously symbolized and actualized the unity of the rank-and-file maritime-labor struggle on the West and East coasts. He explained why the Western sea and alongshore unions had levied a 10 per cent assessment for their Eastern brothers. "We on the West Coast," he said, "have a selfish interest in helping you win your strike against the shipowners. If the employers beat one union they beat all. We have learned that lesson." He told what unity had accomplished on the West Coast. "We longshoremen used to work for miserable wages. We were hired at the same degrading 'shape up' on the docks that you have here, or at company hiring halls. We had the speed-up you have here. Only 2,200 men worked on the San Francisco docks in the days of the speed-up. Now 4,800 men are needed to do the work, and wages average $35 a week. Men are hired at union hiring halls in rotation." This was exciting stuff to Philadelphia dock-wallopers, many of whom are jobless while others work thirty or forty hours at a single stretch without rest.

And this sort of thing, Bridges went on to say, has put "the whole labor movement in the West actively behind us. At a recent meeting of the San Francisco Labor Council the unions donated $18,000 to our maritime strike. If necessary the other unions would go out again on a general tie-up to aid us." More, this militant and successful fight of the West Coast longshoremen for better working conditions has won the support of entire communities, including the city of San Francisco. "Not only labor but farmers and small business men see that their interests are with us as against the shipowners. . . . In San Francisco the city board of supervisors has given support to the marine strike."

On Tuesday, December 15, Bridges was in New York most of the day. He spent the forenoon at the headquarters of the "outlaw" seamen's strike. Then he called on his superior officer, President Joseph P. Ryan of the International Longshoremen's Association, who is also president of the New York City Central Trades and Labor Council and to whom he had previously addressed an open letter accusing him and most of the local I. L. A. union officials on the Atlantic Coast of virtual strike-breaking. He was anything but welcome. In fact, old Joe nearly hit the ceiling and according to newspaper reports called Bridges a "punk," told him he had no business coming East, and discharged him as an organizer of the I. L. A.—obviously for doing his job too well.

That same afternoon Bridges flew to Boston and in the evening addressed the marine and alongshore workers at a mass-meeting in the Franklin Union Institute, also called on very short notice. The Boston Post reported the next morning that "a police stenographer present took the text of Bridges's speech but there was nothing in the text that called for criticism." He talked Americanism, called for democracy in the labor movement as opposed to Ryanism and the increasing anti-labor tendencies of the A. F. of L., and encouraged the Boston longshoremen to turn their backs on the I. L. A. misleaders in the East and refuse to handle "hot cargo."

In New York 16,000 maritime workers and other rank-and-file unionists and their sympathizers came to hear him in Madison Square Garden. The rally was inadequately advertised and poorly handled; it was at least an hour too long, but when Bridges, the last speaker, was finally introduced the 16,000 leaned forward not to miss a word.

I have never heard a better organized, more effective, more intelligent, or more sincere speech than Bridges made on this occasion. Speaking clearly and calmly, never at a loss for the right word, he gave a vivid picture of the maritime situation on the Pacific Coast, where he said the federation's strike was already won; and promised workers in the East active cooperation in winning similar victories, once they achieved unity among themselves. He called on the rank and file on the docks in Eastern ports to repudiate the Ryan "leadership." He asserted that he and his movement were not communistic, as had been repeatedly charged (only the day before again by Ryan), unless the C. I. O., President Roosevelt, and everybody else was communistic who believed that workers should not work under degrading conditions.

He made a profound impression. Here was an extraordinary man—intelligent, purposeful, honest, potentially capable of handling almost any situation, physically slight and perhaps not in perfect health, but strong and tough, driven on a straight course by a great passion. As I write this, indications of revolt against the rotten Old Guard in maritime unions are increasing in the East. A National Maritime Federation, which probably was the main purpose of Bridges's trip East and is one of the implicit aims of the current rank-and-file maritime strikes, seems to be assured.

Who's Who in China

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE kidnapping of Chiang Kai-shek by his former ally and supporter, Chang Hsueh-liang, is but another illustration of the difficulty of classifying Chinese militarists according to their political orientation. To an even greater extent than in other countries Chinese politics are primarily a struggle of personalities. The rise of nationalism in the past dozen years has modified but not transformed this pattern. A few of the younger leaders can be pigeon-holed according to their political beliefs, but the remainder fall into cliques and factions which are built almost entirely on personal, family, and sectional considerations.

THE NANKING CLIQUE

During the past ten years Chiang Kai-shek (pronounced jahng kai shek) has exercised dictatorial power over the central portion of the country. He has held a number of important political offices, including that of President of the Republic, but his power has rested on his personal control of several of the crack divisions of the army and his uncanny judgment of when to fight and when to compromise. More of a politician than a strategist, he came to power as commander-in-chief of the Nationalist army which swept northward from Canton in 1926-27. But shortly after the capture of Shanghai early in 1927, he turned against his left-wing allies and established a new government at Nanking based on the support of Shanghai bankers and industrialists.

Since the invasion of Manchuria by the Japanese in 1931, Chiang has carefully avoided an open clash with Japan, although on a number of occasions it seemed as if his alleged pro-Japanese sympathies would lead to his overthrow. In order to maintain himself against powerful opposition, Chiang has borrowed the methods of the Italian and German dictatorships. He established a secret terrorist organization, known as the Blue Shirts, as a direct agency of the government for the purpose of stifling anti-Japanese and left-wing agitation. He also instituted the so-called "New Life movement," which sought to revive the ancient Confucian virtues as a substitute for genuine economic reforms. At the time of his capture Chiang was chairman of the Executive Yuan and commander-in-chief of the army.

Chiang's marriage to the politically ambitious Soong Mei-ling nearly ten years ago established what is known as the Soong dynasty at Nanking. His wife's brother-in-law, H. H. Kung, Minister of Finance, has been acting head of the government during Chiang's detention. Kung is an American college graduate who would be wholly undistinguished if it had not been for his marriage to one of the Soong sisters. A brother, T. V. Soong, served with distinction as Minister of Finance for many years, but resigned his post two years ago, presumably because of disgust with Chiang's pro-Japanese policies. Another sister, Soong Ching-ling, Madame Sun Yat-sen, has been Chiang's most implacable foe. Despite the strong Chinese tradition of family loyalty, Madame Sun has repeatedly denounced Chiang for his betrayal of Sun-Yat-sen's political principles. Madame Sun's courageous statements have served as a sort of beacon for the left-wing opposition throughout the years of terrorism.

Outside his immediate family Chiang has had comparatively few lieutenants in whom he could place complete trust. His right-hand man in recent years has been his vice-minister of war, Chen Cheng (chen jung), who was captured with Chiang Kai-shek and is being held at Sian. General Chen has commanded Chiang's most trusted troops in several of his anti-Communist campaigns. If Chen should be executed along with his superior, the scepter would probably fall to General Ho Ying-chin, Minister of War, who formerly served as Chiang's agent in North China as head of the Peiping Military Council. General Ho is the only one of the leaders now at Nanking who is considered capable of occupying Chiang's post. His success would be endangered, however, by the fact that he has no personal army on which he can depend.

North China is under the control of General Sung Cheh-yuan, chairman of the Hopei-Chahar Political Council. Although Sung first distinguished himself by his resistance to the Japanese in Chahar in 1933, his present position calls for humiliating subservience to Japan.

THE LEFT

Almost every Chinese military leader has at one time or another opposed the dictatorship of Chiang Kai-shek, but only a few claim credit for more or less consistent opposition on grounds of principle. Perhaps the best known of this group is Tsai Ting-kai, who commanded the Nineteenth Route Army against the Japanese at Shanghai in 1932. General Tsai headed a revolt against Nanking early in 1934 and was badly beaten. He reappeared, however, this past summer with an important command in the southern province of Kwangsi, and obtained wide publicity because of his refusal to permit Japanese naval authorities to make a first-hand investigation of the murder of a local Japanese shopkeeper. In taking this stand Tsai appears to have had the full backing of the two Kwangsi military leaders Li Tsung-jen (lee tsoong ren) and Pai Chung-hsi (bai choong shee). Li and Pai were leaders of the left Kuomintang in the early days of the Nationalist movement. Driven out of important posts in the north by Chiang Kai-shek, they retired to remote Kwangsi, where they have earned an excellent reputation as capable administrators. Last summer they staged a bloodless revolt against Chiang Kai-shek which ended in Chiang's complete capitulation. Many observers expect one of these men, possibly Li, the head of the provincial government, to succeed Chiang Kai-shek if the anti-Nanking forces triumph in China. The civilian leadership of the anti-Japanese movement has functioned through the National Liberation movement. Seven of the leaders of this group, including Shen Chung-ju, president of the Shanghai bar association, were recently arrested by Chiang.

Most uncompromising of the anti-Japanese elements have been the Communists. Although little has been reported in the American press regarding the movement of the Chinese red armies, it is known that the principal units are operating in the far western provinces of Kansu and Shensi. Smaller units may be found in at least twelve of the eighteen provinces of China. Mao Tse-tung (mow tzeh doong) is President of the Chinese Soviet Republic and Chu Teh (joo duh) is the military leader.

THE CENTER

In case of Chiang Kai-shek's death the immediate future of China would depend largely on the position taken by four old-line militarists whose actions have consistently proved unpredictable. All have fought Chiang in the past, and all have professed complete loyalty to the Nanking regime. Best known in this country is Feng Yu-hsiang (fung U shahng), the so-called "Christian General," although his Christianity like many of his other hobbies has long since been forgotten. Despite a long record of intransigence, General Feng is now vice-chairman of the National Military Affairs Commission at Nanking, of which Chiang Kai-shek is chairman. He has always been more or less openly anti-Japanese, and in 1933 staged a show of resistance against the Japanese occupation of Chahar (Inner Mongolia). On May 9 of this year, despite his position at Nanking, he issued a statement calling for a strengthening of the anti-Japanese movement, an alliance with the Soviet Union, and a cessation of all activities against the Communists. Although Feng probably has more prestige than any other potential leader of the anti-Japanese forces, he is notoriously unstable in temperament and has the reputation of never finishing the tasks which he undertakes.

Associated with Feng in his bitter struggle against Chiang Kai-shek in 1930 was the veteran Shansi war lord, Yen Hsi-shan. During the past year Yen has co-operated with Chiang in the latter's campaign against the Chinese red army, but is not openly pro-Japanese. Somewhat over a year ago he refused the chairmanship of the five-province state which the Japanese have been trying to create in North China. Like Feng, he is notoriously unreliable but can be counted on to turn up ultimately on the popular side of every issue.

General Han Fu-chu, military governor of Shantung and a former subordinate of Feng Yu-hsiang's, has never played an important national role. His position in Shantung, however, is of great strategic importance. Both the Japanese and Chiang Kai-shek have long had their eyes on this province, but both have been extremely respectful of Han's formidable military machine.

The central figure in the dramatic events of the past two weeks, Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang (jahng shweh liahng), is perhaps the greatest enigma of all. The "Young Marshal" has never been notably progressive in his political ideas, although he is thoroughly modern in many of his tastes and habits. A good tennis player, he was a familiar figure in the smart clubs of the concessions in the days when his foster-father, Chang Tso-lin, was the undisputed master of Manchuria and North China. After the elder Chang had been murdered by the Japanese, he succeeded to power by the simple device of killing his chief rival. Although disinclined to compromise with the Japanese as had his notorious father, he yielded his vast Manchurian empire without serious resistance. His bitterness toward the Japanese is undoubtedly sincere. His new-found sympathy with the Communists is somewhat more questionable, though it is likely that the Communists have made many converts among his subordinates. At the same time some of his aides are known to be in league with former Premier Wang Ching-wei, a former left Kuomintang leader who sold out completely to the Japanese. Wang, significantly enough, has been living in Berlin since his retirement a year ago.

Events move slowly in China, but they move irresistibly. For more than a year anti-Japanese feeling has been mounting in all parts of the country. Chiang Kai-shek has kept it within bounds, partly by terrorism, and partly by appearing to take a somewhat firmer stand against the invader. With his hand removed, we can be reasonably certain that no leader can attain prominence who is not aggressively anti-Japanese. It is possible that no one person can replace Chiang, in which case common hatred of the invader may force the creation of a truly national government representing all factions. With the existing factional differences, such a government could not be permanent, but it could present a formidable obstacle to Japan's continental aspirations.

A Solution for Palestine

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, November 11

TO THE economic difficulties of settling millions of Jews in Palestine must be added conflicting political ambitions and racial and religious differences. The most striking political factor is the rise of Arab nationalism in Palestine. From a mass of half-civilized, restless tribes with no common aim or interest, a self-conscious national entity has developed. The World War, contact with Western imperialism, and most of all the presence of the Jews have brought about this change. In the cities and towns, among the Arab intelligentsia and particularly among the youth, a deep-rooted hatred of all imperialisms now exists. The recent events in Palestine, repeated in essence in Egypt and in Syria, must be viewed as part of a movement sweeping across the Arab world. No foreign power financed the six-month Syrian strike; religion played an insignificant part, and Christians fought side by side with Moslems. The sufferings caused by the strike were borne almost cheerfully. In the strike at Jerusalem, Arab merchants scribbled on their bolted doors: "To Let. Apply at the High Commissioner's." The villagers expressed their defiance in numerous folk songs.

Palestine is still seething, and another strike may break out at any moment. The Arabs are beginning to direct the nationalist flood into constructive channels. They are organizing small industries to shake off their economic bondage to Europe; they are carrying on a fierce boycott campaign against the Jews. The manager of the largest clothing store in Jerusalem told me a few days ago that he had lost more than half of his business. Other Jewish shopkeepers say the same thing. Even more important is the almost complete cessation of the sale of land. No Arab feudal lord dares now to sell a single dunam of land; the peasants never have sold. "The land to those who work it," is the slogan in the villages. "Only thus can selling of land to Jews be prevented."

But the Zionists have not merely to confront the opposition among the Arabs of Palestine. The movement for a united Arabia is gaining momentum. Though conquered and ruled, often tyrannically, by the Turks, Arabia has always been potentially united. The fact that the Turkish Sultan was also, as Caliph, the religious head of Islam took off the edge of the subservience. The Turks tried to give their conquest a façade of pan-Islamism, which often had a semblance of reality. During the World War the Arabs were won over to revolt against Turkey and to give military aid to the Allies by a promise of a pan-Arab kingdom; British airplanes dropped proclamations full of handsome promises. But the Versailles conference set them all at naught. Instead of helping in the unification of a free Arabia, France and England marked out zones of influence, mandates were set up, and Arab states without any real independence were created. To make unity still more difficult, encouragement was given to feudal vested interests and to racial and religious minorities.

Though starving and exhausted from the war, the Arabs resisted imperialist spoliation. The history of Arabistan has become a succession of appeals to the League, of riots, strikes, and wars. The impediments to unity laid down by the imperialist powers have been swept away one by one. The minorities of Syria, Iraq, and Egypt are more and more identifying themselves with the Arab majority, and the power of feudal lords and princelings created by the war has rapidly declined. Without the support of British guns, the Emir of Trans-Jordan, whose function is to prevent the union of his country with Iraq, would not last a day.

Arabia is a unity however it is regarded. The same language is spoken, the same newspapers circulate, the same books are read. Modern transportation has helped to unify the far-flung lands. "Before the war," the Egyptian consul in Jerusalem once told me, "we Egyptians had the vaguest notion about Damascus. Today our airplanes go there, we read their papers. That has made a great difference." Economically also the lands belong together, and the rising bourgeois class knows it.

During the recent disturbances in Palestine tens of thousands of dollars poured in from all over Arabia in aid of the Palestine Arabs. Money was collected in Hedjaz and Afghanistan. Demonstrations were staged in Syria and Lebanon. In Iraq the windows of the British residency were broken. Protest meetings were organized in Damascus by the nationalist youth, and the Trans-Jordan youth became so outspoken in their protests that the Emir had to close their clubs and prohibit their uniforms. In spite of the misery which cessation of trade with Palestine brought about, the youth, in support of their striking brothers, destroyed and burned hundreds of trucks laden with vegetables. Young men from all over Arabia joined the rebels in the mountains. The two insurgent military leaders were Syrians.

The deepening of the Arab anti-imperialist struggle and the awakening of the masses constitute the greatest danger to Zionism. Ironically enough, although claiming to be a "movement of liberation" for the native Arab population, Zionism is increasingly forced to play a reactionary role. The Hebrew press tells the imperialist powers to "rule with blood and iron." Weizmann, leader of the Zionist movement, has openly said that the Zionists are "opposed to anything which might lower the prestige of Western powers in the Arab world." The Arabs strongly suspected that Weizmann's interviews with the head of the French government were designed to influence him against granting independence to Syria.

Even the Socialist Zionists do not welcome the increasing power of Arab labor. The strike wave now engulfing Syria is treated with contempt by Davar, organ of the Jewish Federation of Labor. The Histadruth has not been noticeably active in behalf of the Arab workers in Palestine. For many years it has tolerated black Arab labor in the quarries of the Nesher cement works, though not a single Arab is to be found in the factory. These workers, who receive miserable pittance, have struck repeatedly, but the Histadruth has never come to their aid. Every time the Histadruth helped to organize Arab workers it was to "conquer" a place for Jewish workers. At a Histadruth conference Yari openly said: "Organizing Arab workers together with Jewish does not come in place of Zionism, but to strengthen Zionism, immigration, and settlement." For the same reason Zionism has fought and defeated almost every law designed to protect the poor Arab peasant. Realizing that a contented farming population would never sell land, the Zionists have opposed government loans to the fellaheen and have united with the feudal lords in opposition to any law which might decrease the lord's rights over his tenants.

Instead of trying to conciliate the Arabs, the Zionists have relied on England. The Jewish Agency has never desired an agreement with the Arabs. Men who have advocated such an agreement have been called "traitors," and one, De Haan, was murdered in the streets of Jerusalem. The most important Hebrew newspaper, Haaretz, said editorially a few weeks ago: "It is a fact which the British government knows perfectly well that the Jews have had more than one opportunity to come to terms with the Arabs, had they been willing to accept the conditions of cooperating with the Arabs of Palestine and those outside against Britain. This condition the Jews rejected. They never made a treaty behind the back of England." Some of the most eminent Jews in Palestine have assured me that an understanding with the Arabs is not impossible. But these men have no influence with the Jewish Agency.

Not only have the majority of Zionists not wanted to come to terms with the Arabs, but they have not even tried to find out what goes on in the Arab camp. As I write these lines I have before me literally pounds of Zionist propaganda, and in all the dozens of pamphlets and books I have failed to find one paragraph on the Arabs. Jabotinsky, the leader of the extreme right-wing Zionists, recently wrote: "My attitude toward the Arabs is similar to my attitude toward any other nation: polite indifference [his italics]."

Zionists in general have adopted an attitude of polite indifference toward the Arabs because they realize the strategic importance of Palestine and Britain's need of a loyal group there. Britain has had to get out of Iraq; British power in Egypt is waning; France is being ousted from Syria. The Hebrew press constantly points out that the same thing would happen in an Arab Palestine. Only a Jewish Palestine can defend the route to India. Davar published a translation of an article in the English weekly Palestine which said: "We are advocating here complete realization of the promise of a national home, not only in justice to the Jews but in the interest of the ideas which Britain represents. . . . Without Jews Palestine is only a part of Syria. . . . Had there been no Zionism in the world, British politics would have had to invent it for military needs alone." Similar articles and editorials have appeared a number of times in Davar and in Doar Hayom, another Hebrew paper in Jerusalem, and in Haboker, a Hebrew daily in Tel Aviv. Haboker said: "Now as ever the Zionist movement and the Jewish community in Palestine remain loyal to Great Britain. If many English statesmen do not appreciate the common interests between the empire and us, we do."

But England understands—only too well. And realizing the importance of Palestine, Britain is determined to assure its own future here. For that purpose neither a Jewish Palestine nor an Arab Palestine would be as useful as a divided country, where Britain could keep a permanent balance of power.

Britain's policy during the last eighteen years has not been such as to encourage Zionist hopes. State land which could have been made available for Jewish settlement has been apportioned to rich feudal families. The Jews have been burdened with taxation for the benefit of the Arabs. The government has done practically nothing to encourage and protect infant industries. A jingle very popular with the army here expresses perfectly the government's policy:

Arab! Don't shoot me
Shoot the man behind the tree.
He is a treacherous Jew
I am Englishman true.
Arab! Don't shoot me,
Shoot the man behind the tree.

What, then, is the solution? Certainly there will be no peace in Palestine as long as the Zionists cling to their dream of establishing here a Jewish state. The Arabs will never consent willingly to becoming a minority in such a state. Even were the Jews to achieve a majority in Palestine, the economic and political factors would prevent peace. At best, the Arabs will remain a large minority in a Palestine surrounded by a huge Arab area.

It is said that eight million Jews will eventually be forced to leave Europe. But Palestine offers no haven for all these millions. Even if all political barriers were removed, the country could not possibly sustain such a large population. In my first article I indicated how costly it has been to settle in Palestine the 200,000 Jews who have come since the war. Palestine has been a luxury. It is a beautiful country and the Jews have done wonders here. Not only have they breathed the spirit of life into the desert, but they have reconstructed the ancient Hebrew culture in modern terms. A Hebrew literature has been created and fine poems are being written. The youth, too, is something to be proud of. But fine as these things are, they do not solve the urgent problems of millions suffering in a dozen countries. These people need bread and peace. Perhaps Biro-Bidjan, or Kenya, or some unoccupied parts of South America can constitute a refuge for the millions who the Zionists claim must quit Europe. But let the Jews not fool themselves into believing Palestine to be that refuge.

Palestine is the Holy Land, in which the whole world has a stake. It is a land dear to tens of millions of Christians, Jews, and Moslems. To the Moslem Palestine is second in holiness only to Mecca. And the endless stream of Christian tourists from all parts of the world is evidence of the lively Christian interest in this land. But Jewish devotion to Palestine has been greater than either of these. Zionism is the eloquent expression of this devotion, and neither persecution nor martyrdom could keep the Jews away. Never during the 1,866 years which have elapsed since the destruction of the Jewish state has Palestine been without a Jewish community. Though they were few in number, these Jews considered themselves trustees for their whole race and were called "remainder of the community." There is something tragic in the longing of the Jews for the Holy Land. The Jewish exiles to Babylon sang as they sat under a fig tree, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may I forget my right arm, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth," and this terrible oath has been repeated by Jews every day ever since. The Talmud is full of Jewish love for this land: "He who has not tasted the bread of Palestine does not know how bread tastes"; "The air of Eretz Israel maketh wise."

Any just and workable solution of the problem of Palestine must recognize the peculiar character of this small land. But the Zionists are no more disposed to consider the nature of Palestine than are the Arabs. Although they continually stress the "historical connection between the people of Israel and the land of Israel," they do not admit that, by the same token, not only Jews but Christians and Moslems have ancient and inalienable rights. The Zionists want a Jewish state in which the Arabs, the indigenous population, will live as a minority. But if a national state is to be founded here, I believe the Arabs have the most right to it. They have been living here for the last 1,200 years.

However, I am strongly of the opinion that Palestine is not the place for a national state, whether Jew or Arab. Not only the inhabitants but the world outside have interests here. The European Christian community, though more or less passive in the present Jew-Arab struggle, would strenuously oppose either a Jewish or an Arab government. If the Zionists could realize that Palestine is no place for nationalism, the most objectionable feature of the movement would disappear. Boycott of Arab labor is necessary if the Jews are to become the majority, but it loses its raison d'être with a change in the political goal. Instead of trying to crush the Arab peasantry, a Zionism without national aspirations would help them. There is no inherent antagonism between the two peoples. The conflict today is not racial or religious but political and economic. I have no doubt that the two peoples could learn to get on perfectly with each other. But because of the political antagonism today only 25

Arab children attend Jewish schools, and only 741 Jewish children attend the government schools, where the language of instruction is Arabic. Without the political antagonism the two peoples could learn both languages, and the way for understanding would be opened.

Suggestions calculated to straighten out the present tangle have been made by Dr. Judah L. Magnes, chancellor of the Hebrew University, by the Orientalist, Nevel Barbour, and by other eminent men. First, since Palestine is no place for the usual kind of national state, some form of international control should be instituted. Possibly government by a commission directly responsible to the League of Nations would be best, or administration might be intrusted to a single nation, preferably one without direct political interests in the Near East. The inhabitants could express their wishes through a democratically elected advisory council, with advisory power only. Administration of village and municipal affairs should be left to the inhabitants. The inhabitants might object to the denial of responsible government, but admitting the principle on which these suggestions are based—namely, that not one race or nation but the whole world is concerned with Palestine—this should not be an insurmountable barrier.

Second, the Holy Land should be strictly neutralized. No nation should use it as a military or naval base. Last autumn, when war threatened between England and Italy, Dr. Magnes wrote in the Manchester Guardian: "Palestine would be better engaged in thinking over proposals like that of Mr. Lansbury, that Jerusalem try to become the voice and conscience of the world's religion, than be engaged upon warlike operations, however necessary they may seem to some of the great powers. . . . Palestine should therefore be neutralized by the League of Nations, together with the non-League powers. It would be an indication of unselfishness and of real devotion to the cause of peace if Great Britain, the mandatory power, were to make such a proposal." Both Zionists and British imperialists scornfully attacked this suggestion.

Third, the principle that no group or community should dominate the others should be recognized legally. Not the laws of the land nor the culture nor the social institutions should depend on the numerical strength of any one group. Immigration should be regulated not by political considerations, as it is today, but by the capacity of the country to absorb it. Experts believe that if immigration were permitted to flow naturally, the result would be a permanent population of about three millions, of whom from 45 to 50 per cent would be Jews.

The Zionists would no doubt consider these suggestions foreign to the spirit of the Balfour Declaration and the mandate. The Arabs might also reject them. But many persons believe that only such a system can bring peace to this disturbed country. If the chauvinist ambitions of Jews and Arabs are not checked, more blood will flow, and Palestine will be in the future what it has been in the past, the battleground of nations.

[Mr. Vinton's first article appeared last week. Next week Philip S. Bernstein will discuss the Zionist position.]

A Body Blow for Tammany

BY WILLIAM D. PATTERSON

THANKS to the outpouring of the electorate evoked by the Roosevelt landslide, the nation's largest city was voted a new charter and a system of proportional representation despite the united opposition of the entrenched political forces in the city.

The Democratic bosses and their henchmen in the districts have good cause to be glum. The new charter and "P. R." are body blows for Tammany Hall. These innovations reduce patronage, eliminate jobs, make "favors" more perilous to dispense, make the shakedown of city employees for political contributions more difficult, and strike at the very foundation of Tammany's political hegemony—the geographical division of the city into aldermanic districts, islets of political power ruled with an iron hand from the clubhouses.

The most grievous injury inflicted by the LaGuardia-sponsored charter is probably the creation of a Council of approximately twenty-seven members to take the place of the Board of Aldermen with its sixty-five members. Among the most valuable sheep in Tammany's flock are the sixty-two Democratic aldermen of the existing board. That thirty-five desirable $5,000-a-year jobs and thirty-five faithful members of the party should be thrown into the discard hurts bitterly.

But the charter, which will go into effect January 1, 1938, does not rest there. In another section it provides that "no councilman or other officer or employee of the city shall pay or promise to pay any political assessment, subscription, or contribution under the penalty of forfeiting his office or employment, and shall on conviction be punished for a misdemeanor." That kills the goose that laid the golden eggs for Tammany Hall. Of course elected officials such as the mayor, councilmen, and borough presidents, and appointive officials such as commissioners and clerks, all of whom are at the mercy of the organization, will continue to contribute willy-nilly, but the provision should interfere materially with the flow of thousands of dollars annually into Tammany's coffers from the underpaid civil-service employees.

The Seabury and Todd investigations into New York courts and municipal government were repeatedly checked by a plea of immunity when public officials were being questioned. Avenues of vital inquiry and evidence were blocked by the refusal of the witness to testify on the ground he might incriminate himself. Officials declined to sign waivers of immunity. One section in the new charter states that any officer of the city administration, when so requested, must sign a waiver of immunity and testify before any properly authorized agency of investigation. The penalty for non-compliance is deprivation of office and of the right to be elected to any other public office.

Finally, carefully woven into the texture of the charter are provisions that eliminate overlapping functions and bureaus and by this very fact do away with many jobs.

For proportional representation the Democratic bosses have an even more bitter distaste. Their first objection almost arouses sympathy. As has been said, the charter substitutes a council of twenty-seven members for a board of sixty-five aldermen. On top of that, the mathematics of minority representation through proportional voting so work out that, on the basis of the division of the vote in the 1933 election for mayor, Tammany will be fortunate to elect sixteen of the twenty-seven members of the new Council. The net loss to the Hall is forty-six aldermanic posts. There are now three Republican aldermen on the existing board. Under P. R. eleven of the twenty-seven councilmen will be Republican. Although they cast only about 57 per cent of the mayoralty vote in 1933, the Democrats elected 85 per cent of the Board of Aldermen. Under proportional representation they would have elected only 59 per cent.

The by-product of this enforced loss of patronage is even sadder. The majority of the Democrats on the Board of Aldermen is today so overwhelming that the opposition is powerless. Indeed, the few independent-minded Democratic aldermen seldom trouble to vote in opposition because their votes cannot change the result and they merely incur the wrath of the leaders. But with the balance of power in the new Council likely to be held by three councilmen, votes have an impressive weight. Public pressure will more easily be brought to bear on the new Council, and there will not be the curtain of a sprawling majority to hide behind. In the existing board it is almost too simple to obtain the two-thirds' vote necessary to overrule Mayor LaGuardia's veto. Under P. R. not only will the thinned ranks of the Democrats have to be held in line, but it will be necessary to switch two Republican votes. For once a minority mayor will have some protection in the city's legislative body.

Tammany Hall is chiefly interested in controlling the municipal government. The political complexion of the state and nation is a relatively minor concern. The political machine with which it has dominated New York City for so many years is founded on the district clubhouse, and the glory and idol of the clubhouse is that incomparable stooge of the party leaders, the alderman. The alderman's political strength lies in his natural talent for good fellowship, his unhesitating willingness to take orders, his ability to do small favors, and the fact that he is part and parcel, blood and bone, of the neighborhood inclosed in his district. He is the common denominator of his district, no better and no worse. The party leaders permit him to be elected because he takes orders without questioning. He is an asset to the machine by reason of the votes he draws from the people whose parking tickets he has fixed, for whom he has obtained relief, whom he has placed in a small city job, for whom he has persuaded the Mayor to do some trifling favor. No issues are raised in his election. It is solely a question of his personal popularity.

P. R. changes all that. The councilman will be a borough officer. His votes will have to come from every corner of the borough. As a result, Tammany rule, based on the strict geographical division of the city into tightly controlled districts, will suffer a severe set-back.

Clearly, Tammany Hall does not intend to accept the situation established by the charter and P. R. as permanent. What are the leaders planning to do? Their first step will be to try to defeat LaGuardia next fall. Then the city administration will be in their hands when the charter goes into effect on January 1, 1938. Many of the provisions in the charter may be simply ignored. With the municipal machinery established by the document under its control, Tammany will again be able to do business at the same old stand in the same old way.

Legal attacks on the sections of the charter that Tammany does not like will follow. Instituted by Tammany-controlled taxpayers, the actions will be contested by the Tammany-controlled corporation counsel, and will be ruled on by Tammany-controlled judges. There should be no doubt of the outcome. While the entire charter can be upset only by a referendum, vital sections of it can be held illegal by the courts. The clauses compelling waivers of immunity from public officials and prohibiting contributions by city employees will be weeded out. Should Tammany still find the charter an uncomfortable garment to wear, it would hardly hesitate to have the whole thing thrown overboard by a special referendum.

Should these legal attacks fail, it has been decided to try to sabotage P. R. The substantial expense of holding an election under this system, variously estimated at from $400,000 to $800,000, will be steadily criticized by Democrats in the present administration. Then the ballot will be overloaded. In Manhattan alone the Democratic strategists plan to nominate at least fifty candidates. With possibly twenty-five Republican and independent candidates, a confusing ballot will be presented to the electorate. Seventy-five candidates for seven offices! The time consumed in voting a proportional ballot as the voters search the long list of candidates for their first, second, third, fourth, and so on choice will surely result in disfranchising many voters, simply because there will not be time enough for everyone to vote before the polls close. Adding to this irritation, which will be given voice by pro-Tammany papers and Tammany public officials, will come resentment over the long time required to count the votes. Officials of the election board have privately estimated that it may take two weeks or more.

If the Tammany bosses are successful in creating a smoke screen of public indignation by these tactics, they will undoubtedly move for a special referendum on P. R. early in 1938 and defeat it with the clubhouse vote. Let the public beware!

Land for Mexico's Peons

BY L. O. PRENDERGAST

Mexico City, December 12

THE essential dependence of Mexico on the United States has been given fresh and striking illustration by the effect of the Roosevelt landslide on Mexico's internal affairs. It is by now common knowledge here that a Landon victory was to have been the signal for an almost immediate military revolt against the Cárdenas government that would have had the backing of landowners, industrialists, Callistas, the church, and the traditional interventionist groups in the United States, who were counting on a Republican Administration to reverse the Roosevelt policy of "hands off Mexico." The defeat of Wall Street and the Liberty League was equally a defeat for their Mexican satellites and imitators.

It is to the credit of the Mexican government that, though perfectly aware of what was impending, it drove courageously ahead with its program of translating the promises of the revolution into something approaching reality. Two recent measures of President Cárdenas are indications that his progressive drive has by no means slowed down. One initiates vast reform in a rich agricultural region hitherto untouched by the Agrarian Code; the other is a sweeping law empowering the government to expropriate virtually any form of private property for reasons of public interest.

It has long been known that the agrarian legislation introduced by the revolution has not attained its avowed objective of solving Mexico's centuries-old land problem. Even where the laws have been to some extent applied, the paltry results have been wholly disproportionate to the years of blood and agony their adoption cost. Some regions have been substantially exempt from the Agrarian Code because the government was bullied or cozened into believing the landowners' cries that division of their swollen plantations for the benefit of the exploited peons would create chaos in the national economy.

The landowners' fears partly materialized in Yucatan, where the distribution of lands began two years ago in the same haphazard, planless fashion which had in the past brought the whole agrarian program into disrepute. President Cárdenas's determination to split up the Laguna cotton plantations without a repetition of former mistakes opens a new chapter in the agrarian revolution. He found his opportunity in the strike in the cotton fields carried out last summer by the landless laborers, who had at last learned the lesson of organization and affiliated themselves with the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers). The strike was settled after Cárdenas promised that on October 1 the Agrarian Code would be applied to the Laguna cotton belt. The distribution of lands is now practically complete, and the blow which the landowners had for years averted by clever propaganda and the systematic corruption of local and federal officials has at last fallen. Some 28,500 rural workers and their families have so far received a total of more than 600,000 acres of arable and pasture lands; 155 ejidos, or cooperative farming communities, have been organized by the National Bank of Ejidal Credit and more will be created as rapidly as possible.

Most important, for the first time the distribution of land and the organization of ejidos have been carried out on a large scale and in accordance with a general plan. Nearly all the agencies of the government are engaged in changing the system of land ownership in the Laguna from that of a few large haciendas employing thousands of laborers into a new order of interlocking cooperative farms; and they are coordinating their various services to establish the new economy of the region on a firm basis. Pure drinking water, public buildings, gardens, playgrounds, athletic fields, and schools are to be provided as quickly as possible after the ejidos are organized. Large credit facilities are being made available; 8,500,000 pesos have already been lent to the ejidos for seed, work animals, fertilizer, and so on. Tools and agricultural machinery to the value of 1,500,000 pesos have been distributed among them, and orders for additional mechanical equipment have been placed in Mexico and the United States. Technicians and agronomists from the Agrarian Department are stationed in the Laguna to instruct the peasants in modern agricultural methods. The irrigation system depending on artificial wells and the waters of the Nazas River, which was built by private capital, is being enlarged; work on a new dam to insure ample irrigation for the whole region begins in January.

As a further stimulus to the initiative of the ejidatarios, democratic controls are being instituted. Both men and women are organizing into leagues for their own defense. For the time being, the Ejidal Bank will carry the accounts and conduct the commercial operations of the ejidos, but its trusteeship will be subject to the approval of the peasant organizations, to the annual meetings of which it must render reports. The local judiciary has been dismissed, and new judges, as well as the administrative officers of each new ejidal village, are to be elected by the ejidatarios themselves.

This is the present plan. How well it will work, only actual experience can tell. There are dangers, of course. Among them is the possibility of sabotage by the big cotton growers, concerned less by the loss of part of their vast acreage than by the loss of exploitable workers, which will lead to labor shortage and higher wages in the cotton fields. Even more serious is the possibility that the government has bitten off more than it can chew. One wonders how long the national treasury will stand the strain put upon it by this and other costly undertakings of the present administration. But the Laguna experiment may fall considerably short of perfection and still be a daring and praiseworthy effort to deal with the agrarian problem in a realistic and thoroughgoing way.

Little space, unfortunately, is left for dealing with the Expropriation Law promulgated on November 25. The bill was introduced in Congress by the President himself, and in spite of the tremendous opposition which it met from chambers of commerce, employers' organizations, and leagues of property owners, was passed in substantially its original form. The law is based on constitutional provisions empowering the government to impose on private property those "modalities" which the public interest may dictate, including total expropriation with indemnification. After listing in its preliminary articles all the various forms of public emergency or need which may make imperative its application, the law subjects all forms of private property to the general exigencies of "public interest."

I suspect that the measure has been adopted more for political than other reasons. It is hardly likely that the government will attempt any immediate widespread application, and the effects of the law will probably be confined, at any rate for the present, to minor matters, such as expropriation of the agricultural machinery of some large hacienda being partitioned under the Agrarian Code. The fact that no protests have come from the foreign embassies suggests that assurances were given in advance that the rights of foreign capital would be respected.

Most of the attacks on the law were concentrated on the question of its constitutionality. The bill's defenders seem confident that there exists full constitutional sanction for its provisions; its opponents claim that the government's right to expropriate was intended by the framers of the constitution to apply only to landed property. The law denies to the person involved all judicial recourse against the expropriation and makes only the amount and terms of payment of the compensation subject to judicial review. Nevertheless, the amparo route—what we should roughly term an injunction—is still open to him, and the act will thus be tested whenever an amparo brings it before the Supreme Court.

Unlike the nine old men in Washington, the justices of Mexico's highest tribunal are almost unanimously in sympathy with the aims of the government. A test case now would certainly be decided in the government's favor. But this subservience of the court to the executive has grave dangers of another kind. It should not be forgotten that Ambassador Morrow brought the oil controversy between the United States and Mexico to an end in 1927 by inducing President Calles to have the Supreme Court declare the oil legislation unconstitutional. In the event that application of the present law should in the future affect American interests powerful enough to invoke diplomatic intervention, that precedent might be very useful. Such a solution would have the additional political virtue of saving the government's face with labor, which has given unconditional support to the new law.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Education or Politics

THE case of Glenn Frank, at this writing in danger of being ousted as president of the University of Wisconsin, is of nation-wide importance because what is involved is the political control of a great state university. The fact that the Governor who is responsible is a liberal and a progressive and bears the honored name of La Follette makes it the more important. When a progressive or a liberal in office undertakes to dominate automatically a given academic situation, it is the duty of liberals and progressives everywhere to join in the protests certain to arise. If liberals cannot live up to their standards when in office, then there is very little hope for the progressive movement in America.

Now I am well aware that some of the points made against Glenn Frank are valid. He is not of the scholarly type. Before his appointment his experience in university affairs was limited to a period as assistant to the president of Northwestern University, and that was nine years before he was chosen to be president of Wisconsin, at which time he was editor of the Century. It is true that his mind leans to compromise, more so than he himself realizes, I am sure, and that he dislikes to take unequivocal stands in academic or non-academic controversies. Hence it is impossible to characterize him either as a liberal or as a conservative. But these facts about Glenn Frank were all patent when he was appointed. He had then set forth his views in a series of editorials in the Century, and as perhaps the highest-paid lecturer in America his habit of balancing the arguments pro and con in every controversy was well known. It is true also that just because he is not a trained scholar his intercourse with the faculty has been limited; I think that he and his wife are frankly more interested in men and women of affairs and social distinction than in their own faculty. It is also undeniable that they made tactical social mistakes on going to Madison and that the community gained the impression that President Frank felt that for him the University of Wisconsin was to be only a stepping-stone to a higher sphere of activity.

All this must not obscure the fact that the university, as Mr. Frank points out, was ranked seventh in the country in graduate work when he became president, and is now ranked second. Nor should his known weaknesses lessen denunciation of the methods utilized to oust him. The ouster was sponsored in the office of Governor La Follette—that is admitted—and not with the Board of Regents. No effort was made to sound out the alumni or the faculty, and it was actually intended last spring, and again this winter, to fire President Frank at a secret meeting without really giving him a chance to know what the charges against him were or an opportunity to defend himself. These charges were not formulated until the meeting of December 6, and I do not think they would have been published then except for the public outcry against the secret, star-chamber method of railroading Mr. Frank out of office. Now at least we have the six charges on paper. If they can be proved, then the question of whether the time has come for the president's retirement can properly be faced. It certainly ought to be possible to establish once and for all whether he has mismanaged the university's finances, whether he has lost the confidence of his faculty, whether he is "without the primary qualities essential in the administrator of a university," and finally whether it is true that he has permitted the expenditure of too much public money upon himself and his household, in addition to his $18,000 salary and his allowance of $2,400 toward the expense of living in the large house willed to the university as a presidential residence.

Whatever the outcome, it will be a grave misfortune if the affair does not result in a determined effort to divorce this unfortunate university from political control. If that is not done, it will be impossible in the future to get a first-class man to occupy the presidency, and we shall have a repetition of what has been going on for years—the packing of the Board of Regents by men and women of the political faith of the Governor who happens to be in office, a practice no more justifiable when done by a La Follette than by a Kohler, or a John C. Spooner, or any kind of Republican Stalwart or Democratic partisan temporarily in office. As Mr. Frank has himself said, the issue now transcends his personality. It is simply whether or not a university, created and supported by the state, shall be under political control; whether or not a president duly chosen shall be subsequently ousted as a result of gubernatorial initiative. It will be a great blessing if as a result of this storm a system can be worked out by which teachers of all ranks may be allowed to have something to say in the government of the university whose reputation and progress rest primarily in their hands. There is no more crying need than this, as the disgusting situation in Yale in connection with the dropping of Professor Jerome Davis also shows. There must be faculty representation upon boards of trustees so that they shall have some control over the conditions under which they work, intellectual freedom, and security of tenure. Let us have a showdown in Wisconsin. Let us get a few of these things into the open. Besides doing full justice to President Frank, let us make impossible further political control of the university's affairs.

Down to the Sea in Haunted Ships

ONE of the difficulties of trade unionism is the fact that in many strikes it fails to gain public sympathy. Even when it has an opportunity to make its case clear, the sympathy of the public may not be of much practical benefit. If every reader of The Nation agreed not to buy a single steel rail until the industry was organized, such a boycott would help John L. Lewis very little. Of course, there are labor situations in which the consumer can help enormously in the winning of a strike. The Newspaper Guild, for instance, is fortunately situated in that reader response has such a vast effect upon daily papers and other publications.

One of the most important labor conflicts of recent years is now in progress along the waterfront, and the public has an opportunity to play its part. As a matter of fact, the striking sailors can do more than appeal to the sympathy of the public. They can appeal to its self-interest. Aside from twinges of conscience the housewife who goes through a picket line into a grocery store may not suffer very greatly. The canned goods she buys are just the same as they were before the strike was called. She runs the risk of remorse, which seems to me a not inconsiderable fact, but she is not in danger of losing life or limb.

The seamen's strike brings up an entirely different factor. A scab ship is certainly not a pleasant vessel on which to travel, and it is also likely to be highly unsafe. One can hardly expect great skill, courage, or devotion from strike-breakers on the sea or elsewhere. The man who sells out his own craft for pay is hardly the person upon whom one would like to rely in a time of crisis. Good working conditions on shipboard are of vital interest to the passenger. He pays for good service and he isn't going to get it if the crew is badly housed, badly fed, and overworked.

There has been much talk lately of slum clearance, and now some of the worst slums are to be found in the floating palaces of the Atlantic and Pacific. New construction has not meant better quarters for the crew. The tendency has been almost the reverse. The more luxurious the liner, the more valuable becomes every cubic foot within the hull of the vessel. And so owners intent on profit skimp the space of the crew more and more.

I suppose there is nothing like a luxury liner for the creation of class consciousness. Some years ago I was on a cruise, and by some coincidence or other I happened to get quite chummy with one of the bar stewards.

"I'm an anarchist," he said, "and I suppose I may shock your bourgeois notions about chivalry and a sailor's duty to go down with the ship."

"Go ahead and shock me," I answered. "I ought to be able to stand it, I'm supposed to be a newspaperman."

"Well," he explained, "if the Communists and the Socialists had any sense, which they haven't, they would work for subsidies for passenger boats, particularly the fancy ones. There's nothing like a liner to class-angle human life. That's where you get the strictest caste lines and the holy folk and the untouchables. The passenger always looks rich, whether he is or not. Naturally the crew don't like it. There he sits on the small of his back drinking beef tea while the sailor is scrubbing brasses. You know it's a rule of the sea that when there is nothing to do the officers have to invent something. So here's a fellow working hard at something perfectly useless and looking at a bunch of reclining passengers who are even more useless than that.

"And of course the sailor is likely to say to himself, 'Those are the passengers—the guys who speak up when anybody says anything about sharing the wealth. And whose answer always is, 'Oh no, we've got the wealth.'"

"Maybe sometime something happens to the ship, and then those same fat passengers are yelling around about sharing the lifeboats, and it is just possible that the crew might say, 'Oh no, we've got the lifeboats.'"

The anarchist bartender didn't shock me very much because I am familiar with the exaggeration of that school of thought. As a radical I naturally deplore the sentimentality of the anarchists, and yet underneath their romantic notions there sometimes runs a thread of truth. It is not a healthy thing for passengers to travel on a ship which flaunts the luxury of one class in the face of a group which is palpably underprivileged. I am referring, of course, to the health of the passengers. A ship requires teamwork of the closest kind, and this can be achieved only through the acceptance of trade-union principles.

The fight about control of the hiring halls is a vital and perfectly simple issue. If the owners may designate the same groups over and over again and leave the rest in the cold, no union can survive. It will be argued on the owners' side that the choice is made wholly on the basis of efficiency, but since this is a profit-making world one may be inclined to scoff a little at this explanation. So long as the employer has the power to disrupt organization by favoring one clique at the expense of another he is likely to avail himself of the privilege.

I've said that the maritime strike is an important one for the public. It is critical in labor history, for the principle of industrialism as against the craft set-up is now being tried out in the laboratory. If Ryan wins over Bridges, it will be a victory for the employers. It will encourage them to pursue the traditional tactics of fighting labor with labor. I'm a timid man about the ocean and its dangers, and when I go down to the sea in a ship I want to be the guest of a happy little family and not a visitor in a house both haunted and divided.

BOOKS and the ARTS

DISCIPLINE FOR GERMAN WRITERS

BY KLAUS MANN

RECENTLY Dr. Joseph Goebbels, German Minister of Propaganda, and Councilor of State Hanns Johst, German writer, president of the Poet's Academy, and friend of the Führer, let themselves be heard again on the subject of German literature. "Not another day will we tolerate having the nation read German authors who reveal an indifferent attitude or who show secret reserve toward the doctrine of National Socialism, or who live abroad. The end has come for these despicable writers; they shall no longer be permitted to poison German hearts. We, Goebbels and Johst, will attend personally to the disappearance of these writers from the sphere of public interest. We will do everything possible in order that the German public may read true and actual Nazi authors." Thus, or similarly, the German minister and the German poet spoke, and accompanied their speeches with many insulting thrusts against the indifferent or undecided writers of the Third Reich.

The representatives of Nazi literature—and consequently government officials and officially recognized writers like Johst—are enraged that the books of the emigrant German authors are preferred abroad to works produced in the Third Reich. I do not believe that the reasons for this attitude of the public outside Germany are predominantly political. Most people, in New York or in Zürich, in Paris or in Rio de Janeiro, simply find the works of Thomas Mann or Stefan Zweig, of Lion Feuchtwanger or Franz Werfel more interesting than books by Kolbenheyer, Ponten, or Johst—names which are quite unknown outside Germany. The international successes of émigré German authors, such as Vicki Baum or Emil Ludwig, are a constant cause of embitterment to authors still living in Germany. The Ministry of Propaganda has dumped German literary products on the international market at a price from 25 to 30 per cent less than the same books cost in Germany. But despite this practice, the sale of books which come from Germany continues at its former low figure abroad.

Moreover, in Germany itself the public favors and demands the books of those authors who are not completely coordinated. This demand can be effective of course only for "Aryan" and politically neutral writers, since the works of Jewish and left-wing authors are forbidden. Particularly striking is the popularity of an author like Hans Fallada, who formerly belonged to the moderate left and is today emphatically non-political. His success in Germany is to be explained in part by the circumstance that he is not a Nazi. A great moral prestige, particularly among German youth, is enjoyed by certain conservative authors who are known to be definitely nationalistic but not Nazi; to this group belong Wiechert, Hans Carossa, and Ricarda Huch. All these writers are much preferred to those of the avowed "coordinated" camp. A special attraction for the more exacting literary public is also exercised by those few writers who no longer live in Germany but whose works could until recently be published and read there. Thomas Mann is one of these. My father lives in Zürich, but his books appeared in Berlin until January, 1936. Although they were not allowed to be much advertised or discussed in the press, they were far more widely read than the works of most Nazi writers.

The irascibility and aggressiveness noted in those circles which bear the responsibility for Nazi culture may be understood when one considers that the Nazis themselves, during their rule, have not produced a single author who enjoys international or even great national fame. With regard to stage and screen the situation is no better. Within the last few years German films have suffered almost complete loss of their international appeal, and in German cities the theater is no longer an outstanding attraction. Doctor Goebbels himself is in despair. He complains and uses abusive language. He arranges prize competitions for young dramatists, but all to no avail; and the poor theater director of the Third Reich must have recourse to old farces or to the few classics in whose works no trace of "despicable" convictions is to be found.

It is now a question whether anything of Germany's cultural life will remain after Goebbels's latest decrees have been carried into effect. Will it still be possible to stage a play of Gerhart Hauptmann's? To be sure, the old and enervated author of "The Weavers," makes every conceivable effort to be on good terms with the present regime, but we all know that at the bottom of his heart he is far from being a Nazi. Therefore does he not also belong to that group which is to be exterminated and silenced? In any case Thomas Mann belongs to this group, and it is a fact that his latest book, the third volume of the Joseph series, cannot be sold in Germany.* And now must vanish those last journalistic retreats for the comparatively liberal spirit, those last oases in the desert of German "coordinated" culture—the feuilleton of the Frankfurter Zeitung and the literary review of the Neue Rundschau, which have been dull and reactionary but not, until recently, completely pro-Nazi.

A people which is soon to serve as food for cannon must first be dulled to the point of stupidity. The Ministry of Propaganda, together with the press, is doing everything in its power to hasten this process.

* Since I wrote this article Thomas Mann has been deprived of his citizenship by the German government, and now all his books are forbidden and confiscated in Germany.—K. M.

LUIGI PIRANDELLO

BY DELFINO CINELLI

THE last time I saw Pirandello—some three months ago—he was as vibrant as ever but perhaps somewhat more nervous than usual; perhaps his face was a trifle paler. He was not happy—not that he was ever what one might term gay, but usually his profound kindness and his simplicity spread around him a serenity which was now missing. Life had been cruel to him, but he would confess only that he was saddened by the fact that his works were so often misunderstood or not understood at all, despite the fact that he was striving with all his might to make his message plain to all.

He was bitterly hurt by the superficiality of those critics who, while admitting the originality of his thought and his gifts as a dramatist, branded his work as cerebral, cold, and abstruse. The accusation may have been due partly to his aloof treatment of the tragic element; he controls so effectively his emotional intensity that his detachment often takes on the grimacing mask of a clown. A greater offense was the common assertion that his plays are concerned with ideas and ideas only. This is an interesting delusion. Pirandellian heroes never discuss themselves. Their tragedies are obscure to themselves as well as to the audience, but they are composed of the primitive stuff of which life is made. The search for that obscure reality, the mystery of personality, the Hamletian doubt, is at the source of his work, not as idea but as the flesh and blood of his characters, as the main element of the tragedy of man. In fact, his great achievement, or rather—if one can use the word in connection with works of art—his discovery, was to reveal that since these metaphysical abstractions are at the root of life and therefore at the root of human emotions, they are also dramatic—in fact, the essence of human drama—and belong to the theater, provided of course one can give them concrete life.

This he undoubtedly has done more effectively than anyone else either before or after him. That is why he could assert, as he passionately did on the least provocation, that he had lived and suffered every word of his writing, every act of his characters. Of course he could not avoid the charge of obscurity, which is brought against any artist who goes a step beyond his readers; yet the deeper one delves into his work, the more difficult it becomes to explain how the charge could be so widely applied to so human and sensitive a writer.

A criticism which did not bother him much was that expressed by pedants to the effect that his form and language were often careless. It is evident that in striving to make his message living, elegance and purity of form became the last of his considerations. Had he chosen to present one of these pedants in a play, he would have assigned to him the appropriate idiom. But there was still another charge which had the power of stirring within him a deep resentment and perhaps some lingering doubt, the doubt which probably goes with all sincere creation:

his art was often said to be merely negative. "If to abate hypocrisies, commonplaces, and the obsolete obstacles to truth is to be negative, then my work is negative," he would burst out with his cold, incisive intensity.

Nevertheless he could not hide from himself the fact that, having posed more effectively and more concretely than anyone else the problem of the secret reality of human life, he had not solved it. Perhaps his answer was that the secret purpose of life lies even in the search for it, in the striving for supreme sincerity. He had still much to convey to us. He said so himself but a very short time ago. But he added: "What can be the use of talking to men in times of such materialism and hatred and strife? Men do not want to listen. . . ."

New Rhetoric for Old

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RHETORIC. By I. A. Richards.
Oxford University Press. $1.75.

TO READERS unfamiliar with Mr. Richards's earlier works these lectures are likely to seem fragmentary, limited in their preoccupations, and indefinite in their assumptions. Their purpose is to point the way toward "a persistent, systematic, detailed inquiry into how words work that will take the place of the discredited subject which goes by the name of Rhetoric." Mr. Richards is concerned with such specific matters as the definition of words, their interrelationships in the context, and the nature of metaphor. And both his tone and method are so polemical as to make the hasty reader believe that he is involved in nothing more serious than a grammarian's squabble. But this is because Mr. Richards was hardly able, within the limits of a few short papers, to do justice to the whole long career of thinking and experimentation that lies behind his present absorption with words. A few eloquent but undeveloped statements, a few ominous hints, and a few knotty quotations from Coleridge were probably all that reminded his Bryn Mawr listeners that behind his discussion of words lies a whole philosophy of rhetoric, and behind this in turn a whole philosophy of the universe.

What Mr. Richards failed to make perfectly clear in six lectures is even more impossible to make clear in a single review; and it will have to be enough to raise one or two points about the possible value and consequences of the inquiry that he has here undertaken. Accepting without trouble the intuition which Mr. Richards shares with Coleridge that the literary work may best be compared to a plant, of which words would be the "parts and germinations," we may ask whether it is really possible to construct a "discussible science" that will formulate, like any proper science, the exact laws of its genesis, growth, and fruition? Is it possible to raise our "implicit recognitions" into distinctions so explicit that they may be imparted to others, presumably by school teachers to their pupils? This is the most general question that the book forces to the mind, and Mr. Richards's answer is to match his quotations from Coleridge with others from Bacon and Hobbes to the effect that the end of knowledge is power.

But another way of discovering an answer is to consult Mr. Richards's own practice, where it will be noted that he is uniformly more engaged in showing us what rhetoric is not than what it is, where the approach is consistently negative. Much of the book is necessarily directed against various ancient and modern theories—the "proper usage" criterion for words, meaning as onomatopoeia, and the treatments of metaphor offered by Hulme, Breton, and Eastman. Here Mr. Richards is the brilliant and nearly always convincing dialectician. But let us look at some of the formulations set up against these exploded notions—the definition of words, for example: ". . . what a word means is the missing parts of the contexts from which it draws its delegated efficacy." The "context" is a cluster of recurrent events in the mind; the word is "delegated" to take over the duties of parts which can then be omitted from the recurrence. The only trouble with this definition is that neither the context nor the process of abridgment by which a part stands for a whole can be established; we come up against "the limits of knowledge." The same impasse is struck when we consider the interrelationships between words in a given literary context, what is here called their "interanimation." This excellent new term enables us to label a phenomenon but it does not unfold the principles of its operation. Similarly, after breaking down the metaphor into a "tenor" and a "vehicle," Mr. Richards is forced to admit that the relations between these two cooperating uses are limitless, that their interpenetration is of the integral and organic character of life itself. In his handling of each of these problems he actually gives the effect of proving just the opposite of his thesis. He convinces us rather that since every rhetorical unit has meaning only in relation to a particular context, and since every context is really a unique event, no single set of generalizations as to "how words work" can possibly be drawn up.

This is not to deny the value of his criticism, which will continue to be, on its strictly negative side, of extreme service to contemporary writing. It is only when he insinuates that scientific method can conjure up a new rhetoric on the ruins of the old that the dry wind of Alexandria seems to blow through his pages. It is only when his disciples write studies entitled "The Seven Types of Ambiguity" and then illustrate all seven types in their verse that the dangers of his method are revealed. In brief, it is only when he introduces the scientific criterion of "use" that his criticism becomes something different from the unique interpretation of a unique literary event. On its negative side, his criticism constitutes a warning not only to students of literature but to everyone who uses language for purposes of communication. In its emphasis on the organic nature of communication, on the relations of words to a whole, and on the relation of this whole to the whole of our mind and personality, it should prevent us from falling into those "springes and snares" that Donne warns about in detaching sentences from Scripture. Above all it should discourage us from even contemplating the possibility of a new Manual of Rhetoric.

The real contradiction in Mr. Richards's position, if one had time to examine it, would prove to be between a philosophy that is intuitive, contemplative, and organic and one that is experimental, pragmatic, and mechanical. As Coleridge put it, without necessary qualifications, it is the difference between Plato and Aristotle; and no more than Coleridge himself is Mr. Richards likely to effect the reconciliation. If he follows Coleridge in his interpretation of literature, he follows Bacon and Hobbes in deciding that something must be "done" with this interpretation; and these influences stand for opposite directions of the mind. It is this tension, however, that makes Mr. Richards one of the liveliest, most stimulating, and most rewarding of contemporary critics.

WILLIAM TROY

Purse of Empire

BACK TO MALAYA. By R. H. Bruce Lockhart. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

THIS time the British Agent travels under his own commission. Six years are a good many for an itching foot, even a canny Scotch foot, to be tied to a news desk, and Mr. Lockhart is in his late forties, an age when many men of less adventurous disposition decide that they must stop the grind and find, or recapture, their youth before arthritis makes the pursuit forever impossible. So, Mr. Lockhart tells us and tells himself, he got leave from his job with the Beaverbrook press to go to Malaya, the scene of an early romance and the home of gorgeous sunrises and virile builders of empire. But fortunately for the reader, Mr. Lockhart protests too much; he is not just another adolescent of forty; the nose for news developed during his service in Russia and Central Europe is too much for him, and his observations on the Malay possessions and Java make important reading at a time when it is not the star of Bethlehem rising in the east.

"Taken together," Mr. Lockhart says, "the Straits Settlements and the Malay States are, for their size, the richest of all Britain's overseas possessions"—and the most remunerative to British stockholders. Control of their tin, rubber, tobacco, and other products has been skilfully held against all comers. Steaming into Singapore after an absence of twenty-five years, Mr. Lockhart saw concrete testimony to the development, and protection, of imperial wealth—oil tanks on the hill, airplanes overhead, destroyers all around, ponderous fortifications at one end, and, in the city, modern office buildings. The perennial interest of the British in sports and the country around the Pantai village of his early romance were the only things unchanged. Routine administrators directed by absentee corporations in London had replaced the virile empire builders; in the hotels refrigerated foods were served from all parts of the world and cabaret entertainers from Austria and Russia beguiled the guests; the old dens of iniquity had been cleaned up. Chinese everywhere, outnumbering British and Malays two to one in many settlements. Few Japanese, but imports of Japanese goods and exports to Japan—through Japanese concessions—of iron and ilmenite, used in the production of titanium tetrachloride, guarantee to the Dutch that the British will not quarrel with them over their possessions in these waters. Amai, now married, had changed too, although less than most Malay women. Mr. Lockhart went on to Java with its 40,000,000 inhabitants. The problem noted here is one too long ignored in our own Hawaiian territories—a growing number of educated young people of mixed blood, eager to find work for which they are fitted but because of discrimination or industrial depression unable to find proper employment; only a few rise to minor administrative positions. In Java as in Malaya, Chinese in city and country; again, not many Japanese but cheap Japanese goods, which, the Dutch administrator said, they had been glad to allow during the depression because otherwise the natives could not have bought anything at all and might have risen.

If the British imperialist rises to the surface every so often in Mr. Lockhart's story, the trained observer corrects the bias as far as temperament will allow. The Dutch administrators, he admits, are better educated and more cultured than the British—although the horrors of Dutch conquest are remembered when the British are forgotten. There is some nostalgia for the good old times, a little veiled prejudice—note the story of the Chinese towkay who kept his feet on the desk during the author's call. Characteristically, he comes to no definite conclusions—empire is probably bad, but on the other hand . . . We have to thank him, however, for a colorful and readable presentation of facts that events are making more important every day, and he has written the first account of Bali I have read that makes the place more than a stage set for Mr. Grauman's Chinese theater.

Mr. Lockhart did not find his youth. Some men never know they have lost it; when they are mature enough to know that it is gone, it is—gone. And Mr. Lockhart is mature; he found many things to think about. The white man, Conrad's Malay said, "is stronger than the wild beasts, but not so wise. A black tiger knows when he is not hungry. You do not."

Sterile Love

MAIDEN CASTLE. By John Cowper Powys. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

NOBODY in a novel by Mr. Powys is ever as interesting as the author himself. Many remarkable things are happening, and a gallery of grotesques presses its walls perilously upon the reader as he passes; but at any moment he is likely to be thinking less of the actions and the characters than of the man who could have contrived them. That unhappy figure is always hugely in the way, pushing people around, straining them into appropriate attitudes, forcing their relationships, producing sound effects of wind and thunder to eke out their rather toneless voices, and gesticulating to the reader lest he miss some cosmic irony which is about to express itself. Nor is Mr. Powys anything but truly interesting. It is simply that his best book is still his "Autobiography," which is completely and frankly about himself.

He is perhaps no novelist at all. To me he tragically lacks the gift of being credible—tragically, because he has so many other gifts in the richest abundance. He has eloquence, imagination, and a unique vision of the universe. He has the kind of humor which comes from looking at things and people through prisms, so that the gray light for him breaks constantly into color. He has a feel for the world. And yet he cannot tell a story which I will believe. He is always getting ready to do so, he is forever maneuvering the battalions of his words toward some strategic point. He is a master of preparation, a potent suggester of mysteries to come. But the mysteries are fizzles, the events are overprepared. This seems to be because Mr. Powys lacks any sort of gumption about what is plausible. He spoils his suspense by having too much of it and by talking too much about it. He slows down his action almost to the stopping place by keeping too many actions simultaneously before our eyes. Where all is supposed to be wonderful, nothing can be genuinely so; where all is grotesque, nothing can be strange.

And this is not at all because Mr. Powys lacks vision. The world he is groaning to give us does exist. But it exists in his own mind, and he has never been able to get it out. It is art that he lacks—the art of projecting his soul into people unlike himself, people who know how to act as if they had never heard of John Cowper Powys. This may or may not be the penalty of his having waited too long to become a novelist. Doubtless there is something in the theory that a man's art should grow up along with him, taking body as he does, and hardening through the years into a universe as visible to us as to him—a universe, furthermore, the meaning of which is possibly less important than the delightful fact of its existence. In such a case the artist himself knows none too well what his stories mean; he merely knows that these people did these things because he saw them doing them, as we may also. It may or may not be true that Mr. Powys has brooded too long in British and American solitudes, building a philosophy inside himself which a belated art will never catch up with. At any rate, in "Maiden Castle" no less than in "Wolf Solent" and "The Glastonbury Romance" he has written a novel which ought to be more important than it is.

The scene as usual is the southwest of England, and as usual the people have preposterous names—Wizzie Ravels-ton, Teucer Wye, Thuella Wye, Enoch Quirm, Mr. Urgan, and so on. The hero, a lonely novelist of picturesque habits and inexpressible visions, is nameless; or rather he calls himself No-man, partly because he does not know who his father is and partly in the attempt to affirm his unique position as spectator of the vast universe's goings-on. And the theme is "sterile love," which No-man and Quirm set forth in numberless lengthy speeches as the driving force of existence. "Rampant desire unfulfilled—why," says Quirm, "there's nothing it can't do! Stir up sex till it would put out the sun and then keep it sterile! That's the trick." It is only through "hopeless desire" and "frustrated love" that we can "break through," they keep on howling while the wind whines in the chimneys and Maiden Castle outside the town hugs the ghosts of old Welsh gods to its moldy bosom. This ought to be interesting, but unfortunately it sounds like nonsense, and for the simple reason that No-man and Quirm never come into being. A similar notion in the "Autobiography" was interesting because we got it straight from Mr. Powys himself. Here in the mouths of dummies it is ghastly. It is Mr. Powys fumbling at the keyhole of nature, hopelessly desiring entrance.

MARK VAN DOREN

Two Thinkers for One

THE MIND AND ART OF JONATHAN SWIFT. By Ricardo Quintana. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

THE MAGIC PLANT. By Carl Grabo. University of North Carolina Press. $4.

SHELLEY and Swift do not occur readily to the mind as making one of those striking parallels that the history of literature occasionally affords. Shelley, the ineffectual angel, and Swift, the gloomy Dean, are in fact antitheses. Yet at the outset of the studies of these men that have just appeared we find a warning and a hint that our current judgments of these two are largely false. Mr. Quintana and Mr. Grabo, writing independently of each other, use almost identical words to gain our open-minded hearing: "No English writer of corresponding stature," says Mr. Quintana of Swift, "has been repudiated so persistently and so fiercely"; and he goes on to assert that the fierce repudiation has been due to misrepresentation. "Shelley," according to Mr. Grabo, "has never been wholly understood; has indeed, for the most part, been thoroughly misunderstood."

To be sure, many readers, unprejudiced by Samuel Johnson and Thackeray, have always been able to discover in Swift something else than a sour hatred of humanity backed up by a morbid fondness for scatology. The life and letters of the man furnished a clue to his rational idealism, his warm-hearted understanding of the goodness and weakness of men. But as late as D. H. Lawrence's preface to "Lady Chatterley's Lover," Swift's philosophy was misinterpreted as evasive puritanism, and the common estimate of his genius tended to class him as one of those minute but powerful critics, very much of their age, who speak to us by virtue of their clear enunciation rather than of any profound meaning. That "Gulliver's Travels" should have become a classic for children is a fair measure of the misinterpretation. Misguided foreigners, like Goethe, seemed to overvalue the satirist, and we preferred the "gentle" irony of Chaucer to the savage indignation of "A Modest Proposal" in the mistaken belief that Chaucer knew and loved mankind more truly than did Swift.

Mr. Quintana's scholarly study gives us grounds to change all that, but it may be questioned how soon the historians of literature and the general public will veer round. The ostensible subjects of Swift's truest expressions repel most moderns; his verse is appreciated by very few, for it looks like doggerel and most editions of it contain more expurgatory dashes than solid rhymes. Lastly, Swift's views on science are not flattering to our prejudices or even clearly ascertained. Mr. Quintana is still of opinion that Swift despised science and had a "negative philosophy of history," that is, a non-evolutionary one. It seems to me possible to hold that Swift was making a criticism of the claims of science as necessary in our day as it was at the beginnings of the Royal Society. But soon or late there will come a time when Swift's stature will be more accurately gauged in accordance with the facts. Misjudgments are largely due to conscious or unconscious suppression, and moreover our age seems well circumstanced to grasp the principle of Swift's thought, a principle that Chamfort gives somewhere as an aphorism: "Whoever is not a misanthrope at forty has never loved mankind."

Shelley did not live to be forty and can therefore be excused from the requirement of misanthropy. Certain it is that he loved mankind, knew it well, and labored for its present and future welfare. Mr. Grabo in his "Magic Plant" is as impatient for the recognition of these facts as Shelley was for the recognition of his reforming ideas, and it can be added that whereas Shelley failed, through no fault of his own, Mr. Grabo fully succeeds, through merits very much his own. His scholarship is ripe, conceals itself, and produces a narrative both intricate and clear, rich in topical allusions and historically sound. One by one the legends of Shelley's folly, of his unrealistic visions, muddled thinking, and personal irresponsibility are shattered by the evidence. Unlike Swift's, Shelley's subject matter and preoccupations are very near ours. If we once give up the anthology habit and read the poet entire, we shall be forced to admit that he was sensible and could think. Shaw had already found this out for himself, but few heeded him. It required special studies in Shelley's poetry and prose, of which Mr. Grabo is now giving us the fourth and all-inclusive one. Shelley, the specialist in west winds and glass domes, has definitely given place to the realist who could write the sonnet "England in 1819," and that substitution of biographical images is an important part of the general rehabilitation of romanticism visible in the rediscovery of Büchner and Beddoes and Pushkin.

Shorter Notices

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY AND HER TIMES. By Elizabeth Atkins. University of Chicago Press. $3.

It is Miss Atkins's purpose to blaze footpaths through the works and days of Edna St. Vincent Millay—the "unrivaled embodiment of sex appeal, the It-girl of the hour, the Miss America of 1920"—even though they open on blind alleys and bins of old lumber. The plan of her volume is accordingly a simple one: she has compiled a list of all the Elizabethans (it would appear) from Peele to Fletcher and appropriated for Miss Millay the pattern of their sundry virtues—a useful prerequisite, certainly, for one who wrote only one "bad line of blank verse in her life." As it happens, Shakespeare is the name most frequently coupled with that of the poet's, but it cannot be said that Miss Atkins has stinted with his contemporaries. Millay's alliteration, for example, is like Shakespeare's and Greene's; Sonnet VI of "Fatal Interview" is "like something out of Webster or Shakespeare"; Sonnet XXXIX suggests the "fresh homeliness of Peele"; and so on. It being also true that Miss Millay is "Elizabethan, Chaucerian, Anglo-Saxon, Vergilian, and Sapphic without being eclectic," the author pauses to apprehend, "like horns out of fairyland" or the "Cambridge History of English Literature," the voices of no less than twenty-six poets in concert, from Aeschylus to Rimbaud, palpitating between the pentameters of "Fatal Interview." Elsewhere we are invited to note the likeness of certain lyrics to "the line of a Beardsley drawing," the colors of Gauguin and Matisse, the sonatas of Beethoven, and the pantry of the housewife stocked with "halibut, herrings, mutton, oaten bread, cheese, baked oysters even." When it seems there has been no hyperbolic stone left unturned to intimate the author's good opinion of her heroine we are asked to deplore with her the fact that "Millay's poetry really needs a whole new system of prosody." Our regrets, however, are better bestowed elsewhere.

BEN BELITT

CANDLE INDOORS. By Helen Hull. Coward-McCann. $2.50

In this her tenth novel Miss Hull tells of the domestic tribulations of a successful and charming manufacturer of automobile accessories who does not begin to realize the responsibilities of parenthood until his wife is in her grave and his relatives and in-laws are pestering him about the rearing of his three children. As his youngsters develop from early adolescence to maturity, Arnold Carlton supposedly matures with them and changes from a what-they-don't-know-won't-hurt-them kind of good fellow into a father who is positively maternal in his selfless concern for his children's welfare. It is a good idea and would have made a good novel except for one important factor: although Miss Hull tells us a great deal about Arnold Carlton, she does not seem to know the kind of man she means him to be intimately enough to make him humanly convincing. His unreality is all the more striking because the lesser characters—the children, the professorial brother-in-law, the medical sister-in-law, the poetic son-in-law—are recognizable and real. If its main character were omitted, "Candle Indoors" would be another competent novel of middle-class family life. With him left in so prominently, however, its main effect is to emphasize once more how extremely difficult it is for even the most talented of women novelists to portray sympathetically any men except those who are so highly intellectual that, psychologically and essentially, they are no longer masculine.

GRACE ADAMS

DRAMA

Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant

LILLIAN HELLMAN, who wrote that powerful and disturbing play "The Children's Hour," has written another almost as powerful and almost as disturbing called "Days to Come" (Vanderbilt Theater). So far as their themes are concerned the plays have little in common, for the first was a study of a purely individual problem in abnormal psychology while the second centers around an industrial conflict and seems to point a definite Marxian moral—namely, that men are sundered from one another by a difference in class interests between which no personal good-will can adjudicate. But the interesting fact is that two plays, superficially so different, should be so obviously the product of the same temperament and the same talent. In each the mood, the atmosphere, the peculiar nature of the tension produced, all the intangibles in fact, are almost identical. There are the same unresolved discords, the same sultry hates, the same murderous impulses below the surface of decorous lives, the same hopeless struggle against an evil that no one dares name, the same quiet but burning intensity of utterance. And it is among such things as these that the common denominator of the two plays is to be sought. Miss Hellman is not a specialist in abnormal psychology and not a specialist in the Marxian interpretation of society. She is a specialist in hate and frustration, a student of helpless rage, an articulator of inarticulate loathings. Ibsen and also Chekhov have been mentioned in connection with her plays. Strindberg would be nearer, though perhaps still far enough from the mark.

"The Children's Hour" was successful and popular despite the almost universal agreement that it so nearly deserted its own subject in the last act as to leave one emotionally suspended and dubious. Curiously enough, the most serious defect of the present play is similar—one is not sure just where its center lies. Of the several stories the one which has the clearest outline is that of the weak but well-meaning owner of an unprofitable factory who allows himself to be persuaded into importing a group of strike-breakers—in actuality professional thugs—determined to settle his labor difficulties by methods he would never have dreamed of employing. Nor is there, in this particular story, anything obscure in regard either to what happens or to the "side" which Miss Hellman takes. The most doctrinaire exponent of the class conflict could hardly object to her picture of events or to the interpretation which she puts upon them. But there are several other stories concerned with the neurotic complications within the family of the factory owner, and one is never sure what the connection between the two is or where the emphasis is to be placed.

Faced with a somewhat similar problem in "Paradise Lost" Mr. Odets solved it formally if absurdly by assuming that the two things were directly related—that in a world economically disordered men naturally suffered from sexual impotence and women naturally got queer ideas. I do not think, however, that Miss Hellman is intending to expound quite so simple a doctrine, and if she is, then she certainly does not make the fact very clear. But I do not, on the other hand, know exactly what relation the two themes bear to each other, or exactly what are their relative positions in the play. Is it about a labor situation which developed under conditions one of the accidentals of which was the neurotic character of the capitalist family? Or is it, as seems to me almost equally probable, about a group of neurotic people who became involved in labor difficulties just as they became involved in various others? Nor is the question merely academic, for the result of our inability to feel an answer is that we are always more or less lost in the midst of the events that are being so powerfully presented. The two themes are given emphasis so nearly equal that we are never entirely clear which the play is really about. And I am not sure but that this is because Miss Hellman herself has not yet made clear contact with the sources of her own power. She is fascinated by her own hatred of something. The passion of that hatred gets itself partially expressed when she chooses a fiendish child as object or when she chooses a strike-breaking thug. But I am not sure that she yet knows what the motive power behind her creative ability really is. These are occasions for her rage. Are they really causes? I think that when I first reviewed "The Children's Hour" I made it clear that I had great respect for the play though I did not exactly enjoy it. Some such reservation I shall have to make again in connection with "Days to Come," despite the fact that it is very skilfully directed by Mr. Shumlin and very well acted indeed. Like the earlier play it produces and sustains an agonizing tension. It also leaves the nerves sore.

"You Can't Take It with You" (Booth Theater), by George Kaufman and Moss Hart, belongs as indisputably in the category of pleasant plays as Miss Hellman's does in the antithetical one. The idea is to exhibit the engaging follies of a family each member of which is wholly given over to his own hobbies but each of whom gets along in joyous confusion with the others because each is instinctively loyal to live-and-let-live principles. It is too bad that despite all the freshness of the details Mr. Kaufman and his collaborator should again be content with a plot outline as stale as one about two lovers who are almost separated because the conventional parents of the one cannot stomach the unconventional parents of the other (Mr. Kaufman ought not to be content to rewrite "Moon Over Mulberry Street," to go no farther back); but the farcical extravagances are so merry that one can and will forgive all that. Even more important perhaps is the fact that the whole thing is pervaded by a humanity, an amiability, and a gaiety wholly delightful. It will have a run and will, I hope, lead a lot of people to yield to their suppressed desire to keep snakes on the mantle-piece, play the xylophone, manufacture fireworks in the cellar, or do any of the other multifarious things the members of this happy family do with such whole-hearted enthusiasm.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THE wax that Columbia puts into the grooves of its records, and that has to be removed by the needle before the records can begin to sound properly, is intended to produce a quieter surface, which eventually it does. But I must question whether record buyers will consider the slight difference—for Victor surfaces are not exactly noisy—worth what it costs in spoiled reproduction during the first playings (and I have heard records betray the presence of the wax even after repeated playings). A person who buys the ordinary four- or five-record set must spend a few hours merely in getting it to the point where it begins to sound as it should. Is Columbia justified in asking this; is it wise? Is it willing that people get the idea of the quality of its recording that I know some to have got who did not spend the few hours, who, for instance, tried the records in a store? I ask these questions about the ordinary four- or five-record set; what shall I say about a set like that of Verdi's "Falstaff," with its fourteen records? And what shall I say as a reviewer who has the responsibility of reporting on the quality of the set, and has the wax to worry about on top of all the other things there are to worry about?

For there are other things. One hears a metallic edge in the violin tone in the Columbia recording of Haydn's Symphony No. 99 by the London Philharmonic under Beecham; and one has to play other records of violin tone to establish the fact that the distortion is in the recording, not in the reproduction; after which one adds that the symphony is one of Haydn's finest, the performance excellent, and the set indispensable in spite of its fault (three records, $5). Or one has to play other recent Columbia records by the Roth String Quartet in order to be sure that this set of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" Quartet is actually as inferior as it sounds (five records, $7). And one has to determine that the marked inferiority of certain sides is not due to variation in the needles, but to variation either in recording conditions or in the pressing.

To return now to "Falstaff" (fourteen records, $21), I have got enough of the wax out to be able to say that certain sides of my set give results that are flawed, but that on the whole the recording is very good, enabling one to hear clearly the subtlety, the delicious wit, the sheer loveliness of this miraculous score—for surely it is miraculous that the refinement of the art that produced "Rigoletto" and "Traviata" should have produced the Mozartian tracery of what is in fact the greatest operatic comedy after Mozart's "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni." The cast and performance are such—in their excellences and imperfections—as one hears in an opera house; which is not good enough for records.

If you insist on believing that Kreisler deserves his reputation, do not make the mistake of comparing his new Victor recording of the Beethoven Concerto (six records, $11) with Szigeti's on Columbia, as I did record for record, for you may have to admit that it is reduced to insignificance. The vitality that Kreisler lacks you will find in Wanda Landowska's superb performances of Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue, Partita in B flat, and six inconsequential little Preludes (four records, $8). Two other important Victor releases—the complete "Marriage of Figaro" and the album of Debussy's songs—I must postpone.

Letters to the Editors

The Spanish Anarchists

Dear Sirs: In the first paragraph of his personal impressions, Under Fire in Madrid, in The Nation of December 12 Louis Fischer found it necessary to report that "on November 16 the Anarchist column fled in front of a small Moorish force and allowed the rebels to enter the university suburb." The implication is obvious: the fleeing Anarchists were responsible for the first great success of the rebels during the siege of Madrid.

It is of course possible that Mr. Fischer saw a small detachment of Anarchist militiamen retreating before a surprise attack coming from the opposing side. But it is just as possible that he took his information from the editor of the Mundo Obrero, official Communist organ, who on August 4 wrote that "the Spanish people were fighting under the direction of the government in defense of their republic and of democracy against counter-revolutionary anarchism and fascism." (Quoted from the pamphlet "Spain Defends Democracy," page 18, issued officially by the Communist Party of the United States.)

The facts about the Spanish Anarchists are as follows:

1. For the last sixty years the Spanish Anarchists have been the romantic dare-devils of their country's labor movement. Whatever unorthodox thinking they may have been guilty of, the accusation of cowardice has never been brought against them.

2. The "Anarchist column" referred to by Mr. Fischer was the pick of the Barcelona Anarchists, who first fought for months on the Saragossa and Huesca fronts against the well-nigh impregnable entrenched insurgent army and then came to the rescue of Madrid. The leader of that column, Buenaventura Durruti, most famous of all contemporary Spanish Anarchists, was killed at the Madrid front in the university suburb two or three days after the "event" reported by Mr. Fischer. He is the same Durruti whom the New Masses of June 9 accused of working with the fascists.

3. Your correspondent's implication is contradicted in the same issue of The Nation by Louis F. Gittler (Barcelona: An Anarchist State), who reports that the young Anarchists of the F. A. I.

(Iberian Anarchist Federation) "unarmed, crashed through the cannon at strategic points."

We protest against Mr. Fischer's biased reporting as harmful to the workers' unity in this crucial moment for the freedom of Spain and the world.

The Church and Murder

Dear Sirs: May the privilege be mine of submitting an open letter to Lawrence A. Fernsworth in response to his letter to me, published in your issue of November 28:

My dear Fernsworth: By an amicable agreement your letter addressed to the Editor of America was published by The Nation. During the past few years, in several articles, you interpreted for us the complexities of the progress of the Republican government in Spain. This summer I was most eager to get in communication with you, and to request contributions on the current Spanish situation. I received your two letters, and was prepared to publish that on Sotelo, for it touched on a most important fact. Your second letter was three times too long for our use, and was, I felt, the sort of statement that you might later regret. It was that consideration which held back publication: the fact that you had just returned from witnessing harrowing, nauseating scenes, and that you were aroused by certain statements contained in some articles contributed to America by Jaime Castiello and John P. Delaney.

Have no further doubts about my attitude, or about the attitude of your church and mine, on murder. There is no double standard; murder, executions, atrocities committed by Franco's men and by Franco himself are to be condemned, utterly and absolutely. They are to be condemned the more, as you will agree, because Franco and his men, having greater knowledge and stricter professions in such matters, have therefore greater guilt. Our sole difference is on the facts: you grant only probability to the reported atrocities committed by the Loyalists; I have certainty that the Loyalists have been guilty of atrocities. While I grant only probability to the wholesale cruelties attributed to the insurgents, you assert with certainty that the insurgents have killed their "thousands upon thousands in cold blood." You have facts, I presume, to prove your charges; on that basis, I would cry out, and our church would cry out, in condemnation of murders and other crimes perpetrated by the insurgents. No, Mr. Fernsworth, we do not excuse nor do we condone the insurgent acts; neither do we excuse nor do we condone the acts of the Loyalists. There is only one standard: murder is murder no matter who commits it.

Misused Used Cars

Dear Sirs: My attention has been called to the recent article in your publication called The Misused Car Market [sic] in which you cast serious reflections on a very large and growing industry.

Not only this, but you make statements which are not in accordance with facts. When you state that the weld will eventually reopen and that the metal will not take a second weld, you indicate that you are not acquainted with engineering practice.

As a representative of one of the largest manufacturers of arc welding equipment in the world we resent such misstatements of facts and ask that you make a retraction and correction in your next issue.

A. F. DAVIS, Vice-President,
The Lincoln Electric Company
New York, December 14

[An article entitled The Used-Car Racket, by Elliott Arnold, appeared in The Nation for September 19.]

Dear Sirs: I have no doubt that given enough time and cash the master minds of the welding industry can perform all sorts of miracles. Almost anything can be done with time and money. But the only point of my whole piece—which the complainant seems to have chosen deliberately to ignore—was that the racketeering dealers of whom I wrote were racketeers solely because they failed to have automobiles properly repaired.

If used-car dealers invested enough time and money to set up cars properly, there wouldn't have been any need for my article. It was written to throw some light on a dishonest and unchecked practice. Crooked used-car dealers have one thought in mind: to get their mechanical wrecks to run in the cheapest way and the shortest time, with no regard for what happens afterward. Mr. Davis's plaint doesn't alter that thesis one bit.

ELLIOTT ARNOLD

New York, December 16

"The Stones Awake"— Last Round

Dear Sirs: I think that Carleton Beals's twelve-point indictment of my accuracy as a book reviewer, in The Nation for December 5, would have been more effective had Mr. Beals been accurate himself. To say, for example, that "Mexico had no presidents named 'Gil' or 'Rubio,'" gives an unfortunate impression of pettifoggery. The presidents referred to were Emilio Portes Gil and Pascual Ortiz Rubio; and though in Spanish they are properly indexed by their double last names as "Portes Gil" and "Ortiz Rubio," in the New York Times and other American papers they are indexed merely as "Gil" and "Rubio."

The other alleged mistakes are too trivial to warrant my answering in detail here. I plead unqualifiedly guilty only to one: calling "Black River" his first instead of his second novel. As for the rest, their nature would seem to justify my praise of Mr. Beals's journalistic abilities while minimizing his talents as a novelist. He seems to forget that I was reviewing "The Stones Awake," which is a novel, and not attacking his political interpretation of Mexican history.

The British Genius

Dear Sirs: In a letter to his sister, written in 1887, William James referred to a jubilee for Queen Victoria, and then commented as follows: "... the density of British unintellectuality is a spectacle for gods. One can't imagine it or describe it. One can only see it. . . ." (Italics those of James.) In the light of recent events in England, these words may interest readers of The Nation.
